"To forgive you—what? What have I ever had to forgive in my father's friend—my father's own right hand?"

"I am keeping a secret from you," he replied, "a something which you ought to know, but which I dare not tell you—which you shall know later on when you are abroad."

"And why run out you tell me, or—trust me?"

"It concerns the life of another, and influences that life so much," he answered; "and I would be forgiven blindly in this matter."

"I do not believe I can have possibly anything to forgive," said Lucy, wonderingly.

"Yet," he responded.

"Then you are forgiven, John, with all my heart and soul. In very gratitude for all the dear old times, believe me," she exclaimed.

"Thank you, Lucy," he answered, as he took her hands in his. "You would bring back those dear old times again to me if anybody could. But that is quite impossible. There is no stepping back to the old days. It is always onward, step by step, to the night."

"Rather to the brighter day, for such good, earnest men as you."

"I am not a good man—although," he said, after a pause, "I am terribly in earnest."

"Why will you not tell me what is distressing you? Because I am a woman, weak and vain and untrustworthy?" she said.

"Because you are the woman who would be distressed with me, and to no useful purpose," he replied: "because you will go away the happier for not knowing; because to know it later on is on very much the better for us all."

"But—"

"But you must not worry me too much, child," he said, with a shade more sternness in his manner, and which she shrank from at once, it being one to her. "I can not bear more even from you."

"Very well," she answered, sadly and submissively.

"Ask at the Poste Restante, Paris, for letters now and then, will you, Lucy?"

"Of course, of course. And father or I will write to you to-morrow night, and—"

Again that strange stretching out of his big hand, and ordering her to immediate silence by a touch which seemed to turn her into stone, as the touch of a dead hand might have done.

"Don't write to me, or think of me, yet awhile, till a communication reaches Paris for you," he said, "it will be only waste of time."

"You do not wish to hear from us," she murmured.

"You and your father are going away from my life, and are anxious to go, why should you be troubled by thinking of me? What is the use of it?" he said.

"You, John Woodhatch, you are offended with us," cried Lucy, passionately now; "we have done you in your estimation—but God knows not intentionally—a grievous wrong. And we have a claim to know what you consider that wrong is."

"You have done me no wrong; I have asked your forgiveness," he said; "and there is no thought in my heart which is not for the welfare of Alec Larcom and his daughter. What more can I say than that?"

"Ah! but you do not explain."

"The explanation will be shortly on its way to you," he replied. "Do me the justice to wait for it, Lucy; and so leave me now in peace. It is the last thing I ask of you."

"I will not harass you any more," said Lucy, in response.

"Not the last thing, quite," he corrected; "there is one favor more I are going to ask."

"Well," said Lucy, "what is that?"

"Come in-doors and play me the 'Wedding March,' as you did five years ago. I should be glad to hear it once more in my life," he said.

"To hear it many times, if you will, when I come back, John."

"Come back here?" he said.

"Why, yes—why not?"

"You will never come back to Farm Foxlorn," he said, "and that is why I wish you to play for me to-day."

She would not ask him for any further explanation; he would not have given it if she had done so. He spoke in riddles, but there was no solution to them—and he spoke as if they were the explanations rather than the riddles themselves. And, moreover, he took it for granted that she and her father were leaving him forever, and were only too glad to get away from him to think of returning to the place. He seemed to imply that he was nothing in their estimation, and that it was on well for all of them it should be so, and she could only trust to time, to a few weeks or months, to disabuse his mind of so unworthy an impression. He was not himself now. The death of Hester Brake had changed him very much, the sudden departure of Greg and Kitty Vanch, and even Mrs. Chatterton, was all part of the mystery which had altered him, and which he had promised to explain when she and her father and Merice were in Paris. This was not the John Woodhatch she had ever known; presently he would be his firm, self-reliant, honest self again, and not the grave shadow of what he had been. And till that day came, she would wait in peace—wondering a little why she should think of it so deeply.

It was a strange time to play Mendelssohn's "Wedding March," a strange air to select, the day after a funeral; but it had been a favorite of his, and this was his last wish, and she was going away.

They passed into the farm parlor together, and she sat down at the grand piano he had bought for her last visit, and played with her old skill whilst he watched her, and thought of the five years since she had sat there terribly afraid of him and what he was going to say to her. She had not changed in the least, to his observation; she was the same fair haired, blue-eyed girl, whose inmost trouble had not marred, and before whom might stretch a world of happiness to come, as he prayed to find it might. He had grown gray in earnest in those five long years, and old at heart, and soured and discontented, and had lost faith in everything that claimed a friendship with him. At forty five years of age he was an old man—a very old man, he knew—without a hope in the world, and with just one fleeting, childish fancy to hear her play again in the home to which he had told her she would never come back, and which was a sore prophecy, despite all Lucy's doubts.

"Thank you," he said, very gravely, when she had finished. "It was kind of you. I will remember this always."

Before Lucy could reply, if she had thought of replying, Alec Larcom and his granddaughter Merice came into the room equipped for their journey, and looking very much astonished.

"What a time to be doddering away at the piano!" exclaimed Mr. Larcom, "and Fludge already outside with the trap. Get your things on, Lucy, for goodness' sake!"

Lucy withdrew, and Alec Larcom bustled about and looked for sticks, umbrellas, and wrappers with the customary fussiness of a man going a few miles, and ran in and out of the room half a dozen times, becoming more red and confounded with each occasion. John Woodhatch stood looking down at the piano as though Lucy was still sitting there, until little Merice touched his hand.

"Are you sorry we are going, Mister Woodhatch?" she asked, suddenly. "You look sorry—oh, so very!"

"Yes," he said; "I am sorry."

When they were outside in the roadway, little Merice, still clinging to her hand, said, suddenly:

"Why don't you come with us? We should like you to."

"Ah! you are kind to think of that, little Merice," he answered; "but that can not be."

She was the first to think of it, the only one to think of it, and he was grateful. He stooped and kissed her, placed her between her mother and grandfather, whilst Fludge clambered to the back seat, with his usual weak grin of satisfaction at everybody and everything. And then there were the final good-byes, Mr. Larcom being absent-minded and flurried, with the reins in his hands, and almost too preoccupied to say farewell, and Lucy as grave as John Woodhatch now, and with tears swimming in her eyes.

"Good-by," she murmured, "and for all kindness here, our thanks."

"Good-by," he answered, softly.

"And we'll see ye again, John, let us hope. And send us all the news, and let ye know how we're faring shortly. And good by to ye," cried the parson, flourishing his whip.

"Good-by, old Alec," he replied. But he looked at Lucy, and as they drove away he raised his big felt hat to her, and she marvelled once again at the meaning on that rugged, sunburned face.

They were gone, and he turned very quickly and like a man of business to the work he had on hand.

"Now, then," he said, sternly.

CHAPTER III.

THE SETTLEMENT OF THE ACCOUNTS.

John Woodhatch seemed to resume all his old energy with the departure of his guests from Farm Foxlorn. Before his friends, he had been reserved and stern; with their absence from his homestead, he was more like the old master than he had been during the last week—and yet, after all, the master with a difference. The friendly smile was altogether gone, and was not likely to return, with the dead weight at his heart, the eager eyes were bright and searching, without the light and love in them which had been always there, and the whole expression of the face was marked by the new determination which had been upon his mind some days, and which he had kept back from all concerned in him.

But the men about the farm, the women-servants in his employ, were to be told readily what he had concealed from Larcom and his daughter, the hour had come to tell them, and he had been waiting for it patiently. With the exodus of his last friends—or those who professed to be his friends still, he thought bitterly—there had arrived the hour for action, and the time to end it all.

"Let everybody on the farm come to me in hall an hour's time," he said to those who were nearest to him at the moment after the Larcoms' departure, then he strode away, and was busy in his own rooms until the time appointed. He wrote two letters there—one to Mrs Gregory Dorward, 10 Bolter's Rents, Drury Lane, and a second to Mrs. Brake, Poste Restante, Paris—and they were both dashed off at a rate which betokened he had made up his mind what to say, and how to say it. Those letters he put in the breast-pocket of his coat, to post at some future period with his own hands; then he packed with the same haste a big portmanteau which he had not used since his last trip to London, five years ago, thrusting in clothes, papers, bank-notes, loose money, with very little heed as to the method of arrangement. A man bent on flight from his pursuers would have packed in that wild fashion, as against time, which might diseonfit him, if he were not quick in preparation; and set, when the task was accomplished, he sat down and scarcely let his mark in a dreamy, almost fashion.

To the minute of the appointed time he was at his post in the farm parlor, with a crowd of eager, unshorned faces surrounding him, looking in at the windows, peering round the doors—the whole retinue of Farm Foxlorn, the rank and file of the grim regiment which he had enlisted in his service, and, as he had hoped, as God's, until this day of disappointment. They were all there, and, massed together thus, presented a strange feature of the scene—a record, as it were—and as he thought in that hour—of the hopeless nature of the task which he had set himself so long ago to carry out.

No wonder he had failed, with this material to work upon, and with his one theory that man required but his chance to pass from darkness into light, seeing the one example in himself of what an honest resolution might aspire to. All the his new intolerable concert, he knew now, for in himself he was a total failure! He had failed in securing happiness, or confidence, or common respect—no one trusted him, and everybody turned away from him when self-interest, or a blind selfishness which knew not what was best, impelled man or woman to take the side against him. He had been simply tolerated all these years, and there was no one really to care for him, and plenty of folk to suspect him and his motives, and to set against him always the history of his early life. No one had believed in repentance but himself, and his had been a mad belief which had ended in this fashion. So be it. He had done his best, but it was not for a man like him to succeed in Christian work. He was not good enough. He gave up, now, for good!

In a few words he told this in his startled listeners, regarding them gravely, to parts of the gigantic failure to which he had succumbed, but he spoke not unkindly, only like one who had made up his mind to end this comedy of philanthropy summarily and completely.

"You will do as well without me in the world as with me, lads," he concluded, "you will get your living, most of you, honestly and fairly, I hope—and there will be no one to preach at you any more. It is a wide country, and there is plenty of room, and, after all, it is not the worst recommendation to come from Woodhatch's farm. And so good luck to you, men and women, and don't forget the master altogether. He will think of you very often."

The faces bereaved blank astonishment rather than regret, but there were one or two lips quivering in the crowd, one or two hearts touched by the few rough words of explanation he had proffered them, one or two rugged, desperate natures which he had distrusted most, the most affected and cast down.

"And now you have only to receive your wages in advance—to pack up to-day and go," he said, drawing a large canvas bag of money on his side.

"Now?" echoed one or two, and "To-day?" was murmured like a chorus in the background.

"It all ends in another hour—and I shall be very glad if you have all left by that time," he answered. "It will put you to some inconvenience, especially you women, but I will remember that in your wages. Money must make the amends it can for the extra trouble which I give you. And if you are not satisfied with what I give, tell me so at once; there will be no time for reparation the next day."

"But the horses—the crops—the stock?" asked many wondering voices.

"They are sold. The stock will be fetched away almost immediately," he added, looking at his watch.

"And the farm, sir—who takes the farm?"

* Begun in Harper's Weekly No. 1308.

"No one takes it," he answered, "it is my own property, and will not be let again. This is Farm Foulern, and will remain so to the end."

They did not understand him, but they asked him no more questions. There was that in his looks which checked further inquiries from his dependents; there had been always times when John Woodhatch was a man not be trifled with, or even reasoned with, and this was one of them. They were to receive their wages and depart; and they were liberal wages which he paid them in full of all demands, being prom that day to mark their progress with gold pieces. Only one man of the number responded to the hint conveyed to them a few minutes ago, and he had been there but three weeks, and had been dissatisfied from the moment of his advent. He turned the money over in his hand, and thought it was not sufficient, considering the lateness of the season, and the long distance to his native place, where there might be but only chance of getting work again; but to John Woodhatch put his hand mechanically into his money bag the man was hustled in last haste from the room, and thrust out by impetuous and indignant force into the roadway The master did not seem to notice this outburst of virtuous feeling—he received that his liberality should not be imposed upon by this new "greedy hound"—and presently he was sitting there alone, having shaken hands with the last servant and received the last good wishes for his future welfare

And there he sat till they were gone, the noise and confusion in the big farm-house troubling him not at all. New came from distant farms, true to their appointed hour, and drove away every living thing upon the estate; the servants melted by degrees, there was a grand exodus toward Skegs Shore village, a long procession of people who were not living in the cottages round about the farm, and who, seized with John Woodhatch's impetuosity, hastened away as once.

Reuben Fladge, bringing the horse and trap homeward from the parson's house, pulled up, dismayed, at the first group which he encountered, and bawled forth his questions as to the meaning of it all, receiving it with open mouth and blinking eyes, and gasping for his breath after the news had been imparted to him

"It's a lie, it ain't so. I tell you it's a lie" he shouted, as he drove off again, stopping at each fresh group he met upon the way and echoing the same questions, and vociferating his indignant denial of it all after each fresh supply of information, flourishing over his whip above his head in his excitement, and like the poor, half mad thing he was.

"It ain't true. He wouldn't have forgot me like this, or told me aught about it. It's every bit a lie," he was muttering to himself still when he reached the farm, where he found the doors closed and the windows barred, as if Death had stepped into the house again. But the master was waiting for him. He had not forgotten him All had been thought out very carefully, and John Woodhatch had never been more methodical.

He stepped out of the house, with the big portmanteau in his hands, and pitched it into the trap by the side of Reuben Fladge.

"You'll have to drive back to Skegs Shore, Fladge, and leave this with the mamma-master I will call for it before the last tram to Hull comes in to-night."

"But—but you ain't a-going away all at once like this?" jerked forth Fladge, "you ain't going to leave me here alone, master, without you? Oh! that can't be!"

"There, there; we must not have any raving in the broad daylight, Fladge," said John Woodhatch, taken aback by the demonstrative fellow, and remembering suddenly the hour of a previous parting with him, and the trouble he had been; "just sit there and listen to my instructions."

A firm, decisive tone was best with Reuben Fladge when the fit was on him of rash impulsiveness. The servant looked hard at the master, but was silent and attentive.

"You understand about that portmanteau—what I want done with it?" said John Woodhatch. Then he reiterated his instructions, and Reuben Fladge nodded his head, and, when the master had concluded, said,

"I'll take care of it till you come"

"No. You will leave it at the station, I tell you"

"But, look here—"

John Woodhatch would not wait for Reuben Fladge's argument upon this part of the question, but went on with further instructions as to the future course of action of his subordinate.

"You will drive from the station to Heathorpe —to Tolland's farm—and there remain till you hear from me."

"You said I wasn't to go there ever any more," Fladge muttered. "I don't like Tolland's farm."

"Why?"

"It ain't like home," he answered, sullenly; "this has only been my home There's been bad luck somewhere else"

"Try and like it, Fladge. It may be yours some day," was the reply

"Mine! No, no! What would be the good of it to me?" he cried.

"Sell it, then, and do something better with the money For it is yours, man," said Woodhatch, "and the deeds will reach you to-morrow to your own house"

"Good Lord!" exclaimed Fladge.

"At all events, it's a chance," remarked the master "And every man should have his chance. Don't you see that yet?"

Fladge shook his head, and flicked the ears of the horse before him with his whip. He had recovered his equanimity, and was sullen and passive enough now.

"I don't want anything o' that sort," he said, "It's not in my line—it's not what I've been used to."

"There will be money to your account in Heathorpe Bank, and you can't make a worse failure of it than I have. And," he added, "you may succeed."

"No—I shouldn't."

"But the thing is done," said John Woodhatch, with an angry stamp of his foot, "and can not be undone. You are the one man I have wronged in my life, in thinking you were the murderer of Morris Brake, and yet you are the only one who has been faithful to me, and will be sorry when I here gone I am rich, and you are a poor dolt, locked down upon in Lincolnshire—and it is settled you shall have this farm You hear this? Do with it what you will when I am gone—that is nothing to me—I shall not care what you do."

"Where are you going, master?" asked Fladge

"That is a question you have no right to ask."

"Can't I go with you?"

"No. Impossible"

"That's all I want. No Woodhatch," said Reuben, very thickly—"to be with you—as ever you. I don't want no more than that—and not having it, nothin's any good to me And I won't take nothin', and that's God's truth"

John Woodhatch turned away and walked the whole length of Farm Forlorn before he came back in the choice in which this black-visaged being was ensconced He was almost unmanned. Here was one creature, at least, and at last, of his work not having been in vain. A strange, loutsome evidence of his success, but marked by real gratitude and an unselfish affection, even of the rarest qualities under the sun.

"I am going away alone, and a long distance, where I shall be only at peace alone, Fladge," he said, "and I am never coming back."

"Oh, don't say that! All of a sudden, too, like this"

"And you will make me going away a harder task than it is by taking any notice of it. And so, Fladge, drive to Tolland's farm after you have been to Skegs Shore again, and think it your home, and begin life afresh there"

"It ain't fit for me," muttered Fladge

"I wish it."

"Ay," said Fladge, with a shout nod, and a little now looking at the master again

John Woodhatch walked back to the house, passed in and closed the door behind him, thus terminating all further discussion with the dull-witted subordinate He had issued his decree, and there was an end of it, he thought. He would benefit the man who did not care for benefits, and to whom benefits would not do any good. So much more waste money, but that did not matter. He could only after his money, and his love, to a wealthy like this, and though that might do even harm to such a being as Reuben Fladge, it was all he could do.

Reuben looked over his shoulder as the door of the farm-house closed noisily and took the hint which was conveyed by it. His master had not wished him good-by, and, though he might think he had blubbered with his thou, he was out of his reckoning this time, and on a mistake. Reuben stared for a while at the farm-house, at the closed windows and doors, at the aspect of desolation which it seemed already to possess, and then, with a half groan, half sigh, born of the excess of thought which was troubling him that day, he drove off slowly in the direction of the railway station

[To be continued.]

OUNCES OF PREVENTION.

OPEN FIRES.

Whether it is of wood or coal, the virtues of an open fire are these: Be its peculiar heat action it warms the air and a room less than its walls and less than the occupants of the room, producing a comfortable warmth. It gives the most thorough ventilation, and it is the most cheerful as well an comfortable source of heat. Its faults are its expensiveness, and the greater trouble required in taking care of it.

Why does an open fire give a comfortable heat when the heat from a system of pipes is often oppressive, and sometimes stifling? Because of the great difference between the ways in which the fire and the hot pipes dispense their heat The heat rays from an open fire pass directly through the air without much heating it, they heat any solid object in their way, whether it be the walls and furniture of the room or the person of the sitter, but they leave the air itself cool until this is heated in turn by radiation from the walls. The occupant of the room does not have to wait for this secondary radiation, he is impartially and promptly warmed, like any other solid object in the room, by the direct glow of the fire, while the air around him may remain comparatively cool. It does not, in point of fact, get to be quite as warm as the walls and furniture, while by choosing a less or greater distance from the fire, or by the use of screens, you can adjust the heat of direct radiation exactly to your personal comfort

This is not the case with any other system of heating. Warmed pipes, a stove at anything short of red heat, and a hot-air register directly heat the air itself, leaving the walls comparatively cool. The room is full of hot air, which you can not temper instantly to your comfort as you can temper the radiation of the open fire, while the walls remain cooler than the air when these heating appliances are used, and abstract heat from the occupants of the room instead of supplying heat to them, as they do when warmed by the open fire

For these reasons the open fire is the most comfortable way of heating. As to its merits in producing ventilation, an open fire "is powerful enough to draw into the room all the air it wants, and for this purpose will not indiscriminately all openings, whether inlets or outlets, if necessary" If, as often happens, when this is cold, and the house is not tightly built, the fire may easily cause too much ventilation, so that the feet become chill ed, and the temperature of the room does not reach a comfortable degree of warmth. In such a case a register supplying warmed air from a furnace below is a necessary supplement to the open fires; a similar compensation is needed in large buildings where hot pipes are used to warm the halls. The open fire, indeed, is often in one climate a luxury for a single room, rather than a sufficient means of heating the house, but the open fire is a great comfort. Other sources of heat may usefully supplement it; but no other, an whatever expense of money and ingenuity contrivance, can take the place of it. I have known more than one builder of his own house who has found out that no winter comfort was by no means wholly decided by the height of the thermometer

The cheerfulness of the open fire requires no eulogy. But the open flame, whether of wood, soft coal, or hard coal, is a costly luxury Soft coal is with or one of the most expensive kinds of fuel, but it is worth remembering that one good load of it upon a hard-coal fire will fill a room with cheerful flame for hours.

Of the heat furnished be an ordinary open coal fire only about one-eighth is radiated in a room This waste has led inventors to contrive various means for retaining a part of the heat that escapes directly up the chimney The principle is as warm an ascending current of air in proximity to the fire, but not to an excessive degree, and to discharge the air near the top of the room. Gallon has devised one of the best of these contrivances, but it is little known in this country. In any fire-place the forms and materials employed make a good deal of difference with the amount of heat saved. Brick and tiles are better than iron for the backing, the grate should project a certain distance into the room, and a projecting chimney piece absorbs and radiates a considerable amount of heat. The fashion, now going out, of concealing the mantel piece with a board, suitably trimmed and decorated, was thus a thrifty as well as a pretty one, the fringes and other coverings of the false mantel-piece serving to retain and distribute the heat of the fire beneath.

The hob is an attachment that should be found upon the grate of every open fire. Any one can make a good hob in five minutes. Take a piece of iron wire one fifth of an inch in diameter and twice as twenty four inches long, bend it into the shape of a long capital I, fire or six inches broad, put the points of this I between the two upper grate bars and bend down the loop of it until it stays level, and you will have a convenient movable hob, and quite as good a one as can be bought for money The hob and kettle are very serviceable for evaporating water, according to the plan I have recommended for keeping the air moist. A hob thus makes the grate fire in the parlor more beautiful, while the tea-kettle simmering upon it adds its own element of domestic comfort. TITUS B. HEDGE COAN.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

A CAVALIER who is a stickler for independence in political action spent a recent election day in his cellar, where solicitors for votes couldn't find him.

By the aid of an electric device German engineers have successful recently in procuring very accurate photographic views of the earth from ascending balloons.

It is claimed that Georgia contributed the word bogus to the vocabulary of the United States The story is that one William A. Bogus conducted a land lottery in Augusta, and succeeded in swindling nearly everybody there before he decamped for Arkansas.

Professor Proctor says that Jupiter is in the state in which the earth was thirty-four million years ago. Thus does the progressive science of astronomy usurp the functions of the oldest inhabitant.

The earliest product of the spring, the foliage of kite nets on telegraph wires, will soon make its appearance.

In a Wheeling (West Virginia) theatre a man in the audience hissed when others applauded. A policeman arrested him on the charge of having made a disturbance.

"Did not the applause make more noise than the hissing?" the judge asked a witness on the following morning

The witness said he supposed it did.

"Did the officer arrest those who applauded?" was another question

And the witness said, with some surprise, that he did not.

"Then," said the judge, "I will discharge this prisoner. The right to applaud implies the right to hiss."

When an artist, professional man, or tradesman in England secures the patronage of some noted person, he is said to be "in the swim," and his fortune is made. Lord Beaconsfield employed a physician who was "a cross between an old school and a new school" The doctor was thereafter "in the swim," and now his practice is enormous.

It is said that the Mormon missionaries in the South have never made a negro convert to Mormonism.

There came in the Governor a few days ago a letter addressed to "Mrs. Grover Cleveland," in which the wife of a Mississippi legislator wrote that she had named her boy after "your illustrious husband," and begged the photographs and autographs of the Governor and the hypothetical Mrs Cleveland, and a present which might be kept for the child. The bachelor Governor was in doubt as to whether he ought to open the envelope, and the council of State officers that sat on the question was divided in opinion. The Governor cast a deciding vote in favor of breaking the seal. He will grant the woman's request as far as we at present in his power.

They tell us an elderly Parisian paper who, while making his way home in the darkness, stumbled up against the iron railing surrounding the base of the Obelisk. After circling around the shaft several times, feeling his way as he went, he cried in despair, "Oh, the miserable wretches! they've gone and locked me in."

The Illustrated London News has a picture of Mr Gladstone "falling" a tree. "The attitude of the venerable statesman," says a Canadian journal, "and the shape of the cut, throw a flood of light on what has hitherto been a mystery, namely, how it was that he did not long ago run out of trees."

According to a writer in Washington, women dressed in costly attire, but wearing very soiled shoes, were seen standing on the new satin covered furniture at one of the White House receptions, in order that they might obtain a view of what was going on in the Blue Room.

It is suggested that Ex-Senator Tabor, of Colorado, should write a book entitled Thirty Days in the United States Senate, after Benton's Thirty Years in the United States Senate, and that, if prepared with equal fidelity to actual occurrences, it could not fail to be very entertaining.

On March 12 a trustee of the East River Bridge told that the bridge would be opened in sixty days. Adding sixty days' "grace" for delays resulting from unforeseen causes it may be considered probable that the bridge will be in use by the middle of July.

A member of the Maine Legislature declared that he was opposed to a certain bill "in toto and senatim." The Boston Herald says that if he had known more Latin his opposition would have been stronger.

Wendell Phillips recently told a visitor how near the history of the abolition struggle came to being written by Garrison—the man, said Phillips, who ought to have a rotten it, and a be meant to. "At one time he took a retired study for the purpose, moved his books and papers into it, planning to work at the matter diligently, and—never entered the room again."

It is said that Richard Dalton, the nine-year-old son of the superintendent of the Senate folding-room, is the only person who ever remained in the Senate-chamber during an executive session who was not a sworn officer on that body. This he did on the Sunday on which the last session came to a close. When his father asked him why he remained in the chamber, he gave the very natural reason that he wanted to see what the Senators did.

One of the weather prophets, doubtless thinking it was time that something be done to protect his class from popular ungenerous, predicted rain for St. Patrick's Day. A patriotic wearer of the green, who has "walked" on every St. Patrick's Day for nearly half a century, was once asked on the eve of that anniversary what he thought the prospect was for pleasant weather on the morrow. The old man shook his head dubiously "But I don't know," he said, brightening up, "there was some fuss Patrick's Day. I think it was along in the thirties."

The Governor of Michigan has pardoned Samuel Ullman, who was sentenced at Kalamazoo in 1855 to life imprisonment for murder After twenty-eight years Ullman's innocence has been proved. Regret for the great wrong inflicted upon him should take the form of some effort to make reparation. His case is another warning against taking the still greater hazard of inflicting capital punishment on the strength of circumstantial evidence.

The Atlanta Constitution says, gleefully: "The 'possum season is about over, but the Georgia pusher yam is at its juiciest. This is where the Empire State of the newest sunny Southland gets away with the rest of the world"

In Brunswick, Maine, a woman's pet cat fell sick The family physician treated the sufferer, but with no good result The undertaker measured its remains in a $12 50 casket, and its mistress called her husband in Europe that the end had come.

A rural member of the New Jersey Assembly introduced a bill some time ago "to prevent the spread of contagious diseases of animals," which provided that poultry dying of a contagious disease should be buried within twenty-four hours, not less than two feet under-ground, and imposed a heavy penalty for violations of the law The bill slumbered in a committee until a day or two ago, when some one managed to get interred in it the following section, which appeared in the printed bill as the members' desks

"Section 2. And be it enacted that there shall be erected over the grave, tomb, or sepulchre of each deceased hen, cat, goose, duck, dog, drake, peacock, rat, polecat, or other fowl, a suitable tombstone, tablet, or monument, not to exceed fifty feet in height, or to cost more than $12 50, upon which shall be inscribed the species, sex, and age of said deceased, and what knocked him out, with suitable poetical finish."

SCENE IN THE BAZAR.

GLASS-BEAD SHOP IN THE BAZAR.

SKETCHES IN CAIRO.

WOMEN BRINGING IN THE RED SEA.

THE CAPITAL OF EGYPT.

The bazars of the Egyptian capital, with their little niches rather than shops, occupied by different classes of tradesmen sitting from [illegible] amidst the pile of their customary wares, afford great [illegible] of costume and character, in which the artist [illegible] for the [illegible]. The sale of personal [illegible] for the [illegible] East, to [illegible] who [illegible] on trust their persons as [illegible] care, forms a considerable [illegible] trade; and necklaces of glass beads, though it [illegible] that the beads were made in Birmingham, are in constant request among the ladies, who come to the bazar wrapped up in shawls and veils, according to Mussulman rules of feminine modesty, to buy the trinkets which they wear in the secluded harem, either to please the eyes of their lords and masters, or to provoke the envy of less-favored sisters in the domestic habitation.

As a sentiment to this rather frivolous trade, the next sketch presents the wild-looking figures of Bedouin Arabs from the bordering countries on the [illegible] of the Red [illegible], who have brought in the Cairo market spoils of the chase, horns and tusks of hunted animals, or valuable skins for the tanner, or precious ostrich, gums, and other gifts of nature, to be purchased by Syrian and Coptic merchants. The laborious class of porters, or carriers of burdens, as in every such place, are deemed to waste much of their time in waiting for hire; they can not always indulge in coffee and cigarettes, however cheap, but they can always go to sleep.

Cairo is interesting to travellers as being the chief centre of Mohammedan learning and culture, and also from the fact that in architecture and general appearance it is one of the most characteristic of Oriental cities. The older portions of the city have narrow and crooked streets, are ill kept and badly paved, but there are hundreds of beautiful mosques, and many old private residences and palaces of great magnificence.

1. Mount Ætna, Catania in Foreground. 2. Mountaineer. 3. On the Edge of the Crater. 4. The English House. 5. An Ascent by Night.

ASCENT OF MOUNT ÆTNA, SICILY.

MOUNT ÆTNA.

Mount Ætna, called by the Sicilians Mongibello, a corruption of the Saracen "Gibbel Uttamat," or Mountain of Fire, rises to the height of nearly eleven thousand feet above the level of the sea. Viewed from a distance, the cone presents a symmetrical appearance, but climbers find it to be exceedingly diversified, and studded with a large number of minor cones. Looking down from the central cone, one beholds a most beautiful prospect, the minor elevations being picturesquely grouped, and rocks clothed with wood.

About eighty eruptions of Ætna are recorded in history, and one of the most remarkable took place in 1792. The overflow of lava continued for a whole year, the burning streams being often thirty feet in height. In 1669, during a terrific eruption, a lava stream reached the ramparts of Catania, sixty feet high, and poured over in a fiery cascade. The solidified lava may still be seen curling over the top of the ramparts like a frozen water-fall. In the eruption of 1809 the overflow of lava was not confined to the principal crater. At numerous places below in the mountain opened, and from these chasms issued fiery and devastating streams, which, moving in their downward flow, formed a river of molten lava eighteen miles long, a mile in width, and thirty feet in height. This eruption was accompanied with violent explosions.

The appearance of Mount Ætna as seen from the entrance to the harbor of Catania is shown in sketch No. 1. At the foot of the mountain lies the beautiful city of Catania, supposed to have been founded by the Phœnicians. No. 3 is the principal crater, the interior of which is incrusted with sulphur and salts to the depth of about one hundred yards. The bottom of the crater is quite level and hard; but the adventurous climbers who descend to it during periods of mountain quietude are often startled by sinking up to their knees in the loose cinders.

The English House, or Casa Inglesi (sketch No. 4), was originally built by Englishmen, and hence its name. The present structure was erected by the Italian government, and is rented to mountaineers at a small rate per day. It is furnished with wooden benches, arranged against the wall. The building is also used as an observatory. It stands about two miles from the edge of the crater, and is covered with snow from August to the middle of June.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE

Is non-alcoholic to of great value. Its action on the nerves of the disturbed stomach is soothing and effective.—[Adv.]

COMFORT! WARMTH! LIFE!

Allcock's Porous Plasters impart vitality and vigor to the blood and fill it with nervous energy. A distinguished lawyer said: "I have on Allcock's plasters and feel like an electric battery."

Frauds may imitate the appearance of Allcock's plasters and call them porous, but to everything else they are dead failures.—[Adv.]

LADIES

Can improve their Complexion, remove pimples, blotches, freckles, and restore their gray hair to its natural color by using Dr. Tourle's Victoria Lavender. Established in 1867, and unrivaled perfectly harmless. Sold by all the druggists. Depot, 61 Murray Street.—[Adv.]

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral is a household word all over the world. For over 30 years it has advertised itself by its merits. It is now advertised to warn the public against counterfeits. The genuine article is manufactured by Dr. J. C. Ayer & Sons.—[Adv.]

An Answer to This Many "Brown's Bronchial Troches" are the most popular article in this country or Europe for Throat Diseases and Coughs, and like paper-hority is based upon real merit. Sold only at home.—[Adv.]

BURNETT'S COCOAINE

Has received universal endorsement. No other preparation possesses such remarkable properties for nourishing and strengthening the hair and rendering it soft and glossy. It cures baldness and eradicates dandruff. Burnett's Flavoring Extracts are the best.—[Adv.]

Mr. overworked wife was restored to perfect health by Parker's Ginger Tonic.—Pastor Eight M. E. Church.—[Adv.]

C. C. Beattie, Furrier, 160 Prince Street, N. Y., will send Fur Fashion Book free to any address.—[Adv.]

Halford Sauce—The standard relish. Of all the cheese embitterers Halford Sauce is the best.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

ROYAL

BAKING POWDER

Absolutely Pure.

This powder never varies. A marvel of purity, strength, and wholesomeness. More economical than the ordinary kinds, and cannot be sold in competition with the multitude of low-test, short-weight, alum or phosphate powders. Sold only in cans.

Royal Baking Powder Co., 106 Wall Street, N. Y.

MINTON'S ART AND ENAMELED TILES.

China Works, Stoke-upon-Trent.

Also, THE CAMPBELL BRICK & TILE CO'S Encaustic and Geometrical Floor Tiles, Mosaics, &c.

THOS. A. PINWALL & SON, 75 & 77 West 23d St., New York.

Sole Agents in the United States.

TIMKEN SPRING VEHICLES!

Easiest riding Vehicle made. Rides as easy with one person as with two. The springs [illegible] according to the weight they carry. Equally well adapted to either carriage pole or thill. Used by Queen of China, Sir Morton Peto and many of the leading Carriage Builders in England, and by all the leading Carriage Builders in America.

HENRY TIMKEN, Patentee. ST. LOUIS, MO.

NURSERIES AT FLUSHING, N. Y.

LATE OF

R. B. PARSONS & CO.

ORNAMENTAL TREES AND SHRUBS

[illegible] and large discounts. For catalogues, address

A. B. PARSONS, Nur., Flushing, N. Y.

CHARLETON'S TREASURY of KNOWLEDGE

[illegible]

ESTABLISHED 1818

Beware of Counterfeits

Copenhagen 7 Prize Medals Peter F. Heering's Cherry Cordial Gold Medal 1878 Paris.

Purveyor to [illegible] and H. R. H. the Prince of Wales.

And by special appointment to the Imperial Russian Court.

Sole Agent for the United States, JOHN DE KUYPER & SONS, Union Square, New York.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1878.

BAKER'S Breakfast Cocoa.

Warranted absolutely pure Cocoa, from which the excess of Oil has been removed. It has three times the strength of Cocoa mixed with Starch, Arrowroot or Sugar, and is therefore far more economical, and is therefore far more economical, as it is delicious, nourishing, strengthening, easily digested, and admirably adapted for invalids as well as for persons in health.

Sold by Grocers everywhere.

W. BAKER & CO., Dorchester, Mass.

D. M. FERRY & CO'S ILLUSTRATED DESCRIPTIVE PRICED SEED ANNUAL FOR 1883.

will be mailed free to all who apply. It is a handsome book of [illegible] pages, and contains about 150 pages, 400 Illustrations, prices, accounts, descriptions and valuable directions for planting the varieties of Vegetable and Flower Seeds, Bulbs, Fruit Trees, etc. Invaluable to all, especially to Market Gardeners. Send for it!

D. M. FERRY & CO. DETROIT, MICH.

IMPORTED TILES & MOSAICS IN HEARTHS, FACINGS, BATH ROOMS & FLOORS. GRATES, FENDERS, ANDIRONS &c. EDWARD BOOTE 11 EAST 19TH ST. N.Y.

TAMAR INDIEN GRILLON

[illegible] to the Patent Medicines, [illegible] Constipation, Sick Headache, Indigestion, [illegible] Prepared by E. GRILLON, Sole Proprietor, [illegible] Pharmacien de 1re classe de la Faculté de Paris, Ex-Interne des Hôpitaux de Paris. Sold by Druggists.

TAMAR GRILLON is so mild that the most delicate can take it with perfect safety, and is agreeable to take and never produces nausea.

50 Doses. Beware of Imitations. Genuine Grillon Tamar on the signature of E. GRILLON. 10c. & $1.00 a Box; Mexico, [illegible]

THE BRADLEY

ROAD CART

About 1/2 the actual size of the cut.

We also make a full line of Carriages, Buggies, Phaetons, Cabs, Speeding Carts, Surreys, Pony Phaetons, Road Wagons, Harness, Saddles, Whips, Robes, Blankets, Horse Clothing, Trunks, Valises, Bags, &c., and sell direct to consumers at wholesale prices. Send for Illustrated Price List.

FIVE STYLES Weighing from 200 to 300 lbs. Prices from $60 to $90. Can be used by anybody. Use one horse or pair. Send for Illustrated Price List.

BRADLEY & CO. SYRACUSE, N. Y. ESTABLISHED 1833.

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

EPPS'S COCOA.

BREAKFAST.

"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately flavored beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

Made simply with boiling water or milk. Sold in tins only (½ lb. and 1 lb.) by Grocers, labelled thus:

JAMES EPPS & Co., Homœopathic Chemists, London, England.

[illegible] L. PINKE, Jr., [illegible] 25 John St., [illegible] P. O. Box 1926.

KEEP YOUR BIRD IN HEALTH [illegible] Depot, 582 Hudson Street, N. Y.

PENN MUTUAL Life Insurance Company OF PHILADELPHIA.

Net Assets, December 31, 1881 $7,514,663 00

Receipts during the year, For Premiums $1,626,136 00 For Interest 440,737 36 2,066,873 36

$9,581,536 36

DISBURSEMENTS.

Claims by Death $447,703 00

Matured Endowments 64,932 00

Surrendered Policies 207,206 34

Cash and Note Dividends 4,194 20

Re-insurances 26,169 58

Total paid policy-holders $750,205 12

Taxes and Legal Expenses 75,194 01

Salaries, Medical Fees, and Office Expenses 126,927 20

Commissions to Agents, 65,650 99

Rents, &c. 17,886 91

Agency and other Expenses 1,395,799 33

Advertising, Printing, Stationery, &c. 7,540 26

Fire Insurance, Office Furniture, &c. $2,904,708 03

Net Assets, Jan'y 1, 1882. $6,676,828 33

ASSETS.

Public Stocks and other Loans, R. E. $2,894,264 00

Pledges and Bonds, Bank and other Stocks 2,846,451 00

Mortgages and Ground Rents 688,882 75

Premium Notes secured by Policies, &c. 648,567 00

Premium on Collaterals, 1882 500,778 00

Home Office and Real Estate bought to meet Loans 64,000 00

Cash in Trust Companies and on hand $7,642,793 75

Cash in Trust Companies and on hand 1,038,573 00

Interest due and accrued 84,000 44

Market Value of Stocks, &c., over cost 397,000 00

Gross Assets, January 1, 1882 $9,162,367 19

LIABILITIES.

Losses reported, but not due $105,454 00

Reserve at 4 per cent. to re-insure risks 6,004,000 00

Insurance Rate Reserve, Surplus on Life Rate Reserve, &c., and Deferred Surplus, 4 per cent. basis 1,402,794 00 $7,409,207 75

Surplus at 4½ per cent., Pennsylvania $1,753,160 44

Standard (calculated) 14,978

Number of Policies in force $33,794,522

Amount of Insurance in force 2,816

Number of Policies issued in 1881 $6,468,649

Amount Insured in 1881

SAMUEL C. HUEY, President.

EDWARD M. NEEDLES, Vice-President.

JOS. S. STEPHENS, 2d Vice-President.

JESSE J. BARKER, Actuary HENRY C. BROWN, Secretary

KNOX & DE FOREST, General Agents, 181 Broadway, New York.

APRIL FOOL.

Beware of spurious or prepared Chocolate Cream Drops for April Fools. The only genuine are made by the STANDARD CHOCOLATE COMPANY, P. O. Box 3618, N. Y. City.

CAMPBELL'S Self-Acting Window Shade Rollers.

Admitted Superior to All Others

Ask your upholsterer for them.

Salesroom, 239 Centre Street, N. Y.

$83.00 FOR ONLY $59.00 FREIGHT PREPAID

BEATTY'S PARLOR ORGANS ONLY $59

Regular Price $83.00 Without Stool, Book and Music.

24 STOPS, [illegible]

FIVE SET REEDS. [illegible]

SPECIAL TEN-DAY OFFER.

If you will remit me $59 and the accompanying Coupon within 10 days from the date hereof, I will box and ship you this Organ, with Organ Bench, Book etc., exactly the same as I sell for $83. You should order at once, as I may dispose of this offer sooner than 10 days. One year's later trial given and a full warrantee for six years.

Given under my Hand and Seal this 24th day of March, 1882.

Daniel F. Beatty,

COUPON On receipt of this Coupon and $59 in cash by Bank Draft, Post Office Money Order, Registered Letter or by Check on your bank, I will forward within 10 days from the date hereof, one of my [illegible] Organs, with Stool, Book and Music, as per my offer as above. Dated this 24th day of March, 1882. $59

DANIEL F. BEATTY.

FREIGHT PREPAID. As a further inducement to you [illegible] I agree to prepay freight on the above organ to your nearest railroad freight station, any point east of the Mississippi River, or that far on any going west of it. This is a rare opportunity to [illegible] at once, as it may be a very long time before I make you such an offer again. Remember, no money saved by correspondence.

HOW TO ORDER. Enclosed find $59 for organ. I have read your statement in this advertisement, and understand that I am to receive the organ described in this advertisement, and if not as represented in this advertisement, you will refund my money. Ship the organ at once. Name, Post Office, County, State, Freight Station, and on what Railroad. Be sure to remit by Bank Draft, P. O. Money Order, Registered Letter or Check. You may accept by telegraph at our cost and remit by mail. Address all communications to DANIEL F. BEATTY, Washington, New Jersey

E. Ridley & Sons,
Grand, Allen, & Orchard Sts., N. Y.

EASTER NOVELTIES,
COMPRISING
FRINGED CARDS, EASELS, and BANNERETTES.
ALSO, SPECIAL DESIGNS IN EGG AND BIRD PIECES.

JERSEYS.
THE LA DIVA JERSEY, MADE OF FINEST CASHMERE JERSEY FABRICS, HAVING REVERS COLLAR, SIDE POCKETS, AND FANPLAITED BACKS, FURNISHED WITH HANDSOME SATIN BOWS,

AT $5 95;
Sold Elsewhere at $7 50 and $8 50.

SPRING NUMBER
RIDLEY'S FASHION MAGAZINE
CONTAINS VALUABLE INFORMATION ON THE LATEST FASHIONS, AND SHOULD BE IN EVERY HOUSEHOLD, AS IT ENABLES ONE TO SHOP THROUGH THE MAIL AND ENJOY THE SAME ADVANTAGES as are HAD AT OUR COUNTERS.
Single Copies, 15c.; or, 50c. per Annum.

EDW. RIDLEY & SONS,
309, 311, 311½ to 317 Grand St.,
[illegible] to 70 ALLEN ST.,
[illegible] ORCHARD ST., NEW YORK.

STATEN ISLAND
FANCY DYEING ESTABLISHMENT,
Office, 5 & 7 John St., New York.
BRANCH OFFICES: 1199 Broadway, near 29th St., N. Y.; 279 Fulton St., Brooklyn; 47 North Eighth St., Philadelphia; 43 North Charles St., Baltimore.
Dye, Clean, and Refinish [illegible] Ladies' Dresses, Cloaks, Robes, &c., [illegible] cleaned or dyed [illegible] of the most elaborate styles [illegible] fully without ripping.
Gentlemen's Garments cleaned or dyed whole. Curtains, Window Shades, Table Covers, Carpets, &c., cleaned or dyed. Employing the best attainable skill and most improved appliances, and having systematized anew every department of our business, we can confidently promise the best results and unusually prompt return of goods. Correspondence invited. Goods received and returned by express and by mail.
BARRETT, NEPHEWS & CO.,
5 and 7 John St., N. Y.

DRY GOODS BY MAIL. [illegible] Jordan, Marsh & Co., Boston, Mass.

CATARRH

SANFORD'S RADICAL CURE.
Head Colds, Watery Discharges from the Nose and Eyes, Ringing Noises in the Head, Nervous Headache and Fever instantly relieved.
Choking mucus dislodged, membrane cleansed and healed, breath sweetened, smell, taste and hearing restored and ravages checked.
Cough, Bronchitis, Droppings into the Throat, Pains in the Chest, Dyspepsia, Wasting of Strength and Flesh, Loss of Sleep, etc., cured.
One bottle Radical Cure, one box Catarrhal Solvent and one Dr. Sanford's Inhaler, in one package, of all druggists, for $1. Ask for SANFORD'S RADICAL CURE. WEEKS & POTTER, Boston.

WANTED
ENERGETIC LADIES of good address to sell
STANDARD LAUNDRY WAX.
The goods are first-class, cheap, and sell readily. For particulars, address G. H. FOLJAMBE, Room 10, Standard Block, Cleveland, Ohio.

CHEAPEST PLANTS & SEEDS. 750,000 THRIFTY PLANTS FOR SALE.
[illegible] $1. [illegible] $200 IN CASH [illegible] FREE. LEEDS & CO., Richmond, Indiana.

FREE NEW ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE OF Scrap Pictures, Visiting and Advertising Cards, Palettes and Printing Presses, including new set of Imported Cards sent to any address for 3 cts. CLARK CARD CO., Box 38, Brooklyn, N. Y.

CARDS. An Elegant New Set of Cards for 3c. stamp. W. H. PRINGLE, Rochester, N. Y.

$72 A WEEK. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly Outfit free. Address TRUE & CO., Augusta, Maine.

ANYTHING BUT.
SYMPATHIZING FRIEND. "Anybody that says you are running fashion into the ground must be prejudiced."

CASTORIA
for Infants and Children.

Castoria promotes Digestion and overcomes Flatulency, Constipation, Sour Stomach, Diarrhœa, and Feverishness. It insures health and natural sleep, without morphine.

"Castoria is so well adapted to Children that I recommend it as superior to any prescription known to me." H. A. ARCHER, M. D., 82 Portland Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

What gives our Children rosy cheeks,
What cures their fevers, makes them sleep;
'Tis Castoria.
When babies fret and cry by turns,
What cures their colic, kills their worms,
But Castoria.
What quickly cures Constipation,
Sour Stomach, Colds, Indigestion,
But Castoria.
Farewell then to Morphine Syrups,
Castor Oil and Paregoric, and
Hail Castoria!

CENTAUR LINIMENT—an absolute cure for Rheumatism, Sprains, Burns, Galls, &c. The most Powerful and Penetrating Pain-relieving and Healing Remedy known to man.

NO HOUSE SHOULD BE WITHOUT ONE. Also Indispensable to Travellers. [illegible] Filter and will last for [illegible] Price 50 cents. Mailed free with Price-list to Agents.
STODDARD LOCK CO., 104 Reade St., New York.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. FINEST AND CHEAPEST MEAT FLAVORING STOCK FOR SOUPS, MADE DISHES, AND SAUCES.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. [illegible] and palatable tonic in all cases of weak digestion and debility. "Is a success and a boon for which nations should feel grateful."—See "Medical Press," "Lancet," "British Medical Journal," &c.
CAUTION.—Genuine only with the fac-simile of Baron Liebig's Signature in Blue Ink across the Label. This caution is necessary, owing to various cheap and inferior substitutes being in the market.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. To be had of all Storekeepers, Grocers, and Chemists. Sole Agents for the United States (wholesale only), C. DAVID & CO., 9 Fenchurch Avenue, London, England.
Sold wholesale in New York by PARK & TILFORD, SMITH & VANDERBEEK, ACKER, MERRALL, & CONDIT, McKESSON & ROBBINS, H. K. & F. B. THURBER & CO., W. H. SCHIEFFELIN & CO.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address STINSON & CO., Portland, Maine.

THE UNEQUALLED
"HOUSEHOLD"
Sewing-Machine,
MANUFACTURED BY HOUSEHOLD
Sewing-Machine Co.,
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Is a marvel of simplicity and beauty. It is easy running, durable, perfect. Send for Illustrated description.
GENERAL OFFICES:
12 East 14th Street, New York (new and complete quarters, with both wholesale and retail departments);
153 and 165 LaSalle Street, Chicago;
149 Tremont Street, Boston.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address H. HALLETT & CO., Portland, Maine.

40 New (1883) Chromo Cards, no 2 alike, with name, 10c., postpaid. GEO. I. REED & CO., Nassau, N. Y.

MODEL WORKING
TOY ENGINES AND FIGURES.
Warranted Engines, Figures, Pulleys, Belt, etc., all complete as per cut, and in working order, by mail for $1 50. Our No. 25 complete Catalogue, 100 large pages, 500 illustrations, by mail, 10c.
PECK & SNYDER, 126-130 Nassau St., N. Y.

NEEDLE CASES FREE
SAMPLE NEEDLE CASE CONTAINING 100 NEEDLES FREE. Send your address on Postal Card. Mention this paper.
LONDON NEEDLE CO., 8 THIRD AVE., NEW YORK CITY.

EHRICHS' FASHION QUARTERLY
For the Spring Season of 1883
[illegible]
EHRICH BROTHERS,
Eighth Avenue, 24th & 25th Sts.,
NEW YORK.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.
Spring styles in Gentlemen's Neck Wear, Percale, Cambric, and White Dress Shirts, Collars and Cuffs, Silk and Percale Pajamas, Dressing Jackets, Bath Wraps, &c. Now open.
Broadway and 19th St.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Per Year:

HARPER'S MAGAZINE	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR	4 00
The THREE above publications	10 00
Any TWO above named	7 00
HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE	1 50
HARPER'S MAGAZINE } HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE }	5 00
HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY, One Year (52 Numbers)	10 00

Postage Free to all subscribers in the United States or Canada.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR begin with the first numbers for January, the Volumes of the YOUNG PEOPLE with the first Number for November, and the Volumes of the MAGAZINE with the Numbers for June and December of each year.

Subscriptions will be entered with the Number of each Periodical current at the time of receipt of order, except in cases where the subscriber otherwise directs.

Specimen copy of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE sent on receipt of a three-cent stamp.

HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY: a weekly publication, containing works of Travel, Biography, History, Fiction, and Poetry, at prices ranging from 10 to 25 cents per number. Full list of Harper's Franklin Square Library will be furnished gratuitously on application to HARPER & BROTHERS.

Remittances should be made by Post-Office Money Order or Draft, to avoid risk of loss. Address

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE, of between three and four thousand volumes, mailed on receipt of Nine Cents in Postage Stamps.

CARDS Send five 3c. stamps for new set of Imported Cards. "UMBRELLA." [illegible] WRITING, 80 Nassau St., N. Y.

40 Chromo Visiting Cards, no 2 alike, for 1883, name on, and Illustrated Premium List, 10c. Warranted best sold. Agents wanted. [illegible] N. Y.

SEELEY'S HARD RUBBER PILE PIPE
[illegible] Philadelphia, Pa., or 74 Fleet Street, London, England.

AGENTS [illegible]

CARD COLLECTORS [illegible] beautiful French chromo cards, assorted. Wm. M. Donaldson & Co. [illegible]

SOLDIERS' CLAIMS and DISCHARGES. [illegible] J. AMBLER SMITH, Lawyer, Washington, D. C. Customs and Internal Revenue Cases settled.

BROWN OF MANCHESTER WRITING HOME

"You would be astonished at the large number of English now visiting New York. Reginald and I took a walk down Broadway the other day, and we noticed that almost every other fellow seemed to be an Englishman."

HOWARD & CO.

Pearls, Rubies, Diamonds, and Sapphires of unusual size and quality

Rich Necklaces and other important pieces

Waltham Watches with fly-back and split seconds for timing purposes.

Choice Modern Silver and unequalled assortment of Antique Plate.

Gold Silver Candlesticks and Candelabra.

Fine Specimens of Chippendale, Sheraton, and Old English Oak Furniture.

Old Dutch China, with and without Chimes.

No. 264 Fifth Avenue.

POND'S EXTRACT

THE WONDER OF HEALING!

CURES CATARRH

SYPHER & CO.

ARE ABSOLUTELY SELLING THIS MONTH

Antique Silver, Furniture, Clocks, Bronzes, and Articles of Vertu.

739 & 741 BROADWAY.

COUGHS, &c.

SUFFERERS from Coughs and Asthma will find a sure relief from those distressing complaints in Hale's Honey of Horehound and Tar—a medicine whose merits and unrivalled value as a valuable pulmonic remedy, being principally compounded from its syrup or honey prepared from the plant or Horehound, skilfully combined with Tar in such a manner as to entirely overcome the unpleasant taste of the latter, thus rendering this medicine extremely palatable, while not detracting from its soothing properties. Chronic as well as Ordinary Colds and Coughs readily yield to this fine medicine. Ask your Druggist for "Hale's Honey of Horehound and Tar" (full name), and take no substitute.

Pike's Toothache Drops Cure in one minute.

Hill's Hair and Whisker Dye, 50c.

IT STANDS AT THE HEAD:

THE STAR THAT LEADS THEM ALL.

UNEQUALLED FOR SIMPLICITY

CASE OF OPERATION

THE LIGHT RUNNING

DOMESTIC SEWING MACHINE

MARLIN MAGAZINE RIFLE

45 Govt. and 40-60 Grain Cartridges.

VERY STRONG, PERFECTLY SAFE.

THE BEST RIFLE in the world for Large Game. Shooting more accurate, Model and Mechanism easier, Finish finer, than any other. MARLIN FIRE-ARMS CO. NEW HAVEN, CONN.

...ONATED AIR

...relief to Bronchitis, Hay-Fever, Catarrh, Ill-ed, Neuralgia, Coughs, Croup, Asthma, ...Consumption. For sale by all druggists ... Free, by mail, for $1.00.

...NATOR M'F'G CO., P.O. Box 3074, N.Y.

Print Your Own Cards, &c. Press $3

...large newspaper circulars, &c., $8 to $20. ...Printing, many-making, printing on ...Envelope, type, Cards, &c. to the factory. KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

CONGRESS WATER.

...Cathartic, alternative. A specific for ... Kidneys, Stomach, Liver, Bowels, the blood. Avoid ... and Cordials. Such waters ... the digestive or- ... to disorder.

FISHERMEN!

TWINE and NETTING

MANUFACTURED BY THE

BALTIMORE TWINE AND NET CO.

WM. J. HOOPER & SON,

No. 6 S. Calvert St., Baltimore, Md.

Send for price-list, naming county and state. Please mention this paper.

H.W. JOHNS' ASBESTOS

LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING,

Steam Pipe & Boiler Coverings, Steam Pack, Mill Board, Sheathing, Fire Proof Coatings, &c.

Send for Illustrated Pamphlet and Price List.

H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO., 87 MAIDEN LANE, N.Y.

OPERA GLASSES Opera-glasses, Telescopes, Barometers, Pocket Compasses, Microscopes, Pocket Lenses for Amateurs &c. E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO., Manufacturers of Photographic Materials, Photographic Apparatus, &c., 591 Broadway, N.Y. Send for Illustrated Price Catalogue.

The Twenty-Third Annual Statement

OF THE

EQUITABLE LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY

OF THE UNITED STATES,

120 Broadway, New York,

HENRY B. HYDE, President,

FOR THE YEAR ENDING DECEMBER 31, 1882.

AMOUNT OF LEDGER ASSETS, Jan. 1, 1882.	$41,611,049 33
INCOME.
Premiums	$9,033,309 00
Interest, rents, and realized net profit on investments and on sales of real estate	2,306,861 33 11,670,171 41
	$53,281,220 74

The net receipts of the Society's building, giving no credit for the part occupied by the Society as its business vehicle, in the case of the New York building, is about one third of the entire space in the building), yields, after deducting taxes and all expenses of maintenance, a net income larger than can be realized on a Government bond.

DISBURSEMENTS.
Claims by death and matured endowments	$2,006,980 13
Dividends, surrender values, & annuities	2,341,944 08
Discounted endowments	139,746 50
Total paid policy-holders	$4,577,661 34
Dividend on capital	7,000 00
Commissions and advertising	891,426 49
General expenses	305,347 92
State, county, and city taxes	102,455 03
TOTAL DISBURSEMENTS.	$7,961,330 80
NET CASH ASSETS, Dec. 31, 1882	$45,319,541 94

ASSETS.

Bonds and mortgages	$21,250,139 27
New York real estate, including the Equitable Building and purchases under foreclosure	6,739,143 84
United States stocks, state stocks, city stocks, and stocks authorized by the laws of the State of New York	13,651,371 97
Loans secured by bonds and stocks (market value, $13,291,610)	10,417,000 00
A detailed statement of these loans, and the securities upon which they are made, is annually filed with the Insurance Department, and is printed in full in the report to the Legislature of the State of New York which is at all times open to the inspection of the policy holders of the Society.
Real estate outside the limits of New York, including purchases under foreclosure and Society's holdings in other cities	3,240,804 66
Cash on hand, in banks, and other deposits, on interest, and in transit (agents' receipts)	2,307,993 66
Due from agents on account of premiums	96,609 42
	$45,379,564 54
Market value of stocks and bonds over cost	806,300 63
Interest and rents due and accrued	98,766 79
Premiums due and in process of collection (less premiums paid in advance, $66,290)	319,907 00
Deferred premiums	1,000,000 00
Total Assets, Dec 31, 1882	$47,600,579 96
Total Liabilities, including legal reserve for re-insurance of all existing policies (N. Y. State Standard,	2,267,976 00
Total Undivided Surplus	$19,632,603 96

Of which the proportion contributed (as computed) by Policies in the usual class, is $9,[illegible] 25

Of which the proportion contributed by Policies in Tontine class, is $3,[illegible]

NEW ASSURANCE WRITTEN IN 1882 $62,262,270.

TOTAL OUTSTANDING ASSURANCE, $272,829,620.

The amount of new assurance written during 1882 exceeds the largest business ever done by any other company in one year.

For sixteen years—from 1867 to 1882, both inclusive—the Society has written a larger aggregate amount of new assurance than any other company.

Total amount paid policy-holders since the organization of the Society, $47,000,000 00.

The amount of Surplus, $7,000,000 00, over Reliefion (four-per-cent. valuation) is larger, and the proportion of death-claims to the amount at risk is smaller, than in any other of the five largest life assurance companies.

The Society issues a plain and simple contract of assurance, free from burdensome and restrictive conditions, and INCONTESTABLE after three years. Such policies are payable IMMEDIATELY upon the receipt of satisfactory proofs of death, and without the delay of sixty or ninety days usual with other companies.

The Society has no unsecured claims on its books.

From the undivided surplus, contributed by policies in the Tontine class, extraordinary dividends will be declared, as thereto on settlement of such annual premium, to ordinary participating policies. From the undivided surplus contributed by policies in the Tontine class, the amounts applicable to policies maturing within the current year will be duly declared, on their respective annual premiums becoming due. The valuation of the policies contributing has been made on the American Experience Table of Mortality with 4½ per cent. interest, the legal standard of the State of New York.

GEORGE W. PHILLIPS, J. G. VAN CISE, } Actuaries.

We, the undersigned, have, in person, carefully examined the accounts, and counted and examined to date the assets of the Society, and certify that the foregoing statement thereof is correct.

BENJAMIN F. RANDOLPH, JAMES M. HALSTED, HARRY B. TERRELL, E. BENJAMIN CULT, HARVEY V. BUTLER,

Special Committee of the Board of Directors, appointed Oct. 28, 1882, to examine the assets and accounts at the close of the year.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS.

HENRY B. HYDE,	JAMES A. STEWART,
GEORGE H. MACY,	V. G. CHAPIN,
THOMAS T. AGNE,	JOHN D. JONES,
HENRY A. HYDE,	E. A. SHERRILL,
WILLIAM H. [illegible],	CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW,
WILLIAM A. WHEELOCK,	H. WILLIAMSON,
HENRY LEE,	HENRY M. ALEXANDER,
HENRY M. MAITLAND,	WILLIAM WALTER,
JAMES W. ALEXANDER,	LEONARD W. CHALLIS,
HENRY B. TERRELL,	GEO. G. HOWLAND,
THOMAS S. YOUNG,	H. W. LAMONT,
ROBERT OLYPHANT,	H. F. RANDOLPH,
DANIEL D. LORD,	J. F. DU PLESSIS,
JAMES M. HALSTED,	JOHN J. MCCOOK,
ROBERT PORTER,	W. WHITEWRIGHT,
HENRY DU P. L. DAY,	SAMUEL BOWDOIN,
ALFRED TALEL,	BROOKS H. PHILLIPS,
JOHN STEVENS,	HARRIS W. TIMBIT,
ANTONY GIHON,	CHARLES G. LANIER,
FRANCIS HATCH,	LOUIS FITZGERALD,
HENRY V. BOYNTON,	WILLIAM M. KING.
L. BOTTOMLEY [illegible],

HENRY D. WALBRIDGE, Boston.

HENRY VAN ARSDALE, Brooklyn.

STEPHEN C. FITZ, Boston.

MARTIN G. GOODHUE, London.

THOMAS A. BIDDLE, Philadelphia.

A. VAN BOMMEL, Paris.

STEPHEN H. TYNG, Philadelphia.

GUSTAV G. FOCK, Hamburg.

JAMES W. ALEXANDER, Vice-President.
SAMUEL BOWDOIN, 2d Vice-President.
WILLIAM ALEXANDER, Secretary.
HENRY M. ALEXANDER, Counsel.
HARRIS DAY, Attorney.

MEDICAL DIRECTORS.
E. W. LAMBERT, M.D., EDWARD CURTIS, M.D.
F. W. SEWELL, Superintendent of Agencies.

DURKEE'S SALAD DRESSING

No Water. No Vinegar. No Deterioration.

A GOOD SALAD ASSURED.

The great Delicious and the most Popular Mayonnaise for all kinds of Salads, Raw Tomatoes, Cabbage, Cold Meats, Fish, &c., ever offered for sale.

ALL GROCERS SELL IT.

HARPER'S BAZAR CUT PAPER PATTERNS.

We have transferred our WHOLESALE PATTERN DEPARTMENT to Mr. J. G. CROTTY, Nos. 130 to 136 Cherry Street, New York, who will conduct it upon his own account and responsibility.

SPECIAL CAUTION.

We are not interested in nor responsible for any contracts made by J. G. CROTTY & CO., whether for HARPER'S BAZAR Patterns or for any other business.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

EARL & WILSON'S PATENT "SHORT BAND" COLLARS AND "BEAD EDGE" CUFFS ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION

AMERICAN STAR SOFT CAPSULES THE BEST. Also, Star Empty Capsules. All Druggists.

VICK'S FLORAL GUIDE.

For 1883 is an Elegant Book of 150 Pages, 8 Colored Plates of Flowers and Vegetables, and more than 1,000 Illustrations of the choicest Flowers, Plants and Vegetables, and Directions for Growing. It is handsomer than ever before. Contains Tables of Raising Flowers and Vegetables, and Post Office address with 10 cents, and I will send you a copy, postage paid. This is not a quarter of the cost, if it is printed in both English and German. If you afterwards order seeds deduct the 10 cents.

Vick's Seeds are the Best in the World! The FLORAL GUIDE will tell you how to get and grow them.

VICK'S FLOWER AND VEGETABLE GARDEN. 175 Pages, 6 Colored Plates, 300 Engravings. For 50 cents in paper covers; $1.00 in elegant cloth. In German or English.

VICK'S ILLUSTRATED MONTHLY MAGAZINE, 32 pages, 6 Colored Plates in every number, and many fine Engravings. Price $1.25 a year. Five Copies for $5. Specimen Number sent for 10 cents. Trial copies for 25 cents.

JAMES VICK, Rochester, N. Y.

THE BEST THE DUEBER WATCH CASE

ANY MAN or WOMAN of ordinary ability will make five times as much money at work for us in their spare time as they can at anything else. The business is new, and one in which a person may honestly and honorably coin money. Full particulars, address at once, DUEBER M'F'G CO., Canton, Ohio.

Room 25, Temple Court, No. 5 Beekman St., New York.

ALLEGHENY COLLEGE LIBRARY.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XXVII.—No. 1371

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 31, 1883.

TEN CENTS A COPY.
$4.00 PER YEAR, IN ADVANCE.

Copyright, 1883, by Harper & Brothers.

A SALMON WHEEL ON THE COLUMBIA RIVER, OREGON.—DRAWN BY A. C. REDWOOD.—[SEE PAGE 194.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 31, 1883.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

AN OFFER TO YOUNG AMERICAN ARTISTS.

For the best original drawing to illustrate ALFRED DOBBIT'S "Christmas Hymn"—the drawing to be suitable for publication in HARPER'S MAGAZINE, and to be the exclusive work of an American artist not over twenty-five years of age—MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS offer an award of THREE THOUSAND DOLLARS, upon the honorable understanding that the successful competitor shall use the same for the prosecution of art study in one or more of the best American schools, including also a sojourn abroad of at least six months for the study of the old masters. The award will be paid in such installments and at such times as shall best suit the convenience of the recipient for the purpose specified.

The drawings must be received by MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS *not later than August 1, 1883, addressed "*Art Competition, Harper's Magazine, Franklin Square, New York"; and each must be designated by an assumed name or motto, which should also be given, together with the real name, age, and residence of the artist, in a sealed envelope accompanying the drawings, and not to be opened until the result of the competition shall have been determined. The name of the successful competitor will not be publicly announced until the publication of the drawing.

MR. R. SWAIN GIFFORD, N.A., MR. F. D. MILLET, A.N.A.; and MR. CHARLES PARSONS, A.N.A., Superintendent of the Art Department, HARPER & BROTHERS, will act as judges of the competition.

It is intended to engrave the successful drawing on one page for HARPER'S MAGAZINE of December, 1883; and should other drawings submitted be found suitable, second, third, and fourth awards will be made, as follows: one page HARPER'S WEEKLY, $200; one page HARPER'S BAZAR, $200; one page HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, $100.

If the judges should decide that no one of the drawings is suitable, MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS reserve the right to extend the limit of time and re-open the competition.

The Christmas Hymns by ALFRED DOBBIT have been published first and second in 1857 to the one for the illustrations of which artists are invited to compete, and a printed copy of it will be sent on application to

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK

THE DEMOCRATIC DILEMMA.

IF the Republican party is to be relieved of power at the next election, it is but fair to assume that the result will be accomplished only by a party united enthusiastically upon a great public policy. A party of divided and conflicting counsels upon such a policy could not hope for success, because the prominence of the question would compel the opposing party to disregard minor differences, and combine for party success. It is obvious that the question upon which many ardent Democrats wish the election to turn is protection. But it is even more evident that upon the question of protection the party is at fatal odds. This is not surprising, for the recent tariff debate in Congress showed that many leading Democrats hesitated, and declined to withdraw the interests of their own immediate constituents from the protective care of a tariff. Mr. BECK, of Kentucky, and the Louisville Courier-Journal are strenuous for a policy which would certainly insure the loss of Pennsylvania to the Democratic candidate, and upon which there is no evidence or probability that he could carry New York. It is because the views which they advocate are generally supposed to be free-trade views, and for free trade the country is not ready.

This is frankly conceded by other Democratic journals, which declare that for free trade, in the broad and absolute sense of destruction of Custom-houses and the total abrogation of duties, there is no party of any importance whatever. They insist that the practical political significance of the phrase "free trade" is simply a revenue tariff, and that this is the true antithesis of protectism. But this interpretation would not necessarily serve the needs of the party, because to the Democracy of the Pennsylvania or RANDALL school—and it is a very large one—no antithesis of protection is welcome. Democrats of that school praise Jeffersonian principles with great fervor, and denounce Republican rascality with unction, but they want protection; and a clearly defined issue for or against a strictly revenue tariff would send them into opposition. Indeed, the whole situation reveals the difficulty, if not impossibility, of seeking Democratic success upon such an issue. Neither the great Democratic manufacturers nor the multitude of Democratic workmen desire it. The question of protection and of revenue is one of the most difficult of public questions for general popular apprehension. All the easy, obvious, ad captandum arguments which are most effective upon the stump and in newspaper squibs and appeals are on the side of protection. The close of the campaign of 1880 is full of instruction upon this point, and in an election joined upon the simple issue of protection to American labor, the Republican party need only hold its present passive position to be well assured of victory.

The fact is that to expect to make protection the cardinal question of the campaign of 1884 is to anticipate a contest over an issue upon which neither party has taken a side. It is agreed that there must be indirect and not direct taxation. Consequently there must be a tariff. Shall it be laid for protection, for incidental protection, or for revenue solely? If for revenue only shall the enormous interests of capital and labor which are involved in the present tariff system be at once abandoned to the chances of a radical change, or shall there be a sliding scale of gradual modification? Shall the whole internal revenue system be summarily discarded?—a system which is favored as most equitable by some of the most ardent and intelligent free-traders. Is it not the tendency of every party to be led by its most positive and extreme element, and will not the cautious, tentative scheme of revenue tariff, so guardedly explained by Democratic doctors, presently turn out to be free trade and immediate competition with the pauper labor of Europe? Amid a whirlwind of such questions, with all the prejudices and obvious advantages of the situation against the party which raises them, will not the old argument of letting well enough alone be invincible? In all that we say we are looking only at the chances of 1884. We are in no degree denying the intelligence of the people, nor doubting that upon a deliberate consideration of the whole question in all its bearings the country might ultimately decide that its true interest lay in the practical application of ADAM SMITH'S principles. But as a question of practical politics and of a party cry for the next election it seems to be clear enough that if the contest were forced upon the tariff, the country would hold by the party of reasonable protection. If, therefore, the Democratic party proposes to resolve itself into a propaganda of ADAM SMITH'S principles, it has decided to change its present character. We certainly should not deny that it would be a very commendable course, but it would hardly elect a President in 1884.

THE IRISH QUESTION.

THE Irish situation is becoming very grave, because it is getting to involve the security of the most innocent Irishmen. The crimes of desperate men and the gratification of individual malice are scored against a whole people, and a few more assassinations or attempted murders might easily precipitate a terrible catastrophe. This situation is confirmed by the passive indifference of intelligent Irishmen toward deeds which they can not approve. Their attitude is like that of Southerners toward the Ku Klux fifteen years ago. It was in vain that they declared their freedom from responsibility for atrocities which they did not deplore enough even to condemn. Nothing would have so certainly hastened the restoration of mutual good feeling in this country as a prompt condemnation of the Ku Klux crimes by intelligent and honorable Southerners, and vigorous efforts to bring offenders to justice. So when MR. EGAN, the treasurer of the Land League, says that he should have resigned if the League had offered a reward for the arrest of the Phœnix Park assassins, and MR. PARNELL, the president of the League, says that of course the attempt to blow up the government offices in London will be attributed to Ireland, they both show a spirit which obviously does not tend to repress such crimes.

But the English Government and the English people ought not to permit the cowardly, detestable, and frantic villainies of some Irishmen to affect their Irish policy. England can not allow a total separation from Ireland for two reasons. One is that such a separation would be an unpardonable betrayal. It would abandon the most intelligent and thrifty Irishmen to the tender mercies of ignorance and brutality. It would be an intolerable inhumanity, against which the civilized world would exclaim. The other is that Ireland separated from England would be instantly seized by some other power, and become the most dangerous menace to England. Whatever is done, therefore, must be done by England alone upon consultation with intelligent Irishmen, and it should be done in a spirit of practical justice. That is to say, separation being impossible, the union should contemplate the utmost possible local Irish rule for Ireland. Such a policy, indeed, would not satisfy assassins nor the friends of assassins, but it would satisfy the general judgment of mankind. And such a policy ought not to be affected by the number or the atrocity of individual Irish outrages. It would not be yielding to threats what ought not to be granted. It would be the recognition that a situation for which England is largely responsible has naturally produced outrages, and that the repression of them by the severest means ought not to be accompanied by refusal to adopt every reasonable measure to redress ancient and acknowledged wrongs.

No government should be driven by clamor or public indignation into a spirit of revenge, or suffer itself to be blinded to the eternal and inexorable laws of human affairs. If martial law in its severest form should be declared in Ireland, the terror, while it lasted, might repress actual outrage, but it would only deepen and strengthen the spirit from which outrage springs. The Irish question is the result of prolonged martial law, and whatever the tragedies and brutalities of Irish crime, it is impossible not to admit that martial law is not a remedy, and will not settle the question. CARLYLE, in a kind of fantastic drapair, proposed the submersion of the island for twenty-four hours. But as extermination is out of the question, counsel must be taken, not of rage and revenge, but of reason and experience. It is not surprising that many persons think the situation to be hopeless. MR. GLADSTONE, however, could he be freed from the wrath and unreason of an excited public opinion, would doubtless grapple with it successfully. Yet to prevent the control of the question from passing into the hands of those who would practically restore the terrible Irish régime of the end of the last century, MR. GLADSTONE must feel himself compelled to yield much against his will. If, as the London correspondent of the World intimates, the Liberal Ministry should be at last overthrown by the Irish question, it would be only because English feeling is too deeply exasperated by horrible Irish crimes to tolerate any Irish policy but that which has always failed.

THE NIAGARA FALLS RESERVATION.

IN his speech before the Senate committee in favor of the rescue of Niagara from destruction as a grand natural spectacle, MR. DORSHEIMER felicitously cited the obliteration of the Genesee Falls at Rochester as an illustration of the fate that is preparing for Niagara; and MR. ERASTUS BROOKS, in his eloquent and suggestive speech in favor of the bill in the Assembly, showed with great force the true economy and the general benefit of the proposed reservation. This speech was one of those which affect votes—a kind which is becoming more and more infrequent. MR. BROOKS'S cogent statement presented the subject in a new light to many minds, and the doubtful, wavering no longer, gave a hearty support to the bill. The same intelligence and true public spirit should certainly carry it through the Senate. The pending bill proposes only a preliminary inquiry respecting the extent of the area that should be reserved and the amount that should be paid, with collateral inquiries, and appropriates $10,000 for the necessary expenses of the investigation. The character of the active promoters of the enterprise is the sufficient guarantee that there is no job hidden in the inquiry.

This will doubtless be conceded. But it is urged that this is but the beginning, and that the enterprise will inevitably develop into a job. It is therefore opposed upon the ground that it is a waste of money, and that it is not a general public benefit. But this is not sound reasoning. It will not be denied that the Erie Canal has been a public benefit to the State, yet it passed through only a few counties. It can not be questioned that in the highest sense the State Library and the State Museum and the State Survey are general public benefits, and that the money appropriated for them is wisely spent. If it should be assumed that the people of the State were properly concerned in no public expense which did not touch some tangible interest in their own counties, New York would instantly drop from its eminence as a progressive State, and every county would feel the positive loss as well as disgrace that springs from the decay of public spirit.

The Niagara reservation belongs to the same class of public interests as parks and libraries and collections and charities and schools. The benefits of all these are at first moral, but they result in material advantages. This may be illustrated in the case of Niagara by the obvious fact that the strangers who would be annually attracted to the cataract would leave in the State far more money than would cover the cost of properly maintaining the reservation. In the case of a noble library or museum the same practical result accrues to the community from the visitors who are drawn to a city, not only for the special use of a library or scientific or historic collection, but by the general renown which great institutions give to it. As for the jobbery and vast expense which are alleged to be sure to result from the passage of the pending Niagara bill, it is enough to say that there need be no such apprehension, because no elaborately decorated park, but only a simple reservation, as contemplated, which can be maintained as economically and reasonably as the State Library or Museum by placing its care in the proper hands. Of course every public enterprise may be turned into a job, but that is not a reason for refusing to undertake desirable public works, although it is the most cogent argument for undertaking them and maintaining them carefully and wisely. It can hardly be held to be a sound argument against the preservation of the sublimest natural spectacle in the State, which is indeed one of the wonders of the world, that it may be turned into a job. Let the Legislature, in response to public opinion, take care that it shall not be a job. But let it also save New York from the lasting disgrace of permitting Niagara Falls to be practically obliterated.

A YANKEE STORY.

THERE is a great deal of good-natured banter every year at the New England dinner in New York about the final capture of the old Dutch stronghold by the "lowel Yankees," and the most Dutch of New-Yorkers would not deny the vigor that springs from constant inoculation with New England qualities. But the Yankee nature is not less tenacious than the Scotch, and New England has as unrelaxing hold upon the descendants of New-Englanders.

An exceedingly interesting illustration of this loyalty was lately recalled by the dedication of the Crane Memorial Hall at Quincy, in Massachusetts. Fifty years ago

THOMAS CRANE, a stone-cutter, wandered away from the Quincy quarries to better his fortunes, and settled in New York. Here his sturdy character, his sagacity, intelligence, and industry, made him a prosperous man, and for many years he was one of the best, as he was one of the most modest, of the citizens of New York, ready and helpful and liberal in all worthy enterprises, and in his own nowadays way no Enoch walking with God.

Mr. CRANE died in 1875. His children were born in New York, and have only a remote personal association with New England. But with a modesty like his own his family have erected in Quincy, the home of his youth, a beautiful memorial building, which they have given to the town, and in which the long-wandering town library will be permanently stored. An address by CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS, Jun., at the opening of this building, tells simply the characteristic story. For so the strong maternal heart of New England draws with secret love even her distant descendants, and binds them more closely to the great family of States of which she is but an elder member.

AMERICAN OPINION OF ASSASSINATION.

THE English press may be assured that American opinion and American law favor assassination and crime no more than those of England. The blustering Irish cowards in this country who extol murder and rejoice in the suffering of innocent people in Ireland and England derive their sole importance from the fact that the boasting newspapers of New York think it worth while to ask them to talk, and then to print their rodomontade as if it were of any significance whatever. Such people represent no public opinion in this country, because their talk does not express the general Irish feeling here.

That feeling is, of course, unfriendly to England, and it has stimulated liberal contributions to the Land League. But that is far short of approving and encouraging the most common murders and cruelties. Meanwhile our laws and public opinion tolerate, as in England, the present expression of political opinion, as of all other. There is a German now going about this country who apparently makes money by declaring in furious public addresses that those who have money ought to be, and soon will be, summarily killed by those who have not. The only consolation of his gospel is that it promises to dispose of the preacher.

But the good sense of the United States perceives that such talk does no harm until the law tries to stop it. When, however, somebody proposes to put the talk into practice, the law deals with him peremptorily. The instant that the praise of assassins proceeds to take the form of helping them, American law will be quite as prompt and effective as English law. But in the mean while everybody may exalt murder and arson and pocket-picking, and every crime and doctrine and custom, as he chooses, and to as many people as he can persuade to pay for hearing him.

A TRICK IN RECENT LEGISLATION.

THE tricks of conference committees in legislative bodies are well known. But a performance of the conferees upon the Army Appropriation Bill in the late Congress is peculiarly suspicious, and invites careful scrutiny. In the appropriation for the pay of the army the following clause was inserted: "And hereafter vacancies occurring in the Quartermaster's and Commissary's departments of the army may, in the discretion of the President, be filled from civil life." No such provision was in the bill as it passed either House of Congress, and only the disagreements in the bill were referred to the committees. In the civil service, Congress, by passing the reform bill by a great majority, had affirmed the principle of promotion for merit and economy. In the military service, in which such promotion is a tradition to which much of the efficiency and honesty of the service is to be ascribed, the principle is discarded. The dishonorable department of the army supplies, which in time of war is the robber's gate to the Treasury, is thrown wide open to the possible appointment of contractors and political agents without the examination required for a clerk in the civil service.

What does such a sly and unnoted change of the law mean? It may have passed some members of the committee carelessly, and it may have escaped the attention of Congress in its final action. But such changes are not accidents. They are craftily done for a purpose. This is a secret scrutthrow of one of the defenses of the Treasury well founded in long experience. If in special, personal, jaggred legislation, and for whose benefit? Is it a stroke of permanent vengeance, or a blow of anger and spleen at the general high character and integrity established in the military service?

It is a gross abuse to open such positions to the furious scramble of political office-seekers. It is a bitter wrong to those who are already in the service, and amply fitted for the discharge of such duties by merited promotion, and it has now be shoved aside by those who can assume political pressure. The trick looks like the last kick of some defeated and soured member of Congress, determined to do all the mischief possible before disappearing in well-earned obscurity.

POLITICAL COMEDY.

THE nomination of ex-Governor SPRAGUE by the Democrats in Rhode Island is another droll illustration of the truth of Mr. HENRY GEORGE'S description of the Democratic party as an organization resolved upon getting into power at any price. Nobody knows, probably, if anybody cares, what Mr. SPRAGUE'S political views are. The latest expression of them, we believe, was made in Boston, when he declared that the country was drifting toward a dangerous abyss, and that escape from it lay in electing General BUTLER President.

The Rhode Island Democrats seemed to think that the nomination of Mr. SPRAGUE spoke for itself, for they made no platform. As the matter stands, therefore, its significance, so far as the Democrats are concerned, is that they will favor General BUTLER'S nomination. But for the Rhode Island Republicans the nomination of Mr SPRAGUE by "independents," and its satisfaction by Democrats, is a wounding of deep and intense dissatisfaction with Republican management. The Republican "machine" in the little State is alleged to be one of the most despotic in the country and there is great impatience of its arbitrary and selfless course.

Rhode Island Republicans have only to look across the border into Massachusetts and they will see a body of Republicans who thought "no harm in seeing what BUTLER would do." There may be enough of a similar mind in Rhode Island inclined to see what SPRAGUE will do. It is a sorry situation in either State. But what gave BUTLER his chance, and what has now given a chance to SPRAGUE? Certainly it is not greater confidence in the party which takes them, as it took GRESLEY, in the hope of obtaining power. Plainly such a party has no principle and no policy except to "get in." But when foreign Republicans, looking eagerly for their party principles and policy, see only the unbending will of a machine, what protects it them?

THE AQUEDUCT BILL.

THE aqueduct bill introduced into the Senate of New York provides for the superintendence of the work by a permanent commission. As the necessary cost of the work, however carefully and honestly conducted, can not be less than eighteen or twenty millions of dollars, the bill so proposed provides for an enormous job, which will delay the completion of the work indefinitely, and swell to cost to twice or thrice twenty millions.

The building of this aqueduct offers the tax-payers and residents of New York a fair opportunity of deciding whether they still have power to manage their own affairs, or whether the construction of necessary public works is merely to furnish an opportunity to a majority of such persons as the city of New York chooses to send to the Legislature to plunder the tax-payers, and through them the honest industry of the community. The vast chances of practical robbery provided by this bill, and the deliberate unconstitutional appropriation of the public money to a sectarian Protectory under the threat of the loss of a sectarian vote at the polls, show the degradation and cowardice of one local politics. Mr ROOSEVELT, Mr. HOWE, and the fifteen who voted with them against the sectarian gift represent the real sentiment of the State, and deserve the highest honor.

If there should be no effective protest from the substantial industrial sentiment of the city against the job hidden in the aqueduct bill, there could be no reasonable complaint hereafter, however grievous the extortion might be. There has been general and adequate warning. The press has sounded the alarm. The facts are simple and easily understood, and the want of a prompt and vigorous declination of the real public opinion of the city, which shall be heard and heeded, would furnish another illustration of the essential failure of popular government in the metropolis to secure economical and honest administration.

PERSONAL.

MR. F. E. CHURCH is painting a new picture of South American scenery, which shows that his facile brush has lost none of its old power. One of his brother artists said of his recently that he as the only man who ever painted a rainbow.

—An American author, well known in New York society, declares that he has at length discovered the exact relative values of men and women. Five women, he says, are equal to six men. Demonstration. "I have been making a good deal late in a Broadway omnibus, and I invariably observe that one of the seats will accommodate six men, but never more than five women." He intends to present the discovery, with his compliments, to Science.

—The widow of the late Mr. SAMUEL R. HOWARD has refused to contest his will. The point in dispute was whether or not his studio was his "domicile." He left her the pictures contained in his "domicile," but the many thousand dollars' worth of his unsold pictures elsewhere situated were bequeathed to his sister. If his studio was his "domicile," most of these works would have gone to the widow. Her contention was that as he sometimes had been known to sleep in his studio, the latter, not less than the apartments where he and she lived, deserved the name of domicile. One of Mr GROSVENOR'S artist friends remarked the other day: "Grosvenor was very exact in the use of language, and when he wrote 'domicile' in his will I think he meant domicile, and not studio. I remember once reading to him an unusual report that I had prepared of the Artists' Fund Society, in which I spoke of the 'generous rivalry' that had existed between that society and a similar organization. 'You mean emulation,' interrupted Grosvenor, 'not rivalry'. It was just what I did mean, and I was glad to get the word."

—While writing his Autobiography WARREN had the MS. put in type and three impressions of it taken, which he gave respectively to his son, his father-in-law, and a Vienna journalist. The type was then distributed, so that no further impressions could be taken. If the work is to be in the hands of the public, it must be reprinted.

—Miss HOPE GLENN, now singing in the STRAUSS concerts, is a young American who went to London to study music, and while there last year was engaged by Madame STRAUSS, at the suggestion of an American lady, who is a friend to both parties. Her parents are at present residing in Florida. Her professional success has been very gratifying to a multitude of well-wishers on each side of the Atlantic, who have long admired this excellent vocalist's pluck and perseverance, and esteemed the rare worth and beauty of her private life.

—The Empress of Russia having honored a military officer at one of the state balls by permitting him to waltz with her, the pair unfortunately fell to the floor. Immediately the Emperor stepped up, asked anxiously if she was hurt, and led her away to a private room, where, however, she soon emerged to witness the mortification of her late unlucky partner. Going to him she requested his company for another dance, which passed off "right plentifully well," and restored to the young gallant his best peace of mind.

—When a woman is good, as is the Rev Dr MORGAN DIX, she is the best that there is; when she is bad, she is the worst that there is.

—Twice as many crimes are committed in London on Saturday as on any other day, and Lord BRAMWELL, the celebrated jurist, calls Saturday "pot day, drink day, and crime day."

—Mr LAWRENCIANO, M.P., writes that what British Democrats object to is "the needless and foolish expenditure arbitrarily connected with the institution of monarchy in Great Britain. The monarch and the monarch's family now cost about £800,000 [$4,000,000] per annum. Democrats can conceive a hereditary monarchy such as ours without the abject ceremonial or the vast expenditure of a court. Much, indeed, of what is now voted to the monarch goes to fill the pockets of the aristocracy or of needy courtiers. The monarchy, accurately, is not bound up in the annual payment of £40,000 to a wealthy nobleman for walking backward with a colored cloth on state occasions."

—The painting of celebrated artists was prized after their deaths. Th NINA'S picture has recently been acquired by the National Gallery of Lucien. Canin's palette was bought in Paris a few years ago by Mr Joseph JEFFERSON, the comedian, who is an ardent admirer of the great French landscapist, and a faithful imitator of his works.

—The late Baron DAVILLIER, the art collector, became, like S SCHOLL, known to literature by his writings concerning some of the most celebrated French painters of the present generation. Fromentin's last letter was written to the baron two weeks before that lamented artist's death. "Here I am again in the Eternal City," it began, "sad and tired, with no inclination to rebel, and with a head as empty as a nest without birds, doubtless they have flown to Fortici, where I spent so happy a summer." The baron described last Thursday as above the average bright, with regular and very beautiful features, that expressed the frankness and honesty of his character, a beter of etiquette and ceremony, and while led by natural docility to be reserved in the company of strangers, very communicative and unreserved in the presence of those whom he loved, and possessed of the rare knowledge to distinguish false comrades from true friends.

—Says President GILMAN, of Johns Hopkins University: "Wealth might be well applied to the increase of the payment of college professors and the foundation of more college fellowships. Men of first-rate powers should be employed as professors, and they must be well paid, with an augmenting salary. They should not be troubled by poverty. To enable students to pursue their studies without the appearance of existing on charity, prizes for excellence should be offered."

—Intense criticism is many-faced, like art criticism. Speaking of the contents of Mr WHITTIER'S recently written pamphlet, the London correspondent of a New York daily says: "Mr WHITTIER'S satire is bright and telling, and sufficiently human to excite mirth as well as admiration," while the art critic of the same paper declares that "his wit is ghastly" and "ridiculous."

—When his Holiness the Pope condemns books he uses the following formula: "No person, of whatever age or station, may, in any place or in any language, either publish in the future, or read, or keep the aforesaid works here condemned and proscribed; but every person ought to deliver them to the ordinary or to the inquisitors of heresy, under the penalties specified in the Index of Prohibited Works."

—"In a season in India most have a female medical attendant to come at all.

—"At the moment," writes an Englishwoman, "I am staying in the house with a lady who has not worn stays for fifteen years. She is now wearing a tailor-made cloth dress, with princesse palatine, the waist measure over her dress being twenty-four inches. She has a resistance thirty-four inches. When leaving the habit maker she said to the tailor, 'I am afraid you will not be able to fit me to your taste, as I do not wear stays.' Her answer was, 'So much the better; we can always get a better fit without them.'"

—The Pall Mall Gazette observes that for those who know the late Mr. J. R. GREEN his life contained a lesson greater than his works—the example of heroic patience in the face of constant suffering, of a fortitude of spirit which no difficulty could daunt and no physical weakness undermine. No greater contrast could be imagined than that of his weak voice and wasted frame with the brilliancy and geniality of his conversation.

—In his Amerose Recorded, Mr. GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA confesses that during his previous visit, in 1863, he "took politically the wrong side, that is to say, I was an ardent sympathizer with the South against the North", but explains his conduct on the ground that "I was, comparatively speaking, a young man, very prejudiced, very sensational, and a great deal more ignorant and presumptuous than (I hope) I am now."

—In the private office of Mr A A Low there hangs an excellent portrait of Howqua, the famous Chinese merchant, who accumulated, it is said, a fortune of twenty-five millions of dollars, and "could think nothing of writing off a debt of $700,000 to oblige an 'old chum' (old friend), or giving a subscription of a million to some public object."

—WORTH'S favorite dog, Rose, is buried at the foot of his grave, the spot being marked by a stone on which the composer caused to be inscribed the words, "Here rests Rose and waits." (Here rests Rose and waits.)

—From the London News: "M GONCOURT, the French novelist, not long ago requested all his fair readers to send him notes of their own private experience. 'How did you feel when you were confirmed?' 'How did Alphonse whisper his passion?' These and other questions quite as intimate were sent by M. GONCOURT. Do English novelists receive any private information?"

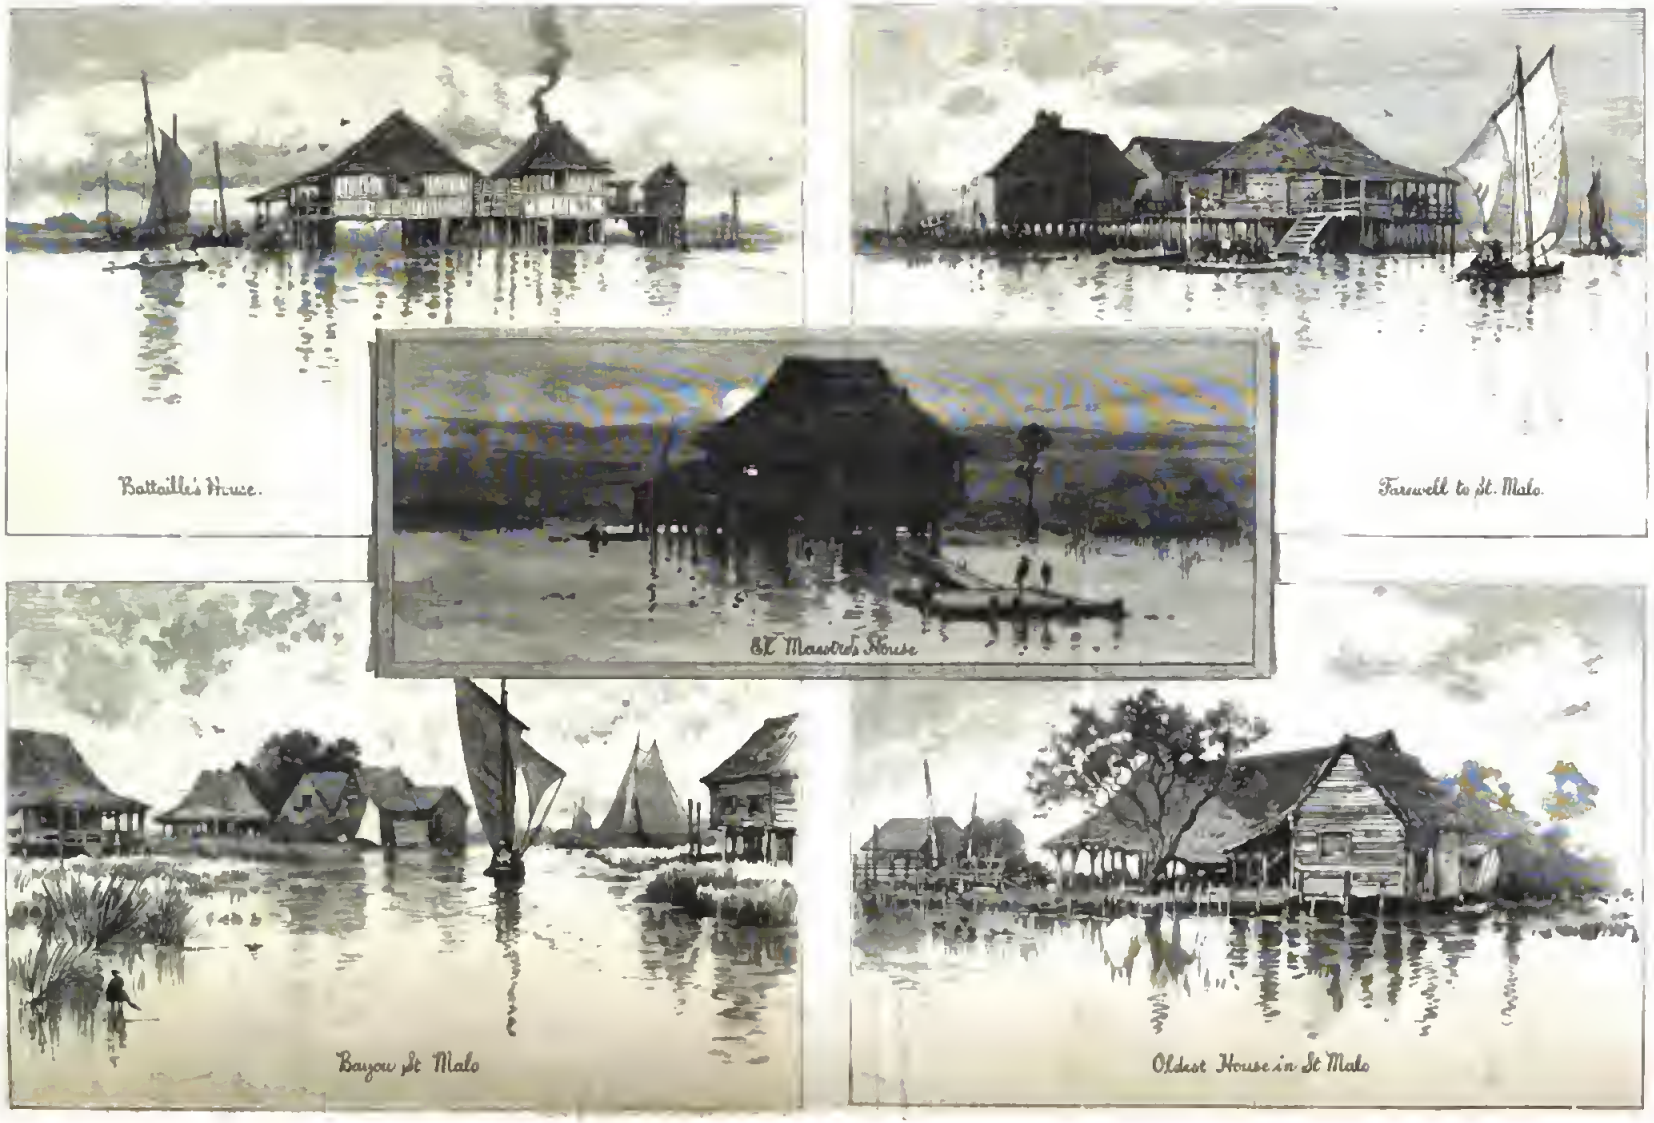
—In W. A. HAMMOND tells of a patient to whom the ticking of a clock resolved itself into articulate words, such as, "Eat your soup," "Drink no wine," and so on. One day the man discovered that if he closed his right ear firmly, the mental illusion disappeared, but if the left ear was closed, the words were distinctly heard, showing that the centre for hearing on the right side was affected, and on the left side was normal. Eventually he put clocks in every room in his house, and professed to be governed by the directions they gave him.

—LAWRENCE BARRETT, the actor, has bought a fine lot on Connecticut Avenue, Washington, near the British Legation, for $7000 Mrs. LANGTRY, formerly JEAN MARIE DAVENPORT, has paid $7500 for two lots near the Cameron house.

—"I have always been polite to women, and indulgent to foolish ones," said Father RYAN, when interrupted by a woman during one of his public lectures at Memphis. As the excitement continued, he boldly addressed his tumultuous enemies as "drunken savages" and "revolutionaries of the worst type."

—When the Princess of Wales and her set (says the Spectator) take up the notion that a certain amusement is "bad form," the fact that they have done so visibly diminishes, if it does not destroy, the minimum with which that amusement is pursued in a hundred circles just beneath her own. "In other words, in those circles the amusement becomes less amusing, becomes dull and lifeless, or else defiant, but men can not be defiant when they are amusing themselves, and still take full delight in their amusements."

—The Sultan's favorite daughter was married at Constantinople by the following ceremony. The chief of the Mohammedan Church approached the throne, and after bowing to his Majesty, took the left hand of the bride in his left hand and the right hand of the groom in his right hand, and prayed for some minutes in a low voice. Then he said: "HAMDI, son of KAMIL, thou art the husband of MEHEMNEH, daughter of HAMID; MEHEMNEH, thou art the lawful wife of HAMDI, son of KAMIL: obey him." A small golden tray containing bread and salt was offered to the pair, with the words, "May there be plenty under your roof!" and each received a piece of parchment containing verses from the Koran, which defined the duties of a husband or a wife. "Long live the Sultan!" cried the spectators, while the bride was carried off to her apartments. The groom did not see her again for twenty-five days, or until the public festivities were over.



THE LACUSTRINE VILLAGE OF SAINT MALO, LOUISIANA.—Drawn by Charles Graham from Sketches by J. O. Davidson.—[See Page 198.]

BITS OF SAINT MALO SCENERY.—Drawn by Charles Graham from Sketches by J. O. Davidson.

GAMBLING AT SAINT MALO.—Drawn by T. de Thulstrup from a Sketch by J. O. Davidson.

THE LACUSTRINE VILLAGE OF SAINT MALO, LOUISIANA.—[See Page 198.]

A SALMON WHEEL.

One pleasant evening, at the Cascades of the Columbia, in Oregon, I walked up to see a salmon wheel. It is the simplest, most fatuous way of catching fishes I know of, and one of the most picturesque.

The Cascades, as their name indicates, occupy a space several miles in length where the Columbia River is obstructed by dikes of lava that have been thrown across its course, ending the water to rush down in a series of small cataracts and boiling torrents, impossible for a boat to stem, and which puts the salmon at their best pace to surmount.

At a convenient point on the southern bank of these cascades, where a narrow and deep race was swept between the shore and a small ledge of rocks, a frame had been planted, in which swung a vertical wheel like a steamer's side wheel, the diameter of which was perhaps forty feet, and the breadth of the paddles seven feet. Bent of the paddles, however, had been dispensed with, the interior of the wheel being chiefly taken up by ten great cages or buckets of wire netting. These buckets were somewhat funnel-shaped compartments, diminishing in a curve from the opening, some five feet square at the rim, to the centre of the wheel, and there terminating in a wooden trough laid in a slanting position along the axle.

This huge wheel was hung low enough so that the open ends of the netting buckets should be immersed at every turn, and they were so arranged, the wheel being sub-drawt, as to entice the water on the up-stream side with a downward motion. Anything swimming up the river under the wheel, therefore, would go straight into the mouth of the funnel as the wheel came around, and would be scooped up.

Carried aloft in this surprising fashion, the unburned fishes made the most frantic leaps in the hope of escape; but the swift revolution of the wheel, elevating their prison, almost instantly inerted them down in the axle, where they slid out of the inclined and slippery trough into a pen of logs prepared for their reception.

I was foolish enough to go out and stand with the owner upon a slender board that overhung the water near the wheel; foolish, because the strong current underneath, the whirling motion of the great machine so close to my face, and the tremendous noise of the rushing and tumbling waters combined to bewilder one's faculties dangerously unless he was trained to it. However, on knew none, and the manager shouted into me ear upon one slender bridge a book full of interesting knowledge about salmon and their ways, distinguishing the different sorts by such names as "Chinook" (best of all), "steel-head" "blue-belly," "Jaly salmon," "spring salmon," etc., and pointing out each an an example came up in the wheel.

"How many will you catch a day?" I ask.

"That varies greatly in different years and on different days. To-day we have got 2000 so far, but we consider that light. One day we took over eleven thousand, and then stopped counting. The pen got full, and there was a regular stream of fish floppin' thwagh the wheel, slappin' down onto the heap, and then slidin' off into the water again. I reckon they took a square drink after that bit n' buck."

"I should think the fish would avoid this big trap."

"They don't see it in time," he answered. "And I reckon their minds is full of the spoonin', and they don't notice much. However, you can make it too clonsy. Now that man over on the island there"—pointing to a similar wheel, except that the buckets were made of laths instead of netting—"ain't lowin' how, because the salmon see his wooden boxes and shy off. I experimented a long time, and I find they can see and will scare at any colored thing except this galvanized gray wire, or else scarlet—they can't see scarlet at all."

All this time the huge wheel, revolving three times in a minute, was picking up entrapped fishes, sometimes more than one at a time. They seemed to come in pairs, two at the same part rising together or in immediate succession. There were intervals when none were caught at all, followed by short periods of plenty, marking the passage of "schools." Some of the "Jakys" weighed forty pounds, and were strong enough to make the biggest angler in the Scottish Highlands brace himself for a long struggle, but these will not bite at a hook.

As fast as the fish are caught—the wheel runs all night, so that there is a run or so to begin the morning's work upon—they are taken into a shed and put under the knife. With a few deft strokes the rich pink flesh of their bellies is cut out and thrown into the brine, the rest of the noble animal (fully two-thirds of his edible weight) being cast aside and wasted in what seems the most wicked fashion. The fishermen reply that the half-century of steady attack upon them has not diminished perceptibly the hordes of salmon that annually ascend the great rivers; but surely sooner or later this heavy slaughter will tell upon their ranks.

The pickling uses only a fraction of the whole number of salmon caught at these wheels. The remainder are strung upon a rope in strings of a dozen each. The ropes are then fastened in large bunches to air-tight casks, and sent adrift to be picked up by the canneries along the river far below, and by them used to the credit of this fishery. We had been firing at these casks as they went bobbing past us in the river that morning, never dreaming that they carried down a valuable freight of salmon.

The number of men who first invented the salmon wheel is a standing joke in the country; but its prototype (and suggestion) was to be seen a few rods below, where an Indian lived in a house, partly tent, partly shed, and ornamented with pictures from the illustrated papers, under trees whose lower branches were decked with the dull red rags of split salmon drying in the smoke. Out from the mossy rock where his family dwelt he had constructed a little staging of poles reaching over the rushing river. There he would stand for hours with a double handed dip-net, sweeping the water from up-stream down, trusting at the chance of accidentally dipping up a salmon. There was an difference whatever in the principle of the Indian's dip-net and the white man's wheel, and no great disparity in their mechanism.

Further up the river another clever Indian method of taking this lordly fish by trickery was to be seen. From one bank to the other the Indians built a solid net-work of willow sprouts, weaving the barrier upon poles driven into the river bottom about four feet apart. This fence was eighty yards long—the whole width of the Spokane River—and in the whole of it there was not a hole big enough for a salmon to crawl through. This fence, or weir, however, was not straight across the river. It was built in the form of a V, the point extending down-stream. At each bank was hung a small wicker door.

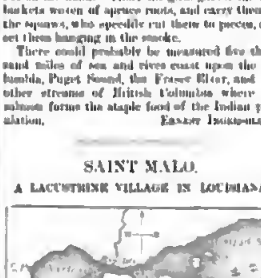
When the salmon came up-stream they met the obstruction, and fell along it for a place to get through. Thus they are conducted to the small doors, which they push open with their noses, the force of the current shutting the door behind them the instant they have passed. Then they find themselves with many predecessors in a pen from which there is no exit, and every minute or two the little door opens to let in some new-comer. There is no danger of their becoming crowded, however, for here stand active Indian lads, naked to their hides, skillfully and tirelessly spearing the poor salmon and tossing them out on the bank. Thaty the girls gather them in baskets woven of spruce roots, and carry them to the squaws, who speedily cut them to pieces, and set them hanging in the smoke.

There could probably be measured five thousand miles of sea and river coast upon the Columbia, Puget Sound, the Fraser River, and the other streams of British Columbia where the salmon forms the staple food of the Indian population.

EGBERT IRONSIDE.

SAINT MALO.

A LACUSTRINE VILLAGE IN LOUISIANA.



REGION OF SAINT MALO.

For nearly fifty years there has existed in the southeastern swamp lands of Louisiana a certain strange settlement of Malay fishermen—Tagalas from the Philippine Islands. The place of their lacustrine village is not precisely mentioned upon maps, and the world in general ignored until a few days ago the bare fact of these amphibious existence. Even the United States mail service has never found its way thither, and even in the great city of New Orleans, less than a hundred miles distant, the people were far better informed about the Carboniferous Era than concerning the swamp affairs of this Manila village. Occasionally vague echoes of its mysterious life were borne to the civilized centre, but these were scarcely of a character to tempt investigation or encourage belief. Some voluble Italian buggerooms once came on town with a short cargo of oysters, and a long story regarding a ghastly "Chinese" colony in the reedy swamps south of Lake Borgne. For many years the inhabitants of the Oriental settlement had lived in peace and harmony without the presence of a single woman, but finally had managed to import an ahlegeved beauty from beyond the Yellow Sea. Thereupon arose the first dissensions, provoking much shedding of blood. And at last the elders of the people had restored calm and fraternal feeling by sentencing the woman to be hewn in pieces and flung to the alligators of the bayou.

Possible the story is; probable it is not. Partly for the purpose of investigating it, but principally in order to offer HARPER'S artist a totally novel subject of artistic study, the Times-Democrat of New Orleans chartered and fitted out an Italian lugger for a trip to the unexplored region in question—to the fishing station of Saint Malo. And a strange voyage it was. Even the Italian sailors knew not whither they were going, none of them had ever beheld the Manila village, or were aware of its location.

Starting from Spanish Fort northeastwardly across Lake Pontchartrain, after the first few miles sailed one already observes a change in the vegetation of the receding banks. The shore itself sinks, the lowland bristles with rushes and marsh grasses waving in the wind. A little further on and the water becomes deeply clouded with sap green—the myriad floating seeds of swamp vegetation. Banks dwindle away into thin lines, the greenish-yellow of the reeds changes into misty blue. Then it is all water and sky, melancholy blue and heaving basaltic, until the ready waste of Point-aux-Herbes thrusts its picturesque light-house far out into the lake. Above the wilderness of swamp grass and bulrushes this graceful building rises upon an open-work of wooden piles. Seven miles of absolute desolation separate the light-house keeper from his nearest neighbour. Nevertheless, there is a good piano there for the girls to play upon, comfortably furnished rooms, a good library. The pet cat has lost an eye in fighting with a moccasin, and it is prudent before descending from the balcony into the swamp about the house to reconnoitre for snakes. Still northeast. The sun is sinking above the rushy bank line; the west is consuming like iron losing its white heat. Against the ruddy light a cross is visible. There is a cemetery in the swamp. These are the forgotten graves of light-house keepers. Our boat is spreading her pinions for flight through the Rigolets, that shaunus waterway leading to Lake Borgne. We pass by the dilapidated walls of Fort Pike, a stronghold which, in a history, picturesque enough, but almost worthless against modern artillery. There is a solitary sergeant in plunge, and a dog. Perhaps the taciturnity of the man is due to his long solitude, the vast silence of the land weighing down upon him. At last appears the twinkling light of the United States customs-house, and the enormous skeleton of the Rigolets bridge. The customs house rises on stilts out of the sedge-grass. The pretty daughter of the inspector can manage a skiff as well as most expert fishermen. Here let us listen awhile to the moonless night. From the south a deep sound is audible rolling up like the surging of a thousand waves, like the long roaring of breakers. But the huge inland lake is scarcely agitated; the distant glare of a pelerine fire illuminates no spurring of "white horses." What, then, is that roar, as of thunder muffled by distance, as of that moaning that seamen hear far inland while dreaming at home of phantom seas? It is only a mighty chorus of frogs, innumerable millions of frogs, chanting in the darkness over unnumbered leagues of swamp and lagoon.

On the eastern side of the Rigolets Lake Borgne has scalloped out its grass-fringed bed in the form of a gigantic clover leaf—a shallow and treacherous sea, from which all fishing vessels scurry in wild terror when a storm begins to darken. No lugger can live in those short chopping waves when Gulf winds are mad. To reach the Manila settlement one must steer due south until the waving bulrushes again appear, this time behind muddy shoals of immense breadth. The short monsoons deepen varying from six inches to three and a half feet. For a while we grope about blindly along to the banks. Suddenly the mouth of a bayou appears—"Saint Malo Pass." With the aid of poles the vessel manages to stumble over a sand-bar, and forth with sinks in forty feet at green water. We reached Saint Malo upon a leaden-colored day, and the scenery in its grue ghastliness recalled to us the weird landscape painted with words by EDGAR POE—"Silence—a Fragment."

Out of the shimmering reed- and bunch-rooted grass on either side rise the fantastic houses of the Malay fishermen, poised upon slender supports above the marsh, like cranes or bitterns watching for some prey. Hard by the slimy mouth of the bayou extends a strange wharf, as ruined and rotted and unearthly as the timbers of the spectral ship in the "Rime of the Ancient Mariner." Odd craft huddle together beside it, fishing-nets make colorless drapery about the skeleton timber-work. Green are the banks, green the water is, green also with fungi every beam and plank and board and shingle of the houses upon stilts. All are built in true Manila style, with immense hat-shaped eaves and balconies, but in wood; for it had been found that palmetto and woven cane could not withstand the violence of the climate. Nevertheless, all this wood had to be shipped to the barren from a considerable distance, for large trees do not grow in the salty swamps. The highest point of land as far as the "Devil's Elbow," three or four miles away, and even beyond it, is only six inches above low water mark, and the men who built those houses were compelled to stand upon ladders, or rather usual frame work, while driving down the piles, lest the quagmire should swallow them up.

Below the houses are patches of grass and pools of water and stretches of gray mud, pitted with the hoof prints of hogs. Sometimes these hoof-prints are crossed with the tracks of the alligator, and a pig is missing. Chickens there are too—scurvy-looking creatures; many have but one leg, others have but one foot: the crabs have eaten them off. All these domestic creatures of the place live upon fish.

Here in the home of the mosquito, and every window throughout all the marsh country must be closed with wire netting. As shadows fall insects rise like a thick fog over the lowland; in the darkness their presence is signaled by a sound like the boiling of innumerable caldrons. Worse than these are the great green-headed coppasses, dreaded by the fishermen. Sand flies attack the colonists in warm weather; fleas are insolent at all hours; spiders of immense growth rival the net-weavers of Saint Malo, and hang their webs from the timbers side by side with scenes and fishing-tackle. Wood-worms are busy undermining the supports of the dwellings, and wood-ticks attack the beams and joistings. A marvellous variety of creatures haunt the surrounding swamp—reptiles, insects, and birds. The pewdee—"pray-god"—utters its soprano note; water-hens and plovers call across the marsh. Numberless snakes hide among the reeds, having little to fear save from the wild-cats, which attack them with savage recklessness. Rarely a bear or a deer finds its way near the bayou. There are many otters and musk-rats, minks and raccoons and rabbits. Buzzards float in the sky, and occasionally a bald-eagle sails before the sun.

Such is the land: its human inhabitants are not less strange, wild, picturesque. Most of them are cinnamon-colored men; a few are ghastly yellow, like that bronze into which a small proportion of gold is worked by the moulder. Their features are irregular without being actually repulsive; some have the cheek-bones very prominent, and the eyes of several are set obliquely aslant. The hair is generally intensely black and straight, but with some individuals it is curly and brown-ey. In Manila there are several varieties of the Malay race, and these Louisiana settlers represent more than one type. None of them appeared tall; the greater number were under-sized, but all well knit, and supple as fresh water eels. Their hands and feet were small, their movements quick and easy, but saltorly likewise, as of men accustomed to walk upon rocking decks on rough weather. They speak the Spanish language; and a Malay dialect is also used among them. There is only one white man in the settlement—the ship-carpenter, whom all the Malays address as "Maestro." He has learned to speak their Oriental dialect, and has conferred upon several the sacrament of baptism according to the Catholic rite; for many of these were not Christians at the time of their advent into Louisiana. There is but one black man in the lake villages—a Portuguese negro, perhaps a Brazilian maroon. The Maestro told us that communication is still kept up with Manila, and money often sent there to aid friends in emigrating. Such emigrants usually ship as seamen on board some Spanish vessel bound for American ports, and desert at the first opportunity. It is said that the colony was founded by deserters—perhaps also by desperate refugees from Spanish justice.

Justice within the colony itself, however, is of a curiously primitive kind; for there are neither magistrates nor sheriffs, neither prisons nor police. Although the region is included within the parish of St. Bernard, on Louisiana official has ever visited it, never has the tax-gatherer attempted to wend his way between the bayous. In the busy season a hundred fierce men are gathered together on this waste and watery place, and these must be a law unto themselves. If a really grave quarrel arises, the trouble is submitted to the arbitration of the oldest Malay in the colony, Pedro Cuarto, and his decisions are usually accepted without a murmur. Should a man, on the other hand, needlessly seek to provoke a difficulty, he is liable to be imprisoned within a fishcar, and left there until cold and hunger have tamed his rage, or the rising tide forces him at terms. Naturally all these men are Catholics, but a priest rarely visits them, for it costs a considerable sum to bring the ghostly father into the heart of the swamps that he may celebrate mass under the smoky rafters of HILARIN's house—under the strings of dry fish.

There is no woman in the settlement, nor has the treble of a female voice been heard along the bayous for many a long year. Men who have families keep them at New Orleans, or at Proctorville, or at La Branche, it would seem cruel to ask any woman to dwell in such a desolation, without comfort and without protection, during the long absence of the fishing boats. Only two instances of a woman dwelling there are preserved, like beloved traditions, in the memory of the inhabitants. The first of these departed upon her husband's death, the second left the village after a desperate attempt had been made to murder her spouse. In the dead of night the man was unexpectedly assailed, his wife and little boy helped to defend him. The assailant was overcome, tied hand and foot with fish-lines, and fastened to a stake deep driven into the swamp. Next morning they found him dead the mosquitoes and tappanees had filled the office of executioner. No excitement was manifested, the Maestro dug a grave deep in the soft gray mud, and tied above it a rude wooden cross, which still shows its silhouette against the sky just above the reeds.

Such was the narrative which El Maestro related to me with a strange mixture of religious compassion for the unshrieved soul, and marvellous profanity expressed in four different languages. "Only mosquitoes five times now," he added, indicating the decaying edifice where the dead man had died.

But for the possession of modern fire-arms and one most ancient clock, the lake-dwellers of Saint Malo would seem to have as little in common with the civilization of the nineteenth century as had the inhabitants of the Swiss lacustrine settlements of the Bronze Epoch. Here time is measured rather by the number of alligator-skins sent to market, or the most striking incidents of successive fishing seasons, than by ordinary reckoning, and did not the Maestro keep a daily record of the days of the week, some might know Sunday from Monday. There is absolutely no furniture in the place; not a chair, a table, or a bed can be found in all the dwellings of this aquatic village. Mattresses there are, filled with dry "Spanish beard"; but these are laid upon tiers of enormous shelves braced against the walls, where the weary fishermen slumber at night among barrels of flour and folded nets and mounted fish. Even the clothes (purchased at New Orleans or Proctorville) become as quaint and curiously tinted in that moist atmosphere as the houses of the village, and the broad hats take a greenish and grotesque aspect in odd harmony with the appearance of the ancient roofs. All the art treasures of the colony consist of a circus poster immemorially old, which is preserved with much reverence, and two photographs jealously guarded in the Maestro's sea-chest. These represent a sturdy young woman with crude eyes, and a grim-looking Frenchman with wintry beard—the wife and father of the ship-carpenter. He pointed out them with a display of feeling made strongly pathetic by contrast with the wild character of the man, and his eyes, keen and hard as those of an eagle, softened a little as he kissed the old man's portrait, and murmured, "Mon cher vieux père."

And nevertheless this life in the wilderness of reeds is connected mysteriously with New Orleans, where the head-quarters of the Manila

men's benevolent society are—La Chaux Philipsen. A fisherman dies; he is buried under the rustling reeds, and a pine cross planted above his grave; but when the flesh has rotted from the bones, these are taken up and carved by some hugger as the metropolis, where they are sheltered away in those earnest niche tombs which recall the Roman columbaria.

How, then, comes it that in spite of this connection with civilized life the Malay settlement of Lake Borgne has been so long unknown? Perhaps because of the natural reticence of this people. There is still in the oldest portion of the oldest quarter of New Orleans a certain Manilla restaurant hidden away as a court, and supported almost wholly by the patronage of Spanish West Indian sailors. Few people belonging to the fashionable circles of New Orleans know of its existence. The menu is printed in Spanish and English; the fare is cheap and good. Now it is kept by Chinese, for the Manilla man and his obliqueeyed wife, comely as any figure upon a Japanese vase, has gone away. Doubtless his ears, like sea-shells, were haunted by the moaning of the sea, and the Gulf winds called to him by night, so that he could not remain.

The most intelligent person in Saint Malo is a Malay half-breed, VALENTINE. He is an attractive figure, a supple dwarfish lad almost as broad as tall, brown as old copper, with a singularly bright eye. He was educated in the great city, but actually abandoned a fine situation in the office of a judge to return to his swarthy father in the weird swamps. The old man is still there—Thomas on the Bayous. He married a white woman, by whom he had two children, this boy and a daughter, WILMA, who is dead. VALENTINE is the best pirogue carsman in the settlement, and a boat bears his name. But opposite the house of THOMAS on the SAFFOR rides another graceful boat, cavely used, and whimsically christened with the name of the dead WILMA. Latin names prevail in the nomenclature of boats and men: Marcellino, Francesca, Serafino, Florenza, Victorio, Pasquo, Mihario, Marcetto, are common baptismal names. The solitary creole appellation Aristide offers an anomaly. There are beggars and sloops bearing equally romantic names: Mazarro de Aranjuez, Marcellita, Joven Independencia. Spanish piety has baptized several others with sacred words and names of mercies.

Of the thirteen or fourteen large edifices on piles, the most picturesque is perhaps that of CARPIO—old Carpio, who deserts the place once a year to play monte in Mexico. His house consists of three wooden withers so arranged that the outer two advance like wings, and the wharf is placed in front of the central structure. Smoked fish black with age hang from the roof, chickens squeak upon the floor, pigs grunt under the planking. Small, squat, sweet, dry, and grimy as his smoked fish is old CARPIO, but his eye is bright and quick as a lizard's.

It is at HILARIO'S great casa that the Manilla men pass stormy evenings, playing monte in a species of Spanish lotto. When the cantador, (the caller) sings out the numbers, he always accompanies the announcement with some rude poetry characteristic of his/her life or Catholic faith:

Pareja de uno;
Dos pajaros de cuero—

a pair of one (11), the two snakes to which the fish-ear is fastened.

Nuevo cuatro;
La casa del gato—

number 6, the cat's house.

Seis con su nuevo;
Arriba y abajo—

six with its nine (69); up and down.

De dos parejas;
Dos patitos en laguna—

pair of two (22); two ducklings in the lagoon or marsh—the Arabic numerals conveying by their shape this idea to the minds of fishermen. Picturesque! The numbers 77 suggest an almost peculiar idea—dos gansos en laguna (two geese in the lagoon).

Tres y pareja;
Edad de Cristo—

thirty-three, the age of Christ.

Doz con su clave;
Dozen noche pasada—

twenty-five (Christmas-eve); the "Good-night" pass.

Nueve y pareja;
El gato viejo—

ninety, "the oldest one." Fifty-five is called the "two boats moored" together, as the figures placed thus $\frac{55}{55}$ convey that idea to the mind—dos pinkas amarradas. Very mischief is the voice of the cantador as he continues, shaking up the numbers in a calabash:

Dos y unos:
Vendo y quiero—22.
Seis con su cuarto:
Sonsita y cuatro—64.
Ocho y seis
Borrachuela y seis—86 (drunken eighty-six).
Nina de quince (a girl of fifteen):
Uno y cinco—15.

Polita, too, three sinister-eyed men; there was not a single person in the room who did not greet us with a hearty buenos noches. The artist made his sketch of that grotesque scene upon the rude pinch work which served as a gambling table by the yellow flickering of lamps fed with fish-oil.

There is an liquor in the settlement, and these hardy fishers and alligator-hunters seem none the worse therefor. Their flesh is as hard as cedar-wood, and sickness rarely affects them, although they know little of comfort, and live largely upon raw fish, seasoned with vinegar and oil. There is but one chimney—a wooden structure—in the village, fires are hardly ever lighted, and in the winter the cold and the damp would soon undermine feeble constitutions.

A sunset viewed from the balcony of the Mayor's house seemed in an enchantment. The steel blue of the western horizon heated into furnace yellow, then cooled off into red splendors of astonishing warmth and transparency. The bayou blushed crimson, the green of the marsh pools, of the shivering reeds, of the drooping timber work, took fairy bronze tints, and then, interspersed with marsh mist, the orange vermilion face of the sun passed invisibly for the last time through the tall grasses upon the bank. Night came with marvellous choruses of frogs; the whole lowland throbbed and laughed with the wild music—a swamp-hymn deeper and mightier than even the surge sounds heard from the Rigolets bank. the world seemed as alone with it!

We sailed away just as the moon began to flame again, and saw the sun arise with roods sharply outlined against the vivid vermilion of his face. Long fish formed clouds sailed above him attempting the blue, green-backed and iridescent trifled, like the dwarfness of the green water below. VALENTINE hailed us from the opposite bank, holding up a struggling pescado (we which he had just rescued from a waligant. A few pirogues were already basking over the bayou, ribbing the water with wavelets half oarewild, half orange gold. Brighter and brighter the eastern fires grew, oranges and vermilions faded out into fierce yellow, and against the blaze all the ragged ribs of HILARIO'S ellish wharf stood out in black. Somebody fired a farewell shot as we reached the mouth of the bayou; there was a waving of picturesque hands and hats; and far in our wake an alligator plashed his scaly body, making for the whispering line of reeds upon the opposite bank.

LAFCADIO HEARN.

WILLIAM PENN AND THE COLONISTS.

In the historical composition which appears on our opening pages Mr HOWARD PYLE represents the reception accorded to WILLIAM PENN, on the occasion of his first visit to America, in 1682, by the settlers who had already founded a flourishing colony on the banks of the Delaware. Not only Friends, but members of other denominations, Englishmen, Swedes, and Germans, joined in giving him a cordial welcome. Several conferences were held, a charter of liberties was issued, a democratic form of government was established, and the city of Philadelphia was planned and founded. At this time also was made the celebrated treaty with several Indian tribes—the only treaty, says VOLTAIRE, "never sworn to and never broken."

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[From our Own Correspondent.]

For for a Penny, to for a Pound.—A Learned Doctor, Wanted, Cats at high Prices.—Clever Russian ambassadress.—The Woes of Journalism.—A moving Incident.—A pattern Parson.

THERE is a proverb about not spoiling a ship for a pound of tar, and it seems there are some folks who apply it even to crime. When they have once begun with it they are not to be deterred, but most little details as they arise with ever-new expedients. A young lady of Manchester, aged fourteen, was charged with attempting to commit suicide, and another lady of more mature years, a Mrs Allen, with aiding and abetting her. Allen first incited Robinson to rob her father, and took the proceeds. When the theft was discovered she recommended the young person to destroy herself, as being the best way out of the scrape. The matter is of more limited range, but never since the days of Strafford has there ever been a more complete scheme of "Thorough." "We all stop somewhere," says Charles Lamb, referring to the practice of honesty, but as regards proceeding in the opposite course it would be interesting to learn where Mrs. Allen of Manchester would feel called upon to stop.

I am always "cracking up" doctors; and no wonder, for I have received as a long life as end of kindness from them. Not only to their calling the most needs of all callings, but no other possess members so generous. It is the rule one, also, which distinguishes in a good sense between the rich and poor, and takes into account the circumstances of a client. I heard to-day a charming anecdote of one of the foremost of our good physicians, whom I will call Sir A. B, another great doctor, and himself, were summoned to attend the sick wife of a country rector not far from London. After the consultation the parson, in bidding them good-by, slipped a fifty-pound note into B's hand, his fingers closed on it without inquiry, and on left the room. When he had gone, the parson offered the same sum to Sir A. "Why, no, sir. I looked into the clergy list before I left home, and find your living is a very small one. I shall take no fee."

"But I have private means of my own—£4000 a year."

"I am glad to hear it;" and he held out his hand and took the check like a man.

To my mind nothing can be better than this. The generosity of the man, his carefulness that B should not see it, so as not to put him in an invidious position, and then the very proper alacrity to take his dues!

I have often wondered how members of a royal race can and it consonant with their sense of propriety to "crack up" the head of their family. It is quite right that subjects should assess their loyalty and express their admiration of monarchical institutions, but surely it is not good taste for those who are on nearly connected with Majesty to do so. The young nobleman who wrote,

"Let law, religion, virtue, morals die,
But leave us still our old nobility"

(or some such fustian), it seems to me showed as little good manners as good sense in so doing, inasmuch as he himself belonged in the class he maligned. But nothing in my mind can equal for this "gude conceit o' oursels" the last words attributed to the late Prince Charles of Prussia, who, on hearing his brother announced as a visitor, "made a final effort, raised his right hand, and faintly exclaiming, 'Long live the Emperor!' expired." Apart from the conventionality of such a speech as to concern a time, and as absurdity as addressed to a man of over eighty, it seems to me a vulgar speech—much more so than that famous "A peerage or Westminster Abbey!" for which Nelson has been so lauded was the coals by posterity.

A well-meaning but slightly disingenuous French priest was punished the other day for forging Sikhim programmes in order to bring Communion into contempt. A Russian inspector of police has bettered this teaching by issuing letters signed "Socialist Committee," threatening death to wealthy personages unless they paid ransoms to that imaginary council. He not only thus strengthened the cause of order, but filled his own pockets. This is remorseless indeed.

There is an immense "to do" made about class grievances, but the most ill-used class in this country, and at the same time that to which the said country is most indebted, are jurymen. When one looks round a court of justice, it is strange to think that, except the prisoner and the spectators (who may go when they please), there are only those twelve poor creatures, pack ed in a box like herrings in a barrel, who are not paid for being there. They have often to sit for days patiently listening to the details of a right-of-way cause, or, as in a recent case, to a dissertation upon art by experts. And yet it appears that we do not know the worst of what British jurymen suffer. At an inquest the other day a juryman called the attention of the coroner to a grievance which, if it were not corroborated by proof, would seem incredible. For coroners' juries, it seems, working men are usually summoned, and not only do they necessarily lose their day's pay, which they can ill afford, but their attendance often entails dismissal by their employers.

The applicant suggested that local tradesmen should be summoned twice for every single time that working men are summoned. The coroner said that he could not do that, but that every one not liable to serve on other juries was summoned by him in rotation. "I can not believe," he said, "that any one has ever lost a situation through doing his legal duty."

ASCOMAN JURYMAN. "I have lost it myself, sir, through being summoned on one of your juries. I showed the summons in my employer, and he told me that if I went he would put some one else in my place, and he did so."

THE CORONER. "That is a great shame. If I knew who that employer was, I would take care he should be made acquainted with the law."

The juryman as once gave up his name, and the coroner said: "I will take care that he shall be summoned on juries enough." And quite right too; but why was not the name of that employer made public? Though such a moving lay lamentable a most of mid twenty-six feet days morning at the rate of a mile in twenty minutes, and submerging 120 acres of pasture-land, with farm and out buildings! Inside the farm-house, which is, it seems, an exceptionally good one, the pro prietor was found sitting in a state of "extreme depression and astonishment." He had heard "of the stars in their courses" fighting against a particular individual, but that was a long time ago, and perhaps he had taken it for an Eastern metaphor; indeed, he might have thought himself not much the worse for any enmity he might have earned among the celestial bodies. But the conduct of his neighbor the bog was something quite out of his experience. It had never, he said, entered into his head, but it really seems to have got everywhere else. It remains in the high-road for a quarter of a mile, ten feet deep, and threatens to burst up the bridges of the neighboring river. This is just the sort of event which half a century ago would have been hailed by the poor man's comment "a judgment."

An admirable specimen of the English divine has just died near Exeter. "His generosity," we are told, "knew no bounds." His cider, which was of his own brewing, was reckoned the best in Devonshire. He handled needle and cotton with the skill of a tailor; he was a skilled mechanic, and possessed over a ton of tools; he was a member of the Volunteer Rifle to the day of his death, which happened at seventy-two, was an excellent shot, and took many prizes at Wimbledon. This gentleman, the Rev. Wilson Brown, was, of course, a man of means, but in other respects he resembles the famous clergyman of Southwaite (his name was Walker, but he really existed) immortalized by Wordsworth. He too could hem and sew and bake and brew; indeed, if I remember right, he kept a public-house (I need not say "most respectably conducted"), and reaped the fruit of his "labors in the vineyard" very literally. Indeed, what seems the most amazing part of his performances was that though his living was less than forty pounds a year, and he had a large family, he contrived by his industry (chiefly spinning) to leave considerable fortune behind him.

R. KEMBLE, of London.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

RECENT experiments in long-distance telephoning have yielded very satisfactory results. A continuous line of wire of the Postal Telegraph Company's system was established a few days ago from this city to Cleveland, Ohio, and conversation was carried on by telephone over the seven hundred and fifty miles of wire with as much distinctness as over the short circuits of the city rooms. A microphone transmitter of peculiar construction was used. The membrane is of rush, with carbon trusses running from its centre to brass slips which are connected with the local battery. It is claimed that by the use of this device the instrument is made more sensitive to the sounds to be reproduced. The receiving instrument was made with the view of obviating the crackling sounds which are usually heard in telephones, and which are owing to induction. This is accomplished by so constructing the magnet that there can be no intervening of polarity between its parts. In the experiments an insulated local battery consisted of two Fuller cells. A ground circuit was used.

Early intelligence from Newport is to the effect that fox-hunting is not likely to be one of the attractions during the coming season. This is not owing to a scarcity of foxes but to the objections of farmers to having their fields trampled by horses running in the wake of hounds that are on the scent of a bag of anise-seed.

In a granite block recently built into a wall in Richmond is "an almost perfectly shaped blackbird outlined in ashes." It may be a petrifaction of one of the batsorie twenty four which were baked in a pie.

The value of a little capital to young men who go West as grow up with the country is illustrated by the experience of a Connecticut youth who has written home for a thousand dollars with which to marry a wealthy Iowa widow.

A splendid diadem is the crown which is to be placed on the head of the Empress of Russia at his approaching coronation. The famous diamond which formerly belonged in the Brahman temple at Tcheringam, which was carried away by a French grenadier, which came into the possession of Prince Orloff, and was presented by him to the Empress Catherine II., is its chief ornament. This stone is said to weigh 779 carats, and is valued at 30,000,000 rubles. The sceptre was made to order of Paul I., and is adorned with a diamond which possesses a history of interest greater than that of the Orloff jewel. It was once an eye of the massive gold lion on the throne of the Shah Nadir, and its companion was the Koh-i-noor, now in the possession of Queen Victoria. The stone weighs 193 carats. Catherine II paid an Armenian 450,000 rubles for it, but it is now valued at 3,000,000 rubles.

The large increase lately in the number of telegraph wires strung over the tops of the London houses moves Truth to call attention to the resulting perils. "It is well to remember," says Truth, "that a snapped wire would cut a man's head off. In wintry weather people walk about the streets in more imminent peril of their lives than if they were in the midst of the Atlantic." What would the residents of London think if, in addition to the peril of having their heads decapitated by breaking telegraph wires, they had to encounter the danger of being deafened over the house-tops by exploding reservoirs of steam or gas whenever they walked in certain quarters of the city? Truth calls for a system of subterranean telegraph wires like that which Germany has completed, and which Russia is introducing.

The startling intelligence is printed in the London Lancet that the exterior stone-work of Westminster Abbey is disintegrating so rapidly that the necessity of reducing the entire structure is imminent. The mischief is said to result from the deposit of particles on the stone, which has given to the walls an extremely dark appearance, and in some unexplained way hastened the destroying effect of the weather on the surface.

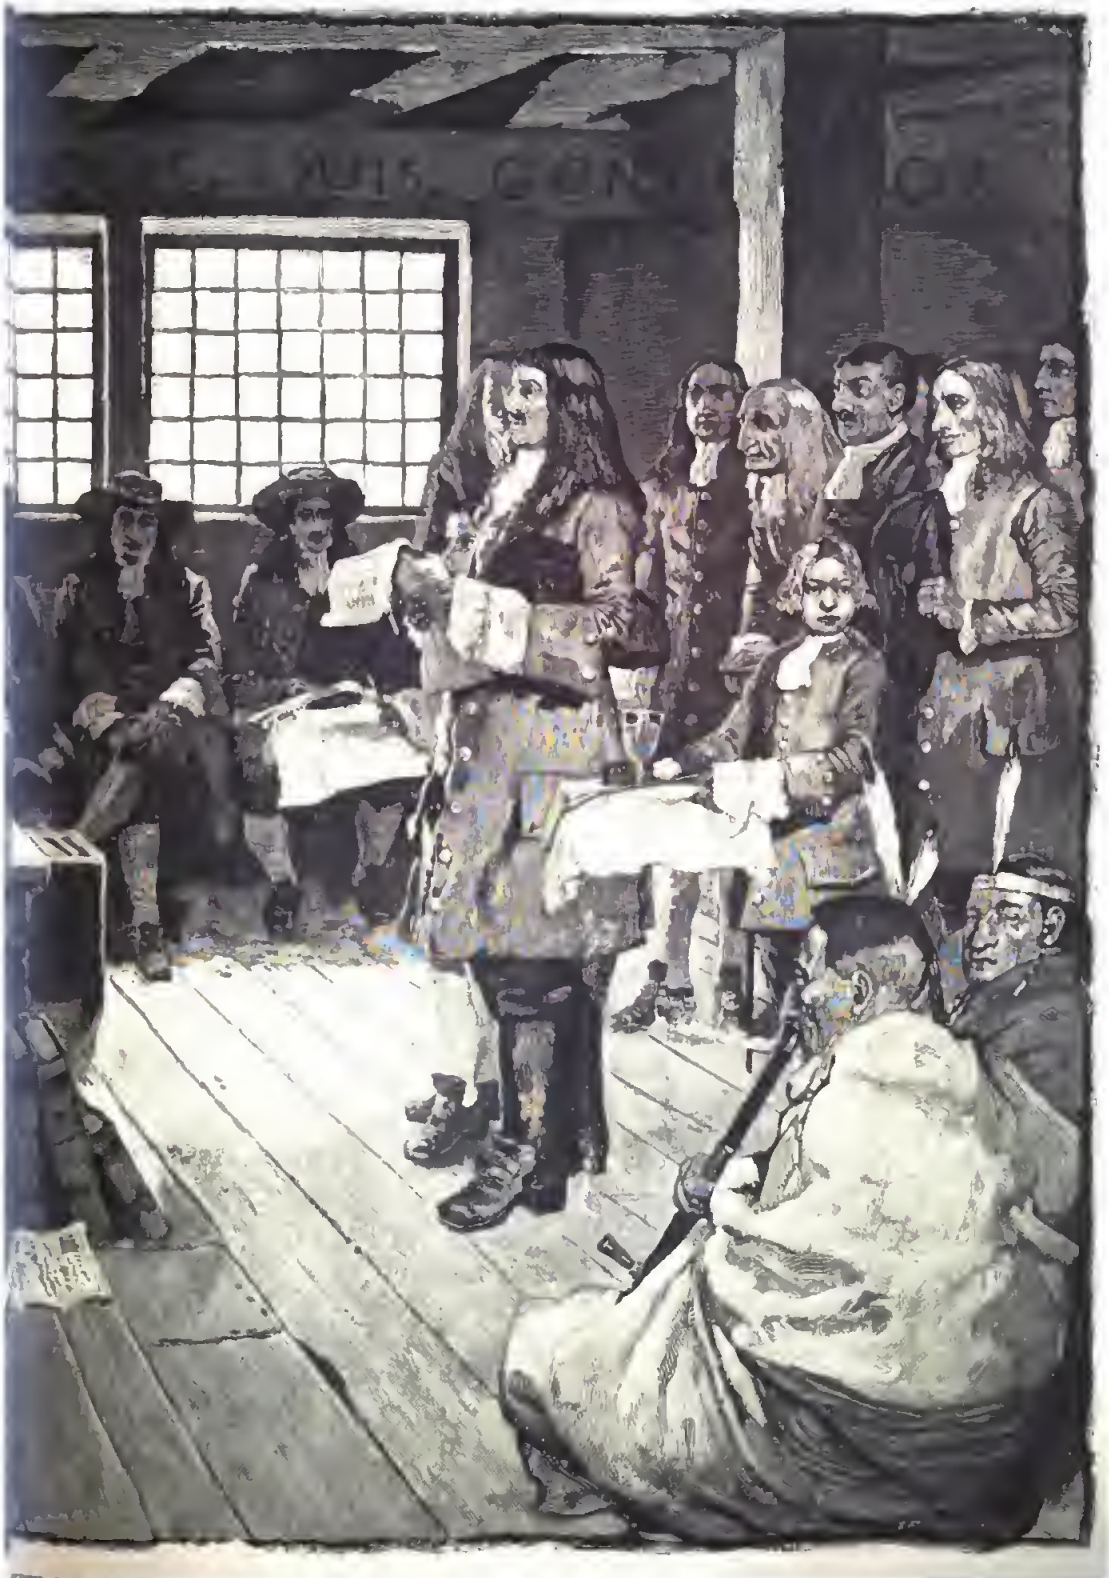
The name of the Alabaw (Texas) newspaper is the Inspector Quill. One of its esteemed contemporaries is the Simpleton.

Complaint is made in many parts of the country because the Congressional Record does not adjourn when Congress does. Two numbers of that publication have been issued since the adjournment, in one of which a single statesman says pass, with speeches that were never spoken, as much sense as there is in an ordinary octavo volume of about five hundred pages.

The chief envoy from Madagascar, who possesses fifteen names and a name with ten syllables, is no admirer of Mr Frelinghuysen. In his estimation, the name of the secretary of State contains sufficient letters to place him at least a considerable distance above the majority of his fellow-citizens.

An extension of time has been granted recently to a company formed for the purpose of draining the valley in which the city of Mexico is. This work was undertaken by the Spaniards after the conquest, and they made a cut three hundred feet deep and several miles long. The work occupied, it is said, a hundred years. It is proposed to deepen this cut sixty-five feet, at a cost of four million dollars. The Spaniards at first attempted to tunnel the mountains, but the water destroyed the tunnel's sides, and that method was abandoned. The Mexican government offers grants of money and land to the company that shall succeed in draining the valley.

THE FIRST VISIT OF WILLIAM PENN TO AMERICA—A CON



ITH THE COLONISTS.—Drawn by Howard Pyle.—[See Page 199.]

WHY THE DAISIES ARE WHITE.

Once on a time a quarrel rose,
'Tis said, between impatient Spring
And that old gray-beard Winter, who Yet longer to his throne would cling
"My turn it is," quoth Mistress Spring,
"To reign, and clothe the earth anew.
How long must all my beauties lie
Concealed, for fear of each an you?"

Then to the Sunbeams cunningly
She turned and said, "To you alone
I look for help earth's chains to loose,
And drive this loiterer from the throne."
So, tempted by her smiling face,
The Sunbeams answered to her call,
And though old Winter battled well,
His laughing foes began to fall.

"But if you think," he coldly said,
"All trace of me to wipe away,
My memory still shall haunt and lie
Upon your meadows day by day."
And as that night a messenger
He Winter sent to Fairyland
Upon each daisy bloscom laid
A sheet of snow with lavish hand.

And Mistress Spring, when she beheld
The souvenir of Winter's reign,
Smiled as she outfit blessed her pets,
And foiled his purpose once again;
For in the heart of each white flower
She laid a bit of golden sun,
And bade it nestle closely there
Until scant daisy life was done.

And thus the fair field flower grew,
Spring's golden sunshine, warm and bright,
At rest forever in its heart,
The while its leaves, like snow, are white.
MARY D. BRINE.

THE HANDS OF JUSTICE.*

By F. W. ROBINSON,

Author of "Cousins Commissioner," "Little Kate Kirby," "Poor Humanity," "For Her Sake," etc.

BOOK THE FOURTH.

THE MOVING OF THE HANDS.

CHAPTER IV.

THE END OF FARM FORLORN.

TIM, the old farm had looked like desolation when Reuben Fladge had driven away from it. The absence of life about it was singularly marked, although human life had only vanished in the afternoon, and it was not yet sundown. And life and all gone from it even, for the master of Farm Forlorn had locked himself in with his household gods and was busy after his fashion. In the cottages round about the farm, and in the lower level, where old Spilkins had died, making its mark matched—all the mischief—in his last helpless days, it was known that Master Woodhatch was still within the house, and hence the villagers kept to the background, guessing instinctively that the master wished to be alone. But in the cottages and in the road before the cottages men and women stood in groups and talked the matter over, and speculated on the reason of it all, and why John Woodhatch in this unseemly haste had paid them in full of all demands and done with them forever.

Knowing not the truth, dreaming not of what a man can do stung to his heart's core by disappointment and ingratitude, being only aware that John Woodhatch was a liberal payer, and liked odd folk and prices folk about him, they, with the facility for ease lying patent to ignorance in general, constructed their own history of the case, and set it down for gospel. Something had been found out, and it was necessary for John Woodhatch to get clear off. Nothing remarkable in that, for there was something to be found out in most of the lives round about this place—this being shadow-land, and these its shadows—but it was certain the master must be gone. And though they would have been glad to know the exact facts of the case, and whether murder or robbery or some gigantic swindle was at the bottom of the explanation, still in the aggregate they trusted John Woodhatch might get comfortably away before the "slops" from Lincoln or Boston came and cabbared him. There were two or three strangers in the place that day who might be after the master already and have warrants in their pockets for him, who could tell? One man professed to be there out of curiosity, and another to have heard of sales at Farm Forlorn, and have come too late in the day to drive any bargain with the owner, but they were men who sat together still in the tap-room of the way side inn and looked out of window at the strangers, and as if half afraid of them, and what they might attempt in the way of rescue presently. Still, they were men who might be brokers bribed to making a seizure, now that the doors and windows of the place were closely barred, and the master as safe within the walls as in a fortress.

The people talked in "the open," at though they had some talking they should see the master again, and learn more of him and his motives, if they were vigilant, before the stars alone out. But the day stole away and the stars were glittering above them, and old Carlo was heard barking within the farm-yard—a sign of life and vigor yet at the old place—when one or two straggglers, getting tired at last of keeping the respectful distance which they had maintained all the afternoon, slouched past the farm and along the high road, with their hands in their pockets and their feet scuffling up the dust—men struck out of work, and already tired of the position. The farm looked very black and gaunt as the twilight deepened into night, and the trees rustled more ominously above it, as though they had some cognesance of evil with the on-coming of the dark hours. Presently, to the amazement of more than one pair of watchful ears pricked up that night, the old dog Carlo was heard berking a good quarter of a mile away, and it was suspected then that the master had stolen from the house by the garden door, and gone the short-cut across the sand-hills to the sea. He wished to get away without any more odium, unless he was coming back again to take care of his property after one of his wild walks on the shore, and after the habit that he had always had. The inhabitants were not certain, and did not go in search of him. They were careful folk, who did not care for walks on the sands after dark, with the awful wind tearing across hundreds of miles of sea at them, and such rank desolation right and left—they would leave all that to John Woodhatch with great pleasure. Presently they grew tired of talking over the matter even, being early people, with sleepy wives; and doors were shut, and lights extinguished to the cottage windows, and only a few reckless souls without wives, or without much care for them or for the morrow, and with as tra money—John Woodhatch's money—to spend upon sour beer, proceeded to the inn, to inspect the strangers again, and take their turn at drinking hard. And the great old farm stood like a giant house beyond them, and grew blacker and blacker with the night, merging itself in the night's dissolve at last, and then suddenly and awfully waking up to light. Waking to a deepred light of hidden flame within, which shone forth luridly through cracks of wooden shutters and fissures in the doors, and above the shutters, where the strips of latticed glass were, and where every twisted pattern of the leaden frames became distinctly marked by a flickering light within, until the glass splintered and shivered with the heat, and smoke and sparks and fire came forth from a dozen parts at once, and each a remote, sure sign of the incendiary having been at work. The flames made steady progress, and stole like fiery serpents from room to room and corridor to corridor, cracking and snapping each scrap of wood-work in its progress; and faraway folk within a hundred yards dreamed not of the disaster till the hostler of the inn, crossing his stable-yard, was startled by the crimson light upon the cobble-stones, and looked up at the red sky and along the road toward the farm, as though the vision of Judgment had come suddenly upon him. It was soon known then, and Skegs Shore woke up to active life with its first wild cry of "Fire!"

All Skegs Shore became busy and excited and half mad, and people ran to and fro and shouted "Fire!" and women and children screamed; and those in other villages and at Skegs Shore proper woke up to the warning in the sky, and in all haste made for Farm Forlorn—the common centre of disaster. The old parish engine was being unearthed and getting ready for the journey; and the telegraph wires were flashing the news to border centres, and asking for assistance. Meanwhile he the light of his own burning home John Woodhatch strode away. There was no longer darkness in his path: his favorite walk when his mind was ill at ease—as it had been so many times in his life—was steeped no more in blackness, but aglow with crimson and gold, where the wet sands caught the reflection of the sky and the waves grew bright with it

He stopped once and looked back, and muttered, "So soon!" and then resumed his way, Carlo leaking up at him as if he were as much puzzled by the master as those who had served him, and whom he had left behind that night with a grand spectacle of flame as a wind-up to his life with them.

He had had the sands to himself now. All Skegs Shore was bent on night-seeing; a few hundred feet past him now and then, knowing the short-cut to the farm as well as he; some glancing at him as they ran, and one man recognizing him and calling out his name, to which he took no heed, but strode on more rapidly. Presently, when he was close upon the old ship's skeleton, some one darted toward him full of excitement and caught him by the arm. There was no need to ask who it was that stayed his progress thus unceremoniously, there was on one, had John Woodhatch been in ignorance, for, in a husky, agitated voice, Reuben Fladge cried out,

"Master! the farm! the farm!"

"What are you doing here?" said Woodhatch, angrily; "why are you hurking about the spot—why are you not at Heatherpe, as I ordered you?"

"I have been waiting for you. I knew you would come this way; I wanted so to see you once again!" he cried. "You won't be angry? The farm, oh! the farm is—"

"Yes, I know. Don't scream over it," said Woodhatch, interrupting him. "It is a fit and proper thing, Fladge, that that should be the end of it."

He pointed back to the red sky, and the flames rising brightly in it, and the sparks which were drifting out to sea in one continuous stream of golden flakes, with the thick, heavy wreathe of smoke following them like fate.

"Oh, master!" cried Fladge, bursting into tears; "you have burned it down, then?"

"Yes, I have."

"Oh, he! what will they do to you for that?" John Woodhatch laughed scornfully.

"Anything they like; and I don't know if I should protest," he answered. "But there, you must not make this noise, or we shall have many eyes about us. I have done no one harm in this; it was my own house, bought with my own savings, and it is better a ruin. I choose to have it a ruin, Fladge," he added, taking him by the arm, the better to impress the fact on his companion's mind; "and when you hear fools and liars talking about this, tell them so from me."

"Why did you burn it down?" gasped Fladge, glancing at his master, and half afraid of him and his manner, which was new to him.

John Woodhatch had never been a man to brook much questioning, but he made no protest in this instance to Reuben Fladge's inquiries. He was like a man anxious to explain to this one being, whose brain was not able to receive them, the motives for his desperate act. His anger at the sight of Reuben had vanished, and his voice was low and earnest, as he walked on with Fladge, his arm still linked in his.

"I burned it down, Fladge, because in that house I had met nothing but greatness shame and gross ingratitude," he said. "I wanted—I, a poor thief born wretch—to act as God Almighty in this place and rule as king and savior. I wanted to be talked of as a great reformer of bad lives—a wondrous man, who, having known what crime was, and what temptation was, knew best the way to lead poor sinners from them. And I know nothing—not even myself—and have been laughed at for my pains. Do you think you understand me?"

"Hardly, sir—hardly."

"Try and do so when you are alone, as that you can tell this story when I am a long way from Skegs Shore. For you are left, Fladge, to fight my battles here, you know," he said, "you who stood by me to the very end, and was the one friend left when the wreck came."

"I—I don't understand," whimpered Fladge, again. "I can't. Where are you going, master?—tell me that. And what are you going to do?"

John Woodhatch did not reply to these two extra questions. They were of the class to which he would hazard no reply. But he went on in his own way.

"You will go to Heatherpe, and see what can be done there, Reuben, and you will take care of old Carlo for me till he dies, I know."

"Ay, that I will," Fladge answered.

"I had intended to drown him here to-night out of his misery—the misery of a master's loss, Fladge, and which a dog feels most," he muttered to himself, "but your barking here to-night has saved the little life that's left him."

"Ay, is that it?" said the troubled Reuben.

Here John Woodhatch came to a full stop, and Fladge and Carlo stopped with him.

"I was rough and hoarsh to you when I saw you first," Woodhatch remarked. "Let me say, with my good-by to you, that I'm sorry you should have had any harsh words of mine to-night to sting you. But I am not myself just now—and I dare say," he added, with another short, mocking laugh, "I shall never be quite myself again. Who knows?"

Fladge regarded him tearfully. As John Woodhatch held out his hand toward him in farewell greeting he did not withdraw his own hands from the pockets into which a moment since he had thrust them.

"Why can't I go with you?" asked Fladge.

"I have said it's impossible."

"You'll want somebody—you ain't fond of your own company—and I'll never say a word or do a single thing to make you nay. I'm sorry I took the feller with me," pleaded Fladge.

For an instant John Woodhatch wavered, although Reuben Fladge was not aware of it.

"It can't be. At all events just now. Perhaps," he added, "I may write to you in time to come—write to Heatherpe, where you will be."

"Ah! that's no good," muttered Fladge.

"You don't mean it?"

"Well, good-by."

"What are you going to Hull for?" asked Fladge. "You said you was going to Hull."

"It's handy place to start from, and the ships sail out there night and day, hour after hour, to new worlds, new hopes, new lives. And, Fladge, I am very tired of the old life. There," he said, "will that do? I can explain no more than that."

"Yes. I make out—some of it," answered Fladge.

"Then good-by—and God make a man of you, and a good man!"

"Thank you, sir," answered Fladge, very humbly, and even inclining his head, as a suppliant might do receiving a benediction from his priest, "thankee, master, and—God bless you—allers!"

"Thanks, Fladge—I will value your last wish for me. And good-by again," he said, extending his hand once more. "Why the devil don't you say good by?" he cried, petulantly, at last.

"I ain't a-going yet awhile."

"But you must."

"My way's your way," said Fladge. "There's the horse and trap at the Swan, and I've got to fetch it."

"I'm not going to the Swan."

"No, but you're going that way," replied Fladge, still persistent, yet to any obstinate.

John Woodhatch shrugged his shoulders, and pressed the question no further. He walked on moodily toward the sand banks, where the pathway met the sea-shore and led to the village where he was known as well, and where Lucy Beake had lived to this day. A poor, weak, loving, warm-hearted little woman, this Lucy, and not fit for him in any way, he thought very suddenly and remarkably just then, but the only woman in all his life whom he had ever thought of loving and would have made an idol of, in his own clumsy way. Where was she now? he wondered. And why had she, with all the rest of them, gone away as easily from him, with a few commonplace expressions of regret? She might have guessed they would never meet again—that that had been his fixed resolve from the hour her father thought of giving up Skegs Shore.

He walked on, thinking of her still, and Fladge and Carlo followed to the sea. The sky was all ablaze, and lighted him along the foot-path to Skegs Shore—the old gilt vane on the church tower seemed like little jets of flame that night, and the glass windows in the quiet village were bright with dancing lights.

There had been a rare race of the inhabitants to the farm, but there were a few dark figures dotting the main street, too indolent to make the journey, or too indifferent to sight-seeing, or with too much business to hope upon their shirts; and there was quite a crowd of likers round the doors of the Swan, all talking of the fire and of John Woodhatch, and all with their faces turned to the red glare in the sky. One or two more were hurrying in the distance toward the railway station, where the down train was nearly due, and it was John Woodhatch who, seeing them, was reminded of the time, and took longer strides in their direction.

But the master of Farm Forlorn was remembered by those left behind in the old village, and more than one called out his name as he stepped into the foreground, and a few came running after him. He turned abruptly aside, with the object of evading them, and the hundred questions which would be hurled at him, but they intercepted him at right angles, and were in front of him again, two men, on whom he had never set eyes before, standing completely in his way.

"Mr. Woodhatch," said one of them.

"Yes; but I am pressed for time, and have the Hull train to catch," he said, striding by.

"Very sorry, sir," replied the man, as he and his companion kept pace with him, "but you can't go that journey yet awhile."

"Why not?"

"Very sorry, sir," he said again, "but I am a constable, and it's my business, and my unpleasant duty—to arrest you."

"To arrest me!" exclaimed John Woodhatch.

"Yes, sir; that's it."

"It is my own farm, and on one's own property I'm thunderod forth."

"I don't know anything about the farm, Mr. Woodhatch," said the officer; "mine's a different affair, and I hope you'll come quietly with us, and save all fuss and bother."

He glanced at the stalwart proportions of the farmer and trusted sincerely that he would.

"What is your charge?" asked John Woodhatch, calmly.

"Murder."

"Murder!" repeated the accused man, and "Murder!" echoed Reuben Fladge, in a higher key.

"Yes, sir. The old Morris Brake business, I'm sorry to say," replied the man, still solemnly. "and you'll come quietly, I hope."

"Yes," replied John Woodhatch, "quietly enough, my man. I am your prisoner."

CHAPTER V.

ON REMAND.

THERE was more news for this quiet and sleepy part of green old Lincolnshire—this dead-and-alive Skegs Shore, where news, as a rule, flew by and left no trace, like carrier-pigeons with wings for a busier sphere. Moreover, here was news to be transmitted from Skegs Shore to English towns and cities, to the mighty London even, many miles away—news which might interest folk who had forgotten this dull, flat strip of coast, but remembered something about a murder near it years and years ago.

And now the murderer was discovered, and the whole story, with strange supplementary details born of the mighty imaginations of descriptive reporters paid to make the most of it, cropped up afresh in the newspapers, and, Heaven be praised! not a slack time of year, when politicians were grouse-shooting, or, if extra energetic, wearing provincial and country audiences with second-hand platitudes, stage thunder, and blue fire—with dismal prophecies of the country going to ruin for not taking their advice, as hymns of praise and glory for taking it implicitly, and being none the better for it just at present. The Skegs Shore murder came as a relief to the wind and water of the dull season, and people talked of it and grew interested in it, and saw love and jealousy and deep, dire revenge in it, and heaps of mystery, and all the component atoms of a big sensation.

It was a murder well pieced together, and the general public gave on thought to the possibility of the innocence of the man now under arrest. It was an indisputable a chain of evidence, it was as everybody had thought; it was as clear as day, as true as Gospel; it was absolutely natural!

John Woodhatch and Morris Brake had been rivals for the affections of the parson's daughter, and when the former had discovered the secret marriage of his pupil with the object of his love, he had waylaid and killed the youth who had supplanted him. These had always been the facts of the case, people said down in Lincolnshire; but in the absence of proof, and with a liberal expenditure of money, and an artful attempt to pose as a philanthropist, John Woodhatch had almost lived down the first suspicion which had fastened on him. And then the murder was out, and the proofs rose like ghosts from the grave of the slain man, and all was bare in the white light of God's day, with the Heads of Justice closing on the guilty one at last. A grand moral, that sin should not have all its own way, and that there was retribution to follow the commission of it.

It was known now that the weapon with which the murder was committed had been buried in the sands, and that the name of John Woodhatch was on the handle. The farmer and one Reuben Fladge, a mere tool of a stronger mind, it was asserted, had been seen digging up the spot one dark night together, and sinking it deeper again, for more security. There was an old cap there also, a something Woodhatch had worn probably by way of a disguise, and the weapon had been missed from the night of the murder, and hidden here in preference to hurling it into the sea, which would have ebbed away along the level sands and left the weapon shining on the sands with the next outflow of the tide. The murderer knew that very well, and understood the road. Thus Reuben Fladge was probably an accomplice, and would turn Queen's evidence when frightened a little more, the good, worthy, perspicacious general public thought.

He would make the whole story stronger, having been bribed heavily, for even a farm called Tolland's had been settled on him, for no earthly reason that any one could conceive, save as a price upon his silence.

The evidence was somewhat weak at present, but the discovery of the spud would lead to laniness. Already it had been ascertained that John Woodhatch was not at his farm on the night of the murder, but on the sands, creeping stealthily in the direction of Skegs Shore; and the police were anxious to discover the whereabouts of a certain Mrs. Chanderton, who had set up for him this night, and who had evidently disappeared from Farm Forlorn rather than be a witness in the case. Here was another party lurked and sent out of the way, John Woodhatch having had no inkling that the dead was being talked about again, and himself once more suspected. A deep, designing man this Woodhatch — a desperate character, and ready with the knife even as a hare, and one who might have been hanged for murder as a boy if his victim had not been mercifully spared. They had all his antecedents in the papers now—the mighty Press had him by the throat. And then as burn down the farm, and doubtless with many proofs of his crime therein; to pay his servants beastly to keep them on his side in case of an arrest, and rescue him—for the destruction of his farm should not divert the attention of Skegs Shore folk so completely from the village as to enable him to slip away to Hull, thence to take ship away and be lost.

By some mysterious means he had been warned of his danger early on that day, but had acted just a little clumsily in some respects, and so had come to grief. Always the way with these calculating criminals: a merciful dispensation it was that they should help to put the hangman's rope around their own necks when left to their nefarious devices.

There were two letters found upon the prisoner also, it was said, which tended to implicate him more deeply than soon the one evidence which had cropped up so his detriment. One letter was to a Mrs. Gregory Durward, the wife of a deserving youth who had left Farm Forlorn probably in disgust at the conduct of its mean, telling her where money would be found to pay the passage out to Canada of herself and husband, and hinting that they were better away out of England, and might rely on further help from him when they required it. This was further evidence of bribery and corruption. The second letter—and strange that it should be so, it was thought at first—was written to the widow of the murdered man, who also, as if doubting him at last, had left suddenly for Paris, to which city the letter he had never posted—as though he had been afraid to place himself in her power—was addressed. Herein was allusion to the murder, to the motive for same (forgiveness which he had asked of the young widow), and she had granted him, out knowing for what offense. "I knew who had killed Morris, and I kept the truth from you for the sake of your own peace," he had written, very vaguely, although sin would guess the truth at once, he knew, when he was far away from England and beyond all chance of capture. Of course there were hypocritical wishes for her happiness, allusions to old times, and the old love in her had for her words of long farewell, and words which were incoherent to all a meaning which only Mrs Love Brake could satisfactorily explain. It would be unfair to find Mrs. Gregory Durward and Mrs Brake, two beings who had occupied almost the last moments of Mr Woodhatch before he had made a bonfire and his property. They would throw light upon the dark manners of the mean widow, and add to the interest of the plot. But neither Mrs. Gregory Durward nor Mrs. Morris Brake was readily discoverable. The Durwards, a disreputable gang, as it transpired, had disappeared from Baker's Rents a day or two ago, and up to present date the Brakes had not been discovered in Paris. Hereabouts the first examination of John Woodhatch before a bench of magistrates at Lincoln was duly reported in the papers; and the facts, more or less distorted, which had led to his arrest, and which we have foreshadowed, were set before many dull but worthy gentlemen.

One fact was startling, for a man who had maintained some position in the county, and whose badly packed portmanteau—unmistakably significant of sudden flight and haste—was crammed with notes drawn from his own bankers twenty-four hours before, and that fact was, the prisoner remained completely undefended. He had refused to send for his solicitor so to employ a counsel—it was not worth while, he said; and it was remarked in court that he regarded the whole matter apathetically, as if he were a half-interested witness in the case, rather than the party principally concerned, and over whose head was hanging so terrible a charge. He said not a word to exculpate himself, which was a wise proceeding, he did not even state that he was innocent, and to the evidence against him he listened with a languid interest, which must have been sheer affectation, the police people thought.

There would have been a lack of sensation in the whole matter altogether had not the preliminary business been cut short by the coming of Reuben Fladge into the witness-box, against his will, and guessing him as the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; which, to all outward seeming, he particularly objected to, raising and protesting and blundering and contradicting, and feigning to be idiotic, even raising the ire of the bench and the observant public, and then consoling both with laughter.

It was a bad case, and went against John Woodhatch from the first. This Reuben Fladge would get himself into trouble presently, it was considered, and if not more sinister on the next occasion, might find himself in the dock along with his master. He was a bad one, had once upon a time borne the worst of characters, and it was not unlikely had had something, after all, to do with the commission of that crime. Still, he was not arrested, although detectives were told off to keep an eye upon him until the next examination; a hush they did, and found it dreadfully tiresome work, Reuben being prone to long, swift walks of twenty-five miles or so at a stretch, without any object that was apparent, save to render himself disagreeable, and tire the official force of Lincolnshire completely off its legs. He behaved like a madman at his preliminations too—flinging up his arms and raving at the sky, and calling for all kinds of people to curse and help his master; he was altogether "playing a pretty game," it was asserted by the exhausted police detailed to follow him, and who were dead beat already. Only the senior of Farm Forlorn was calm and grave, and terribly at his ease. He would see no one; to those who came by special order to see him, he wrote to offer no one way or another their services or sympathy — there were a few of these folk, to his great surprise — he sent word to thank them, and so decline their kind offers of interposition on his behalf. In his cell, under remand, he sat and thought a great deal, but he asked no one for the news beyond his prison walls.

"What does he matter now?" he was heard to mutter once in the airing yard, when he was taking his exercise with other unfortunates to whom bail had been refused, and on whom Justice—grand and stern and merciless — had laid its mighty hands. "What does it matter now?"

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

WHAT SOCIAL CLASSES OWE TO EACH OTHER.

By PROFESSOR W. G. SUMNER.

VI.

CONCERNING SOME OLD FOES UNDER NEW FACES.

The history of the human race is one long story of attempts by certain persons and classes to obtain control of the power of the state so as to win earthly gratifications at the expense of others. People constantly assume that there is something metaphysical and sentimental about government. At bottom there are two things only with which government has to deal. They are the property of man and the honor of women. These it has to defend against crime. The capital which, as we have seen, is the condition of all welfare on earth, the fortification of existence, and the means of growth, is an object of cupidity. Some want to get it without paying the price of industry and economy. In ancient times they made use of force. They organized bands of robbers. They plundered labourers and merchants. Chief of all, however, they found that means of robbery which consisted in gaining control of the civil organization—the state—and using its power and eminence as a gigantic robber rover of which they made robbers' use ful. They developed high-pom theories of nationality, patriotism, and loyalty. They took all the task, glory, pomp, and prestige of the great civil organization, and they took all the rights. They threw on others the burdens and the duties. At one time, no doubt, feudalism was an organization which drew together again the fragments of a dissolved society, but when the lawless had united the themselves to modern kings and converted the feudal nobles into an ornamental court nobles, the feudal nobility no longer served.

In modern times the great phenomenon has been the growth of the middle class out of the middle ranks, the accumulation of capital and the employment of capital, as a social power, on the ground formerly occupied by rank and birth. The middle class has been obliged to fight for its rights against the feudal class, and it has, during three or four centuries, gradually wrested and established institutions to guarantee personal and property rights against the arbitrary will of kings and nobles.

In its turn new capital is becoming a power in the state, and, like every other power, is liable to abuse unless restrained by checks and guaranties. There is an insolence of wealth as there is an insolence of rank. A plutocracy might be even far worse than an aristocracy. Aristocrats have always had their class vices and their class virtues. They have always been, as a class, despised lying and cheating. They have always pretended to maintain a standard of honor, although the definition and the code of honor have suffered many changes and shocking deterioration. The middle class has always abhorred gambling and licentiousness, but it has not always been strict about truth and pecuniary fidelity. That there is a code and standard of mercantile honor, which is quite as pure and grand as any military code, is beyond question, but it has never yet been established and defined by long usage and the concurrent support of a large and influential society. The feudal code has, through centuries, bred a high type of men, and constituted a caste. The mercantile code has not yet done so, but the wealthy class has attempted to merge itself in or to imitate the feudal class.

The consequence is that the wealth-power has been developed while the moral and social safeguards by which that power ought to be controlled have not yet been developed. A plutocracy would be a civil organization to which the power resided in capital, in which a man might have whatever he could buy, in which the right, interests, and feelings of those who could not pay would be overridden.

There is a plain tendency of all civilized governments toward plutocracy. The power of capital to the English House of Commons has steadily increased for fifty years. The history of the present French Republic has shown us extraordinary development of plutocratic spirit and measures. In the United States many plutocratic doctrines have a currency which is not granted them anywhere else; that is, a man's right to have almost anything which he can pay for is more popularly recognized here than elsewhere. So far the most successful limitation on plutocracy has come from aristocracy, for the prestige of rank is still great wherever it exists. The social sanctions of aristocracy tell with great force on the plutocrats, more especially on their wives and daughters. It has already resulted that a class of wealthy men is growing up in regard to whom the old sarcasms of the nouns and the stage about parvenus are entirely thrown away. They are men in high social esteem, by whatever standard one chooses to measure them. Such an interplay of social forces would indeed be a great and happy solution of a new social problem if the aristocratic forces were strong enough for the magnitude of the task. If the feudal aristocracy, or its modern representative, which is, in reality, not at all feudal, could carry down into the new era and transmit to the new masters of society the grace, elegance, breeding, and culture of the past, society would certainly gain by that course of things as compared with any such rupture between past and present as occurred in the French Revolution. The dogmatic radicals who await "an principle" the inherited social notions and distinctions are not serving civilization. Society can do without patricians, but it can not do without the patrician virtues.

In the United States the opponent of plutocracy is democracy. No home else in the world has the power of capital come to be discussed in its political aspects as it is here. Nowhere else does the question arise as it does here. I have given more reason for this in former papers. Nowhere in the world is the danger of a plutocracy so formidable as it is here. To it we oppose the power of numbers as it is presented by democracy. Democracy itself, however, is new and experimental. It has not yet existed long enough to find its appropriate forms. It has no prestige from antiquity such as aristocracy possesses. It has, in deed, none of the surroundings which appeal to the imagination. On the other hand, democracy is rooted in the physical, economic, and social circumstances of the United States. This country can not be other than democratic for an indefinite period in the future. Its political processes will also be republican. The interest of the people for democracy makes them blind and libertine al in regard to it, and they are so fond of the political fallacies to which democracy lends itself as they are of its sound and correct interpretation, or lender. Can democracy develop itself and at the same time curb plutocracy?

Already the question presents itself as one of life or death to democracy. Legislation and judicial scandals show us that the conflict is already opened, and that it is serious. The lobby is the army of the plutocracy. An elective judiciary is a device so much in the interest of plutocracy that it must be regarded as a striking proof of the toughness of the judicial institutions that it has resisted the corruption so much as it has. The caucus, convention, and committee lend themselves most readily to the purposes of interested speculators and jobbers. It is just such machinery as they might have invented if they had been trying to make political devices to serve their purpose, and their processes call in question nothing less than the possibility of free self government under the forms of a democratic republic. The most serious question in the present position which I desire to bring forward against all the demonstrations and [illegible] made about the power of chartered corporations and aggregated capital. If charters have been given which confer undue powers, who gave them? Our legislators did. Who elected these legislators? We did. If we are a free, self governing people, we must understand that it costs vigilance and exertion to be self governing. It costs far more vigilance and exertion to be so under the democratic form, where we have no aids from traditions or prestige, than under other forms. If we are a free, self governing people, we can blame nobody but ourselves for our misfortunes. No one will come to help us out of them. It will do no good to heap law upon law, or to try by constitutional provisions simply to abolish from the use of powers which we find we always abuse. How can we get bad legislators to pass a law which shall hinder bad legislators from passing a bad law? That is what we are trying to do by many of our proposed remedies. The task before us, however, it one which calls for fresh reserves of moral force and political virtue from the very foundations of the social body. Surely it is not a new thing to us to learn that men are greedy and covetous, and that they will be selfish and tyrannical if they dare. The plutocrats are simply trying to do what the generals, nobles, and priests have done in the past—get the power of the state into their hands so as to bend the rights of others to their own advantage, and what we need to do is to recognize the fact that we are face to face with the same old foes—the vices and passions of human nature. One of the oldest and most [illegible] fallacies in this country lies from the [illegible] that we are better than [illegible] ment [illegible] elsewhere. This fallacy has blinded us from observing our old foes as soon as we should have done. Then, again, these vices and passions take good care here to deck themselves out in the trappings of democratic watch-words and phrases, so that they are more often greeted with cheers than with opposition when they first appear. The plan of electing men to represent us as the systematically surrender public to private interests, and then trying to cure the mischief by newspaper and platform declamation against capital and corporations, is an entire failure.

The new foes must be met, as the old ones were met, by institutions and guarantees. The problem of civil liberty is constantly renewed. Solved once, it re-appears in a new form. The old constitutional guarantees were all aimed against king and nobles. New ones must be invented to hold the power of capital to that responsibility without which no power whatever is consistent with liberty. The public jury has given the most satisfactory evidence that it is competent to the new duty which devolves upon it. The political mountebanks who indulge in platform denunciations of capital desire, of course, to adopt these measures which could be paraded for political effect. Such measures would destroy capital and impair the most essential interests of society. There is, however, no reason at all to despair but the remedies which the courts afford may not prove adequate to the protection of rights against any tyranny or insolence of capital. On the side of political machinery there is no hope, but rather fear. On the side of constitutional institutions there is ground for hope. It is on one thing to find that institutions are the real safeguard of liberty and rights wherever the latter are in danger.

OUNCES OF PREVENTION.

STEAM-HEATING.

The subject of steam heating is one that has attracted much popular interest, and will attract more and more, because by the use of steam and hot water pipes it is possible to distribute heat on the grandest scale, even as the warming of whole towns from central boilers, and at a moderate expense for fuel. The system, properly managed, is both sanitary and economical.

The cause of the great efficiency of heating by steam as hot-water pipes is found in the great capacity of water to store up latent heat. Water has, in other words, a great specific heat—greater, indeed, than that of any other substance. It boils at 212° F., the barometer standing at 30 inches. But after it has reached 212°, and before it begins to pass into steam, it has absorbed the further amount of 966° of heat, called latent because the thermometer does not show it. But it is all there, the 212° indicated by the thermometer and the 966° not indicated, and of this entire quantity, 1178°, the greater part is available for the heating of our dwellings by means of steam or hot-water pipes.

We may, indeed, use considerably higher temperatures than these by making the apparatus strong enough to resist the steam pressure. This is often done when it is desired to warm the walls of a room or building more rapidly than the air, as I have said is the case when the source of heat is at a comparatively high temperature. Steam by itself can be heated to a very high degree with comparative safety, because its rate of expansion, like that of other gases, is moderate. Water can not be greatly heated with safety, because each added degree of heat makes new steam, and the pressure soon rises up to a dangerous point. For very prompt and effective warming of large spaces, and for the transport of heat to a great distance, steam-heating is therefore the best. But the principle in each case is the same—the steam and the hot water in cooling give up their generous treasure of latent heat. It is by this circumstance virtue that a bottle of hot water will keep one's feet warm so much longer than the same amount of sand or other solid substance, heated to an equal degree according to the thermometer.

For ordinary warming the hot-water pipes are preferable to steam pipes, because they do not overheat the air, and are less likely than steam pipes to get out of order. They are rather cumbrous things in the living rooms, but they are an efficient contrivance for heating large houses, and especially for the halls. A temperature of 90° F. can readily be had, if desirable, in the coils of the ordinary hot-water apparatus. This is a simple thing, as generally made. It is a circuit of closed iron tubing filled with water. A coil of this is exposed to the furnace heat; the warmed water rises and flows through the upper part of the circuit, returning below, and partly cooled, to the furnace for a fresh supply of heat, and so the circuit goes on continually. A "low-pressure gravity apparatus," i. e., one without an outlet, with a thorough circulation, and requiring no mechanical means to return the water to the boiler, is a very complete and economical heating system. Inside [illegible] there is to the current, "the blood," the boiler being the heart, the [illegible] the arteries, [illegible] the return pipes the [illegible]. It is safe and noiseless, and requires little trouble to manage it.

But it is for the heat supply not merely of the largest buildings, as of asylums and hospitals, but of whole villages, towns, and cities even, that the system of steam-heating promises to be available. The features of the plan are (1) great fires and boilers at a central station, where the best can be produced in the most economical way and upon a grand scale, and (2) a system of radiating pipes as protected by felt, paper, asbestos, and atmospheric air that flake of the latest heat [illegible] pa[illegible] for [illegible] to [illegible] at last [illegible] that [illegible] of the [illegible] the kitchen range, cellar furnace.

[illegible]

"THE HOUR OF PRAYER."

large scale in more than one place, as in the cities of Detroit and Rochester. In the latter place two hundred houses were heated from a central boiler. Four tons of hard coal per day were used. The steam pressure in the boiler was kept at thirty-five pounds during the winter. There were three miles of main piping leading up to the various points of consumption; the supply pipes from these mains were an inch and a half in diameter, and three-quarter inch pipes were used in the houses. Loss of heat was prevented by a first wrapping with asbestos paper, a second with Russian felt, a third with Manila paper, and the whole was incased in timber having bored out three quarters of an inch larger than the pipes and their coverings, so as to include a jacket of atmospheric air as a further protection. Injury from the expansion and contraction of the pipes according to varying temperatures was guarded against by using, at intervals of every one or two hundred feet, extension or "telescopic" joints. The pipes were then laid in the streets like gas or water mains. The loss of heat was surprisingly small. "In a house three quarters of a mile from the boilers a bucket of cold water could be raised to boiling heat in three minutes by the passage of the steam through a perforated nozzle plunged into the bucket." The laid on steam was used for cooking purposes, for boiling, and even for baking. For warming the houses the ordinary system of inch pipes arranged vertically as radiators was employed.

The working expenses consisted of the coal and two firemen's wages. The company laid their pipes up to the houses, the consumer having to pay for all the internal fittings. In an eight-roomed house these cost $150; in larger houses, with more expensive finishings, about $500 were paid. A meter in each building indicated the total consumption of steam.

There can be no doubt that great economy in principle may be secured by thus supplying heat from a central source, and the great experiment now in progress in New York city will be watched with much interest by those who are weary of struggling with stoves and kitchen ranges.

TOTTEN MCMANUS COAN

MUSSULMAN PRAYER AT SEA

THE following is a translation of the beautiful form of invocation used by pious Mussulmans at sea:

"O Allah! O Exalted! O All-powerful! Thou art my God, and sufficient unto me is the knowledge thereof. We pray Thee for safety in our goings forth and in our comings in, our works and designs, our dangers and doubts.

"Subject unto us this sea, as Thou didst subject the deep unto Moses, and subject unto us all the seas in earth and heaven, the sea of Life and the sea of Futurity, O Thou who reignest over everything, and unto whom all things return!"

THE BLACKVILLE BILLIARD CLUB A MENACE TO VIGNAUX.

"If Mr. Johnsing make dat shot, we'll back him agin de bull Chicago Turnapment."

DRAWN BY SOL. ETTINGE, JR.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE IN NERVOUS DEBILITY.

Dr. Edwin F. Vose, Portland, Me., says: "I have prescribed it for many of the various forms of nervous debility, and it has never failed to do good."—[Adv.]

TRUE MERIT ALONE

Has given Allcock's Porous Plasters the largest sale of any external remedy in the world. If you have been using other kinds of plasters, one trial of "Allcock's" will convince you of their wonderful superiority.—[Adv.]

A FINE HAIR DRESSING.

Cocoaine dresses the hair perfectly, and is also a preparation unequalled for the eradication of dandruff. The superiority of Burnett's Flavoring Extracts consists in their purity and great strength.—[Adv.]

"Brown's Bronchial Troches" have a direct influence on the inflamed parts, giving relief in Coughs, Colds, and the various Throat troubles to which Singers and Public Speakers are liable. Sold only in boxes.—[Adv.]

Extraordinary richness and permanence make Floreston an exceedingly economical cologne.—[Adv.]

Thousands of people testify to the merits of Piso's Cure for Consumption.—[Adv.]

C. C. Shayne, Furrier, 103 Prince Street, N. Y., will send Fur Fashion Book free to any address.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1878.

BAKER'S

Breakfast Cocoa.

Warranted absolutely pure Cocoa, from which the excess of Oil has been removed. It has three times the strength of Cocoa mixed with Starch, Arrowroot or Sugar, and is therefore far more economical. It is delicious, nourishing, strengthening, easily digested, and admirably adapted for invalids as well as for persons in health.

Sold by Grocers everywhere.

W. BAKER & CO., Dorchester, Mass.

STATEN ISLAND

FANCY DYEING ESTABLISHMENT,

Office, 5 & 7 John St., New York.

BRANCH OFFICES: 1199 Broadway, near 29th St., N. Y.; 279 Fulton St., Brooklyn; 47 North Eighth St., Philadelphia; 43 North Charles St., Baltimore.

Dye, Clean, and Refinish Dress Goods and Garments. Ladies' Dresses, Cloaks, Robes, &c., of all fabrics, and of the most elaborate styles, cleaned or dyed successfully without ripping.

Gentlemen's Garments cleaned or dyed whole.

Curtains, Window-Shades, Table-Covers, Carpets, &c., cleaned or dyed. Employing the best attainable skill and most improved appliances, and having systematized anew every department of our business, we can confidently promise the best results, and unusually prompt return of goods. Correspondence invited. Goods received and returned by express and by mail.

BARRETT NEPHEWS & CO.,

5 and 7 John St., N. Y.

THE ACME LEVER CUFF BUTTONS

Overcome all trouble with

STIFF CUFFS.

Ask your Jeweller for them, and

TAKE NO OTHER.

The Jumbo Catalogue.

Just published, the largest and most complete Catalogue of all sporting goods ever issued—on Lawn-Tennis, Base-Ball, Archery, Cricket, Foot Ball, Fishing, Boating, and Gymnasium and Firemen's Goods and all the latest novelties. 228 large pages, 4000 illustrations, on fine tinted paper. Price, by mail, 25 cts. PECK & SNYDER, 126 to 130 Nassau St., N. Y.

BENJ. PIKE'S SONS, OPTICIANS,

928 Broadway, N. Y.

Spectacles and Eye-Glasses, with finest quality glasses or Brazilian Pebbles, Telescopes, Microscopes, Magic Lanterns, &c.

Send us your address on a postal card, and we will mail you our illustrated Catalogue.

Universally prescribed by the Faculty

TAMAR INDIEN GRILLON

A laxative and refreshing Fruit Lozenge for Constipation, bile, headache, hemorrhoids, cerebral congestion, &c. Prepared by E. GRILLON, Sole Proprietor, Pharmacien de 1re Classe de la Faculté de Paris, 27, rue Rambuteau, Paris. Sold by all Druggists.

TAMAR, unlike pills and the usual purgatives, is agreeable to take, and never produces irritation.

KEEP YOUR BIRD IN HEALTH and Song by using [illegible] Pa[illegible] or Gas[illegible] Paste. For sale by all [illegible] Depot, [illegible] Hudson Street, N. Y.

[illegible] RHENISH COLOGNE.

THE GREAT SAUCE OF THE WORLD.

LEA & PERRINS'

Imparts the most delicious taste and zest to

EXTRACT of a LETTER from a MEDICAL GENTLEMAN at Madras, to his brother at WORCESTER, May, 1851.

"Tell LEA & PERRINS that their sauce is highly esteemed in India, and is in my opinion the most palatable, as well as the most wholesome sauce that is made."

SOUPS, GRAVIES, FISH, HOT & COLD MEATS, GAME, &c.

Lea & Perrins

Signature is on every bottle of GENUINE WORCESTERSHIRE SAUCE.

Sold and used throughout the world.

JOHN DUNCAN'S SONS,

AGENTS FOR THE UNITED STATES. NEW YORK.

Print Your Own Cards, &c. Press $3

Large sizes for circulars, &c., $8 to $75. For pleasure, money-making, young or old. Everything easy, printed instructions. Send 2 stamps for Catalogue of Presses, Type, Cards, &c., to the factory. KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

CARDS. An Elegant New Set of Cards for 3c. stamp. W. H. PRINGLE, Rochester, N. Y.

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

EPPS'S COCOA.

BREAKFAST.

"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately flavored beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

Made simply with boiling water or milk. Sold in tins only (½-lb and lb) by Grocers, labelled thus:

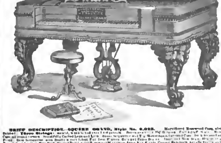
JAMES EPPS & Co., Homœopathic Chemists, London, England.

HAS NO EQUAL as an OINTMENT or SALVE for the dressing of Wounds, Sores, Burns, Scalds, Cuts, Bruises, Piles, Tumors, Chilblains, Bunions, Nasal Catarrh, Sore Throat, Croup, Diptheria and Pleurisy, all Skin Diseases, Tetter, Eczema, Barbers' Itch and Piles of Insects. Internally for all Bronchial troubles. Sold by Druggists. Manufactured by BINGHAMTON OIL REFINING CO., Binghamton, N. Y.

CARLETON'S TREASURY of KNOWLEDGE. The most [illegible] ever known. The [illegible] discount. Circulars free. Agents, address G. W. CARLETON & CO., Publishers, N. Y.

$1,000 FOR ONLY $225---WHY?

BECAUSE I desire this beautiful Square Grand Pianoforte introduced quickly, as, [illegible] It pays to [illegible] at a special low price. Read the description and offer, and [illegible] seen around the post-office.



BRIEF DESCRIPTION. SQUARE GRAND, Style No. 6,022. Magnificent Rosewood Case, elegantly finished. Three Strings. [illegible]

MY REGULAR CATALOGUE PRICE, $297.50.

A SPECIAL LIMITED OFFER.

If you will remit me ONLY $225.00, and the following Due-bill, within 10 days from date, and will agree to send list of 10 persons of your acquaintance who have no Pianofortes, after you have received your instrument and are satisfied, I will box and ship you this Pianoforte (mailing you a receipted bill in full for $297.50) with Stool, Book and Music, exactly the same as I sell for $297.50.

$72.50. Railroad [illegible] and Beatty St., Washington, New Jersey, [illegible] 1882. On demand within 10 days from date, I promise to [illegible] Dollars and Fifty Cents, as part payment for one of my No. 6,022 Square Grand $297.50 Pianofortes. [illegible] DANIEL F. BEATTY.	DUE BILL.

If you do not wish an instrument yourself [illegible]

YOUR GUARANTEE. [illegible]

Given under my hand and seal,

Write date of your remittance here.

and keep this as a complete guarantee to you.

Return due-bill with your order.

Daniel F. Beatty

FREIGHT PREPAID. As a further inducement for you (provided you order immediately, within 10 days from date) I agree to prepay freight on the above Piano to your [illegible] prices. Order now; nothing saved by correspondence.

HOW TO ORDER. [illegible] Square Grand Pianoforte, Style No. 6,022. [illegible]

Be very particular to give Name, Post Office, County, State, Freight Station and on what Railroad.

[illegible] Registered Letter, Express prepaid, or by Bank Check. [illegible] Address or Call upon the Manufacturer,

DANIEL F. BEATTY, WASHINGTON, NEW JERSEY.

REASONS WHY MRS. THOMPSON'S PATENT WAVES

PAT. FEB. 6, 1877.

ARE BETTER THAN ALL OTHERS!

1—The PATENT SPRING conforms itself to shape to EVERY head.
2—They [illegible]
3—They cannot tear or break apart, not [illegible]
4—They CANNOT WRINKLE or SHRINK [illegible]
5—They do not fade or [illegible]
6—[illegible]
7—[illegible]
8—MOST IMPORTANT. [illegible]
9—[illegible]

Beware of parties endeavoring to sell you Waves representing them to be the Thompson Wave, as I do not allow any other Dealer to sell my goods.

HEADQUARTERS OF

MRS. C. THOMPSON,

No. 32 East 14th Street, NEW YORK.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT. FINEST AND CHEAPEST MEAT FLAVORING STOCK FOR SOUPS, MADE DISHES, AND SAUCES.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT. An invaluable and palatable tonic in all cases of weak digestion and debility. "Is a success and a boon for which nations should feel grateful." See "Medical Press," "Lancet," "British Medical Journal," &c.

CAUTION.—Genuine only with the fac-simile of Baron Liebig's Signature in Blue Ink across the Label. This caution is necessary, owing to various cheap and inferior substitutes being in the market.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT. To be had of all Storekeepers, Grocers, and Chemists. Sole Agents for the United States (wholesale only), C. DAVID & CO., 9 Fenchurch Avenue, London, England.

Sold wholesale in New York by PARK & TILFORD, SMITH & VANDERBEEK, ACKER, MERRALL & CONDIT, McKESSON & ROBBINS, H. K. & F. B. THURBER & CO., W. H. SCHIEFFELIN & CO.

CATARRH

SANFORD'S RADICAL CURE,

The Great American Balsamic Distillation of Witch Hazel, American Pine, Canada Fir, Marigold, Clover Blossom, etc., [illegible]

APRIL FOOL.

Boxes of specially prepared Chocolate Cream Drops for April-Fool's Day sent postpaid on receipt of 10c., 25c., and 50c. STANDARD CHOCOLATE COMPANY, P. O. Box 3648, N. Y. City.

IMPORTED TILES & MOSAICS IN HEARTHS, FACINGS, BATH ROOMS & FLOORS. GRATES, FENDERS, ANDIRONS &c. EDWARD BOOTE 11 EAST 19TH ST. N.Y.

[illegible] Market St., Phila. [illegible]

WOOD-CARPET

THE VERY BEST MATERIAL FOR

BORDERS FOR RUGS

[illegible] Parlors, Dining, Sitting, and Bath Rooms, Libraries, Offices, Stairs, [illegible] Send stamp for Book of Designs.

CARDS [illegible] Elegant Gold Beveled Edge and Chromo Visiting Cards, finest quality, largest variety and lowest prices. 50 chromos with name, 10c., a present with each order. CLINTON BROS. & Co., Clintonville, Conn.

50 Elegant Genuine Chromo Cards, no two alike, with name, 10c. SNOW & CO., Meriden, Ct.

BIBLE PICTURES

LOW PRICED AT LAST

DORE'S MIGHTY MASTERPIECES at prices [illegible] ONLY FIFTY CENTS [illegible] Sixteen [illegible] DORE'S BIBLE PICTURES [illegible] ALBUM COVERS. [illegible] SIXTEEN PLATES [illegible] BEAUTIFUL [illegible] JEWESSES [illegible] PROPHETS [illegible] WARRIORS [illegible]

[illegible] SIXTEEN [illegible] GREATEST BIBLE PICTURES—ALBUM STYLE—ONLY FIFTY CENTS. FIVE [illegible] $2.00. [illegible] WORLD MANUFACTURING CO., 122 Nassau Street, New York.

RIDLEYS',

Grand, Allen, & Orchard Sts., N. Y.

SPECIAL DISPLAY OF

SPRING NOVELTIES,

IN

TRIMMED MILLINERY.

OVER 3000 DIFFERENTLY TRIMMED

BONNETS AND ROUND HATS

(NO TWO ALIKE),

Small Bonnets,
Poke Bonnets,
Round Hats,

TRIMMED IN ALL THE NEW COLORS: ORANGE, LEMON, SHRIMP, PINK, TOBACCO, ROYAL BLUE, NEW BRONZE, and CINNAMON.

ALSO, TRIMMED COMBINATION GILT, AND THE NEW SOUTACHE LACES.

FLOWER BONNETS

IN MANY STYLES.

STRAW GOODS

In all the New Colorings, Shapes, and Braids. We are also displaying many advanced shapes for summer wear.

EDW. RIDLEY & SONS,

309, 311, 311½ to 317 Grand St.,

26, 28, 30, 32, 34, 36, 38, and 40 ALLEN ST.,

69, 61, and 63 ORCHARD ST., NEW YORK.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

Have recently opened a large collection of

ANTIQUE CARPETS

Which for beauty and richness have never been equalled in this city.

Broadway and 19th St.

DRY GOODS BY MAIL

Patterns by any post of the Union sent to Boston Purees. Catalogue now Ready, gives what desired samples of Dress Goods, Silks, Woolens, from the largest and best stock in the country. Write to Jordan, Marsh & Co., Boston.

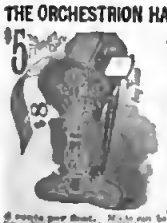
THE ORCHESTRION HARMONETTE



$5

The most wonderful musical instrument in the world. It produces both a musical and mechanical effect. Beautiful in construction, elegant in design and marvellous in power and sweetness of music. It plays any tune—there is no limit—and is the only musical instrument ever invented that more than one person can operate it. It costs many thousands of dollars to purchase the Orchestrion, and is the only perfect musical instrument for the parlor. Price of 36 notes, only $5 each, post paid. Music can be sent by mail at 10 cents per sheet. It is the most instructive and agreeable present that can be made to a child. Circulars free. Address

HARMONIA ORGANINA CO. Philadelphia, Pa.

HARPER'S BAZAR CUT PAPER PATTERNS.

We have transferred our WHOLESALE PATTERN DEPARTMENT to MR. J. H. CROTTY, Nos. 150 to 156 Cherry Street, New York, who will conduct it upon his own personal and responsible basis.

SPECIAL CAUTION.

We are not interested in nor responsible for any contracts made by J. H. CROTTY & CO., whether for Harper's Bazar Patterns or for any other business.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

50 Large Crosses, New and pretty as ever published. Name on, 10c. VANN & CO., New Haven, Conn.

NO DANGER OF A MILK FAMINE IN NEW YORK.

Although the Orange County shipments are 100,000 quarts short, a corresponding increase from the Croton Valley will enable the thrifty milkman to pull through.

CASTORIA

for Infants and Children.

Castoria promotes Digestion and overcomes Flatulency, Constipation, Sour Stomach, Diarrhœa, and Feverishness. It insures health and natural sleep, without morphine.

"Castoria is so well adapted to Children that I recommend it as superior to any prescription known to me." H. A. ARCHER, M. D., 82 Portland Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

What gives our Children rosy cheeks, What cures their fevers, and lets them sleep? Castoria.

When babies fret and cry for teeth, What cures their colic, kills their worms, And Castoria.

What quickly cures Constipation, Sour Stomach, Colds, Indigestion, Not Castoria.

Parents! shun to Morphine Syrups, Castor Oil and Paregoric, and Hail Castoria!

CENTAUR LINIMENT—an absolute cure for Rheumatism, Sprains, Burns, Galls, &c. The most Powerful and Penetrating Pain-relieving and Healing Remedy known to man.

NO HOUSE SHOULD BE WITHOUT ONE.

Also Indispensable to Travellers. It is a genuine Filter, and will last for years. Price 60 cents. Mailed free with Price-list to Agents.

STODDARD LOCK CO., 104 Reade St., New York.

THE BELGIAN. A WONDERFUL BARGAIN

TAKE ADVANTAGE OF THIS OFFER. THE BELGIAN IS A [illegible] ORDER NOW! [illegible] E. C. RIDGOUT & CO., 10 Barclay Street, New York.

CAMPBELL'S Self-Acting Window Shade Rollers,

Admitted Superior to All Others

Ask your upholsterer for them.

Salesroom, 259 Canton Street, N. Y.

30 Fine White Gold-Edge Cards, name on, 10c. Sample Book, 25c. M. Sage & Co., Jersey City, N. J.

$72 A WEEK. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly Outfit free. Address True & Co., Augusta, Maine.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address H. HALLETT & Co., Portland, Maine.

40 New Gilt Chromo Cards, no 2 alike, with name, 10c., post paid. Geo. I. Reed & Co., Nassau, N. Y.

THE BRADLEY

ROAD CART

Above Cut only represents one of our 3 PRIZE-MEDAL Carts. We now make 60 in 6 different styles. All the newest improved features, including rubber tires. Our New Ball-Bearing Single Park Cart is the most complete style for that purpose ever made. Also two-wheel Carts, Pony Phaetons, Pony Carts, Village Carts, and Dog Carts, used in harness or loose.

THREE STYLES weighing from 80 to 100 lbs. Prices $60 to $85.

Send for Illustrated Price-List.

BRADLEY & CO. SYRACUSE, N. Y. ESTABLISHED 1832.

THE UNEQUALLED "HOUSEHOLD" Sewing-Machine,

MANUFACTURED BY

HOUSEHOLD Sewing-Machine Co., PROVIDENCE, R. I.

is a marvel of simplicity and beauty. It is easy to run, durable, perfect. Send for illustrated description.

GENERAL OFFICES:

12 East 14th Street, New York (new and complete quarters, with both wholesale and retail departments);

163 and 165 Lake Street, Chicago;

149 Tremont Street, Boston.

THE DINGEE & CONARD CO'S BEST ROSES EVER GROWN

ROSES

The only establishment making a SPECIAL BUSINESS OF ROSES. 20 LARGE GREENHOUSES for ROSES alone. Stock of Plants suitable for Retail trade by mail, by express, or freight. Safe arrival guaranteed everywhere. Safest, surest, most choice, all labeled, for $1, 12 for $2; 19 for $3; 25 for $4; 35 for $5; 75 for $10; 100 for $15. GIVE A WAY a Magnificent Present of choice and rare ROSES free with every order. Our NEW GUIDE, a charming Practical Treatise on the Rose, elegantly illustrated, and free to all. Send for it.

THE DINGEE & CONARD CO. Rose Growers. West Grove, Chester Co., Pa.

With 3 colored plates, and many hundred engravings of the choicest Vegetables and Flowers, and directions for planting. Mailed FREE to all applicants. Invaluable to all, especially to Market Gardeners. Send for it!

D. M. FERRY & CO. DETROIT, MICH.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Per Year.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR	4 00
The THREE above publications	10 00
Any TWO above named	7 00
HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE	1 00
HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE	5 00
HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY, One Year (52 Numbers)	10 00

Postage Free to all subscribers in the United States or Canada.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

EUROPE EDUCATIONAL EXCURSIONS

1883. Combining Unequalled Advantages. Send for Descriptive Circular, Free.

E. TOURJEE, Franklin Square, Boston.

THE BIGGEST THING OUT Illustrated Book Sent Free. (Name this paper.) E. NASON & CO., 111 Nassau St., New York.

JOHN MELLEN, No. 1 Astor Pl., N. Y. City. SHOW CARDS and SIGNS for all kinds of MERCHANTS, ready-made and made to order.

BOSS' PATENT GOLD WATCH CASES

Boss-ine Enamels Have Every Quality of Elegant Enamel Guaranteed for 40 Years!

AGENTS [illegible] Address H. L. HERBERT & CO., 125 Nassau St., N. Y.

CARD COLLECTORS send 25 cents for package Cards and receive by return mail 50 beautiful French chromo cards, assorted. Wm. M. Donaldson & Co., 118 Main St., Cincinnati, O.

CARDS Send five 3c. stamps for new set of Imported Cards, or UMBRELLA, WHITING, 33 Nassau St., N. Y.

40 Chromo Visiting Cards, no 2 alike, for 10c. and 3c. stamp, and Illustrated Premium List, 10c. Wonderful sold. Agents wanted. Lucas & Co.,

SILK PATCH

THE NEW BIRD
ORNITHOLOGY
Duce, Drake, Duck, Dane, Ducats, a bird of the genus Ducks
Ducks, a genus of birds including the Teals

HALE'S HONEY.

ONE of the best and most reliable remedies for Throat and Lung affections is found in the skillful compound of Hale's Honey of Horehound and Tar. It is especially the great Leading Specific in all coughs, colds, etc., and when administered upon the first symptoms of Croup will not only speedily give relief to the little sufferer, but, by its effective operation, prevent the formation of the false membrane, which is at once the terror and the despair of parents. This remedy should always be kept in the house, as it may sometimes save the life of the child. Be sure not to purchase but the genuine, which can only be obtained of druggists or Hale's Honey of Horehound and Tar, and avoid all worthless substitutes.

Pike's Toothache Drops Cure in one minute.

Riff's Hair and Whisker Dye, 50c.

H.W.JOHNS' ASBESTOS
LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING,
Steam Pipe & Boiler Coverings, Steam Packing, Mill Board, Sheathing, Fire Proof Coatings, &c.
H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO. 87 MAIDEN LANE, N.Y.

STANDS AT THE HEAD!
THE STAR THAT LEADS THEM ALL
LIGHT RUNNING
SEWING MACHINE

IODINATED AIR,
THE IODINATOR M'F'G CO., P.O. Box 3016, N.Y.

EARL & WILSON'S
PATENT SHORT BAND COLLARS AND BEAD EDGE CUFFS

$1,000,000.00 will be made by Agents this year with KEELER'S "Little Joker," Send 3c. stamp for circulars and terms. Keeler's Little Joker Co., Buffalo, N.Y.

CONGRESS WATER.

SYPHER & CO.
ARE CONSTANTLY RECEIVING FROM ABROAD
Antique Silver, Furniture, Clocks, Bronzes, and Articles of Vertu.
738 & 741 BROADWAY.

SPECIAL NOTICE.
Dry Goods Delivered Free.

E. J. DENNING & CO.,
SUCCESSORS TO
A. T. STEWART & CO.
(RETAIL.)

Hereafter all Dry Goods bought of us will be delivered at any accessible part of the United States

Free of All Mail
OR Express Charges,

Thus enabling purchasers to receive goods at the same prices as if bought at our counters in person.

Orders received by mail for Goods or Samples will have our prompt and careful attention.

Broadway, 4th Ave., 9th & 10th Sts.
NEW YORK.

CATARRH
To any suffering with Catarrh or bronchitis who earnestly desire relief, I can furnish a means of Permanent and Positive Cure. A Home Treatment. No charge for consultation by mail. Valuable Treatise Free. Certificates from Doctors, Lawyers, Ministers, Business men. Address Rev. T. P. CHILDS, Troy, Ohio.

THE BEST THE QUEBEC WATCH CASE

MARLIN MAGAZINE RIFLE
45 Govt. and 40-60 Grain Cartridges.
Very STRONG, PERFECTLY SAFE.
THE BEST RIFLE in the world for Large Game. Shooting more accurate, Model more beautiful, Manufacture easier. Finish finer, than that of any other rifle. MARLIN FIRE-ARMS CO. New Haven, Conn.

THE BIGELOW CARPET CO.,
ORIGINAL POWER LOOM MANUFACTURERS OF WILTON AND BRUSSELS CARPETS,
100 and 102 Worth Street, New York.

The Carpets made by this Company have received the highest award wherever exhibited, including Gold Medals at the Paris Exposition, 1878, and at the Centennial, 1876.

Their deserved reputation for excellence of fabric, richness and durability of color, novelty and beauty of design, has led to frequent infringements, and inferior goods have often been palmed off in their stead. For the protection of the public the company has adopted as a trade-mark the word "BIGELOW," which will be woven (at every repeat of the pattern) in white capitals into the back of the fabric.

Customers will therefore have merely to examine the back of a carpet to be certain that they are getting the genuine Bigelow Wiltons or Body Brussels.

1790. ROBERT LOW'S 1883.
TOILET PREPARATIONS.

Before the close of the last century Mr ROBERT LOW established his reputation as one of the leading perfumers of his day, and the extracts for the handkerchief made by him were received with so much favor that he was appointed "Perfumer to the Court of St. James."

He originated the popular odors "Upper Ten," "Jockey Club," and "West End," which have obtained such world-wide celebrity. These odors were quickly imitated by other manufacturers, who were apparently unable to originate for themselves. Had Mr Low anticipated the great demand for his perfumes under these names he would have secured the sole right to use as his trade-marks these popular "household words," but he ever considered that his own name and signature on his goods was a sufficient security.

Many of the perfumes made by his successors up to the present time are prepared from his original formulas, and aided by the experience of successive generations in the business, we continue to manufacture extracts which are unsurpassed for excellence, delicacy of perfume, and lasting qualities.

The new odor "Flower de Luce," which we have recently produced, is confidently recommended as the most delicate and refined perfume yet presented to the public.

The Old Bloom Wonder, "Turtle Oil," "Elder Flower" and "Glycerine" Toilet Soaps, manufactured by us have long been favorably known in every country of the civilized world; the great trade established in these standard productions of our factories is the result of a steadfast adherence for nearly a century to the policy of making none but the best goods, and never sacrificing purity of materials for any other considerations.

Increase in material prosperity, and the spread of education, by effecting a corresponding extension in habits of refinement, have created a constantly growing demand for pure and truly perfumed Toilet Soaps. Recognizing the importance of this demand we are constantly working to secure by improvements in methods and machinery, a still higher quality, if possible in all our manufactures. The latest additions to our list is a special brand of Toilet Soaps, named from its odor "Flower de Luce." Impregnated with this delightful perfume, its emollient qualities and charming odor continue to make it a perfect Toilet Soap suited to the most delicate skin and satisfactory to the most fastidious requirements.

Our Soaps are all made from the best English soap stock, procured from the leading London houses who make a specialty of this branch of manufacture.

Druggists throughout the world recommend our goods for uniform high quality and economy in use.

LOW, SON, & HAYDON, London. ROBERT LOW'S SON, New York.

DURKEE'S SALAD DRESSING
No Waste. No Trouble. No Disappointment.
A GOOD SALAD ASSURED.
The most delicious and the most Popular Accompaniment for all Kinds of Salads, Raw Tomatoes, Cabbage, Cold Meat, Fish, &c., ever offered for sale.
ALL GROCERS SELL IT.

FISHERMEN!
TWINE and NETTING
MANUFACTURED BY THE
BALTIMORE TWINE AND NET CO.
WM. J. HOOPER & SON,
No. 6 S. Calvert St., Baltimore, Md.
Send for price-list, naming county and state. Please mention this paper.

MAGIC LANTERNS AND STEREOPTICONS FOR SCHOOL, HOME EXHIBITIONS
C. T. MILLIGAN
ASK FOR ILLUSTRATED CIRCULAR OF THE NEW DISSOLVING STEREOPTICON.

AMERICAN STAR SOFT CAPSULES THE BEST. Also, Star Empty Capsules. All Druggists.

HERCULES MALT WINE
The most effectious, delicious, and PURE EXTRACT OF MALT in existence. An unrivaled remedy for INDIGESTION, MALNUTRITION, and DEBILITY; a thorough restorative for ENFEEBLED PERSONS, CONVALESCENTS, NURSING MOTHERS and Children of Delicate Health. Sold by all Druggists and Fine Grocers, at 25c. PER BOTTLE.

GOLD PENS.
PENCILS, HOLDERS, CASES, &c.
THE CALLI-GRAPHIC PEN.
A GOLD PEN and RUBBER HOLDER containing the ink for several days' writing. Can be carried in the pocket. Always ready for use. A luxury for persons who care to have their individuality in writing.
MABIE, TODD, & BARD,
New York.
180 Broadway.
Send for Price-List.
FOR SALE BY FIRST-CLASS DEALERS.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S
STEEL PENS
Sold By ALL DEALERS Throughout The WORLD
GOLD MEDAL PARIS EXPOSITION 1878

BABY CARRIAGE—The Novelty. Runs easy. Just to weight. L. P. Tussell, 347 Broadway, N.Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XXVII.—No. 1373. NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 7, 1883. TEN CENTS A COPY $4.00 PER YEAR, IN ADVANCE.

Copyright, 1883, by Harper & Brothers.

ON THE OKLAWAHA RIVER FLORIDA.—DRAWN BY W. P. SNYDER.

A TRIP OVER "CROOKED WATER."

No visitor to Florida who has any regard for his own peace of mind can leave the State without having made the trip up the Oklawaha River, at least to Silver Spring. He may have explored every other river in the State from its source to its mouth, but if he has neglected this one river, his friends who have sailed in "crooked waters" will insist upon it that he has failed to see the chief object of interest, and really knows nothing of Florida. In itself the Oklawaha is no more remarkable than a dozen other rivers in the State, nor is Silver Spring more wonderful than several others which are hardly ever visited; but they come within the radius of the main line of winter travel, while the others do not. However much people may exclaim over the delights of the wilderness, and announce their love of "roughing it," the popular routes of travel are alike open those upon which are the most comfortable sleeping accommodations and the best set tables. In Florida the great highway of travel is the St. John's River, up which boats run three hundred miles south from Jacksonville. At Tocoi, fifty miles up the river, the traveller branches off to the east and, and takes the little fifteen-mile railroad to St. Augustine; and at Palatka, twenty miles further up, on the opposite side of the river, he halts, if he is bound up the Oklawaha.

A night's stay in Palatka is imperative, because all boats reach there in the afternoon, and all the Oklawaha boats leave there in the morning. So at Palatka—a place in which there is little to see and less to do—the traveller spends an afternoon and night as best he may, and by nine o'clock next morning is ready and anxious to break the monotony of existence there by a trip up the Oklawaha or any other river that promises interest and variety.

The Oklawaha River boats, five in number, are sui generis, built expressly for the navigation of this particular stream, and all alike in general features. They are short, narrow, flat-bottomed, built without guards, low, and compact. Their chimneys rise but little above the roof of the pilot-house, in front of which, or on the lower deck forward, are the seats which the passengers occupy all day, and for into the night, while viewing the novel scenes constantly presented during the journey. As compared with the rude, awkward craft of a few years ago, these boats are models of comfort, and are admirably fitted for the service they perform. Their are all of the stern wheel or "wheelbarrow" pattern, each a boat being so contrived as to be protected from contact with overhanging trees or [illegible]. Most of them bear Indian names, such as Ocklawaha, Astatula, or Tuskawilla; and often during the [illegible] the rush of travel is so great that three of them filled with [illegible] at the same time.

[illegible] at nine o'clock in the morning, the boat, with her merry [illegible] for Oklawaha River travellers are proverbially jolly [illegible] for three hours up the St. John's, to Welaka, on the left bank opposite which the "crooked water," which is the meaning of the Indian word "Oklawaha," debouches into the lower stream, and here the trip really begins. The moment the broad St. John's is left behind, the character of the scenery changes. Entering the narrow, tortuous channel, winding through vast expanses of [illegible] overspread by a dense growth of magnificent trees [illegible] with moss and interwoven with a maze of vines and creepers, to the [illegible] ing from an open clearing into a dark forest. Palms and other strange forms of semi-tropic vegetation fascinate the eye, and new and curious specimens of animal life present objects of never-failing interest. The alligator, which in Northern rivers is the greatest of curiosity in Florida, and which is now rarely seen from the decks of the St. John's River boats, here becomes common, and at length fails to arouse any great amount of interest. So clear is the water that frequently the "gator," startled from his siesta among the "bottoms" or rushes on the bank, can be seen making his way far beneath the surface to a more secure retreat. Shooting from the deck of the steamer, which was allowed during the earlier days of Oklawaha navigation, became such a nuisance, and so threatened the destruction of some of the breeding attractions of the river that it is now strictly prohibited, much to the disgust of those fledgeling sportsmen who look upon every species of undomesticated bird or beast as their legitimate target, and to the satisfaction of all sensible travellers.

Although the alligator is the star and leading attraction in this grand spectacle, he is ably supported by a select feathered troupe, which are to be seen at their best in these watery fastnesses. Most beautiful of these is the great snowy heron, which, with his companion the great blue heron, is such a treasure to the curiosity dealers, and works up so effectively into a fire-screen. At every bend, perched upon some dead limb, is seen the conical water-turkey or snake-bird, stretching his long neck, and ducking his head in a ridiculous state of indecision as to whether he shall fly or not, and finally solving the problem by dropping like a shot into the river, and disappearing beneath its surface. His cousin the cormorant shares his indecision, and affords almost as much amusement as the water-turkey by his frantic and erratic efforts to escape the approaching steamer. The speckled limpkin attracts attention at once by the peculiarly discordant cry, not unlike the laugh of a hyena, with which he makes his presence known, and which may be heard echoing through the dismal swamps at all hours of the day and night. A limpkin's egg is about the size of a hen's egg, and very good to eat. Besides these are the ibis and egret, the [illegible]ouchier, and many others curious in form and bold. The various [illegible] along the river afford a [illegible] the country beyond, some of them are [illegible]-like embankments, be[illegible] upon shaky little wharves, and connected with the mainland by roads of cordurov laid through the swamps. They bear such names as Sunday Bluff, Limpkin Bluff, Forty-foot Bluff, Island Grove, Eureka, and Dunnellon, and the few unpicturesque-looking natives, whose straight, lank hair and dirty homespun suits form prominent features at each landing, do not convey to their forms or countenances any reassuring suggestions as to the healthfulness of the adjacent country. But alas cares for malaria or chills and fevers when on a trip up the Oklawaha! They can't be connected in one day, and most of the gay party of tourists have got to live there, so, with a word of pity for the unfortunates who must make this their home from one year's end to the other, the subject is dropped, and attention is again directed to the river.

A steady subject of inquiry is, "When shall we pass the down boats?" And a low shout announces that a hustler has been sent around, all hands crowd to the best positions for seeing and exchanging greetings with the returning tourists as they pass. If the place of meeting is very narrow as is generally the case, the up-bound boats hug the bank closely, and wait for the others to pass. As the last on which our artist was making his first trip up the river thus drew to one side to give the others room, a comical accident occurred that came very near being serious. Beside our artist sat an enthusiastic old gentleman whose jolly face and bald head were surmounted by a tall and very shiny silk hat. With him were his two pretty daughters, and the three were in a state of great excitement over the meeting of the down boat, on which they expected to see friends. As soon as she came in sight they began to wave their handkerchiefs. The old gentleman, having attached his to his gold-headed cane, was waving it high above the others, when suddenly there was a jar of the boat, a crash overhead, and from a tall cypress, into which the up boat had run while hugging the bank too closely, a dead limb came tumbling. It struck fairly on the top of the shiny silk hat, drove it down over the beaming face, and scattered twigs and splinters over the rest of the passengers. In the confusion which followed, the down boat passed unheeded. Nobody was hurt, and it was as good as a play to see those two pretty girls strive to release their father from the embarrassment of that now disreputable-looking silk tile. The lining caught on his rather prominent nose, but every attempt to lift the hat elicited a howl of pain from the old gentleman, and much vigorous language. At length a release was effected by the aid of the ready penknife of our artist, and soon afterward, with a swollen nose, and disguised by an old shawl, felt hat borrowed from the captain, the respectable father of the pretty girls presented the [illegible] of a remarkable [illegible], just emerged from a [illegible]-hole.

The great [illegible] the Oklawaha [illegible] a dark [illegible] light [illegible] A boat [illegible]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 7, 1883.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

AN OFFER TO YOUNG AMERICAN ARTISTS.

For the best original drawing to illustrate ALFRED DOBLET'S "Christmas Hymn"—the drawing to be suitable for publication in HARPER'S MAGAZINE, and to be the exclusive work of an American artist not over twenty-five years of age—MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS offer an award of THREE THOUSAND DOLLARS, upon the honorable understanding that the successful competitor shall use the same for the prosecution of art study in one or more of the best American schools, including also a sojourn abroad of at least six months for the study of the old masters. The award will be paid in such installments and at such times as shall best suit the convenience of the recipient for the purposes specified.

The drawings must be received by MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS not later than August 1, 1883, addressed "Art Competition, Harper's Magazine, Franklin Square, New York"; and each must be designated by an assumed name or motto, which should also be given, together with the real name, age, and residence of the artist, in a sealed envelope accompanying the drawings, and not to be opened until the result of the competition shall have been determined. The name of the successful competitor will not be publicly announced until the publication of the drawing.

MR. R. SWAIN GIFFORD, N.A., MR. F. D. MILLET, A.N.A.; and MR. CHARLES PARSONS, A.N.A., Superintendent of the Art Department, HARPER & BROTHERS, will act as judges of the competition.

It is intended to engrave the successful drawing as one page for HARPER'S MAGAZINE for December, 1883, and should other drawings submitted be found suitable, second, third, and fourth awards will be made, as follows: one page HARPER'S WEEKLY, $200; one page HARPER'S BAZAR, $200; one page HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, $100.

If the judges should decide that no one of the drawings is suitable, MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS reserve the right to extend the limit of time and re-open the competition.

Two Christmas Hymns by ALFRED DOBLET have been published. That published in 1867 is the one for the illustration of which artists are invited to compete, and a printed copy of it will be sent on application to

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

REPUBLICAN HARMONY.

THE extraordinary opportunity which was given to the Democratic party by the result of the election of last autumn has been completely lost. That election showed the Republican party to be in serious peril, and it was evident that if the voters who had deserted the Republicans of victory should see that the aspects which they had in view would be promoted by another party, they would probably support it. The situation offered the best possible test of the Democratic party, and that party has totally failed. Nowhere and in no act since the election has it offered to independent voters the least reason for supposing that any good cause would gain by Democratic ascendency. On the contrary, its course has deepened the universal distrust with which it has been long regarded, and it is not surprising that the apprehension of its obtaining control of the government in so strong that great anxiety is shown to make such a result impossible by reuniting the Republican party. This hope has been the theme of much recent discussion. Informal meetings looking to "harmony" have been held in Philadelphia; Republican leaders have been interviewed in Albany; ward politicians have gossiped in New York; and all that is said proves the general conviction to be that Republican success is easily possible in 1884 upon the sole condition of Republican "harmony."

This word in politics is very elastic. But it is evident that it has two meanings in the present discussion, and this must be borne carefully in mind. "Harmony," as used by certain Republicans, means simply forgetting what has passed, and resolving to sustain the grand old party against the common enemy. In other words, it means "going it blind" for whatever is labelled Republican. "Harmony," with other Republicans, means support by the Republican party of certain definite purposes and measures, the nomination of candidates who actually represent them, and an organization of the party which restores equal rights to every Republican. The party discord which it is proposed to replace by harmony arose from very palpable differences, which are in their nature irreconcilable. This has been proved at the polls. Rather than permit the success of certain methods, or tolerate the petty tyranny of certain men in their own party, Republicans have secured Democratic success. It would be a fatal mistake to suppose that these Republicans now propose to accept such tyranny and adopt such methods because they are disgusted with the Democratic party. They do not ask any favor nor propose any dicker. "Bosses" are just as contemptible to them and "machines" as despotic as ever. "Harmony" must not be supposed to mean compromise in the sense of the husband who said that he always preferred linen sheets and his wife cotton, and that they had agreed to settle the difference by compromising upon linen. The precise situation to be dealt with is this: the unwillingness of intelligent and patriotic voters to support the Democratic party, and their indifference toward any party which does not offer something better. It need not be assumed that disgust with the Democrats is equivalent to satisfaction with the Republicans. Certainly it does not follow that because a man will not vote for JOHN KELLY he will vote for JOHN F. SMYTH, and "harmony" does not mean voting for SMYTH to escape KELLY.

It is plain that if the Republicans show themselves to be as incapable of using the opportunity which the failure of the Democrats has given them as the Democrats to avail themselves of the result of the election of last November, they will equally repel the confidence of honest men. "Harmony" is possible only upon condition that those who have opposed measures and methods which the country approves shall now accept them. For instance, Republican harmony is possible only by a frank and honest support of reform of the civil service both according to the spirit and the letter; only by seeking economy of administration through a revision of the tariff upon sound revenue principles, and with careful regard to all vested interests; only by the overthrow of the machine built upon official patronage. How could there be "harmony" among New York Republicans if the same old machine in the city ground out delegates to the Convention, and patronage were used to control votes, and the reformed system of the civil service were betrayed, and everything which produced the Republican revolt and catastrophe of last year were maintained in full vigor? Republican success in 1884 can be assured only by making the party the active agent of the measures which the country has shown that it desires. The proof that it is such an agent must be offered from this time forth. It can not be done by fine phrases in a platform. It can be accomplished only by the votes and the acts of Republican executive and legislative officers, and by the tone of the Republican press.

SECTARIAN LEGISLATION.

THE attempt in the New York Legislature to send the Freedom of Worship Bill to the "Grinding Committee" was happily baffled by Mr. ROOSEVELT, whose services to public honesty and the public welfare during this session have been many and eminent. Had the bill slipped into that committee it would have been beyond general discussion and exposure upon the floor. It would have been ordered to a third reading, and have been forced through to a vote under the previous question by the evidently unscrupulous Democratic majority. The instigators of this extraordinary sectarian legislation will now be compelled to explain upon the floor and to the people of New York the reasons for their urgent insistence upon the bill. Some of those reasons have been already announced, and they are worthy the serious attention of the public. The Catholic Review of February 27, 1883, said plainly, "We wish to say that there are enough men interested in the passage of this measure to secure the political damnation of any man or any party that will not do us justice." This is an unequivocal declaration of a leading sectarian authority that if a certain unjust and unconstitutional sectarian bill is not passed by the Legislature, the members of the sect as voters will secure the defeat of all who oppose it, and this threat will undoubtedly influence votes. This is not an unimportant matter. It is, we believe, the first time in our political history that the recognized organ of a religious sect has threatened the vengeance of the sect upon legislators for the honest discharge of their duty.

The bill assumes that certain inmates of certain public reformatory institutions are deprived of freedom of worship. This assumption is the sole reason of the bill. But it is wholly unfounded. The bill, as is known, is aimed at the House of Refuge. This admirable institution is one of which the city is justly proud. It is managed by a Board of Trustees comprising men of various religious denominations, including Roman Catholics. The inmates are attended by such clergymen as they desire. But sectarian proselyting is, of course, prohibited, and religious worship must be conducted only upon such conditions as are compatible with the good order and due discipline of the institution. The chapel is open to ministers of all denominations at proper times and under proper conditions.

In a public institution which justly recognizes no sectarian differences what more can be asked? What more, with just regard to equal rights and necessary discipline, can be allowed? But this bill proposes that minors shall be visited by the ministers of the sect to which their parents belong, not by the wish of the minors, but upon the application of the ministers, and that religious service shall be held according to the rules and discipline of the sect. This is, in plain words, an attempt of a certain sect to proselyte among children in a public institution. But it is for the State which has charge of the minors, not for the parents who have lost control of them by their conviction for crime, to secure to all the minors an equal freedom of worship, and this is done in the House of Refuge. The chapel, as we have said, is open to all denominations without discrimination, and visits from any clergyman are received under the necessary regulations of the board by those who desire them. All attempts at sectarian proselyting in public institutions should be resolutely baffled. And when the organ of a sect, in furtherance of a plan of sectarian aggression upon religious freedom in public institutions, threatens political vengeance upon its opponents, it is high time for intelligent citizens to inquire how long it would be after the success of a sectarian inroad upon public penal and reformatory institutions that a renewed and more powerful sectarian movement would be made against the public schools.

ANOTHER BLUNDER.

ONE of the most daring strokes of the TWEED Ring in the height of its power was the passage of a bill which virtually authorized a judge to construe criticisms in newspapers as offenses to be summarily dealt with by imprisonment. The object was to muzzle the press and to prevent all public comment upon the vast system of robbery of the public treasury in which TWEED and his gang were engaged. A bill so passed the Senate which was aimed a[t] liberty of the press, and [t]hat a few Republi[cans] perpetrated by the re[publicans] was ordered to a thir[d reading] minutes, many of the [members] of its scope or purpo[se] short: "Section 249 of [the Code] penaled. This act shall [take effect]

This section provides tha[t libel] published in a newspaper ma[y be tried] county where the paper is published or in the county where the complainant resides and the paper is circulated. But in the latter case the defendant may have the case removed to the county where the paper is printed on certain specified conditions, one of which is that he shall give bonds to pay, in case of conviction, "all the complainant's reasonable expenses in going to and from his place of residence and the place of trial and in attendance upon the trial." Nothing could be fairer than this provision. But the repeal would restore the old common law rule which authorizes an indictment to be brought in any county in which the paper circulates, and the consequences of such a rule are evident, and were clearly pointed out by the daily journals. It would enable any man who felt himself to be aggrieved to carry a defendant for trial to any neighborhood which the accuser knew to be unfriendly.

In the debate in the Senate upon reconsidering the passage of the bill several Senators made a very foolish assault upon the press, the only apparent bearing of which upon the subject was that the bill was intended to wreak some kind of vengeance upon editors for their criticism of legislative action. But how would Senators know anything of the public estimation of what is said and done in the Legislature except for the press? And what would not be said and done there except for the press? It was the press that overthrew TWEED. He might buy individual Senators, but he could not buy a whole press. Except for the vigilance of the press all the tricks and offenses of this very Legislature, the enormous grabbing of patronage, the theft of Mr SPRAGUE'S seat, the treachery to reform, the unconstitutional Catholic Protectory grant, the proposed sectarian legislation, and this very blow at a free press would all have passed unexposed. All of those schemes have not been frustrated, indeed, but the names of those who have sustained them, and the party which is responsible for them, have been exposed to the people of the State by the press, and the just judgment that will be entered against the party will be due in great part to the press. The petty spite of such attempted vengeance as this bill provides was most discreditable. Not a single adequate or respectable reason was brought forward for the repeal, and so instant and emphatic was the public condemnation of it that the bill was promptly and unanimously rejected by the Assembly.

RESUMPTION IN ITALY.

THE 12th of April will be one of the noteworthy days in the history of the Italian Kingdom. On that day Italy is to resume specie payments. Seventeen years ago the Italian government, in view of the annual and growing deficit in the treasury, and of the low state of the national credit, was compelled to issue a forced paper currency. Nine years later the budget, for the first time in the history of the new nation, showed a small surplus. Year by year the surplus enlarged and the credit of the government improved, until it became possible to obtain by a loan the amount of gold needed to redeem the paper currency. To use the phrase made famous by that clever phrase-maker NAPOLEON III., the resumption of specie payments crowns the edifice of Italian independence.

The cost at which the independence and unity of Italy have been purchased has been very great. The silent sacrifices made by the patriotic people of the peninsula deserve the warmest admiration. If material prosperity is the chief good of life, then the Italians have made a grave mistake in becoming a nation. Under the rule of popes and kings and dukes and viceroys the Italians were lightly taxed. Few cities were burdened with large municipal debts, and the poorest beggar could always obtain a meal at the door of a convent. The expulsion of the Austrians and the overthrow of the petty rulers brought into existence with the Italian monarchy a burden of national taxation such as scarcely any European nation had ever before borne. What little prosperity Venice knew under the Austrian rule vanished when the Austrian garrison was withdrawn. Turin and Naples lost their respective courts and became provincial towns. Florence was ruined by the transfer of the capital to Rome; and after her municipal palace had been sacked for debt, she was rescued from utter bankruptcy only by a gift from the general government. Rome, which did not owe a dollar under the popes, was burdened with a debt of 50,000,000 of francs within three or four years after the national troops entered the city. Everywhere the people were crushed under taxation, and with the closing of the convents the wretchedly poor lost the last protection against absolute starvation. These were the most obvious results of unity and independence, and it would have been perfectly natural had the simple and ignorant people of the lower classes demanded the return of the old and easy days when Italy was only a geographical expression.

We can gain an idea of the passionate patriotism of the Italians when we remember that those long years of suffering were endured quietly and cheerfully in order that Italy should be made strong enough to keep her independence, and to win the respect of the world. No government could have collected the taxes which the Italians have paid during the last twenty years had the people been unwilling to be taxed. The generation which voluntarily assumed the burden of excessive taxation has almost passed away, and it bore this burden for the sake of its children. There is something sublime in the courage which has made resumption possible, and there must be no fears felt as to the future of a people capable of such splendid and silent heroism.

IRVING'S CENTENARY.

THE portrait of WASHINGTON IRVING upon another page of this paper was the last ever taken. A few years before his death one of his nieces by marriage decoyed him—as he humorously said upon another occasion—while the miscreant artist took his likeness. Soon after IRVING'S death his friend and family physician, Dr JOHN C. PETERS, heard of the picture, and was permitted to have a photograph taken. From this photograph, with the kind permission of Dr. PETERS, our engraving is made. CHARLES MARTIN'S drawing in 1859 is in time the nearest likeness to this, but the friends of Mr IRVING prefer the latter picture. Dr. PETERS describes the head of IRVING, who at the end of his life was absolutely bald, as one of the most massive and beautifully moulded that he has ever seen.

It is a little surprising that in IRVING'S native city the centenary of his birth should not have been commemorated in an imposing manner. The Historical Society or the Century Club might well have taken the lead in a fitting celebration to honor the memory of the most distinguished of native New-Yorkers, with the play of whose genius American literature began. At least the anniversary should remind us with regret and even shame that while in our Central Park great authors of other lands and scenes of our own are justly honored by statues and busts, the first of American authors, who was born in the city, and who has given it and its neighborhood an undying charm, is without any memorial whatever.

We speak also here of the Life of Bryant, which appears in IRVING'S centennial year. But at the IRVING commemoration, now nearly a quarter of a century ago, when BRYANT delivered his delightful address, it was suggested that without delay the statue could be erected. It is not, indeed, necessary for his fame, for it is plain that he will not be forgotten. But the absence of IRVING'S statue from the Park to which New York has named so many is a reproach to his native city.

GODWIN'S "LIFE OF BRYANT."

MR. GODWIN'S Life of William Cullen Bryant is an admirable and complete portraiture of our first great poet, and of a noble American citizen. Mr. BRYANT'S long life was simply that of a man of letters and of a political editor, but to insight and sympathy such lifs offers rich material, and Mr. Godwin has made a singularly interesting and instructive narrative of an outwardly uneventful career. The skillful use that he has made of letters and "articles," and his judicious comments, forcibly impress the individuality of BRYANT upon the reader, and the story of a life so closely associated with the beginning of our distinctive literature was well worth telling in this ample form.

The most difficult part of the biographer's task is most happily accomplished. We mean, of course, the editorial career of the poet. Mr. BRYANT was an editor of the Evening Post for half a century, and during most of that time he was proprietor and editor-in-chief, directing the course of the paper. He was, we may say, born a Federalist, and he was nearly thirty years old before his political views changed. But he was one of the earliest free-traders in the country, and the most eagacious and forcible of all the daily advocates of the Jeffersonian principle of the limited functions of government. He was, in fact, a more sincere and consistent Jeffersonian than JEFFERSON himself. He called himself a Democrat, because the Democratic professions were more agreeable to his convictions than those of their opponents. But his views logically made him more of a "Free Trade" than was acceptable to the Democratic Southerns, and he steadily opposed the Democratic betrayal of justice and humanity in the party servility to slavery. BRYANT was therefore in the Democratic camp rather than a Democrat in the strict party sense, and when the party became a mere slavery propaganda he was naturally a Republican. The same independence and loftiness of character loosened his connection with the Republican party when in his judgment it forsook its principles and abused its power.

Mr. Godwin, without vexatious detail, and with great mastery of the general political movement from 1830 to 1870, gives a very vivid and accurate picture of the essential leadership of Mr. BRYANT. The Evening Post never probably had a circulation like that of some of the morning papers, but it taught the teachers. A hundred other papers were middle-men between the Post and the great public. Those who hold the political views which the Democratic party, as a party, travestied, found in the Post the strong arguments of their side stated with incomparable clearness, comprehensiveness, and vigor, and this book amply vindicates Mr. BRYANT'S title as a great editor, independent, incorruptible, courageous, and very able. We do not wish to convey the impression that the narrative of this part of the poet's career overshadows that of his more purely literary and social life. It does not. We have especially mentioned it because it is less known. Proportion and perspective are justly observed, and the book is a delightful and valuable addition to our biographical literature.

THE LATE POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

THERE was an unmistakable expression of sincere regret at the death of the late Postmaster-General HOWE, which is not surprising to any one who knew him. He was, in the old Saxon sense, a homely, old-fashioned man, of perfect integrity and of strong feelings. The cause of the Republican party in its early day was most congenial to his convictions. Upright, humane, and shrewd, he was the heartiest of Republicans.

A certain conservatism of nature made him comfortable only in the most unquestioning loyalty to that rather vague and obscure authority, "the party," and he looked with distrust upon whatever protested or questioned or menaced any kind of disturbance. Things might be bad in some Republican quarters, but nothing, he thought, could be so bad as the chance of Democratic success. This is an intelligible but an unfortunate disposition, because it is blind to the real perils and to the effective remedies. Could Mr. HOWE and his friends have had their way, the party would have been defeated, and he never would have been Postmaster-General.

But it is the amiability and gentleness of his private character, his sanity and rugged honesty, which all who knew him pleasantly recall. His long public service was without stain. As a Senator in his life and manner he illustrated the simplicity which so fondly associate with the earlier days of the republic, and whose disappearance will mark the end of its best days.

SHALL NIAGARA BE SAVED?

IT would certainly be most discreditable in the State of New York if the adverse report of the Senate committee upon the Niagara reservation bill should be sustained. The Committee of Finance consists of seven members, of whose two were absent when the question was taken, and among the five members present the vote stood three to two against a favorable report. The opposition is said to proceed chiefly from mill-owners in the vicinity, and this is not surprising, because it is from obliteration by mills and other disfigurements that the bill proposes to rescue Niagara.

It must be remembered, however, that no waste of waterpower is necessary or contemplated. The plan as originally proposed by Mr GARDNER and Mr OLMSTED provides for making the power available without destroying the spectacle of the cataract, and one of the objects of the pending bill is to ascertain in what way and with the least inconvenience to all existing interests this result can be accomplished.

The defeat of the bill would probably seal the doom of this unparalleled ocean of natural grandeur and beauty. Twice the bill has passed the Assembly, and with every year the increase of obstructions makes the reservation much more difficult and impracticable. There should be no delay in forwarding petitions to add to those which have been already laid before the Legislature. Those which are ready should be sent to J. H. HAMILTON, the corresponding secretary of the Niagara Falls Association, Postoffice box 166, New York, or directly to some friendly Senator. Every Non-Yorker who has a just sense of the honor of the State is interested to make himself an active volunteer and agent, to take care that the voice of intelligent New York upon this subject is heard by the Legislature.

PERSONAL.

THIRTY years ago an American artist promised one of his sweetest little landscapes to a friend. It was a sunset, and above the orange glory of the horizon a pale new moon silvered a soldier radiance. To-day the picture has two moons, the second one evidently an earlier specimen that had been painted out, but the pigments that once covered it have dried away. The effect is very strong.

—The late Mr J. R. GREEN was a fervent admirer of Dean STANLEY'S literary style, and, naturally, expressed himself in a style quite unlike the Dean's —Sir WILLIAM HAMILTON, the philosopher, was smart as a lad. In his third year he read English admirably, and had overcome many of the obstacles of arithmetic, in his fourth year he took high rank in geography, in his fifth year he could translate Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, and recite from HOMER, MILTON, DRYDEN, and COLLINS. His eighth year found him able to converse in Latin, French, and Italian, and his tenth year saw him a student of Arabic and Sanskrit.

—Pictures and sculpture galleries, observes Mr J. A. SYMONDS, accustom us to the separation of art from life. It is only on festivities, after long experience, that we come to perceive that the most fruitful moments in our art education have been casual and unsought, in remote nooks and unexpected places, where nature, art, and life are happily blent.

—"England's only relation with South Africa," said Mr GRANVILLE recently in Parliament, "is a history of continued troubles. It is the one standing difficulty of our colonial policy which we have never been able to set right; in other parts of the world difficulties have arisen—in India, in Canada, and in New Zealand—and every one has been dealt with and satisfactorily disposed of, but never in South Africa."

—The students of Glasgow University held a meeting at which they voted to absent themselves from JOHN BROWN'S rectorial address unless proper seats were provided for them, the faculty having arranged that they should stand, while the public were seated. Their wishes were thus respected.

—Miss MARIANNE NORTH, a painter now travelling in South Africa, is disappointed because "the country is all dried up," having few flowers and many swarms of flies.

—The anthropologist, according to Mr. A. LANG, the poet, should be a student not merely of savage life, but of human nature as a whole, and so much interested in the Cornish house-maid who kills spiders because her late master (the rector of the parish) was believed to have become a spider, as in the Zulu who spares serpents in which he recognizes his sisters and his cousins and his aunts and other deceased relatives.

—Professor ATTEMS, in a recent lecture at the Royal Institution, expressed his faith in electricity as a motor. A street-railway in Ireland was run ten miles an hour by the use of electricity, and could have made twenty-five miles had the load permitted. Another car, holding forty-six persons, moved six miles an hour at a cost of $1 86 a day. Horse power would have cost $7 a day.

—News comes from Borneo that the son of Mr JOSEPH HATTON has been shot while hunting elephants. He was a young engineer and scientist of remarkable attainments, and a distinguished career was confidently predicted for him. Mr Joseph HATTON is well known in this country as the London correspondent of the New York Times and the author of several popular novels, and in this sad bereavement he will have the sympathy of thousands of American readers.

—Mr BROWNING it is said, loves successive shocks of thought or feeling, and can hardly deny himself the satisfaction of thinking that even the spirit of perfect love and harmony is perpetually exerting this dull world by galvanizing it with vivid spasms, such as he himself has the skill to administer.

—From the Pall Mall Gazette of March 16: "We learn that Mr EDWIN A. ABBEY has been elected a member of the Institute of Painters in Water-Colors. Mr ABBEY is a young American artist lately settled in England, whose paintings have as yet been seldom seen over here, but who has gained the highest distinction as a pictorial and original illustrator. His edition of HERRICK, which was reviewed in these columns, was perhaps the finest of our Christmas books last year. He is the most prominent draughtsman on the staff of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. We congratulate the Institute on having performed a graceful act to a stranger, and on having secured an admirable artist." It may be added that Mr. ABBEY stands to the very front rank of American painters in water-colors.

—The present Archbishop of Canterbury is the authority for the following: "When the war was over," said our great Duke [of Wellington], "and I came home, I thought one of my first duties was to know who, on what rational grounds, I belonged to the Church of England, and I read through several books. The one which I value most of all is WATERLAND'S Treatise on the Athanasian Creed."

—JAN BRUEGHEL, the celebrated Flemish painter of the sixteenth century, ass in the habit of buying back any of his juvenile works which he considered too imperfect, at a price greater than he had received, in order to destroy them. Dean used to buy his back to touch up and sell at a profit.

—Professor TYRRELL has recently made some experiments which prove that during the night the earth's surface is several degrees colder than the air, and during the day the reverse is the case.

—Sir WILFRID LAWSON, M.P., has not the slightest doubt that "a great temperance wave" is rolling over England. Mr SAMUEL MORLEY, M.P., believes that the temperance question, whether viewed socially, politically, or religiously, has more to do with the life of the people than all other causes put together.

—After an interval of thirty years, Sir WALTER Scott's novels are being retranslated and republished in France. These works are so efficient to enlist and force from those of the popular novelists of the day that whether the new edition will be successful is a matter of some doubt.

—The silk and scarves issued to the Twentieth Middlesex (Artists) Rifle Volunteers by their Lieutenant-Colonel, Mr FREDERICK LEIGHTON, president of the Royal Academy on the occasion of the recent grand review of the militia at Brighton, England, directed that "pink woollen socks, which should be draped so prevent blistering of the feet, and strong, laced shooting boots should be worn on the march. Lace-up boots should always be worn with the leggings." Mr FAIRMAIRN, it seems, is not a painter only.

—In Berlin, the post-office money-orders are cashed at the residence of the payees by a special messenger, and not at the postoffice, as in this country. One of these messengers having been killed and robbed by the payee on whom he had called, the government has decreed that hereafter money-orders shall be paid only on the presence of third persons.

—Lord LANSDOWNE says that he likes the term "girls" better than "young ladies," and the term "school" better than "seminary."

—It used to be supposed in Ireland, that a man's ghost could not rest in peace until his debts were paid; but the belief at present is cooperative.

—Miss ISBEL KAUFMANN, in her recent book of travels in Spain, having apologized for being unable to describe a bull-fight, because she had never seen one, is informed by one of her countrymen that an apology is needed. "In the first place, a bull-fight is a brutal exhibition which nobody expects English ladies to patronize; and in the second place, it has been described and painted and sung for so often that we are all so utterly tired of the subject as an era of the big gooseberry, the great sea-serpent, the unfortunate nobleman, or the Kilmainham treaty. Even Moly-Wark in Seville has been a little overdone, and the Alhambra on each forepe an final a murmur."

—"The proposal to introduce a new fighting dress into the English army appears," says a London journal, "rather startling, and there are probably not fifty men in Great Britain who will not at first revolt from the thought that the so-called British scarlet will no longer be seen on any field of battle. But in most of our late wars the troops discarded their home uniforms, and were provided with garments of altogether different cut and color, and it has come to be pretty well understood that the British soldier, on his arrival at home, is dressed in a costume unsuitable for war, and had better get quickly out of it and into mufti before trusting himself to perform [illegible] warlike [illegible]."

John Richard Green.

Author of "A Short History of the English People," etc., etc.
Died at Mentone, March 1883, [illegible] of forty-five

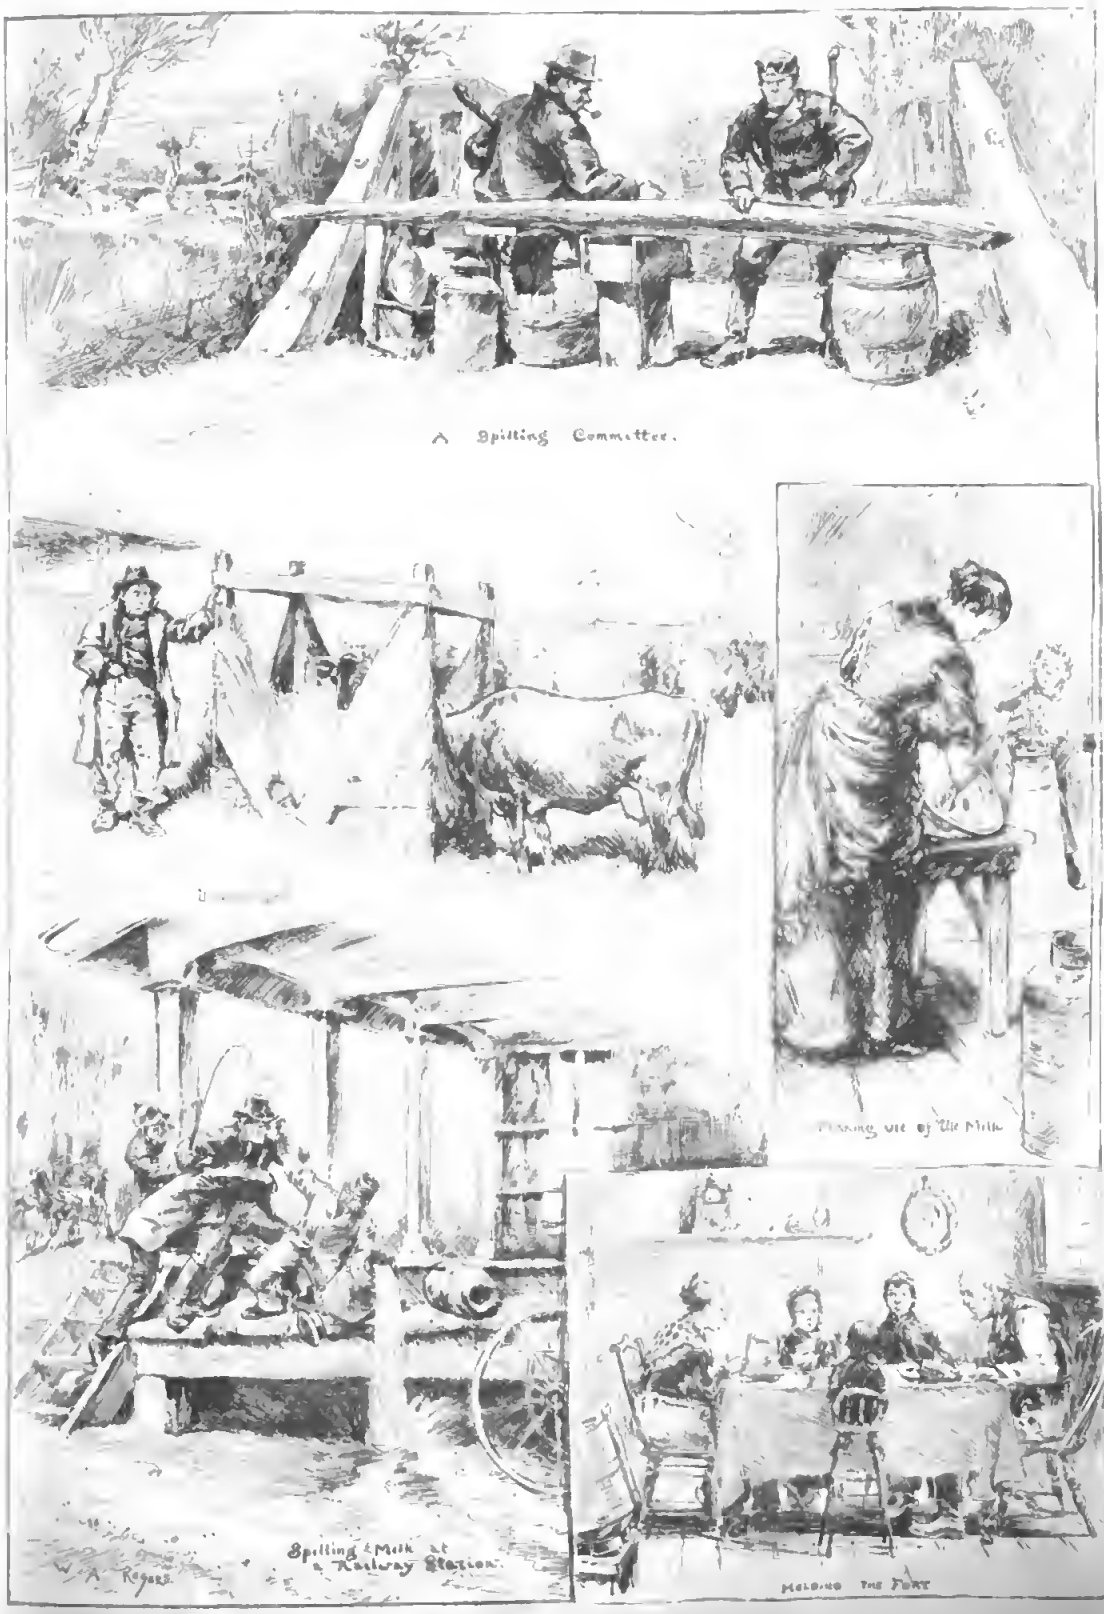
Enough for [illegible] brief life the toil, the glory;
[illegible] have said [illegible] English story;
[illegible] of Eng[illegible] many [illegible]
[illegible] of Ea[illegible] old [illegible]
[illegible] all men [illegible]
Robbed by [illegible]

THE PROPHET JOSEPH SMITH.

THE OLD TEMPLE AT NAUVOO.

THE MORMON REUNION AT KIRTLAND, OHIO.—From a Sketch by Frank Taylor.—[See Page 210.]

THE OPENING OF THE FAIR OF THE SEVENTY-FIRST INFANTRY.—From a Sketch by Charles Graham.—[See Page 221.]



INCIDENTS OF THE MILK WAR.—Drawn by W. A. Rogers.—[See Page 214.]

THE ACADEMY EXHIBITION.

DREAM-LAND (A FRAGMENT).—CHARLES D. WEAVER.

To the children of light an academy of art is a stronghold of the Philistines. Like the ancient temple of the Egyptians, it stands high above the life giving Nile, its façade monotonously flat, and without openings for windows. What enters it, indeed, to ere anything outside of itself? So think in full measure those alleged spokesmen of the children of light, the critics, and with each recurring exhibition of the National Academy of Design they renew the expression of their dislike of the way in which the institution is run; and as no institution in this world is perfectly run, the animadversions made upon the Academy's manner of doing things are bound to be true, if kept sufficiently general. At this time of the year those animadversions are addressed chiefly to the hanging committee, and may be classified under two principal heads: "You have hung too many pictures;" and, "You should make the exhibition more select."

As it is not within our knowledge that man self respecting journal ever uttered a word in favor of a hanging committee of the Philistines, we propose this time, in speaking of the Academy exhibition, to present our readers with the necessity of an attempt to find, even in the hanging committee at Fourth Avenue and Twenty-third Street, some evidence of the doctrine that there is a soul of goodness in things evil.

At the outset, then, we may open our eyes to the obvious [illegible] which these good men are expected to do. Each one, as we write, has his pockets bagging with letters written by the friends of artists—or alleged artists—who have sent canvases to the exhibition, the worse the picture, the more vehement the supplication to accept it and give it a good place. It is admitted on all hands that every Philistine has his Delilah, but never is Delilah so pressing in her overtures as on the night of a hanging of paintings. She rises—or rather swoops—with the occasion, and the horror that she makes in the vitals of that gentle soul is most pitiable to those who see the most of it. There never yet lived a member of a hanging committee who could truthfully say within himself, "I am absolutely inaccessible to the blandishments of the sex," and if in the commonsense quiet of his own studio you should ask him if his judgment was influenced by the sweetly perfumed epistles with which his pockets are stuffed, he would tell you frankly and in all confidence that it was.

The thoughtful Philistine may add, if pressed, this to hanging a picture at the Academy exhibition he takes into consideration three things: First, the quality of the work itself; secondly, the position of its author; and thirdly, the demands of the general color scheme of which the picture is to form a part. It is at the second of these points that he is most likely to be led astray. If the author is an Academician, shall a man not take care of his friends? and the precedent at the institution has always been to allow every Academician at least one painting on the line. If the author has been commended in one or more of the afore-mentioned letters, is it human to suppose that the commendation must always be inoperative? There are, indeed, two kinds of episcopal commendation which in no respect act as temptations. Every year the hanging committee welcomes from amidst the exhibitors at Maryannville or Eaglestown wund-converers in the shape of extracts from the local press in praise of the color, composition, handling, and subject of pictures on the way to the Academy. These productions of the provincial pen are couched (as their own writers would express it) in the most appreciative terms, and by forwarding them it is supposed that a proper self-confidence will be imparted to the hanging committee when performing its manifest duty of giving the paintings so heralded the rostrum in the principal gallery. Again, the committee have been known to receive such a communication as this: An ecclesiastic of prominence whose portrait had been painted by a fellow-townsman sent the work to the Academy with a communication, carefully written by himself, to the effect that as a likeness it was perfect, and as an art-work immaculate. And in order to make his own assurance as well as that of the committee doubly sure, the document was accompanied by a notary public's certificate, in which his reverence swore that the facts were as stated.

Though it is paradoxical to say that at the National Academy the best exhibition can never be the best exhibition, the words express the truth. To the hanging committee the best exhibition is not the one that has the largest proportion of excellent paintings, but the one that is the most widely representative, including the works of the promising aspirant, as well as the works of the established professional; the works of the Westerner, the Southerner, and the Easterner, as well as those of the New-Yorker. With the present limitations as to wall space it is impossible to give the exhibition this representative character, and at the same time to make it consist exclusively of the best pictures procurable. There is not one of the most successful members of the Academy who would not like to send to the annual exhibition at least half a dozen of his paintings; and if the hanging committee encouraged this liking, the absolute quality of the show would be improved. But would the actual gain to American art be greater? And if the Academy is really an academy—a school—should it not take care of its promising pupils, and give them an opportunity to display their works before that great public whose appreciation will be literally their meat and drink? Where else are these pupils—some of them destined doubtless to be successful—to go with the meritorious creations of their skill, if not to their alma mater? And is it of no interest or profit to the public to notice year by year the growth of these aspirants? The best exhibition, in the sense of being composed exclusively of the best pictures attainable, the Academy exhibition is not, and never should be. Special exhibitions may be organized to accomplish special purposes, but a National Academy exhibition is not a special exhibition.

G. W. SHELDON.

THE MILK WAR.

THE spilling of a few cans of milk and the temporary stoppage of the supply from the line of the Erie Railroad is not the beginning nor the end of the Orange County milk war.

The causes which goaded the farmers to desperation lie too deep to be rooted out by a schedule of prices set by a committee for a month or a year. Such agreements, entered into by a large number of people, are never maintained. Supply and demand will assert their power in spite of all the resolutions of farmers' committees or combinations between creameries men and milk dealers. A few facts may give an idea of what has made milk farming a losing business.

The average Orange County farmer has a natural affinity for a mortgage. If he owns ten cows, he must mortgage his place and buy to-enty more. He finds it impossible to care for so many cattle and carry on any other branch of farm labor. Not one farmer in ten raises his own grain. Almost all of the feed used in Orange County is brought there from outside its limits. They do not even raise their own cultes, but buy from the West, and add it to the mortgage. Many of them actually buy their butter, and but very few raise any pork, either to eat or sell. The whole aim of their existence has been to produce milk. While the consumer was paying fifty cents for butter, sixteen to eighteen cents for pork, and twenty-five cents for beef, these farmers had not a pound of any one of these to sell, but were flooding the market with milk, for which they received a cent and a half to two and a half cents per quart. This is how the farmer has cheated himself.

Now very naturally follows how, when he had thrown away half his chances, a few shrewd men, not too philanthropical, could pocket the other half. They established creameries in the milk country—skimmeries would be a much more appropriate name. The farmer was invited to bring in his milk, and receive the New York price for it, less the freight. This struck him as a good thing—no wear and tear of runs on the cars, nor risk of losing them. The creamery man became his customer. But this customer was also a member of the Milk Exchange in New York, which sets the price next month for the milk bought during this. Now when the creamery man has collected all the milk from a hundred farms, it is poured into small cans, and placed in shallow cats filled with water and ice. Here the cream rises, and is carefully skimmed off until the last milk delivered by the farmer has been reduced to a point just escaping the limit fixed by law. Part of the cream thus obtained is sold to New York hotels at from twenty to thirty cents per quart, and part is made into the high-priced "creamery butter." The skimmed milk, in which, often with the aid of a little salt, the lactometer bobs serenely at exactly the official figure, is then put into the usual forty-quart can and shipped to the city, and upon what this impoverished stuff still bring in the market is based the "New York price" to the farmer for the milk delivered during the month past. In other words, the creamery man pays the farmer for his fat milk what he himself gets for the skimmed article, and has the cream, butter, and cheese, for which he pays not one penny, for his profit. The expense of running a creamery is trifling, a one-horse engine and two or three men doing all the work. It is not very strange, then, that the creamery men have grown fat, while the farmer is unable to pay the interest on his debts. The writer knows of cases—and they are typical—where farmers have spent during the past season for feed alone as much, or within a hundred dollars of as much, as they received for milk, being out their help, interest on capital invested, interest on their indebtedness, and their time.

Now the farmers may get angry when they find themselves being driven to the wall, and may denounce the creameries as the source of all their troubles, and call the proprietors swindlers and thieves, but it is the milk farmer who has made the creamery a possibility. The creamery is simply doing the work that should be done upon the farms. Why do not a few farmers try making butter as well as selling milk, feeding a few porkers on the skimmed milk, raising their own oats, rye, and corn for feed, bringing up a few good calves, and not try to turn everything into milk that is not wanted?

As matters stand now in the milk-producing counties about New York, the farmers are like sheep running in a deep rut, making it an easy matter for the wolves to full upon and devour them.

In this short statement of the case we have endeavored to state the facts as they were given to us by several of the most intelligent producers. Allowing for possible exaggeration on their part, there is still cause for reflection on the subject of overproduction of milk.

UNDER THE CONVENT WALLS.

ABOUT twelve o'clock one bright February day in Paris Madame Blanchet sat waiting for the arrival of her belated scholar, Miss Cora Bell, a young American whose habit it was to spend a couple of hours three times a week in so-called "elegant conversation" in the French language with that worthy dame. The little apartments where the teacher lived had formerly been a garret over the dependance of a suburban lumbering-house, taken under some stress of circumstances by its present occupant, and little by little, through taste and perseverance, it had been made to "blossom like the rose." No wonder merry Miss Cora liked her tri-weekly French lessons. The walls of the large room, divided into two smaller ones by screens, were hung with fluted chintz, all flowers and leaves of brightest hue. A tiny porcelain stove diffused, when called upon (but that was not too often, for madame, like all French women, believed in economy in wood), a friendly warmth. In both windows, whose panes of glass were polished like the speckless boards of the flooring, were kept plants and birds. A great green box of mignonette in flower sent out a luscious fragrance. Vines were made to start from behind every picture-frame and ant of every china jar upon the shelves, and somehow or other they grew like Jack's bean-stalk, strong and green and luxuriant. Best of all, a flood of genial sunshine came in on all sides, for the garret boasted of various windows. Where madame slept one could find out by peeping behind a screen at the tiny white curtained bed with the crucifix above it, but where madame cooked no one ever guessed; yet she had a fashion of producing from nowhere corners a series of luncheons that were nectar and ambrosia to her youthful visitors. Days there had been in madame's past experience when the poor lady had known what it was to subsist upon the slenderest of rations, but now the fame of her exquisite embroideries in chenille and silk was noised abroad, while her occasional scholars, like Cora Bell and a few liberal Americans of the same set, made up an income sufficient for the widow's wants.

Madame Blanchet, sitting at the open window overlooking an ivy-covered wall that just here formed the boundary of the Bois de Boulogne, felt quite wistful with regret over the non appearance of her favorite scholar. "She will not come now," the widow said to herself, as the inevitable mantel clock struck a cheerful loud-voiced "one." "Truly, she has twined herself into my heart, that chère petite Cora. How she laughs and dances and sings her life away! Just like that other one—so many years ago." A shiver ran over the little woman's frame, and she closed her eyes as if to banish some painful image. "My pretty Cora will never know so sad a fate as hers, thank to bon Dieu." A light step upon the stairway, and Cora, blooming with health and animation, came into the room.

"Don't scold, dear madame. There is time enough yet for a chapter of our book before they send for me."

The lesson began, but Cora's attention wandered; her thoughts flew off at a tangent; her eyes grew dreamy; a deeper rose-color settled in her cheeks. At last a little white protesting hand was laid across madame's page.

"Blanchet dear, I want to confess to somebody. Won't you be my priest? You know that papa is in America attending to business always, and that mamma is forever going out. I've nobody but that stupid Parkey of mine, and talk I must—I must. Oh, Blanchet, if such a thing can be, I am too happy! All of this dear blessed morning he has been with me, and mamma has given her consent, and on are to be married soon."

And then, the flood-gates loosed, came a stream of joyous confidence. Cora never thought to look up at her listener until she felt a hot tear, then another, drop upon her hands clasped in the widow's lap.

"What is it, dear madame?—what have I said to pain you?" the girl asked, wondering, to be answered by a fit of bitter sobbing. With kind and gentle words Cora soothed her friend's emotion, and at last Madame Blanchet was able to speak once more.

"Forgive me, dearest young lady," she exclaimed. "In truth I never can forgive myself. I owe it to you to explain my weakness. See here: this picture which you have often caught a glimpse of in my desk. Look at it—judge for yourself of her youth, her innocence, her beauty. Ah! was my only child, and I have lost her forever. Years ago she knelt, as you do now, and poured out to me the wealth of her love and happiness, under circumstances like yours. The rest is too painful for you to hear."

"Tell me more," the girl said, tenderly. "I would be selfish indeed if I refused my sympathy at a time when all seems so bright before me."

Little by little the story was revealed. Ten years before, Léonie Blanchet had been sought to marriage by a wealthy Englishman, to whom her mother had given her with some misgiving, watching her go from that modest home into a life of luxury with many anxious fears. The husband Léonie had chosen was handsome, young, and winning; he had made good his claim to a rank and station far above Léonie's expectations. Léonie adored him. What, then, was there to apprehend? The widow could not tell, but still! Léonie's first letters came to her so full of buoyant pride, of confident happiness, that for a time the mother could not but reflect it. The young couple were absent upon their wedding journey in the South, and had reached Rome, when a thunder-bolt fell upon the proud, trustful bride. The man whom Léonie believed to be her husband had left his true wife in England—a gay, fashionable beauty, sufficiently "emancipated," according to the notions of her class, to mock openly and lightly at her husband's latest fancy.

"But this is not for you to hear, my child," the little French teacher said. Cora, who from motives of delicacy had avoided looking to her friend, glanced hastily up, struck by the suppressed passion in her voice. What a transformation was there! In place of the quiet, repressed, demure personage she had been accustomed to see, Madame Blanchet's eyes were alive; her cheeks glowed with a dull crimson, his teeth were clinched.

"Do you know what I would have done to him?" she went on. "I am a Corsican, and the blood runs hot in our veins when a so stirred by wrong—so I"

The brief passion was spent. It was succeeded by a calm even more full of meaning. Cora waited until her friend could trust herself to speak.

"They parted then and there," Madame Blanchet went on, in a low tone. "He did me deadly himself. He simply laughed at her—my poor, heart-broken, humiliated child. He said she was too innocent for the times she lived in. And so she was, but Dieu, too innocent. She put all of this into one last letter to me, and then she fled—fled into the night."

"And now?" the young girl said, after a long silence.

"Now she is at peace," the mother answered, quietly. "The Holy Church received her in its bosom. Léonie is one of the sisters of the convent of the Sepulte Vive. For some time past I have been saving up money in order to take the journey to Rome, but until recently it was all I could do to live here, and to go away from my employment meant starvation. Oh, if I could but have seen her, I would have starved—yes, gladly—but that is impossible. All I can do is to rest the outside of the convent upon her darling once a year each sister has a day, when she is allowed to throw over the convent wall a flower in token to her watching friends that she is still alive, but that is all. I know what flower my Léonie would choose—a bunch of fresh white lilac!"

"'Sepulte Vive'—buried alive!" the young girl repeated, sadly. A shadow seemed to fall over her life, and her budding happiness.

A few months later saw the Roman spring unfold to all its glory. A party of tourists were visiting that relic of mediæval days, the convent of the Sepulte Vive. Most of them turned back disappointed at the threshold, but a group of three people lingered until the rest of the sightseers, after a colloquy held through a revolving barrel in the wall of the convent, had reluctantly dispersed. Over this barrel was traced an inscription: "Who would live content within these walls, let her leave at the threshold every earthly care." Upon these lines a woman dressed in black, standing apart from her two companions, kept her eyes fixed, while her lips moved in prayer.

The order of sons who have thus condemned themselves to a living death subsist no charity. It is only when their supplies are totally exhausted that they are allowed, after twenty-four hours' starvation, to ring a certain bell, which the outside world interprets: "We are famishing." Two Lents are observed by them during the year—the one common to all Catholic Christians, and another held between November and Christmas. In the interval the sisters receive and partake of whatever food may be bestowed on them by visitors.

Two of the three loiterers were young and handsome, radiant with ill-disguised happiness. That they were new-made husband and wife none could doubt, and it was a pleasant sight to see the wife order to be brought from a carriage awaiting them a hamper of abundant dainties, and with the aid of her husband proceed to unpack their store. To gain answer from the convent the young man knocked briskly upon the barrel head, which, slowly turning, revealed a shelf within.

"What will them, stranger?" came a voice, faint and far as the note of an Æolian harp. So strong was the sense of remoteness and of desolation produced by this sound that involuntarily the young wife clasped her husband's arm in shuddering.

"Oh! it is too sad," she whispered in his ear. "I think I will go back to the carriage and leave Madame Blanchet with you—may I not?"

"Nonsense, darling. Who is it who has contrived and carried out this little expedition, I should like to know? Come, cheer up, and bestow your bounties upon the good sisters within. Depend upon it they will relish them."

Their presents were given, and in exchange our visitors had received a series of cartelles, or tiny slips of printed paper folded like homœopathic powder papers, and intended to be swallowed whole by the believer, who might thereafter hope the cure of any mortal ailment possessing him. As their colleague with the unseen sister came to a close, the young man signed to Madame Blanchet to draw near. The mother had kept a veil over her face while standing by in silence, but now she sprang forward, and putting her lips to the opening, uttered with feminine audacity a few sentences of wild pleading unheard by her companions.

Fainter and farther were the pitying accents that smote her ear in return.

"Sophie vive," daughter. The grave given back no answer."

"Let us wait beneath the garden wall, dear friend," Cora said, as between them her husband and the supported the steps of the trembling mother from the spot. "It should be at about this time that the flower is thrown, and oh! how it will comfort you to have it from her hand!"

Underneath the ancient wall of the convent garden the little group waited in silence. It was a moment of feeling too profound for words. As the hour drew near the mother left her friends and went to kneel alone upon a grassy mound where her cheek might press the wall, as if caressing it. For a time all was silent. Then a bell sounded the hour with slow and solemn strokes. A hand bared into joyous unrolling in the tree above where Cora stood. "It is a good omen," she said, glancing up into her husband's face. As the last stroke of the bell died upon the air something white and fragrant fell at the feet of the kneeling figure. "It is Léonie's white lilac!" Cora cried, starting joyously forward.

But the mother did not cur. The token had come too late to awaken joy or sorrow.

CONSTANCE CARY HARRISON.

WHAT SOCIAL CLASSES OWE TO EACH OTHER.

By PROFESSOR W. G. SUMNER.

VII.

ON THE VALUE, AS A SOCIOLOGICAL PRINCIPLE, OF THE RULE TO MIND ONE'S OWN BUSINESS.

THE passion for dealing with social questions is one of the marks of our time. Every man gets some experience and makes some observations of social affairs. Except matters of health, probably none have such general interest as matters of society. Except matters of health, none are so much affected by dogmatism and crude speculation as those which appertain to society. The amateurs in social science always ask: What shall we do? What shall we do with Neighbor A? What shall we do for Neighbor B? What shall we make Neighbor A do for Neighbor B? It is a fine thing to be planning and discussing broad and general theories of wide application. The amateurs always plan to use the individual for some constructive and inferential social purpose, or to use the variety for some constructive and inferential individual purpose. For A to sit down and think, What shall I do? in commonplace; but to think what it ought to do is interesting, romantic, moral, self-flattering, and politicized all at once. It calls into a great number of human weaknesses all at once. To go on and plan what a whole class of people ought to do is to feel above self a power on earth, to win a public position, to clothe one's self in dignity. Hence we have an unlimited supply of reformers, philanthropists, humanitarians, and would-be managers-in-general of society.

Every man and woman in society has one big duty. That is to take care of his or her own self. This is a social duty. For fortunately the matter stands so that the duty of making the best of one's self individualic is not a separate thing from the duty of filling one's place in society for the two are one, and the latter is accomplished when the former is done. The common notion, however, seems to be that one has a duty to society, as a special and separate thing, and that this duty can aim at smoothing and deciding what other people ought to do. Now the man who can do anything for or about anybody else than himself is fit to be head of a family, and when he becomes head of a family he has duties to his wife and his children in addition to the former big duty. Then, again, any man who can take care of him self and his family is in a very exceptional position if he does not find in his immediate surroundings people who need his care and have some sort of a personal claim upon him. If now he is able to fulfill all this, and to take care of anybody outside his family and his dependants, he must have a surplus of energy, wisdom, and moral virtue beyond what he needs for his own business. No man has this. For a family is a charge which is capable of infinite development, and no man could endure to the full measure of duty for which a family may draw upon him. Neither can a man give in society an advantageous an employment of his services, whatever they are, in any other way so by spending them on his family. Upon this, however, I will not insist. I recur to the observation that a man who proposes to take care of other people must have himself and his family taken care of after some sort of a fashion, and must have on or yet unexhausted store of energy.

The danger of minding other people's business is twofold. First, there is the danger that a man may leave his own business unattended to; and second, there is the danger of an impertinent interference with another's affairs. The "fraude of humanity" almost always run into both dangers. I am one of humanity, and I do not want any volunteer friends. I regard friendship as optional, and I want to have my say about it. I suppose that other components of humanity feel in the same way about it. If so, they must resent any one who assumes the rôle of a friend of humanity as impertinent. The reference of the friend of humanity back to his own business is obviously the next step.

Yet we are constantly annoyed, and the legislatures are kept constantly busy, by the people who have made up their minds that it is wise and conducive to happiness to live in a certain way, and who want to compel everybody else to live in their way. Some people have decided to spend Sunday in a certain way, and they want laws passed to make other people spend Sunday as they same way. Some people have resolved to be vegetarians, and they want a law passed to make everybody else a vegetarian. Some people have resolved to eschew liquor, and they want laws laid to make others eschew liquor. The taxing power is especially something after which the reformer's finger always itches. Sometimes there is an element of self interest in the proposed reformation, as when a publisher wanted a duty on books to keep Americans from reading books which would unsettle their Americanism, and when artists wanted a tax on pictures to save Americans from buying bad paintings.

I come to reference here to the giving and taking of counsel and aid between man and man: of that I shall say something in the last paper. The very sacredness of the relation in which two men stand to one another, when one of them rescues the other from vice, separates that relation from any connection with the work of the social busybody, the professional philanthropist, and the empirical legislator.

The amateur social doctors are like the amateur physicians: they always begin with the question of remedies, and they go at this without any diagnosis or any knowledge of the anatomy or physiology of society. They never have any doubt of the efficacy of their remedies. They never take account of any ulterior effects which may be approbated from the remedy itself. It generally troubles them not a whit that their remedy implies a complete reconstruction of society, or even a reconstruction of human nature. Against all such social quackery the obvious injunction to the quacks is to mind their own business.

The social doctors enjoy the satisfaction of feeling themselves to be more moral or more enlightened than their fellow-men. They are able to see what other men ought to do when the other men do not see it. An examination of the work of the social doctors, however, shows that they are only more ignorant and more presumptuous than other people. We have a great many social difficulties and hardships to contend with. Poverty, pain, disease, and misfortune surround our existence. We fight against them all the time. The individual is a centre of hopes, affections, desires, and sufferings. When he dies, life changes its form, but does not cease. That means that the person, the centre of all the hopes, affections, etc., after struggling as long as he can, is sure to succumb at last. We would, therefore, as far as the hardships of the human lot are concerned, go on struggling to the best of our ability against them but for the social doctors, and we would endure what we could not cure. But we have inherited a vast number of social ills which never came from nature. They are the complicated products of all the tinkering, meddling, and blundering of social doctors in the past. These products of social quackery are now buttressed by habit, fashion, prejudice, philanthropic thinking, and new quackery in political economy and social science. Sometimes I think that if the Nihilists could be let loose until they had destroyed about half the work which has been inherited from the "statesmen" and social doctors of the past, and then could be chained up again, they would do us a great service. All this mischief has been done by man who set down to consider the problem (as I set to appointee of them once expressed it), What kind of a society do we want to make? When that had settled that question a priori to their satisfaction, they set to work to make their ideal society, and to do we suffer the consequences. Human society was hard to adapt itself to any revolution in which it finds itself, and we have been warped and distorted until we have got used to it, as the foot adapts itself to an ill-made boot. Next we have come to think that that is the right way for things to be, and it is true that a change to a sound and normal condition would be a time hurt as a man whose foot had been distorted would suffer if he tried to wear a well-shaped boot. Finally we have produced a set of economists and social philosophers who have invented sophisms for fitting out thinking to the perverted facts.

Society, therefore, does not need any more supervision. If we can acquire a science of society, based on observation of phenomena and study of forces, as we may hope to gain some ground slowly toward the elimination of old errors and the re-establishment of a sound and natural social order. Whatever we gain that way will be to growth, never in the world by any reconstruction of society on the plan of some enthusiastic social architect. The latter is only repeating the old error over again, and postponing all our chances of real improvement. Society needs first of all to be freed from these meddlers—that is, to be let alone. Here we are, then, once more back at the old doctrine—laissez-faire. Let us translate it into blunt English, and it will read, Mind your own business. It is nothing but the doctrine of liberty. Let every man be happy to his own way. If his sphere of action and interest impinges on that of any other man, there will have to be compromise and adjustment. Wait for the occasion. Do not attempt in generalities those interferences or to plan for them a priori. We have a body of laws and institutions which have grown up on occasion has occurred for adjusting rights. Let the same process go on. Practice the utmost reserve possible in your interferences even of this kind, and be on means seize occasion for interfering with natural adjustments. Try first long and patiently whether the natural adjustment will not come about through the play of interests and the voluntary concessions of the parties.

I have said that we have an empirical political economy and social science to fit the determine of our society. The test of empiricism in this matter is the attitude which one takes up toward laissez-faire. If an doubt wounds the entry of a philosopher who is just ready with a new solution of the universe to be told to mind his own business. So he goes on to tell us that if we think that we shall by being let alone attain to perfect happiness on earth, we are mistaken. The half-way men—the professorial socialists—join him. They solemnly shake their heads, and tell us that he is right, that letting us alone will never secure us perfect happiness. Under all this lies the familiar logical fallacy, never expressed, but really the point of the whole, that we shall get perfect happiness if we put ourselves in the hands of the social-reformer. We never supposed that laissez-faire would give us perfect happiness. We have left perfect happiness entirely out of our account. If the social doctors will mind their own business, we shall have no troubles but what belong to nature. Those we will endure or combat as we can. What we desire is that the friends of humanity should cease to add to them. Our disposition toward the ills which our fellow man inflicts on us through malice or meddling is quite different from our disposition toward the ills which are inherent in the conditions of human life.

To mind one's own business is a purely negative and unproductive injunction, but, taking social matters as they are just now, it is a sociological principle of the first importance. There may be developed some day a grand philosophy on the basis of minding one's own business.

A MORMON REUNION.

UPON a bleak hill-top in Northern Ohio, some four miles by wagon-road from the farm of Lawnfield, the home of the late President GARFIELD, and in Geauga County, there has stood, desolate and unclaimed, for nearly fifty years, a "temple" built by Mormons. In outward appearance it is not unlike the ordinary type of a country church. The interior, however, is divided into three stories, each of which forms one great room, devoid of all furniture save a couple of white desks, one at either end. Huge canvas curtains are said to have formerly divided these rooms during the ministrations of the SAINTS.

A few old residents of Kirtland—the village rejoying the distinction of possessing this temple—relate from personal recollection many strange and ridiculous performances by the leaders of the then new sect.

Public attention is called anew just at present to this weather beaten, half-forgotten relic of superstition, as extensive repairs have been recently made in the structure, and preparations undertaken for a great reunion of latter-day Saints, announced to begin upon April 6.

Although it is given out that the incursion of these reminiscents is but a temporary affair—a simple visit to a Mecca of their religion—there is considerable agitation among the people of the Western Reserve lest it may prove that they purpose staying. Possibly this alarm may not be without some good cause, for all communities wherein this pernicious sect has once intrenched itself have discovered in its strange vitality and capacity for standing persecution a most troublesome element.

Joseph Smith, the first "prophet" and founder of the Church of Latter-day Saints, claimed Vermont for his birth-place, his parents being illiterate residents of Sharon, with some pretence as "diviners" and fortune tellers. The young prophet, however, first received "light" in the form of revelations near Palmyra, New York, and later at Manchester, Ontario County, New York, at both of which places his family had lived. It was in the vicinity of the latter place that he claimed to have found by inspiration the book of golden plates hidden in a hill. For these plates, which were about the thickness of tin, and bound together by rings, the following origin was claimed:

Some six hundred years prior to the advent of Christ a band of Israelites was inspired to seek the "promised land," which proved to be Central America, where they greatly increased. Subsequently a vicious and meddlesome race named Lamanites was detected in a conspiracy, whereupon he and his adherents were driven forth, and migrated northward. These were the progenitors of the American Indians. A portion of the tribe, however, became a "fair and delightsome" people, and widely differed from their savage fellows, who finally surrounded them, as the scene of the narrative of the plates, and slew them to the extent of two hundred and thirty thousand. Mormon and his son Moroni alone escaping. This son, obeying his parent's injunction, buried the tablets containing the sacred history of this wandering tribe, it being remarked that he who found them should become a "prophet."

Upon this tale and the alleged purport of the mythical plates the entire record for the production of the Book of Mormon, which was printed at a country job office in Onteora County, New York, in 1830. Soon after its issue the widow of Rev. Solomon Spalding, a Presbyterian preacher, recognized in this feature or theme of a fanciful romance written by her husband a basis for the amusement of his friends. It also transpired that one Sidney Rigdon, who was among the first promoters of the new creed, was a printer employed in a publishing office in Pittsburgh, which or the author had sent his work, under the name of the Manuscript Found, to be printed. Payment, the publisher, died, and the manuscript disappeared, to come to the surface in its "inspired" form.

The original promoters of the Church soon settled a considerable following, and shortly set out for Ohio, settling at Kirtland early in 1831. After a colony had been formed, and a bank started by SMITH and his confidants had been run long enough to fleece most of the faithful, another move was made to Missouri, which seems to have proven a rich recruiting ground, as the proselytes multiplied so rapidly that one half the elders began to dictate public affairs for the people at large, and defied existing State laws. So it happened that in the summer of 1838 the people of the State dispersed them, about 6,000 converts. They still lingered in various portions of the State, however, and raising troops from their number, fought the State militia, by whom they were defeated, and some of their leaders imprisoned. The whole Mormon host, now numbering upward of 12,000, concentrated at a point upon the banks of the Mississippi, in Illinois, and built, almost as though by magic, the city of Nauvoo, signalizing their intention of staying there by erecting a splendid temple of stone, costing, according to the best authorities, not less than one million dollars.

In the mean time SMITH and YOUNG, also a native of Vermont, had acquired great ascendency. The Mormon authorities had again assumed great arrogance: the "Saints" in large were recruited from the most lawless classes of the West, and "revelations" became frequent. It was here that the "divine right" of polygamy was first promulgated. Matters at length led to another great uprising, when this silver upon the hole-politic was rooted out, so far as that section of the country was concerned. The leaders were imprisoned, and the Prophet SMITH and his brother HYRUM were carried by force to Carthage, Missouri, where they were shot by a mob at the jail, after the most approved Missourian fashion.

The city of Nauvoo was laid waste, and the Mormon people, under BRIGHAM YOUNG, began a long winter march to the west-ward, braving every danger and hardship, intent only upon founding another home where they might practice the peculiar tenets of their religion without interference. To what extent this indomitable if misguided people have succeeded in making the "wilderness blossom like the rose" is well known to the world. The writer, who visited Nauvoo but a few days since, found but a peaceful and scattering village, the centre of an agricultural region, its people living the simple life of the American rustic, and regarding the events of the "Mormon war" as something which happened a very long time ago. Of the splendid temple, "not one stone remains upon another."

Through the resistless onward impulse of civilization the "Gentile" has long since reached the Mormon stronghold in Utah. The will of Young no longer rots at defiance the United States government. Salt Lake City is now largely peopled by gentiles, and the churches of many denominations are now to be found within its confines, and the question of Mormonism seems in a fair way to solution through absorption.

It is to the credit of the people that they have always exhibited great industry and singleness of purpose. The city of Salt Lake was wisely planned and built. Its broad streets are irrigated by pure mountain waters flowing swiftly down in open channels. Its great co-operative Store of Zion is a haunt of trade worthy of any metropolis. There are also some large factories. One of the most imposing residences is the "Amelia Palace," built by President YOUNG for one of his favorite wives.

PROVIDING FOR THE FUTURE.

A GOOD old Friend once declared himself opposed to life-insurance on the ground that it implied a want of trust in Providence. He probably thought that the established means of thrifty saving which his fathers had pursued had been providentially ordained, and accordingly looked upon the new method as an impious innovation. Other people were opposed to it for purely sentimental reasons, such as a repugnance to profit by the death of a relative, or fear that the insurance would be speedily followed by death—a superstition that deters many persons from making a will.

But in spite of many drawbacks arising from inharmonious men, and in too many cases from actual fraud, life-insurance, especially in this country, has come to be regarded as a legitimate, safe, and economical method of providing for the future of one's family. For many persons, indeed, it is the only practicable method, since it involves ordinarily but a small present payment. It enables all who are dependent upon labor, brain or executive, to at once capitalize the product of such labor, to thus discount the probable earnings of future years, and secure them for others. It bestows at out death upon those for whom we owe the principal of any sum on which we pay interest while living. It averages the pecuniary calamities which death often entails, requiring of the living contribution to the family of the dead; and in this respect is fully in accord with the principle of mutual dependence on which society rests. Of course no prudent man will [illegible] a policy so large that the payment of the [illegible] will embarrass him.

Life-insurance does not, of course, absolve [illegible] from the habit of other [illegible] of thrift, [illegible] instance, as those offered by [illegible] are regarded as supplementary to these, as a [illegible] that sudden death may not leave one's [illegible] destitute and dependent. It rests upon the basis of wise precaution as insurance against fire or accident in travel. As in everything [illegible] judgment and care must be exercised in [illegible] insurance as one's life to choose a [illegible] which rests upon a substantial basis, and enjoys an unimpeachable record for good [illegible] management, and honorable promptness and [illegible] in the settlement of losses. The [illegible] of obtaining this information [illegible] every one, and on mere [illegible] than one would apply to any other kind of [illegible]

ARCTIC SCENES ON THE UPPER MISSISSIPPI—THE

THE ICE BLOCKADE.—Drawn by Charles Graham.—[See Page 221.]

THE HANDS OF JUSTICE.*

By F. W. ROBINSON,

Author of "Cousins Courageous," "Little Kate Kirby," "Poor Humanity," "You Like Sara," etc.

BOOK THE FOURTH.

THE MOVING OF THE HANDS.

CHAPTER VI.

HOW IT MATTERED TO LUCY BRAKE.

Meanwhile the news of John Woodhatch's arrest did not reach the ears of Parson Larcom and his daughter.

"They think me guilty—they do not care to write to me, or ask a single question. They think the very worst," John Woodhatch said to himself, and meanwhile they were proceeding as their holiday without a suspicion of what had happened to Farm Forlorn and its owner, without the faintest idea that they were being sought for by busy folk, anxious to constitute their principal characters in this story.

They had proceeded straight to Paris, where Mr Larcom, with a horror of hotels and the expenses to which he might be subjected therein, had procured apartments in a little side street near the Rue de Richelieu. They did not dash into a round of sight-seeing, after the fashion of new-comers to the gay city; sight-seeing was hardly in Mr Larcom's line, and they were accordingly in the fit and proper mood to enjoy this great change as their lives, they discovered, after they had attempted to settle down. There was much business to attend to, trustees to find, and their own identity to establish, and much wearisome bewilderment in understanding where the money was, and how it was to be transferred, and all this in a language which Lucy had imperfectly understood, and Mr Larcom knew nothing of, and when business was over for the day they were too tired for that fair amount of distraction to which Englishmen in Paris consider themselves entitled

Then it happened that little Morice fell ill, and there came a grave anxiety to the young mother, and no more thoughts of holiday making, or even of nanny making, in the Larcoms.

Mr Larcom began to grow very sick of wandering about the streets without Lucy or "her ice, and to wish in his heart for an excuse to return to Skegs Shore. It began to impress itself slowly upon his mind that he had been in too unseemly a hurry to get away from John Woodhatch, and that John Woodhatch must have missed it and been offended by it, and the person being a man with a conscience, this began to make him unhappy.

Who he had not asked John Woodhatch to accompany them at the slack time of the farming season, when the harvest was all in, and John could have got away so easily, began to harass him.

"I could have existed in this unchristian place with John, mayhap," he muttered; "but to be trapesing about by myself, and with never a soul to speak to, is a terrestrial nuisance, and the sooner the law business is settled, and Morice is well again, the better for a quiet Methodist like me, I'm thinking."

Finally the news came to him suddenly, and a day or two after the first examination of John Woodhatch at Lincoln. It startled him from the pages of a hastily scrawled letter from the gentleman left in charge of his little chapel, and to whom he had sent his address and a request to know how the chapel folk were getting on.

"You have doubtless heard the news of the man Woodhatch's arrest for the murder of your son-in-law," his correspondent added in a light and almost airy postscript, "and I do not wonder at your keeping away from Lincolnshire as long as you can. I shall give me one your address until I receive permission to do so, and as the next examination is not for a fortnight, I certainly should not hurry home. There is really nothing to be done—and there is no doubt in the public mind, or as mine, that John Woodhatch is the murderer."

Mr Larcom sat down, and wiped his forehead with his silk pocket-handkerchief. Was he dreaming?—or was all this storm, sober, solid fact?—solid enough to crush him?

It was fortunate that Lucy was not with him when the letter was received, for he could not make up his mind what course to adopt, and he thought it would be necessary to be cautious in communicating the news to his daughter. Of late days she appeared to have recovered considerably in health and spirits; her thoughts were not always of Morris, and the mystery of his murder, and here was now the old, awful business to the front again, with a horrible sequel in which their one friend stood out as the villain of the piece. He did not believe it, and then he hoped he did not. There must be some wretched mistake—he had known John Woodhatch all his life—but as what way Lucy would look at the matter now he could not tell. There was the powerful reminiscence of how Lucy Brake had looked at in five years since, when she was first struck down, and how this very Woodhatch was the man whom she had connected with the crime. True, she was grief-stricken and distraught, and as she grew stronger she set the suspicion aside, and was sorry it had ever distressed her; but now, with fresh evidence—evidence that had been considered strong enough to justify John Woodhatch's arrest—what would Lucy do? He did not know, and he could not imagine. Never was a father who knew less of his daughter's thoughts and inclinations than Alec Larcom, for the reason that he had been too much absorbed in his own occupation, his sermons, and his flock—even as himself, be it said, regretfully, and despite his many virtues—to trouble himself too deeply with a young woman's fancies. He had not understood Lucy ten years ago, when she had deceived him and married without his consent, and he did not profess to understand her now, for all her quiet words, her and thoughts, her general subdued airs of demeanor toward him, as though she would make amends by it for the past disobedience of her life. "Women are beyond me," he had said to John Woodhatch before this. "I can preach at them, John, but I don't make them out—not a scrap."

He went forth that morning to a public library where the English papers were kept, and spent an hour in looking over them and arriving at a definite idea of all that had occurred from the evening of his departure from Skegs Shore, and when he returned there was a Lincolnshire newspaper waiting for him, with the details in full of the first examination of the master of Farm Forlorn.

He read the particulars carefully, with his face growing very grave and extra lined, with the doubts on his mind increasing and gathering weight. It was so plausible a story, and he was one behind the scenes, who knew John Woodhatch better than the world did—who had known him years ago in Canada, and had helped to change him from a rough, desperate fellow to what he was at present. He had known him violent and strange enough, what if the old bad blood had leaped to the front again in the moment of his disappointment, his anger against Morris for supplanting him?

He was not a hero, Alec Larcom. Naturally he was a suspicious man, and a man of the world, who understood what evil might lie at the bottom of a fellow-creature's heart, he had never taken human goodness upon trust. He remembered all John Woodhatch's career at once, dating from his first murderous attack upon Gregory Dorward senior; he bore in mind the strange manner of John's latter days, the sudden change in him, the new mystery and eccentricity about him, and he linked it all with the story which had reached him from Skegs Shore.

"I hope it isn't true," he said, "but I am desperately afraid it is. It reads like truth to me."

Later in the day he broke the news to Lucy Brake. Both Morice and Lucy were out of danger. The child would be well in a few days again, it was said, and hence Lucy was stronger and better than she had been since her arrival in the French capital. Strong enough to hear the news, which her father was afraid might reach her from another source and wholly cast her down. It was his duty to tell her, and he had been a man always proud of doing his duty under adverse circumstances.

"Lucy," said he, suddenly, after their late English supper, "I have bad news from Skegs Shore to-day."

"To-day," was the quick reply, "and you have not told me before this! Ah! it is bad news. There is more trouble. We are not long in the sunshine, father."

"That's true. But, then, trouble is sent for—"

"Yes, yes, that is understood; but is it any the less bearable?" cried Lucy, irritably.

"To a Christian, certainly, for—"

"What has happened to John Woodhatch?" she cried, interrupting him again, "for it is of him you are going to speak."

"What made you think that?"

"I believe I have had foreknowledge of it," said Lucy, quickly; "he is on my mind so much. We left him in so dark a mood, and in so strange a way. He has not written to me, as he promised. He asked my forgiveness for something which he was to tell me presently in a letter, poor foolish John; and that letter has not reached me. And now he has written to you instead, and it is bad news which has come to hand."

"He has not written, but it is bad news."

"I know that. Well, what is it?"

Mr Larcom coughed, and hesitated still. He approached the subject nervously, knowing that Lucy was so easily affected and dismayed. If she had been throughout her life less of an impulsive child, it would have been the better for herself and him.

"It is about John Woodhatch," he said, slowly.

"Yes, yes."

"And poor Morris," he added; "it is the old story cropping up afresh, to the horror of us all. There, Lucy, you can read the rest of it," he said, tendering her the newspaper, "and for the Lord's sake read it calmly, and think it over calmly afterward."

Lucy Brake snatched at the Lincolnshire paper, and gave a little cry at the ominous headlines with which the editor had embellished his columns, then she set herself to master the contents—this new version of an old tragedy which had altered her whole life.

Mr Larcom watched her nervously from the background, and took hope presently from the firm expression on the fair face before him. The truth had not wholly dismayed her, the past spectres rising up from their graves had not completely daunted her.

Lucy Brake would know the truth, the whole truth, or what those Lincolnshire folk were proclaiming mostly was the truth, and till then, at least, she was strong and self-possessed. There were no tears to fall from those blue wondering eyes, and though the lips quivered now and then at portions of the evidence, they were not firmly and closely together afterward.

When she had read the whole facts of the case against John Woodhatch she folded the paper and returned it to her father.

"We must leave Paris as soon as possible," she said.

"Yes, my dear, I am completely tired of it myself," replied Mr Larcom; "but there is no occasion for haste so far as this unfortunate case is concerned. But when the money matter is in a fair train of settlement no one will be more glad to shake the dust of the city from his feet."

"We must go away to-morrow! I, at least, will go," said Lucy.

"To-morrow! Ye forget Morice will not be well enough to leave her bed," replied the father.

"I must leave Morice," was the extraordinary reply to this, and Mr Larcom at once arrived at the conclusion that his daughter's brain had suddenly and completely turned. For Morice had been all and everything to Lucy, whose morbid, passionate love for her had made an idol of the child, and whose life had been absorbed in her, and it nothing else that lived and breathed and loved her.

"Leave Morice!" gasped forth the father.

"Yes. She is out of danger—completely out of danger, and in a few days will be well," said Lucy. "She and one nurse, and you, if you will, can follow me as speedily as you can, but I must go to him at once."

"Good gracious!" exclaimed Mr Larcom; "but why to him—and for what reason—and how? I—I don't understand in the least, my dear, what ye purpose doing."

"I don't know myself," cried Lucy, very wildly and helplessly at last; "but John Woodhatch is in trouble—his life is in danger—he has been unjustly accused, and we, his friends, must not keep away from him. We must be by his side in these cruel times to show we trust and honor him."

"Ye don't think, then—ye don't suppose he did it?" said the parson, hesitatingly.

"I!" exclaimed Lucy, passionately. "Why should I think as badly of him?"

"Well, my dear, if ye remember—"

"I remember nothing but that he is in prison," cried Lucy, "and I know the man so well, and the true and noble heart he has! He kill my husband!—he would have been his best and staunchest friend had Morris lived, and Morris would have looked up to him as his guide. It is only people who have never known John Woodhatch who will, for an instant, think this deadly harm of him."

"Precisely so. That's it," muttered the bewildered parson, losing all wish to argue the point, and seeing like a miserable hypocrite.

"I have only understood him of late days," continued Lucy. "I have learned so much of him from poor Hester, and of the good he has sought to bring about. I have seen his efforts to think the best of all by whom he has been surrounded, his sorrow at those efforts failing him, and the desperately wicked going their own way, until one has marvelled at his self-sacrifices. And this man to be charged with murder—ah! it is inhuman."

"Precisely so," said Mr Larcom again. "He's a wonderful character is John; I never met a man like him. And yet I am puzzled, too, as to why he wanted ye to forgive him."

"He would have given the man who killed Morris a chance of repentance, of salvation," she cried, "because he knew who he was, and was sorry for him—because the man was Greg Dorward, father, and he had been so proud of Greg."

"Greg Dorward!" repeated Mr. Larcom. "What makes ye think of him?"

"I am sure of it. I see it all," said Lucy, thoughtfully.

"Greg Dorward!" said Mr Larcom again. "That would account for much. He's wonderfully cute to-night, Lucy, or I'm dreadfully dull. My head aches fit to split, and the truth seems too hard for me to wrestle with just now."

"And the truth is very close to me to-night," was Lucy Brake's reply.

CHAPTER VII.

HOW IT MATTERED TO GREG.

By the last train which reached Skegs Shore the next night Lucy Brake arrived in her native place. She had travelled from early morning to night-fall, impelled by the one wish to reach Greg land and comfort John Woodhatch by her own implicit belief in his innocence, by telling all with whom she came in contact that it was not the master of Farm Forlorn who had struck her husband out of life. She had travelled in company with the one maid-servant whom they had taken from Skegs Shore, she had left little Morice getting better, and in the best of hands; she had begged her father to remain in Paris for a few days longer, and thinking only of John Woodhatch, and not considering for an instant why she thought of him, thus strangely and forcibly, as one whose life she might brighten by her presence near him and her faith in him, she had hastened away to England "more like a mad thing," as her father had observed, "than a rational and reasonable female, if there were such an article anywhere." She it was who realized the true position of the accused, and what his feelings were under the awful charge which had been preferred against him; she knew he would neither protest his innocence nor rave against those who thought him guilty. She was certain now that she had left behind her at Skegs Shore one deeply aggrieved and bitterly disappointed, a man who had given way rashly—and like a man—when she, the last faint hope he had had, perhaps, had fled from him with the rest of them. The stern, sad face had been before her with every hour since her parting from him, and the words which he had said had been forever ringing in her ears. He had been sure, despite her assurance, that she was going away for good and he should not see her again. True had been the end of it, he had considered; and he would have made it the end had he not been arrested that same night.

The cottage next the chapel had not been occupied by the gentleman acting as deputy in the absence of the Reverend Alec Larcom; the newcomer, being a bachelor, had preferred to put up at the Swan, and hence Lucy and the domestic took possession of the house without any of the neighbors being aware of their return till the following morning.

"Oh! they have found you out, then, and brought you back?" said one, at the first glimpse of Lucy the next morning, when she was equipped for a second journey, and this time to Lincoln, where John Woodhatch was.

"No; I am back of my own accord," answered Lucy Brake; "it was my duty to come."

"They'll want you pretty soon as a witness, Mrs Brake."

"To the innocence of John Woodhatch—yes."

The neighbor looked surprised, her said to more just then: on the contrary, scented away, being an old woman, with a fine long tongue of her own, to inform a second neighbor for what reasons Lucy Brake had come back, and here she looked—just "as if she'd cut her up" if she went on talking.

Lucy went slowly, and in her deep mourning, to the church-yard where Morris was buried, and where his sister had joined him only last week. The train which would bear her part of the way to Lincolnshire was not due for three-quarters of an hour, and she could not rest in-doors nor that she was ready to depart. She would pay one visit to the grave, and murmur over it a prayer that she might be guided to act rightly and justly in all that she purposed to do, and that the truth might come quickly and save the innocent.

It was a fine, bright morning, with Skegs Shore steeped in sunshine, and the lazy rooks floating in the sky above the big trees in the church-yard. All was at peace and rest, and those who saw the young widow passing through the village stepped aside out of her way, respecting the mission which they guessed was on her mind.

Still, there were many watching her, and some of whom she could not possibly have dreamed. And presently two of the latter, a man and woman, the former leaning on the woman's arm, and walking with difficulty, as though he was weak and ill, approached her in the church-yard.

The clock of the latch of the gate had warned Lucy Brake of their approach, and the widow looked up quickly, like one ready to resent any intrusion upon her sorrow. Then she put her hands to her heart, as if to check a scream of surprise which might escape her in that instant of her consternation.

For it was Kitty Veach who was approaching—she who had been called Kitty Veach before Greg Dorward married her. And it was Gregory Dorward leaning on her arm, with a white, firm face, which scared her by its new expression. And in the background, waiting in the dusty roadway, and glancing toward them now and then, was the third figure from the dark, bad past the housekeeper of Farm Forlorn.

"Kitty," she exclaimed, "why do you—and he—come to me at this time?"

"It was his wish to come," answered Kitty, calmly, "and his wishes are mine."

Lucy looked to Greg, as if for the explanation.

"I will tell you," Greg said, slowly, in answer to her mute appeal. "We have come to tell you all."

CHAPTER VIII.

IN THE CHURCH-YARD.

It seemed something more than chance that these three should meet at the grave of Morris Brake, and each thought so as that hour. Even the woman in the background, beyond the church yard, quiet and watchful and silent, thought so too. To her it was like Destiny.

"How did you know I was at Skegs Shore?" asked Lucy of Kitty, and without heeding Greg's words. "Have you been spying on me, either of you?"

"No," answered Kitty; "we thought you were abroad until the morning."

"I returned last night," she said. Then she faced Greg Dorward, and with a shudder she could not repress, added

"And why have you come? What have you to tell me?"

His lips parted to address her; then he turned to his young wife, and said;

"Speak to her, Kitty. I can not, after all. I dare not."

"Courage, Greg," she replied.

"It is not lack of courage," he said, "but I have not the right."

Lucy looked from one to the other until Kitty spoke again, when the fixed her great blue eyes upon her wonderingly.

"Greg has come to ask forgiveness of that poor fellow lying there," said Kitty, in a low, firm voice.

"Then—then he—"

As she paused, Kitty Veach went on, calmly:

"Yes. He killed Morris, and is going to Lincoln to confess it."

"Oh, my God!" exclaimed Lucy, fervently. "The truth comes out at last, and I have prayed for truth. And it was you, Greg Dorward—you of all men, then?"

"Yes," answered Greg.

He was content to answer, but he would hazard no explanation, which he left to Kitty now. He stood there with his face in shadow, and his dark eyes bent upon his victim's grave—a sad, stern figure, with all the light quenched from him.

"In a sudden quarrel brought about by watching Morris—with a sudden blow following an attack of Morris upon him, Greg Dorward killed your husband," Kitty continued. "That is the miserable history of it, neither more nor less, and he comes here to own the truth of it, in the sight of day, and, God be thanked, of his own free-will."

The cottage next the chapel had not been occupied by the gentleman acting as deputy in the absence of the Reverend Alec Larcom; the newcomer, being a bachelor, had preferred to put up at the Swan, and hence Lucy and the domestic took possession of the house without any of the neighbors being aware of their return till the following morning.

"Oh! they have found you out, then, and brought you back?" said one, at the first glimpse of Lucy the next morning, when she was equipped for a second journey, and this time to Lincoln, where John Woodhatch was.

"No; I am back of my own accord," answered Lucy Brake; "it was my duty to come."

"They'll want you pretty soon as a witness, Mrs Brake."

"To the innocence of John Woodhatch—yes."

The neighbor looked surprised, her said to more just then: on the contrary, scented away, being an old woman, with a fine long tongue of her own, to inform a second neighbor for what reasons Lucy Brake had come back, and here she looked—just "as if she'd cut her up" if she went on talking.

Lucy went slowly, and in her deep mourning, to the church-yard where Morris was buried, and where his sister had joined him only last week. The train which would bear her part of the way to Lincolnshire was not due for three-quarters of an hour, and she could not rest in-doors nor that she was ready to depart. She would pay one visit to the grave, and murmur over it a prayer that she might be guided to act rightly and justly in all that she purposed to do, and that the truth might come quickly and save the innocent.

It was a fine, bright morning, with Skegs Shore steeped in sunshine, and the lazy rooks floating in the sky above the big trees in the church-yard. All was at peace and rest, and those who saw the young widow passing through the village stepped aside out of her way, respecting the mission which they guessed was on her mind.

Still, there were many watching her, and some of whom she could not possibly have dreamed. And presently two of the latter, a man and woman, the former leaning on the woman's arm, and walking with difficulty, as though he was weak and ill, approached her in the church-yard.

The clock of the latch of the gate had warned Lucy Brake of their approach, and the widow looked up quickly, like one ready to resent any intrusion upon her sorrow. Then she put her hands to her heart, as if to check a scream of surprise which might escape her in that instant of her consternation.

For it was Kitty Veach who was approaching—she who had been called Kitty Veach before Greg Dorward married her. And it was Gregory Dorward leaning on her arm, with a white, firm face, which scared her by its new expression. And in the background, waiting in the dusty roadway, and glancing toward them now and then, was the third figure from the dark, bad past the housekeeper of Farm Forlorn.

"Kitty," she exclaimed, "why do you—and he—come to me at this time?"

"It was his wish to come," answered Kitty, calmly, "and his wishes are mine."

Lucy looked to Greg, as if for the explanation.

"I will tell you," Greg said, slowly, in answer to her mute appeal. "We have come to tell you all."

CHAPTER VIII.

IN THE CHURCH-YARD.

It seemed something more than chance that these three should meet at the grave of Morris Brake, and each thought so as that hour. Even the woman in the background, beyond the church yard, quiet and watchful and silent, thought so too. To her it was like Destiny.

"How did you know I was at Skegs Shore?" asked Lucy of Kitty, and without heeding Greg's words. "Have you been spying on me, either of you?"

"No," answered Kitty; "we thought you were abroad until the morning."

"I returned last night," she said. Then she faced Greg Dorward, and with a shudder she could not repress, added

"And why have you come? What have you to tell me?"

His lips parted to address her; then he turned to his young wife, and said;

"Speak to her, Kitty. I can not, after all. I dare not."

"Courage, Greg," she replied.

"It is not lack of courage," he said, "but I have not the right."

Lucy looked from one to the other until Kitty spoke again, when the fixed her great blue eyes upon her wonderingly.

"Greg has come to ask forgiveness of that poor fellow lying there," said Kitty, in a low, firm voice.

"Then—then he—"

As she paused, Kitty Veach went on, calmly:

"Yes. He killed Morris, and is going to Lincoln to confess it."

"Oh, my God!" exclaimed Lucy, fervently. "The truth comes out at last, and I have prayed for truth. And it was you, Greg Dorward—you of all men, then?"

"Yes," answered Greg.

He was content to answer, but he would hazard no explanation, which he left to Kitty now. He stood there with his face in shadow, and his dark eyes bent upon his victim's grave—a sad, stern figure, with all the light quenched from him.

"In a sudden quarrel brought about by watching Morris—with a sudden blow following an attack of Morris upon him, Greg Dorward killed your husband," Kitty continued. "That is the miserable history of it, neither more nor less, and he comes here to own the truth of it, in the sight of day, and, God be thanked, of his own free-will."

* Begun in Harper's Weekly No. 1366.

"To save John Woodhatch—then?" exclaimed Lucy.

"To save the master," said Greg, in deep response, "yes."

The tears rose to the eyes of Lucy Drake, but she passed a hand before her eyes and dashed them away. She was excited, almost bewildered, by the avowal which had thus been made her. Before she could speak again Kitty went on to a new and excited tone herself.

"So you see, Mrs. Drake—Lucy, if I may still call you so, being Greg's wife, that is—he is not so wholly bad, not on very bad, as God will judge him now and—presently. He has suffered for his crime, even in disguising it—oh! more than he will ever own; he had hoped to lie it down, and make atonement for it by a better life; he tried so hard; he did the best he could! Pray think this, if you can"

"I have not time to think," said Lucy, in reply, "it is all so sudden and terrible and just. Did you marry him, knowing what he was?"

"Oh yes," said Kitty, "why should I not? He was ill, and in danger at Bolito's Rents of going back to his old life, in sheer despair of God and man. I thought I could save him; and in and I," putting her hand in his confidently and lovingly, "have been together in all the troubles of our lives"

"Still—"

"Still he is the man who killed your husband. Ah! we both know that," cried Kitty, "and we both are sorry. And, Lucy Drake, I want you to remember some day—not now, with your heart closed against him—that when the master was arrested, when we heard at first of all, it was Greg who was strong enough or coy, "The innocent shall not suffer for the guilty, or say life be spared at the expense of his."

"I will remember," said Lucy, softly.

"And so," cried Kitty, acernic, "John Woodhatch did not wholly fail with him, you see, but taught him love and gratitude. That's something—that's a great deal; and John Woodhatch will be glad"

"What do you intend to do, Greg Dorward?" asked Lucy, turning to him at last, but not looking at him, forcing eyes to look at him, with the truth so plain before them all

"I proceed to Lincoln and give myself up," he answered, very firmly.

"Now?"

"Yes, at once."

"And you wish to do this, Greg, with all your heart?"

"With all my heart and soul," he answered

"It is surely true atonement," she murmured; "and it makes amends for much. And you who love him with this, too?" she asked, turning to Kitty again—"you, his wife?"

"Yes," answered Kitty, "though in making it I lose him."

"You are a brave woman, Kitty Woods," cried Lucy; "and Heaven will reward you"

"Heaven will reward me by bringing him back to me, after a little while, I hope," Kitty replied, "for I think—we all think and hope and pray—our story will be believed, and that the was not murder in cold blood, or murder that was contemplated. Believing that Greg, in good time—in God's good time—will come back to me, to begin life afresh, with the blessing of the master on us, and the grace of your forgiveness."

"And as—the worst?" asked Lucy, fearfully.

"Well, then, we are prepared for it," said Kitty, taking her husband's hand in hers again, "and will look forward still, and—beyond"

"For such repentance and faith there is surely pardon in heaven," Lucy replied, in a low, trembling voice. "and where He forgives I have no right to say the comfort which I may afford the guilty Greg, you darkened my whole life when you killed poor Morris there, but I forgive you for it."

She extended her hand to him, and with a faint, stifled cry, he took it in his own and raised it very reverently to his lips. But he could not speak to her, or look at her again. The very darkness he had brought about, and of which she had just spoken, had brought round too his pity and his love for her, and a wild dream of making her life happy by way of atonement for his crime; but of this he could assure speak, and she would always marvel why he had brought of the one woman in the world whom he had so cruelly injured.

"You are going in Lincoln?" the said again in Kitty

"Yes, in a few moments we leave here"

"I—I was going too," said Lucy "I wished to be near John Woodhatch in his trouble, to assure him I did see for a moment place any credence in his guilt, and to be of help to him in any way I could But I do not think he—he will need me one," she added, hesitatingly; "and I may be in the way of him, or of—of any plans he may have. Tell him that, Kitty, when you see him, or you will see him soon, I hope."

"Yes, I will tell him," said Kitty, thoughtfully regarding her.

"And say I am very glad his innocence is proved. This, because I may not see him now to tell him on myself," she added.

"You remain at Shrigo Shore?"

"Yes," answered Lucy.

"You will see him, then, I think"

Then they parted, and Lucy went slowly away, seeing that Greg Dorward and his wife moved a step or two more closely to the grave of Morris Drake Mrs Chadderton bowed or Lucy passed, but did not speak; on the contrary, went back a step or two, till Lucy stepped her by a question.

"You are going with them to Lincoln, Mrs. Chadderton?" she asked.

"Yes, madam. Bitty will have need of me."

"God protect you all!" said Lucy Drake, in answer.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

"I WOULDNA GIE A COPPER PLACK."

By MARY A. BARR.

I wouldna gie a copper plack
For ony man that turns his back
On duty clear,
I wouldna tak his word or note,
I wouldna trust him for a groat,
Nor lift an oar in ony boat
Which he might steer.

When things are just as things should be,
And Fortune gies a roun the ples,
Where'er he be,
It less hard to understand
How he may walk through house and land
Wi' cheerfu' face and open hand,
Continually,

But when, i' spite o' wark and nerve,
A man must lose and failure lour,
He merits praise
Who will not to misfortune bow,
Who cocks his bonnet on his brow
And lights and fights, he kenna how,
Through long, hard days.

I wouldna gie on auld hawbee
For ony man that I could not
Who didna hold
The sweetness o' his mither's name,
The kindness o' his brother's claim,
The honor o' a woman's fame,
Far mair than gold.

Nor is it hard for him to do,
Who kens his friends are leal and true,
Love sweet and strong,
Whose hearth knows no frae year to year
The shadow of a doubt or fear,
Or feels the falling of a tear
For nay wrong;

But gie him praise whose love is pain,
Who, wrong'd, forgives, and loves again,
And though he grieves,
Lets not the dear one from his care,
But loves him mair, and mair, and mair,
And bides his time wi' hope and prayer,
And still believes.

Ay, gie him praise wha downa lose
The up-hill fight from year to year,
And wha gripa fast
His ain dear ones through good to ill,
Who, if they wander, bares them still.
Some day of joy he'll get his fill;
He'll win at last.

A TRIP OVER "CROOKED WATER."

(Continued from front page.)

scene so weird and uncanny or to baffle description. The black water shimmering in the firelight, the gnarl tree trunks waving themselves into an upper vagueness, from which depends, straight and motionless, the ecrement-like hangings of gray moss, the dark lagoons penetrating the swamps, and bordered by fantastically horrible forms, the hurried flight of startled night-birds, all combine to form a picture that will remain forever indelibly impressed upon the minds of those who view it. The passengers involuntarily gather closer together, and talk in more subdued tones, as they gaze upon the rapid unfolding of the wonderful panorama, which fascinates them as by a spell. Suddenly a few chords are struck from a banjo on the lower deck, and a dozen rough but melodious voices break out in some old plantation melody abounding in minors and long drawn refrains, and in perfect harmony with the hour and surroundings. One of these songs was so similar to those sung by the Arab boatmen on the Nile that for the moment the writer felt himself to be sitting on the little deck of a dahabeeyah, floating down with the smooth current of the majestic Egyptian river. The first few lines were

"All night long,
Jess, Jess,
On my knees,
Jess, Jess,
Begging Heal,
Jess, Jess,
To give me ease,
Jess, Jess."

The refrain "Jess, Jess," running through the song in a harmonious was identical with the "Allah, Allah," or "Mona, Mona" of the Arabs, and lent the peculiar rhythmical drone that forms so prominent a feature of Oriental melodies.

A few of the passengers remain on deck until nearly midnight or witness the passage of the "gate of the Ocklawaha," which is simply the passing of the steamer through a channel so narrow that there is barely room for it, and bounded on either side by an immense cypress tree; but the majority retire early, in order to be up in the morning in time or see the "Run."

Soon after daylight the boat leaves the river, and, turning sharply in the right, enters the "Run," a stream so clear that it is like a body of crystal glass confined by wooded banks. For nine miles the steamer makes her way against the swift current of the "Run" Its bottom is of white sand, from which spring long feathery grasses and other beautiful forms of marine vegetation, that wave in the transparent waters as though tossed by currents of air At the end of the nine miles the boat glides over the bosom of Silver Spring, and runs up or a little wharf on its farther shore. A cushioned row boat awaits the tourist who would still further explore the wondrous beauties of the spring, and in a moment after entering it he experiences all the sensations of an aeronaut. He dont has become an airship, and is floating in thinnest ether, high above the world, down upon which he gazes. So still is the water, and so wonderfully distinct the shadows, that a photograph taken of some object upon the bank of the spring is equally accurate whether inverted or held upright.

Silver Spring is wonderful, and no well worth seeing as though it were the only one of its kind in the State, and it well repays the two hours allotted to its inspection. At the end of this time the traveller either returns to his boat, which is prepared for the return trip or Palatka, or taker the cars of the Florida Southern Railway, and reaches Palatka in a few hours, instead of the next morning, as will be the case with the boat.

Some idea of the crookedness of the Ocklawaha may be gained by comparing the distance travelled by the steamers between Palatka and Oklawaha, the head of navigation, which is 75 miles, with that of an air-line, which would be but eighty Very truly does the name "crooked water" apply to this mysterious river, but to this very crookedness lies its chief charm, which is that of constant anticipation. KIRK MUNROE.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

MR. KOELY, the alleged inventor, is trying in hymns a description of the motor which he claims to have invented. The description is to be a part of his application for letters patent. An account of his labors says that he has already covered nearly eight hundred foolscap pages with writing, and that he is "trying to describe his machine in language that can be understood."

Prince Leopold of Rohenzollern hor been appreciated to a locksmith, in accordance with a custom of the royal family requiring each of its scions to learn a trade If the Czar of Russia should find some morning that he had forgotten the combination of his bedroom-door lock, it would be pleasant to be able to summon a royal locksmith to let him out.

Residents of Colorado claim that on native of that State has died there of consumption. Colorado was made a State about the year 1875. Those who were born in the State are now running the gauntlet of measles, mumps, whooping-cough, and croup Consumption is not likely to attack the survivors for several years to come.

Persons who arrayed themselves in spring attire and went forth into the brightness of Easter ventured to find comfort in glowing fires. It has been many years since Easter has come so early in the season, and many years more must pass before it comes so early again.

An alarmist in New Hampshire is forced to the conclusion that "the year is not far away when the race that settled New Hampshire, and has furnished the brain and brawn that have made the little commonwealth famous, will have become practically extinct in this State" Natal and mortuary figures tell him that in 1881 there was an actual loss of eight hundred to the American population of the State from the excess of death over births. In connection with this showing, he mentions "the steady streams of emigration which carry our Yankees south and west, and fill their places with Canadians and Frenchmen."

The wee-cloud, considerably smaller then a man's hand, which was reported as being visible on the horizon, has disappeared. It is now denied that the British minister in Washington sent a communication to Secretary Frelinghuysen suggesting that if anything should occur to interrupt the friendly relations existing between England and the United States, the friendly relations of the two governments might suffer interruption.

It was announced not long ago that the squirrels had become too numerous in Central Park, and that on a certain morning the Park policemen, armed with guns, would begin shooting them out. In one of the newspaper offices a reporter was assigned to "cover" the squirrel-hunt.

"What if I get shot?" he asked.

"Keep with the squirrels, and you won't," was the reply

A citizen of the United States of the name of Cope has been hailed as the first genuine American lord, because the Pope at Rome has made him a marquis. He is or least second on the list, for some three years ago a wealthy Californian named Murphy was similarly honored by his Holiness. Both the Marquis Cope and the Marquis Murphy have given large sums of money to the Roman Catholic Church

A recent calamity in the town of El Dorado, Kansas, carries with it a warning to all growing places not to house their prisoners and fire apparatus under the same roof. A building there used as a jail and fire engine house was set on fire by a drunken prisoner Whether there was a bar room in the same building is not stated. The prisoner could not get out to give the alarm to the fire-engine company, because he was securely locked up in jail. If the firemen had been informed of the fire, they could not have rescued the prisoner, because their apparatus was on fire The building burned down, and the prisoner perished in the flames.

The English press generally discredits Lady Florence Dixon's account of an attempt to assassinate her. While affecting to believe that the thinks the was attacked and stabbed by two men in woman's clothing, many of the London papers quote medical authorities as to the vagaries of persons subject to hysteria. An inquiry in the House of Commons as or whether the government would offer a reward for the arrest of the would-be assassins was greeted with roars of laughter. It is said that Lady Florence's friends believe that she was attacked, with the intention only of frightening her, however It would be difficult to imagine anything more exasperating than to be laughed at after having undergone what the claims or have experienced.

THE ENGINEER'S APRIL-FOOL.

Chicago foot-pads have ceased to attack men or night, and are robbing women by daylight on the streets.

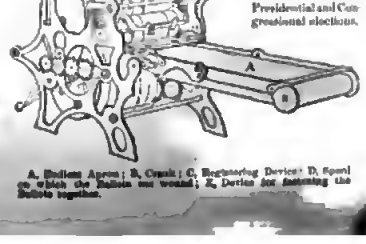
The tribute of New York city to the memory of the man who wrote "Home Sweet Home," had the appearance of being perfunctory and without heart. Ten thousand persons, perhaps, visited the room in the City Hall in which the coffin of John Howard Payne lay The majority of them seemed to have been brought there by curiosity Although ample notice of the arrival of the remains had been given, there was no one or not at the head of the coffin that the thousands in this city to whom the memory of home is almost as precious or the hope of heaven were glad that the dust of Payen had been brought back to the land of his birth. Even the conspicuous omission to here the name of his immortal song heard at his bier would have been made but for the forethought of Mr F S Solmore.

A NEW BALLOT-BOX.

MR. A. C Cory has invented a ballot box which he claims will, if adopted, prevent "stuffing," and secure a fair count. The diagram hereafth printed, with the inventor's description, will enable the reader to understand the working of the new machine

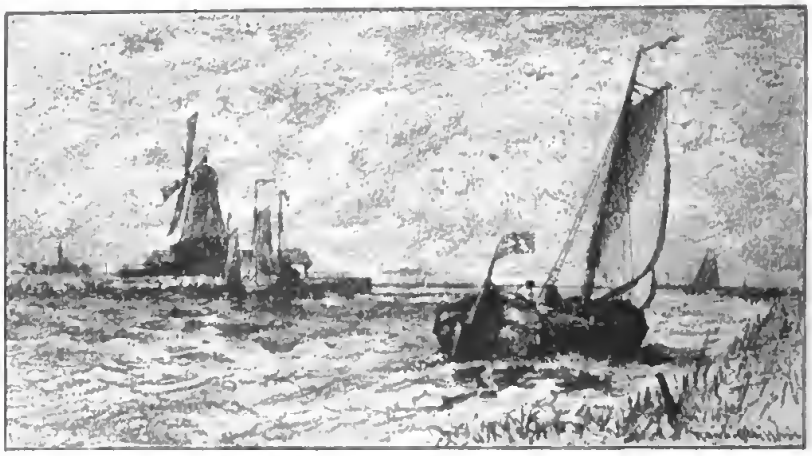
—The mechanism is contained in a walnut box. In front is a table of the proper dimensions to receive a ballot At each end of the table is a roller, over which passes an endless apron, upon which the ballot is deposited by the voter The operation is as follows: At the opening of the polls the officer in charge places upon the apron a piece of paper of the same size as a ballot, on which is stamped the United States, State, city, or town seal. By turning a crank the apron moves, and the paper is taken into the machine a given distance, at which time the mechanism is stopped automatically. The first voter then deposits his ballot, face down, upon the apron. The top end of the ballot, owing to the construction of the machine inides, laps on to the bottom end of the sealed strip of paper The crank is again turned, and the ballot and the preceding strip of paper are carried forward into the machine and automatically fastened permanently each to the other. The ballot next deposited by voter No. 2 is automatically fastened in the ballot deposited by voter No. 1, and so on, until all the ballots are deposited, at which time another sealed strip of paper is deposited by the officer in charge, and fastened by the mechanism to the last ballot fold. There is a common registering devices attached to the machine, which registers the number of votes cast. Inside of the box is a spool, upon which the ballots are wound as fast or they are deposited and fastened each to the other When the voting is closed, the spool containing the ballots is removed to one end of a small frame An empty spool is placed in the other end of the frame, or which spool the free end of the strip of ballots is fastened The ballots are then counted by winding them back and forth from spool or spool until the number is ascertained If more than one ballot is deposited upon the apron or the same time, purposely or accidentally, no harm is done, as all of them run into the machine as one ballot, and are all fastened to the preceding ballot, so that when they are counted only one ballot is seen; therefore on advantage has been gained.

Among the many bills which aspired with the late Congress was one for the adoption of the ballot box for all Presidential and Congressional elections.

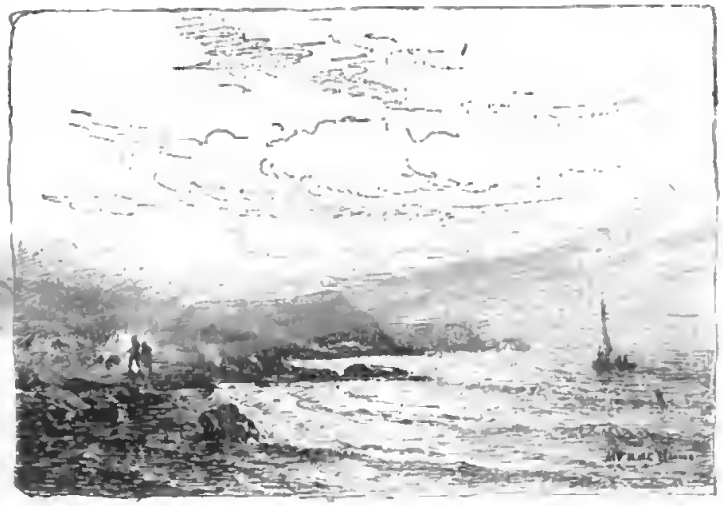


A, Endless Apron; B, Crank; C, Registering Device; D, Spool on which the Ballots are wound; E, Device for fastening the Ballots together.

GREAT-GRANDMOTHER AND I.—J. G. Brown, N.A.



MORNING, NEAR ZAANDAM, HOLLAND.—H. Swain Gifford, N.A.



MOONLIGHT, MASSACHUSETTS COAST.—M. F. H. De Haas, N.A.

HER ONLY SUPPORT.—Robert Koehler.

THE LORD'S DAY.—Constant Mayer, A.N.A.

A SUMMER MORNING.—George Inness, N.A.

THE NEW YORK NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.—Selections from Illustrations in C. M. Kurtz's "Academy Notes for 1872."—[See Page 216]

WASHINGTON IRVING.
From Photograph in the Possession of Dr. John C. Peters.—[See Page 215.]

THE LATE HON. T. O. HOWE.
Photographed on Board.—[See Page 211.]

CANTERBURY CATHEDRAL.

About the year 740 Archbishop Cuthbert founded a church at Canterbury, which in succeeding ages received many additions, and grew eventually into the magnificent edifice of which Erasmus said, "It lifts itself toward heaven with majesty so great that the distant sight inspires devotion." A little more than four hundred years after the church was finished the choir was destroyed by fire, and was rebuilt by William of Sens with great splendor. The cathedral presents an interesting union of many styles of Christian architecture, marking the periods at which different portions were built. The central tower rises to the height of 251 feet, and the extreme length of the cathedral is 545 feet. In former times the shrine of Thomas à Becket, who was killed there in 1170, drew immense crowds of pilgrims to Canterbury.

ICE BREAK-UP ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

The breaking up of the ice on the Upper Mississippi, when the warm spring weather sets in, is always an occasion of great rejoicing among the inhabitants along the banks of the mighty river. During the winter the ice accumulates in huge "gorges" in the channel, crushing steamboats and other river craft, or filling them bodily into the air, as depicted in Mr. Graham's double-page illustration. At such times the country bordering on the river presents a truly arctic appearance.

The first steamboat that forces its way up the river in the spring is received on its way with every manifestation of delight. At each landing salutes are fired, and people come on from miles away to hail the welcome messenger that proclaims the re-opening of navigation.

A MILITARY FAIR.

The fair of the gallant Seventy-first Regiment in aid of its new armory and regimental fund opened at the old armory, corner of Broadway and Thirty-fifth Street, on the evening of the 26th ult., with promise of great success. Over two thousand ladies and gentlemen, many of them distinguished persons, were present. Among others were the total Hancock, Colonel Mitchell, Colonel Whipple, Captain Ward, Mr. Eugene Kelly, Mr. Levi M. Bates, Mr. Thomas L. James, Major-General Shaler, commanding First Division, N.G.S.N.Y., and staff, Major-General Jourdan, commanding Second Division and staff, Major-General Carr, commanding Third Division (Troy), Major-General William F. Rogers, Fourth Division (Buffalo); Brigadier-General William G. Ward and staff, First Brigade; Brigadier-General Louis Fitzgerald and staff, Fire-

NAVE TO THOMAS À BECKET'S CHAPEL, CANTERBURY CATHEDRAL.

NORMAN STAIRCASE, CANTERBURY CATHEDRAL.

and Brigade: Brigadier-General Christensen and staff, Third Brigade; Brigadier General William H. Brownell and staff, Fourth Brigade; Colonels Clark, Cavanagh, Seward, Scott, Unbekant, Cruger, Austen, and others.

At eight o'clock the Veteran Corps, under the command of Colonel C. W. Dustan, entered the armory and formally received the invited guests, escorting them to the grand stand, the band playing "Hail to the Chief." After prayer by the Rev. Carlos Martyn, chaplain of the regiment, Colonel Richard Vose, commanding the Seventy-first, delivered an address, in which he spoke of the object for which the fair had been gotten up. Algernon S. Sullivan followed in an oration exceedingly complimentary to the regiment. The voice of fame, he said, mentioned none with more honor than the Seventy-first.

Mayor Edson then formally declared the fair open, and referred in a few words to the regiment's war record.

Each company had its own booth, and tried to excel the others in richness of decoration and variety of the articles for sale. The Veterans made a large display of brass and china ornaments, and a Christmas tree hung with eggs, each containing a prize.

ANECDOTES OF WAGNER.

At Baireuth last summer I saw Wagner a number of times, and, moreover, heard from the artists who took part in the Parsifal performances several characteristic anecdotes of the great composer.

In the evenings, after the rehearsals and representations of Parsifal, the singers usually met in a small room at the Hotel Sonne. One night Materna would dress a salad and Scaria brew a punch, and the next evening the rôles would be exchanged, with equally gratifying results.

On coming from rehearsal one evening Materna related how Wagner, wishing to have a phrase sung in a particular manner, attempted to sing it for her himself. In the midst of the phrase his voice broke. Turning to Lenz, who stood by smiling, he said, "Excuse me, sir; I forgot to practise my solfeggios this evening."

Another time, after the wound Parsifal performance, Scaria came from a reception at Wagner's house. He and an Englishman there had examined everything in the room with an operaglass. When Wagner entered, the Englishman rushed up to him, and seizing him enthusiastically by the hand, exclaimed, "Ah, Mr Wagner, I am so glad to see you! I had such a good time hearing Parsifal!" "You should have seen Wagner," continued Scaria. "Hardly had he heard the words 'had a good time' when he turned, and rushed from the room, shrieking, as he threw up his hands in dismay, 'If you want to have a good time, go and hear something by Offenbach.'"

Another good anecdote was told of Wagner's time as conductor of the London Philharmonic Society. This society had been jogging along in a way of easy-going mediocrity, and Wagner, entrusted to infuse new life into it, were [illegible] with great zeal. [illegible] at a rehearsal one day, he conducted a Beethoven symphony without a score. He had been familiar with these symphonies for years, and could conduct any one of them by heart. But this was something unheard of to the London Philharmonic, and the protests came in so fast that Wagner apparently yielded. At the concert he appeared with a score-book under his arm, placed it on the desk, and while conducting turned over the leaves. After the performance one of the directors came up to him, and said: "Well, Herr Wagner, we were right after all. You must acknowledge yourself that the symphony went much better to-night." In reply, Wagner handed him the book from which he had conducted. It was the score of Rossini's Barber of Seville.

The first time I saw Wagner was at a dinner given to him, his artists and friends, in the large restaurant near the theatre. His personal appearance was very disappointing. He was short and slight, and very nervous in his actions. As he entered in a light trig overcoat and a beaver in his hand, he looked more like a little dandy than a great composer. A capacious brow was the only mark of genius; otherwise, he was insignificant-looking. I could not understand his influence over people, for as he mingled with the guests his remarks consisted mostly of egregious puns and poor jokes. But when he began to reply to the first toast after dinner, I could comprehend his power. He seemed to grow in stature; every word, every gesture, was eloquent. His speech was in the main a eulogy of his artists.

"I am," he said, "under deep obligations to all who have contributed to the fund for the Parsifal performances, but I am under deeper obligations to my singers and musicians; for, after all, art is not created by money, but by artists."

That last sentence was surely worthy of the great man who all his life long had stood by what he believed to be the true and the beautiful in music.

GUSTAV KOBBE.

NATURE'S RENOVATOR.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS instantly relieve and speedily cure sprains, wrenches, rheumatism, neuralgia, sciatica, pleurisy pains, stitch in the side, slow circulation of the blood, heart disease, sore muscles, pain in the chest, and all pains and aches, either local or deep-seated. They are the best pain-killing, stimulating, soothing, and strengthening plasters ever made. See that you get the genuine. All other so-called porous plasters, without a single exception, are imitations.—[Adv.]

Thousands of people testify to the merits of Piso's Cure for Consumption.—[Adv.]

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE,

A VALUABLE NERVE TONIC.

Dr. C. C. Dunsmoor, Milwaukee, Wis., says: "I have used it in my practice ten years, and consider it a valuable nerve tonic."—[Adv.]

BURNETT'S COCOAINE.

The best in all hair-dressings. It allays irritation, removes all tendency to dandruff, and invigorates the action of the capillaries in the highest degree, thus promoting a vigorous and healthy growth of hair. Its effect upon the glossiness and richness of the hair is such as cannot be surpassed. BURNETT'S FLAVORING EXTRACTS are the best.—[Adv.]

LADIES

Can Improve their Complexion, remove pimples, blotches, freckles, and restore their gray hair to its natural color by using Dr. Tebbs's Victorian Lustrum. Established in 1843, and warranted perfectly harmless. Sold by all the druggists.—[Adv.]

A Cough, Cold, or Sore Throat requires immediate attention, as neglect results in some incurable Lung Disease. "Brown's Bronchial Troches" will invariably give relief. Sold only in boxes.—[Adv.]

No well-regulated household should be without a bottle of Angostura Bitters, the world renowned appetizer and invigorator. Beware of counterfeits. Ask your grocer or druggist for the genuine article, manufactured by Dr. J. G. B. Siegert & Sons.—[Adv.]

Tea aged and feeble should use Parker's Ginger Tonic. It brings appetite, strength, and good cheer. —[Adv.]

C. C. SHAYNE, Furrier, 103 Prince Street, N. Y., will send Fur Fashion Book free to any address.—[Adv.]

HALFORD SAUCE—The standard relish. Of all the choice condiments Halford Sauce is the best.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

This powder never varies. A marvel of purity, strength, and wholesomeness. More economical than the ordinary kinds, and cannot be sold in competition with the multitude of low-test, short-weight, alum or phosphate powders. Sold only in cans.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., 106 Wall Street, N. Y.

By JOHN RICHARD GREEN.

Short History of the English People.
A Short History of the English People. By JOHN RICHARD GREEN, M.A. With Maps and Tables. 8vo, Cloth, $1 20.

History of the English People.
History of the English People. By JOHN RICHARD GREEN, M.A. With Maps. In Four Volumes. 8vo, Cloth, $3 50 per volume.

Stray Studies from England and Italy.
Stray Studies from England and Italy. By JOHN RICHARD GREEN, M.A. Post 8vo, Cloth, $1 75.

Readings from English History.
Readings from English History, Selected from Foreign and American Writers, and Edited by JOHN RICHARD GREEN, M.A., LL.D. Three Parts in One Volume. Part I. From Hengest to Cressy.—Part II. From Cressy to Cromwell.—Part III. From Cromwell to Balaclava. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

Making of England.
The Making of England. By JOHN RICHARD GREEN, M.A., LL.D. 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

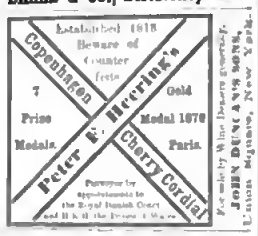
"JOKER'S BITTERS," THE OLDEST and Best Stomach Bitters known—unequalled for their medicinal properties, and for their flavor as a cordial. To be had in Quarts and Pints. R. PYNE & JR., Sole Manufacturer and Proprietor, 78 John St., N. Y. P. O. Box 1023.

LUNDBORG'S PERFUMES.
Edenia, Bureehal Nid Rose, Alpine Violet.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1878.
BAKER'S
Breakfast Cocoa.
Warranted absolutely pure Cocoa, from which the excess of Oil has been removed. It has three times the strength of Cocoa mixed with Starch, Arrowroot or Sugar, and is therefore far more economical. It is delicious, nourishing, strengthening, easily digested, and admirably adapted for invalids as well as for persons in health.
Sold by Grocers everywhere.
W. BAKER & CO., Dorchester, Mass.



DIALECT TALES.

By SHERWOOD BONNER.

ILLUSTRATED.

8vo, Cloth, $1 75.

"The clever tales of border-state, mountain, and rural life, by Sherwood Bonner, which have been collected in an illustrated volume entitled 'Dialect Tales,' have much beside the novelty of their provincial dialect to commend them to favor, however faithful and spirited that may be, and however valuable a memento its reproduction may come one day prove of the forms of speech and manners of a vanished class. Few American tales are so terse, so absolutely inspire the ruder phases of life of a people who live as primitive in their ways and speech and morals, because of their isolation amid wild and primitive scenes, and their practical remoteness from the refining influences that surround but never [illegible]. The fine instinct of the author has discerned [illegible] such simple and unconventional [illegible] to complete [illegible] and admirable as a work of art, possessing also that vet and the effectiveness that beautify it to record and affecting in its incidents and vicissitudes, an inevitable subject to alternations of joy and sorrow, and even quicker in its transitions from comedy to tragedy, and from tragedy back again to comedy."

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

The Jumbo Catalogue.

Just published, the largest and most complete Catalogue of all sporting goods ever issued—as Lawn-Tennis, Base-Ball, Archery, Cricket, Foot Ball, Fishing, Boating, and Gymnasium and Firearms a Specialty and all the latest novelties. 225 large pages. 5000 illustrations, on fine-toned paper. Price, by mail, 25 cts.

PECK & SNYDER, 126 to 130 Nassau St., N. Y.

Print Your Own Cards, &c. Press $3
Large sizes for circulars, &c. $8 to $30. Type for printers, many printing young or old. Everything easy, printed instructions. Send 2 stamps for Catalogue of Presses, Type, Cards, &c., to the factory.
KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

Universally prescribed by the Faculty.
TAMAR A laxative and refreshing Fruit Lozenge for Constipation, bile, headache, hemorrhoids, cerebral congestion, &c.
INDIEN Prepared by R. GRILLON, Sole Proprietor, Pharmacien de 1re Classe de ce Fils ainé de Paris, 27, rue Rambuteau, Paris.
GRILLON Sold by all Druggists.
TAMAR, gentle pain and the usual purgatives, is agreeable to take, and never produces irritation.

☞ CARLETON'S TREASURE BY GOOD KNOWLEDGE The most healing book ever known. The largest discount. Circulars free. Agents, address G. W. CARLETON & CO., Publishers, N. Y.

KEEP YOUR BIRD IN HEALTH and Song by using SCHARER & PATZEW'S GERMAN PUREE. Sold by all druggists and bird and cage dealers. Price 25 cents. Depot, 502 Hudson Street, N. Y.

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

EPPS'S COCOA.

BREAKFAST.

"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately flavored beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

Made simply with boiling water or milk. Sold in tins only (½-lb. and lb.) by Grocers, labelled thus:

JAMES EPPS & Co., Homœopathic Chemists, London, England.

TIMKEN SPRING VEHICLES!

Fastest riding [illegible] Vehicle made. [illegible] Quick [illegible] Perfectly [illegible] shortens according to the weight they carry. Is fully warranted in each case. Manufactured and sold by the [illegible] Company.

HENRY TIMKEN, Patentee, ST. LOUIS, MO.

MINTON'S ART AND ENAMELED TILES.

Chief Works, Stoke-upon-Trent.

Also, THE CAMPBELL BRICK & TILE CO'S Encaustic and Geometrical Floor Tiles, Mantles, &c.

THOS. ANSTIN WALL & SON, 75 & 77 West 23d St., New York, Sole Agents in the United States.

IMPORTED TILES & MOSAICS IN HEARTHS, FACINGS, BATH ROOMS & FLOORS. GRATES, FENDERS, ANDIRONS &c. EDWARD BOOTE, 11 EAST 19TH ST. N.Y.

BEAUTY ONLY SKIN DEEP.

It is a mistake a matter of vital importance to every [illegible] with a beautiful complexion to take care of it. When it becomes rough, tanned, freckled, and pimply, get a pot of Paterson's Cuticle Cure, and in a few days [illegible] you. [illegible] you get the grandest, most pure white Perfection a lady can possess. Sold by druggists. [illegible] Send for [illegible] Soap, [illegible] and [illegible] Sold by Druggists and dealers in toilet goods.

BINGHAMTON, N.Y., OIL REFINING CO.

Manual of Guard Duty

And Kindred Subjects for the Regular Army, Volunteers, and Militia of the United States. Being a thorough Compilation of Rules, Regulations, and Principles, collected from the most Authentic Sources. By JAMES REGAN, First-Lieutenant and R. Q. M. 9th Infantry. 32mo, Leather, with Clasp, $2 00.

General W. T. Sherman writes: "I have in part examined this work, and have caused the whole to be critically examined by one of my best and most experienced staff officers, in whose judgment I have implicit confidence. He says: 'The work brings together the best information on the subject of guard and kindred subjects. I have no knowledge of any single treatise which so fully explains the class of duties referred to as this does, and it would be of great value in the hands of officers and enlisted men of the army.' I am satisfied this work of Lieutenant Regan has merit, and that its publication for general circulation will result in good to the service."

In the publication of his little "Manual of Guard Duty" Lieutenant Regan recognizes, and to a large extent meets, a want felt by nearly all classes in the army. He presents in an intelligible form much needed instruction upon this important subject. The information he has carefully compiled was to be found only in numerous publications, inaccessible to most soldiers, or existed in the still more indefinite form of customs of the service, in regard to which it was difficult to obtain any reliable information.—Army and Navy Journal, N. Y.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

Lady Agents [illegible] City Suspender Co., Cleveland, O.

CARDS, An Elegant New Set of Cards for 3c. stamp. W. H. PRINGLE, Rochester, N.Y.

HARPER'S BAZAR CUT PAPER PATTERNS.

We have transferred our WHOLESALE PATTERN DEPARTMENT to No. 3 G. CRUTTY, Nos. 130 to 136 Cherry Street, New York, who will conduct it upon her own account and responsibility.

SPECIAL CAUTION.

We are not interested in any [illegible] contracts made by J. G. CRUTTY [illegible] Harper's Bazar Patterns on [illegible]

HARPER

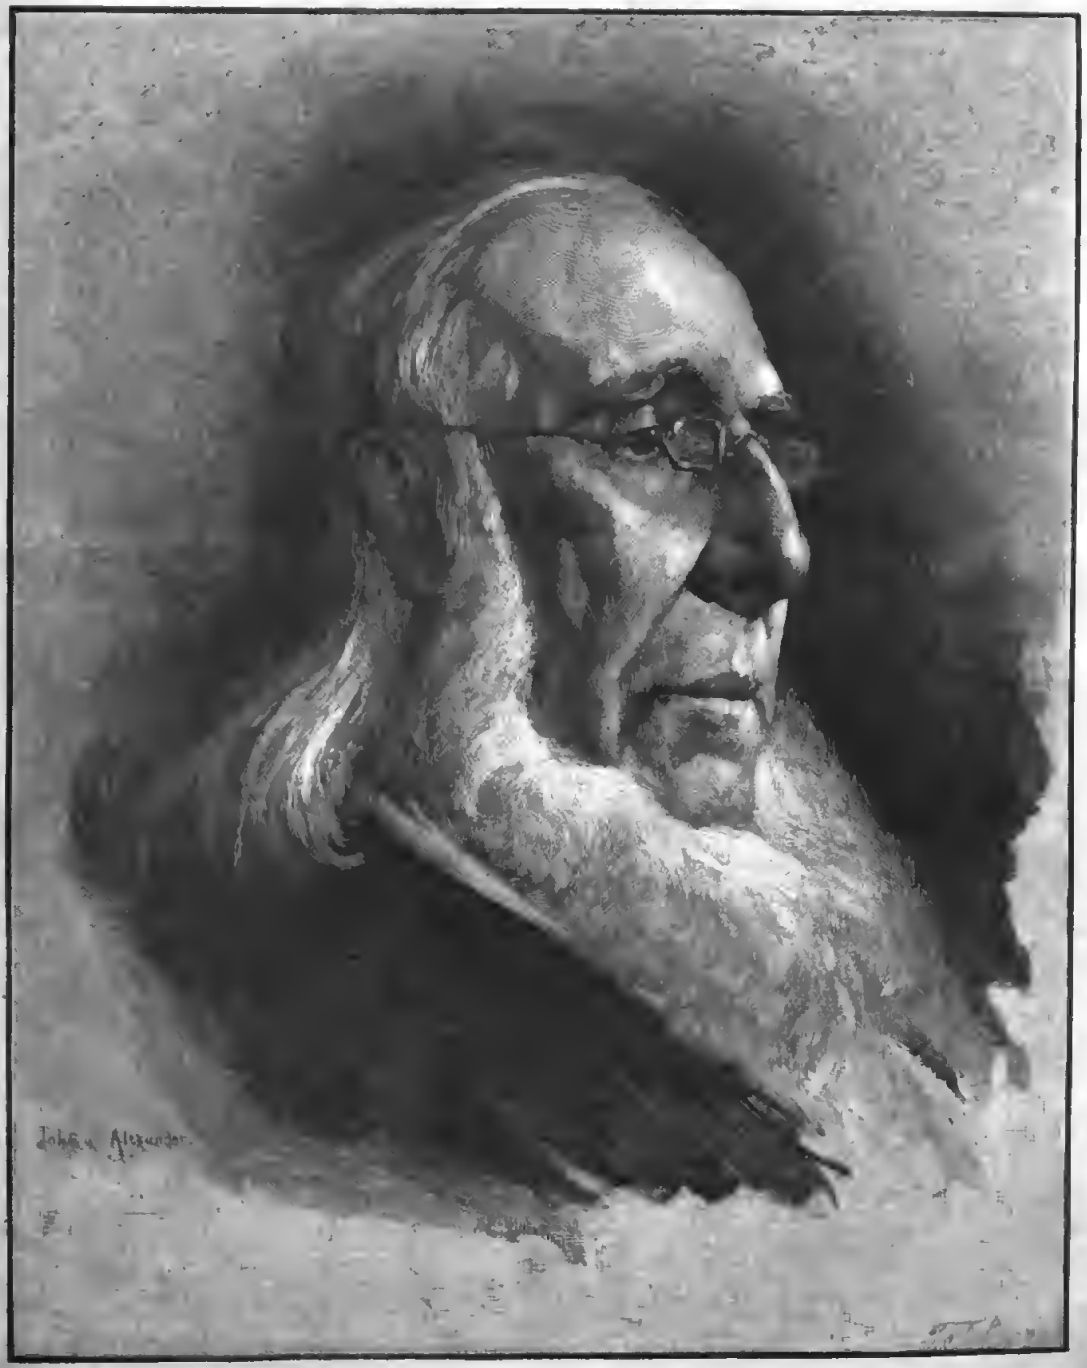
ALLEGHENY COLLEGE LIBRARY.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XXVII.—No. 1378. NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 14, 1883. TEN CENTS A COPY. $4.00 PER YEAR, IN ADVANCE.

Copyright, 1883, by Harper & Brothers.



PETER COOPER.—Drawn from Life by John W Alexander.—[See Page 234.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 14, 1883.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

AN OFFER TO YOUNG AMERICAN ARTISTS.

For the best original drawing to illustrate ALFRED DOMETT'S "Christmas Hymn"—the drawing to be suitable for publication in HARPER'S MAGAZINE, and to be the exclusive work of an American artist not over twenty-five years of age—HARPER & BROTHERS offer an award of THREE THOUSAND DOLLARS, upon the honorable understanding that the successful competitor shall use the same for the prosecution of art study as one or more of the best American schools, including also a sojourn abroad of at least six months for the study of the old masters. The award will be paid in such installments and at such times as shall best suit the convenience of the recipient for the purposes specified.

The drawings must be received by MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS not later than August 1, 1883, addressed "Art Competition, Harper's Magazine, Franklin Square, New York"; and each must be designated by an assumed name or motto, which should also be given, together with the real name, age, and residence of the artist, in a sealed envelope accompanying the drawings, and not to be opened until the result of the competition shall have been determined. The name of the successful competitor will not be publicly announced until the publication of the drawing.

MR. R. SWAIN GIFFORD, N.A., MR. F. D. MILLET, A.N.A.; and MR. THOMAS PARSONS, A.N.A., Superintendent of the Art Department, HARPER & BROTHERS, will act as judges of the competition.

It is intended to engrave the successful drawing to one page for HARPER'S MAGAZINE of December, 1883; and should other drawings submitted be found suitable, second, third, and fourth awards will be made, as follows: one page HARPER'S WEEKLY, $300; one page HARPER'S BAZAR, $200; one page HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, $100.

If the judges should decide that no one of the drawings is suitable, MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS reserve the right to extend the limit of time and re-open the competition.

Two Christmas Hymns by ALFRED DOMETT have been published. That published in 1867 is the one for the illustrations of which artists are invited to compete, and a printed copy of it will be sent on application to

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK

NEW SERIAL STORY.

In this number of HARPER'S WEEKLY will be found the opening chapters of a new and fascinating serial story, entitled

"DISARMED,"

from the pen of Miss M. BETHAM EDWARDS, author of "Kitty," "Exchange No Robbery," and other popular novels.

TWO IMPORTANT QUESTIONS FOR NEW YORK

THE most important bills now pending in the Legislature of New York are the aqueduct bill and the New York charter. The real public interest in both bills is substantially the same. It is in the one case to secure the best and most economical construction of a great public work, and in the other to provide the most efficient government for the city. In both cases the public concern is economy and efficiency. But this is not the selfish and political interest in them; that interest is to secure place and pay for a certain ring of politicians, and to turn to the most party advantage the patronage involved in both bills. The real public interest is to prevent two enormous jobs. The mischief presents itself in one bill in the effort to secure the appointment of the aqueduct commissioners by the Mayor and the Board of Aldermen; that is to say, the persons who are to expend a sum which at the lowest estimate will be not less than $18,000,000, and which may become $40,000,000, would, if this effort succeeds, be appointed by the Board of Aldermen of New York—a body which represents neither the intelligence nor the character of the city, and which as a body is neither respected nor trusted. The Mayor, it is true, would nominate. But experience shows that he would probably either obey some secret influence, as in the nominations he has already made, or select such persons as he supposes the aldermen would confirm; and that kind of person is well known in municipal politics.

The proper plan under the circumstances would be to authorise the Mayor to appoint with the approval of the Governor. The responsibility would then be plainly defined. The State of New York and the country would see whether Mr EDSON and Mr. CLEVELAND would do what they know intelligent public opinion expects, or what a knot of notorious political jobbers demands. The alternative would be to name the commissioners in the bill. But this is less desirable, for obvious reasons. It would lead to amendments in the form of substitution of some names for others, and this would end in a most unedifying discussion of personal character. Moreover, final responsibility for the selection of commissioners would be lost in the multitude of legislators and the uncertainty of motives. On the other hand, if the Mayor and the Governor alone must name the commission, there will be no doubt of the real responsibility.

The proposed city charter recalls the days and deeds of the TWEED Ring. The theory of the bill is simple. The city is Democratic, but in municipal elections the party is often restive, and the result is then a matter of serious apprehension to the party bosses, because a Republican ticket offers the opportunity of revolt to defeat the Democratic machine. The TWEED plan was to take the Republican machine into partnership, and proportionally divide the spoils, and that seems to be the present scheme. The administration of city affairs is apparently to be parcelled out among the Democratic factions and the Republican machine; while, as the dominant party, the Democratic bosses are to control certain departments which are now divided. The purpose of such a deal is to make the Ring secure, in case of a reformed Democratic or independent ticket, by providing a straight Republican ticket, and preventing union against the Ring. This is the old and familiar trick. It was played at the last election, when Mr. O'BRIEN was nominated, and it would be a suggestive event if Mr. O'BRIEN should be one of the beneficiaries of the new arrangement. The whole scheme is illustrative of the actual failure of popular government in the city, where a few men, by means of the patronage, select municipal officers and legislators solely for the purpose of retaining their own power and pay. The mass of voters in the different parties merely register the edicts of these few men. They have no initiative, and generally no knowledge of those for whom they vote. The worth and industry and intelligence and the tax-paying interest of the city have scarcely any representation either in the local or the State legislature or government. The severest comment upon the Democratic party—an argument intelligible everywhere in the country—is the government of the city of New York. If that party should now make a partisan aqueduct commission bill and a ring charter, it would furnish another effective argument against its success in the State next autumn and in the country next year.

A PUBLIC WRONG.

THE circumstances of the removal of the Collector of Internal Revenue at Detroit illustrate the truth of what we have said more than once, that the passage of the reform bill was but the beginning of reform, and that its friends must relax no effort or criticism if they would see the principle of that bill become the spirit of the service. General TROWBRIDGE, the Collector at Detroit, was an unexceptionable officer, one of the best in the internal revenue service. His collections last year amounted to $2,362,945, and his record of official service at the Treasury is stated to have been entirely satisfactory. But for some reasons, evidently unconnected with his official conduct, the Collector was not satisfactory to a knot of politicians in Michigan, including Senator CONGER and the well known Mr. JAY A. HUBBELL. Perhaps he differed with those gentlemen upon the subject of assessments. Perhaps he declined to be an agent of their political and personal plans. But however this may be, certain politicians demanded his removal, and it is not known that they urged one public or proper reason for it.

Indeed, a year passed after their demand was made before the removal was ordered. This alone shows that there was no valid reason for it. According to the uncontradicted statements, the whole movement was a simple conspiracy of certain legislative officers in Michigan against an honest, capable, and efficient executive officer, and a conspiracy to secure other ends than those of good public service. Suppose, as is stated, that Senator CONGER demanded the removal of the Collector. If the Senator knew or had reason to believe that he was a dishonest man or an incapable officer, he had the same right as any other citizen to make complaint. But beyond that what right has Senator CONGER to demand the removal of an internal collector in Michigan that he has not to demand the removal of Collector ROBERTSON in New York? For Senator CONGER to insist that the President shall remove a collector, or a postmaster, or any other officer, except for valid public reasons, is a gross scandal and outrage, because the demand involves a covert threat to the Executive that if he does not yield he shall suffer defeat in future nominations. It is not only an unpardonable impertinence for one public officer to interfere in this manner with another, but it is an intolerable wrong to the public service, and a menace to the President.

The story has been now so long uncontradicted that its substantial accuracy may be assumed. But if Senator CONGER has been misrepresented, and should say so, we shall not fail to call attention to his denial. Meanwhile intelligent citizens may see in this one instance, which is but a single illustration of a system, the outrageous nature of the abuses in the civil service of which public opinion demands the correction. Here is an honest and exemplary citizen, admirably discharging his duties to the public as a revenue officer, who is suddenly turned out of his office, probably with the most serious consequences to himself and his family, because somebody else, who has nothing more to do with the office than the reader of these words, either wants the place as a reward for one of his own dependents, or wishes to punish the officer for personal or political reasons. Had the President refused to yield to the Senatorial dictation as his predecessor did, he would have been sustained by the country as his predecessor was sustained.

PETER COOPER.

THE career of PETER COOPER shows that wealth does not necessarily alienate general sympathy, and that public feeling toward rich men is determined by the use that they make of their money. He was a rich man, but there was probably no man in the city who was more universally beloved, or whose death would produce a profounder impression. The explanation is, of course, familiar. It was his unostentatious philanthropy. His sympathy with those to whom fortune is unkind was constant and wise. His success did not seal his eyes to beneath his heart, and as he had known honest poverty and the want of opportunity, his sagacity and industry enabled him to provide relief and to open opportunity for others in the most beneficent ways. There has been no more striking or significant spectacle in the city for many years than the annual Commencement of the Cooper Union, when the benign patriarch sat among the young men and women to whom with the most intelligent generosity he had given the means of helping themselves. It was an impressive contrast with the uses to which wealth is often put, but it illustrated why this rich man was beloved.

Mr. COOPER preferred to be his own executor. He did not leave to chance and the future the disposition of his bounty, but he personally superintended the details of his philanthropic enterprises, and sustained them with a great and untiring generosity, preferring temporarily to embarrass himself rather than to stay or limit the operation of his beneficence. There was no more marked or striking personality in this community. He was emphatically "the good gray head that all men knew." He held some views which were not accepted as sound by wise men, but they were all errors of benevolence, and doubtless endeared him more closely to those whom he aimed to benefit. The simplicity and sincerity of his character overbore in the public regard all eccentricity of opinion. Sure of his purpose, the community judged him by that alone, and by the great benefits of his actual achievements. Mr COOPER'S feeling in regard to education was like that of EZRA CORNELL. The early education of both had been very limited. When he had amassed a fortune CORNELL said that he wished to found an institution in which any youth might learn anything, and COOPER said that he wished to prevent any young person suffering from the kind of want that he had known.

PETER COOPER will be always a memorable figure in the history of the city. As time passes, the tale of his good life will broaden into a popular legend like that of WHITTINGTON in London. His name will become a synonym of wise and modest philanthropy. He will be the accepted figure of sagacious and successful diligence, the type of a man, "whose life is low estate began," rising by simple probity and honest devotion to the highest public regard. There are many morals to be drawn from his long and beneficent and blameless life, but none more timely than this, in a community of great fortunes and of an eager strife for wealth, that the rich man whose daily conduct proves that he regards his wealth as a trust for others and not as a prize for his selfish appropriation, although he were worth untold millions, lives universally beloved, and dies amid the benedictions and sorrow of a consciously bereaved community.

COLUMBIA COLLEGE.

THE trustees of Columbia College have issued a plain statement of its financial condition, and of the necessary steps that must be taken to expand its system of instruction to that of a true university. The clear and complete exposition will serve as a strong appeal to the pride and munificence of the city to furnish an endowment which would make the institution, in the amplitude of its opportunities, worthy of the chief city of the continent. This result would be accomplished by supplying deficiencies in the present scheme of instruction, of which none are more conscious than the trustees, but their resources are inadequate to the work. In brief, this is the financial situation: the income of the college from students' fees and rents of real estate is $336,392; the expenses, including repairs, and interest, and increase of the library, are $238,690, leaving a surplus of $97,702. The surplus is applied to the cost of new buildings, which will reach a total of $700,000 by the time that the contemplated buildings are finished, and all surplus will be consumed for at least ten years.

The extension of the present scheme of instruction into that of a true university will require competent schools of archæology, comparative philology, Oriental literature, various branches of natural history, sanitary engineering, physical geography and the fine arts, and especially must the regular increase of the working library for training in original research be adequately secured. President BARNARD mentions an additional yearly revenue of about $200,000 and an endowment of $4,000,000 as desirable to make the university what it should be.

For the contemplated enlargement of the college system there are many advantages arising from the situation of Columbia in the great city. But there is one obvious disadvantage. The liberal gifts to other colleges are largely due to a kind of college loyalty and youthful association, which arise in great part from the romance and tradition of college life. But these are possible only where there can be college residence and a distinct college community, which in a great city are not practicable. We are far from meaning to draw upon our heads the wrath of C-o-l-u-m-b-i-a. But where there is no common and separate college life, something surely is lacking in the kind of hold which college has upon the graduate. There can hardly be the feeling for the London University, for instance, which there is for Oxford and Cambridge. In one word, when the associations of residence are wanting, much of the romance of college feeling does not exist, and this one spring of generosity is dry. But, on the other hand, this want may be supplied by the pride of a great city in a great university. Such a the wealth and the liberality of New York that it seems to us not at all improbable that men will come forward and propose to bear the expense of some of the Columbia buildings which are projected or erected, upon condition that they shall bear their names. To what better purpose could money be applied? What nobler memorial of his name could a man rear than a stately and beautiful college hall? It is in the libraries which they founded that the names of ASTOR and LENOX survive. It is in great universities—Harvard, Yale, Cornell, Johns Hopkins—that noble benefactors are nobly commemorated. The name of WILLIAM of Wykeham lives chiefly in the colleges that he founded. Whoever should erect one of the Columbia halls and give to it his name would both advance the great university and build his own monument.

THE DEMOLITION OF "THE COCK."

THE news that "The Cock," in Fleet Street, London, is to be demolished announces the disappearance of one of the resorts which are intimately associated with the characteristic life of London for centuries, and with the most famous names in English literature and history. Many a pilgrim to London would hasten first of all to the site of the old Tabard Inn in Southwark, and search curiously for some trace of Dame Quickly's tavern in Eastcheap, or BEAUMONT and JONSON'S "Mermaid," or HAYDEN'S "Ruttens," or Dr. JOHNSON'S "Mitre." London, indeed, swarms with taverns and clubs and resorts so intimately identified with the most interesting traditions that old London itself vanishes as they disappear.

"The Cock," of which there is a characteristic picture upon another page, is not only rich in old reminiscence—for it was auctioned since the days of JAMES I., and PEPYS made merry there in 1668—but it has acquired fresh charm in recent times from TENNYSON'S "Will Waterproof's Monologue," in which that thoughtful rustic so capitalizes the "plump head waiter of the Cock." In DICKENS'S Life and Letters there is the same friendly feeling for the tavern as a seat of good-fellowship. THACKERAY is never more charming than when he is playfully gossiping or mourning about the good places for good dinners, and what he was in this country he was never more at home than when, at the "Century," he was seated with his cigar and his "modest glass," ruling with gentle away, like ADDISON with his pipe, in his familiar realm.

Such associations as those of the famous London resorts of wits and poets and statesmen and scholars are of great value to any city. As they disappear the city is robbed of an influence which, although a mere sentiment, is most elevating and persuasive. The universal instinct of men which builds monuments and other memorials of the famous dead, the heroes and patriots the poets and storytellers and orators, is akin to that which fondly cherishes the material objects with which they were associated, and preserves their autographs and every personal relic. New York has retained very few buildings which have any striking or interesting connection with the past. The most interesting of them is probably Fraunces' Tavern, at the corner of Broad and Pearl streets, where WASHINGTON parted with his officers. But although London still keeps with them, even London will have lost a charm which no splendor of architecture or convenience of building can restore, when the most famous "Cock" in the world is gone forever.

THE BROOKLYN "UNION."

MR JOHN FOORD, late editor of the New York Times, is not lost to New York journalism by going over the river to conduct the Brooklyn Union. But the change is one which furnishes a fitting opportunity to speak of the unusual editorial ability of MR FOORD, his readiness, courage, and independence, his sound views of public questions, and the simplicity and inclusive vigor of his style. During his connection with the Times he admirably maintained its high character as a wise and strong leader of political thought, and his transfer to the Union happily gives the good cause which the Times represents another efficient champion.

THE SPRAGUE-BUTLER DEFEAT.

THE defeat of SPRAGUE in Rhode Island is a popular rebuke of BUTLER and Butlerism, while the alarm of the canvass will be undoubtedly of service to the Republican managers in the State. The dissatisfaction with that management was not strong enough to overcome the deep distrust of the immediacy of a man of no personal weight or importance, and who represented only discontent and the total want of political principle which is described by the word Butlerism. Intelligent Republicans in Rhode Island may now well consider whether the management of the party may not be wisely reformed, and whether or not the conditions of the challenge should be revised. The result ought not to be interpreted as a popular approval of what is well known in the State as "the machine." Many honest and independent voters took what they thought to be the best mode of the alternative. But who control of a party does not offer dilemmas to its own voters. A man who is not quite sure that he wishes his party to succeed at an election may be a very poor party man, but his case deserves careful consideration, because, when multiplied by a thousand or more, his vote or his indifference may defeat the party.

The thick-and-thin party man persistently cry that if every party man voted as they vote there would be no trouble. That is very likely. But every party man is not a fool, and will not vote stupidly. It is a hard lesson for bosses to learn. But it is a lesson worth learning.

THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

THE appointment of General GRESHAM has been received with universal favor, not because he is very generally known to the country, but because all that is said of him is high praise both of his military and judicial career, and because of the unsatisfactory names that had been mentioned in connection with the office. As the only objection made to the appointment is that he is not generally known, it is to be remembered that the trouble with most of the persons named for the office was that they were too well known. General or Judge GRESHAM is from Indiana, and he is a positive but independent Republican, personally friendly to General GRANT, but a supporter of MR HAYES in 1876. He is called to a post requiring extraordinary energy and administrative faculty, and his conduct will be watched with hope and confidence.

THE "ANNEX" OF THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA.

THE tendency of the time is obviously to give to women the same freedom of choice which men enjoy, and it is observed that where such freedom is conceded no evil results have followed. It would be hard to say why Miss MARIA MITCHELL and Mrs. SOMERVILLE should not have every opportunity which is accorded to Sir JOHN HERSCHEL or to Professor ABBEY, or in what way either they themselves or the community would suffer from their devotion to study.

The recent interesting report of the Harvard Annex shows the value of the opportunity which it offers to women, and how gladly they have availed themselves of it. And a report from a committee of the trustees has just been presented to the management of the University of Pennsylvania, proposing that women shall receive the same course of instruction in the university as men, but at a different time and place. They will be taught by the same professors, examined by the same board, and receive their degrees upon the same terms with the male students.

This proposition is justified by experience, to say nothing of good sense. The question of association in lectures and recitations is one of convenience and economy, and it will readily answer itself when the main point is gained. It is of course more expensive and unnecessarily troublesome to do at two times and in two places what can be as readily done at one. The comparative results of the experience of Cornell and Michigan universities, and that of the Harvard Annex and of the University of Pennsylvania, if the plan recommended should be adopted, will be watched with great interest.

PERSONAL.

DR. MCCOSH having resigned the presidency of Princeton College, the name of Professor MURRAY, formerly pastor of the Rich Presbyterian Church, New York city, is almost mentioned with reference to the succession than that of any other member of the faculty of the institution. The professor, who now fills the chair of English literature, is a scholarly gentleman of much personal dignity and a great favorite with the students. Dr. JOHN HALL, of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, is also spoken of as Dr. MCCOSH'S successor.

—The National Academicians are celebrating themselves that during the first three days of their annual exhibition at French & Avenue and Twenty-third Street [illegible] less than twenty thousand dollars' worth of pictures have been sold—more than twice the sum ever before received in the same time for the same purpose.

—In page 228 will be found the portrait of the Hon. AMASA M. BURNS, who has been elected Governor of Rhode Island, on the Republican ticket, by a large majority over the Independent and Democratic candidate, the Hon. WILLIAM SPRAGUE.

—A letter in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE recently quoted the late Mr PETER COOPER as saying: "The success of the Cooper Institute in preparing young women to earn a living has gratified me more than anything else. It was one of the things that I was most concerned about, and I made a statement of my desire in my 'deed of transfer' of the building to the trustees. Pupils came to new place, and behave themselves like gentlemen and ladies. For ten years not a single complaint of misconduct has been made to the trustees by any one of our twenty or three teachers. Nine boys whom we graduated are now professors in colleges. An old fireman called the other day to 'thank' me for his son's success; the lad, once a pupil of the Cooper Institute, is now a professor in the great University of Berlin, and much esteemed. So little is written about the Cooper Institute that people hardly know of its possibilities and results. Every year it instructs three thousand young men and women. For myself, I try to keep the building in good shape, I am looking at my books to-day, and I find that I have spent on it $130,000 in the last two years."

—JULES BARTON'S very beautiful landscape with figures, "Evening in the Hamlet of Finistère," which was a star picture at the last Salon, and received unusual attention from the press, is now on exhibition at the Avery Art Rooms. MR AVERY has collected in an interesting little pamphlet more than one hundred French criticisms on this notable work.

—GENERAL AUGUSTUS SALE, who was educated at a public school in France, recalls his experience of forty-three years ago without enthusiasm: "There was too little recreation, the boys' brains were wearied by tasks of inordinate length. They scarcely knew how to play, when I was twelve I did not know how to drive a hoop. The food was poor. The hours of work were too long. The inspectors were bullies, and the sub-rosa spies, and there was little sympathy between the masters and their [illegible]."

—Having been presented with the freedom of the city of Glasgow, MR JOHN BRIGHT said: "I read a letter a few weeks ago from a friend of mine, a very eminent citizen of the United States, who has filled very high offices there, telling me that in the United States they are endeavoring in connection and elevate their politics. What he meant was this, that they were endeavoring to cure the gross evils connected with the appointments in the civil service, and to withdraw their legislation in regard to economic questions, to tax and trade, from the grasping hand of the monopolists, who, since the war, have had them so entirely in their own power. England also is endeavoring to emancipate and elevate her politics."

—The wife of a British manager at some Mexican mines, being asked after her return home how she liked the change from picturesque but dangerous Mexico to humdrum England, replied that the change was well enough, but that she missed her escort of lancers when she went out shopping.

—On the anniversary of the death of Queen VICTORIA'S mother, the Duchess of Kent, the mausoleum at Windsor was opened for the "memorial visits" of the royal household and their families.

—Signor MADRAZO, the director of the Madrid Gallery, has earned the gratitude of artists by recent alterations and improvements in the arrangements of that noble institution. He has lowered the "line," has isolated some of the pictures, and has put others in more favorable lights. The Spaniards, with some show of justice, call this gallery the finest in the world, and the modern art-student values it chiefly for the abundance and excellence of the portraits by VELASQUEZ.

—General JOSEPH K. BARNES, lately Surgeon-General of the United States Army, died on the 25th ult., in Washington, in the sixty-sixth year of his age. His army service dated from June, 1840, when he was appointed an assistant surgeon. He served with distinction in the Mexican war, under Generals TAYLOR and SCOTT. At the outbreak of the war of the rebellion he was assigned to duty in the office of the Surgeon-General at Washington, and in 1863 was appointed Surgeon-General to succeed Dr. HAWKS. He was placed on the retired list last year by the operation of the compulsory retirement law. General BARNES was the first physician called in the bedside of President LINCOLN when he was assassinated, and when President GARFIELD was shot he served on the consulting board of physicians until the President's death. His portrait is given on page 228.

—It is expected that a performance of GOUNOD'S Redemption will soon be given in Westminster Abbey in aid of the fund for restoring the façade of that venerable structure.

—The French ambassador to St. Petersburg is a brave sailor, but lacking in social tact. Recently, through inadvertence, he deprived the customary ball of all gayety and animation by failing to invite the dancing men among the officers of the garrison. On another occasion, while at dinner in the Imperial Palace, he unluckily asked the Empress if she contemplated soon returning to Gatchina—the city whither she had fled for safety from the attacks of the Nihilists. French counsels say that these difficulties are greatly increased by social deficiencies on the part of the ambassadors, especially by the marked taste of the latter for appearing in democratic circles.

—General Pourrain DIAZ, Ex-President of Mexico, who is now visiting this country, and whose portrait is given on page 228, is one of the most energetic and sagacious statesmen of the day. His administration of affairs during his Presidency was marked by many judicious reforms. The purpose of his present visit is to effect closer commercial relations between the United States and his own country.

—An excited contemporary urges the establishment of a botanical garden in this city: "Apart from the scientific value of such a paradise open to the youths and maidens, who can doubt that the marriage rate would rapidly increase, keeping the parsons in cash, and stimulating the manufacture of plain gold rings?"

—Those attending the recent enthronization of the Archbishop of Canterbury were requested to wear lilies of the valley in honor of Thomas à BECKET; but in view of MR FROUDE'S exposition of the true humbleness of that prelate, it has been suggested that tiger lilies would have been more appropriate.

—JOHN BAIL, a potted-meat manufacturer in London, has been arrested for having five pieces of donkey flesh for sale on his premises. Twenty-six tin cans, filled with partly boiled flesh of the same description, were also found there. JOHN was sentenced to a month's imprisonment.

—A student in a Russian university insulted the president of the institution, and raised a disturbance generally. He was sentenced to spend three years in Siberia.

—At the Sunderland library sale an edition of the New Testament [illegible] was sold for $150. Its title ran as follows: "The Gospels of the fower Evangelists translated as the old Saxons' tyme out of Latin into the Vulgar tounge of the Saxons, newly collected out of auncient monuments of the said Saxons, and now published for ye benefite of the same."

—Mr W. H. SMITH, M.P., declares his conviction that though some persons in London are able to lay by money, the great majority of [illegible] keepers, professional men, and others—are struggling for existence, and have no margin to allow for the education of their children, and in putting them out in life. The course of trade in the last few years had not permitted many people to increase their incomes. Trade had been stagnant, and in many cases retrograde.

—Great destitution still prevails in the Western Highlands of Scotland. Five hundred and twenty-five families at Uigg are subsisting entirely on potatoes. More than two hundred families at Harris are in utmost want. From Skye, seven hundred and eight five families are reported to be in need of assistance; and from Lewis, more than twelve thousand persons in a state of extreme destitution. Sir W. HARCOURT announced in Parliament that the Government would consider it a duty "to attend this distress carefully."

—The sword of JOHN HAMPDEN, who was mortally wounded while waving it to cheer on his men against Prince RUPERT, has been sold at auction for about three hundred dollars. It is a rapier of finely tempered steel, thirty-eight inches long from the hand-plate, with a cross hilt and a scroll guard.

—Mr JOHN SIBBS, Professor of English Literature in Glasgow University, speaks, in his book on American Literature, of WHITTIER having an living "among the slopes of Sleepy Hollow, by a brook he built his New England home."

—The grand offense of parents, says ALEXANDER DUMAS, lies in shirking the difficulties presented by the curiosity of children. He dwells upon the hoisenonsense of the time-honored practice of lying to children. Children, he declares, are always old enough to receive correct answers to the questions that ask. "There is no such thing as a stupid child. A child may have a more or less prompt intelligence, it may develop special aptitudes or compatibilities, but you will never hear it say a stupid thing as long as you have not deceived it, as long as you have not told it a lie."

—At the trial of some prisoners of state in V[illegible] one of the members, OTHY PRATHER, a well-educated man, who had been living for the people in [illegible] of Europe, was asked to speak in his own d[illegible] I have been he said, but I have been in the [illegible] and have been [illegible] the [illegible] n [illegible] of. When I [illegible] the [illegible] was," [illegible] dance to rise to [illegible] I have this principle. I have zealously studied, honestly labored in Vienna whom I was arrested. I have been [illegible] months, and of those I have been imprisoned [illegible] what have I done? Nothing. If I have done [illegible] I am ready to bear the consequences. I [illegible] punishment. But I ask for justice." He was [illegible]

PORFIRIO DIAZ, EX-PRESIDENT OF MEXICO.
[See Page 227.]

GENERAL JOSEPH K. BARNES, LATE SURGEON-GENERAL OF THE ARMY.—[See Page 227.]

THE HON. AUGUSTUS O. BOURN, GOVERNOR-ELECT OF RHODE ISLAND.—[See Page 227.]

THE OLD JEFFERSON HOUSE, PHILADELPHIA.

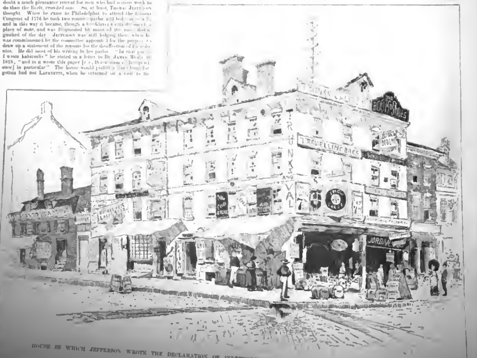
The house in Philadelphia in which Thomas Jefferson wrote the Declaration of Independence is at present attracting more attention than it has probably received since the time when Jefferson had lodgings in it. This is because, as usually happens to [illegible] old landmarks, it is to be sacrificed in order to make room for newer buildings better suited to the demands of increasing business in the neighborhood. So long as there was no immediate probability of its being destroyed, few gave it a thought.

The house thus brought into public notice stands at the corner of Seventh and Market streets. It is a plain, unpretending, four-story brick building, differing but little from the [illegible] on the same block. As the death of a once celebrated actor or actress long retired from the stage calls forth reminiscences of his or her early glory, so the threatened destruction of this old house suggests at once the days of its prosperity and greatness. In 1776 it was new; had just started life, [illegible] like [illegible] owner one Graaf by name, who had [illegible] married. He [illegible] troubled times, also, between the heavy taxation of the mother country on the one hand, and on the other the probability that a war of rebellion would make the second state of the country seven times worse than the first, the chances of money-making were not great. But Graaf, it seems, was like most Germans, a thrifty man, and understood the [illegible] of having two strings to one bow. Though a bricklayer by trade, he [illegible]. His house was then far up town. [illegible] had been built around it. It was away from noisy business centres, and was no doubt a much pleasanter retreat for men who had serious work to do than the [illegible], crowded inns. So, at least, Thomas Jefferson thought. When he came to Philadelphia to attend the famous Congress of 1776 he took two rooms—parlor and bedroom—[illegible], and in this way it became, though a [illegible], a place of note, and was frequented by many of the most distinguished of the day. Jefferson was still lodging there when he was commissioned by the committee appointed for the purpose to draw up a statement of the reasons for the disaffection of the colonies. He did most of his writing in his parlor. "In that parlor I wrote habitually," he stated in a letter to Dr. James Mease in 1825, "and in it wrote this paper [i. e., Declaration of Independence] in particular." The house would probably have been forgotten had not Lafayette, when he returned on a visit to the United States, awakened popular interest in places made sacred through association with the principal events of the Revolution. Philadelphians, fired by his example, exerted themselves to discover in which house so important a document had been prepared, and fortunately Jefferson was then alive to give the necessary information.

After his time a fourth story and a roof with dormer windows were added to Graaf's house, and passing into other hands, it became an eminently respectable private residence. Then it was in its zenith. But the city grew, as cities in a new country have a way of doing. Market Street was made a strictly business street, and men of means or of any social standing moved their dwellings to more fashionable quarters. The house in question was, with the others, turned into a store. At present its ground floor, the outside of which is a favorite corner for theatre posters, is occupied by a dealer in trunks, satchels, etc. The upper floors are rented out to men of various trades and callings. From a door on Seventh Street a flight of stairs leads to that portion of the [illegible] which was occupied by Jefferson. [illegible] it is to be hoped he never [illegible] nature [illegible] What was once the great [illegible] the office of a manufacturer of [illegible] advertisements [illegible] [illegible] once his parlor been put? Alas, that we should have to tell the tale! It has been made into a hall or passageway, and there by the window where perhaps he was wont to sit at his writing-desk a hatchway has been cut, and so—farewell to all its greatness!

It must be confessed that at first sight there is nothing to distinguish this house from those surrounding it, or to denote its age. On a little closer observation one notices the stone facings to the windows usually found in houses built about a century ago, and the old-fashioned dormer windows in the roof. But in itself it is so far from being remarkable that we can understand why many antiquarians have had doubts as to its identity. The honor of having been Jefferson's residence when he wrote the Declaration of Independence has been at different times assigned to the house [illegible] on Market Street, and to the small one just back of it on Seventh Street. The general appearance of the latter is much more striking, and more like that of a house with a history, and as it has for a number of years been known as the Jefferson House, or Wigwam, it has misled many "old-house hunters." However, the claims of the building at the corner have been firmly established, and those interested to know the pros and cons in this dispute may be referred to the chapter on the subject in Westcott's Historic Mansions of Philadelphia. The necessity for pulling down this house is to be regretted. The interest attached to it is not of a local but of a national character. The corner of Seventh and Market streets may possibly be improved in appearance by a new building, but the removal of the old one is a loss to the whole country.

Elizabeth Robins.



HOUSE IN WHICH JEFFERSON WROTE THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, SEVENTH AND MARKET STREETS, PHILADELPHIA.

"THE STORY OF ŒNONE."—F. D. MILLET.

"MASSACHUSETTS COAST."—GEORGE H. SMILLIE.

"HERRING BOATS PREPARING FOR SEA, SCHEVENINGEN, HOLLAND."—H. CRAIG.

"IN VOYAGE."—PETER MORAN.

"ANTWHITHER."—A. H. WYANT.

"IN THE GARDEN."—C. S. REINHART.

"TURKISH IDLERS."—S. W. VAN SCHAICK.

"MORA-PLAYERS."—P. DOLLMAN.

SKETCHES FROM THE NEW YORK NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

THE HANDS OF JUSTICE.*

By F. W. ROBINSON,

Author of "Cousin Cinderella," "Little Kate Kirby," "Poor Humanity," "For Old Sake," etc.

BOOK THE FOURTH.

THE MOVING OF THE HANDS.

CHAPTER IX.

CHRISTMAS.

There was more news to excite and confound the intelligence of honest Lincolnshire when it was spread throughout the country that young Gregory Dorward had confessed to the murder of Morris Brake, and that John Woodhatch was wholly innocent. It was as everybody thought from the first, everybody took the liberty of asserting now; and those fun who had stood by the farmer bard and fast—and cheered his hours, after all, by the assertion of their faith in him—had extra reason to take credit for the clearness of their views.

Still, the law's delay—which is proverbial and Shakspearean—did not open the prison doors of John Woodhatch's cell in an instant, and on the mere word of one of his farm pupils. The murder of Farm Forlorn had been seen in the dark night as the sun-shone, with Reuben Fladge, disinterring, and then sinking deeper, the evidence of the crime. The past rose up against him even, and the last act of his life, before his sudden arrest, had been a very desperate piece of business, verging closely on a further crime, or, at least, akin to madness. All that had to be considered, and the truth to be sifted from the false, before the order could be given for John Woodhatch's release; but John was very patient now, and very thoughtful, marvelling at last at the love some people had for him. The prison rules were, to a certain extent, relaxed in his favor, it being thought that mere formalities were keeping him in jail; and Reuben Fladge, though he took no more long walks, and with the excited prospect before him of his master's speedy restoration, was relieved from that rigid surveillance of the police which had been more an inconvenience to the force than to himself, and had resulted in one constable being borne to his bed from sheer exhaustion, and another being reduced to a sad and crippled condition of corns and bunions, a back had been abnormally developed by the most violent exercise.

Still, Reuben Fladge could afford to be patient with the rest, and he looked the very personification of patience, standing day and night before the doors of the jail, waiting for the master; always waiting for him to come forth, as people said he would soon, and never for him an hour together absent from the place—a faithful servant, forever on the watch, and disregardful of the health and strength he wasted.

Once a tall young woman, dressed in black, touched him on the arm and asked if he remembered her. He looked askance at her and nodded his head.

"Oh, yes, of course I do."

"Is it wise to wait here night and day?" asked Kitty.

"I'm afraid of losing him."

"Yan are very faithful, Fladge, and the master will be proud of you," said Kitty, "but it is not a joy to watch as closely thus. To-day, now, he can not possibly come."

"Oh, you don't know," said Fladge, doggedly.

"I think I do."

"He may come out of those doors at any moment," remarked Fladge; "that's where it is."

"Yan will be glad to see him."

Reuben nodded. It was a foolish question, and hardly worthy of a nod. Glad to see him!

"I—I hope," said Kitty, timidly, "that with your gladness you will be presently a little sorry for my Greg."

"Ah, yes, I s'pose I may be," was the careless answer.

"He saves the master," added Kitty.

"Anybody would have done that," muttered Fladge.

"Ah, no, Reuben," said Kitty, shaking her head, "the son repentant and anxious to take the sin upon himself is scarcer than you think."

"Do you think I wouldn't?" cried Fladge, indignantly.

"Yes, you might," she replied, looking at him thoughtfully.

"And more than that," continued Fladge, "I'd a-said I killed the man whether I'd done it or not—if I could have got anybody to believe me," he added, with a sigh over the general distrustfulness of his fellow-creatures.

"You loved the master—and so did Greg, with all his faults, poor fellow," said Kitty.

"Ay."

"We will wish happiness to John Woodhatch, at all events," she said as she moved away, "and it is justice."

Reuben Fladge looked after her wonderingly, as after some one who had talked too much to him and disturbed him; then he took an apple from his pocket and munched it slowly, with his eyes fixed upon the prison gates. And as we leave him—a man with one idea.

Meanwhile Lucy Brake had evinced less patience than the rest of our characters. The only real heroine we have, she was less heroical than those who had moved her life and made it what it was. She was even fidgety, and petulant, and inconsistent, like a woman crossed in every little wish or in every big secret hope; she was unlike herself, and yet a very woman! She regretted twenty times a day she had not gone to Lincoln, that she had altered her mind when the clouds were breaking away from the life of John Woodhatch; as if, with the coming sunshine of fair fame and honor cleared, she was afraid to meet him—as she was, though for a reason she could not explain and did not care to analyze.

* Begun in Harper's Weekly No. 1346.

When her father, with little Morice, almost strong and well, returned from Paris—an event which occurred a few days afterward—she was only better for a while, and while the novelty of their arrival was upon her.

After that she was again fretful and eccentric, irritated—justly, perhaps—against the difficulties in the way of John Woodhatch's release.

To her father's stories of his Paris incidents she did not even profess to listen, but sat staring over his head when he had finished, and with her thoughts very far away.

"It's not much good talking to ye, Lucy," he said on one occasion, "for ye won't hearken the least bit in the warld."

"I can't."

"I've been telling ye that all's fair sailing with the prosperity, and it will be all settled in a month or two, without our taking any further trouble about it, and—Lucy, what are ye thinking of, in the land's name, to pull that nevermenble face?" he exclaimed, very petulantly himself, at last.

"I am miserable. Why is nothing done—with the guilty man in safety to the crime, and the innocent locked up in prison still? This is not justice," she cried, "and it angers me, and makes me wretched."

"There's that stupid heaviness of the fire, they say," replied Mr. Larcom, quietly filling his pipe, "and people can't make out why he should have done it."

"He thought everybody had deserted him—he was disappointed in every one of us, and he was not his own true self that night," she said. "I understand it all."

"I understand he's a terrible-tempered, fun all the good in him, and it's a marcy the farce was his own freehold and unmortgaged, though he won't get off quite clear, for all that."

"You get off!" exclaimed Lucy; "oh! don't say that."

"It's clear arson, if he owns he burned it down, I'm thinking," said Mr. Larcom; "and though he's done no one any harm, it was a very near perceiving. And yet a child can turn John Woodhatch, who is like a child in most things, leasing too much in everybody and everything. Which is a bad failing, Lucy—as I've told him twenty times, and twice twenty times, for that matter—and he never a bit the better for it. And here's the result of it, ye see."

"I see nothing but that you are losing time," cried Lucy, sharply, "and neglecting your duty as a friend."

"What—what's that ye say?" exclaimed Mr. Larcom, in a loud voice.

"Is he not your friend?" cried Lucy. "Has he not always been, father, the best friend you have ever had?"

"Well, I confess that."

"Then you are not acting like a friend by idling here at home," she cried. "Your duty is at Lincoln, using every means and every effort to set him free from those calumnies which entangle him, sparing no money, employing the best men everywhere to fight his cause and get him out, doing everything in your power, as he would have done, you know too well, for you."

"Bless and save us all!" ejaculated Mr. Larcom.

"I am a woman and helpless," she cried, "and the time hangs back so cruelly!"

Mr. Larcom put his pipe on the mantel piece, buttoned his coat, and thrust his rusty hat on his head.

"You're right," he said. "I'll go, if I post all the way. You're not often right, mind ye, Lucy; but this time—just for a change—I think ye are."

And, after that remark, Mr. Larcom started on his journey.

CHAPTER X.

AMONGST THE RUINS.

What had turned Lucy Brake's thoughts so completely toward John Woodhatch, his fortunes and misfortunes, is difficult to say. It is always a difficult task to account for the vagaries of the sex, the subtlest answer is no. Certainly there had been a whirl of events of late days in the life of the Methodist parson's daughter, and she had been whirled round with it, and confronted with stern truths and many changes, and might still be confused and agitated, and "not herself at all."

She had come into money, without caring for money in any degree; she had been confronted with the scathing news of her late husband's love, or professed love, for Kitty Ynnell, and regret his death as she might, the hero was no longer on the pedestal where her devotion and sorrow had placed him. Forever before her was the uncomfortable thought of how a man so feeble or unpressionable would have behaved through life, had his been spared him, and the certain assurance that much unhappiness would have come in its time to dispel the fair illusions she had had of his character and his affection for her. And then, before she had had time to consider this, and return for this, there followed Miss Brake's death, John Woodhatch's farewell of her, the journey to Paris, the burning of the farm, and the arrest for murder. It was unnecessary haste, after all, with which she had hastened home, only to remain supine and helpless, and pray for better times. She had written to John Woodhatch a few lines of consolation—if words from her could convey any consolation, she thought, very humbly now—and there had come no answer back in a line or two of thanks, no more, as though he had not the wish to write, and yet had felt compelled to answer her.

His troubles distressed her more than she could have possibly imagined that they would, great as they were, and affecting her own life with his—pages in the same story. He had suffered as much, he had been as terribly disappointed in all that he had schemed for, he had been an unselfish zealot a crowd of people thinking only of themselves, and, at last, he had been, poor John! as desperately reckless, that it was doubtful how the law would consider his last act. Would it even believe Greg Dorward's confession to be anything else save another mad fellow's freak—that insane craving for a notice in the newspapers which besets the British mind, and would be rather connected with a murder case than forever "out of print," and thus cruelly ignored?

Mr. Larcom disappeared into space, as it were, for Lucy heard no more from him. He did not write to his daughter—it had not entered into his mind to be "bothered" by any correspondence; and so Lucy was left to distress herself, which she did very successfully, as to the progress of events at Lincoln, where were all the principal characters of the tragedy—if it were to end like a tragedy, and as the cruel delay and uncertainty seemed almost to warrant.

Still there was hope, more hope than she believed. The neighbors were quite certain of a satisfactory result, so far as John Woodhatch was concerned; the newspapers were as "cock-sure" about it as newspapers generally are; and all would be well in time, if time would only move a little faster!

She would wait another day and go to Lincoln, she thought. One more day, and receiving no missive from her father, she would leave Skegs Shore again. She must be one of the principal witnesses in the case, having been almost the last to see Morris Brake alive. Why did no one communicate with her at this crisis?

That day she and little Morice walked along the sands to Farm Forlorn—never looking so forlorn and grim as in that hour, with its blackened walls, its roofless, windowless aspect, and its great gaps to the sky, with its charred timbers, still stretching intact from side to side of the old farm, and its debris of ruin strewn about the ground. A terrible wreck, a still more terrible monument of man's despair and passion, a black blot upon a fair, green landscape for Lucy to shudder at that early autumn day, with little Morice cowering in the folds of her mother's skirts. A blot, too, upon the fair life of its owner, to show he was very weak and—very human.

"Yes, this is Farm Forlorn indeed," said Lucy, with a sigh.

John Woodhatch had prophesied she would never come back to it, and she had smiled a little at his prognostication, knowing so much better than he that he was in the wrong. But it was all stern truth, and there was no return, only as the wreck—the grim witness of where the farm had stood and how the hopes had shrivelled up with its destruction.

There were tears swimming in Lucy's eyes as she gazed at the ruin; the ruin of one man's life seemed to be mocked by it, too, and she, at least, could have altered it by a word. And if that word had been spoken, what would have been the end of it to him or her? Surely something more full of promise than the utter collapse of one honest house, one earnest life.

She walked with Morice into the garden, where she had talked with John Woodhatch a few minutes before she went away, and where he spoke in riddles to her, and looked at her with his grave face the while. Here there was but little change, the neighbors' children having spared it, and more than one neighbor's hand having kindly helped to keep it bright and trim for the sake of the master who might come back at any moment now—for who could tell?

Who could tell, indeed? For suddenly through the gate, across the fields, there came John Woodhatch, with his old quick strides, toward her—the same man whom she had ever known, with his frank, clear face aglow with health and hope, despite the shade of sorrow in it—a sorrow, as it were, for others suffering for his sake, and who had taken his place, so that he might go free. A noble return even in a criminal, and a poet penitent like Greg Dorward, of whom there should be surely hope sound day.

John Woodhatch's sudden appearance was too much for the overwrought feelings of Lucy Brake, she had not thought to find him there, she had not believed he was at liberty and at Skegs Shore again, and she burst into tears and ran toward him—stopping before she reached him, in alarm at her own impulse, and coloring very much.

But he was at her side very quickly too, when she sobbed forth, "I am so glad you have come back, John! I—I did not think you would be here so soon."

"There, there, don't cry," he said, taking both her hands in his, "you have never been one to shed tears—even of joy. And if it is joy—"

"Yes—it is," she confessed at once.

"Then surely I am happy."

He stooped and kissed her forehead, and she did not shrink away from him. That was all the love-making between them then, and for some time afterward, but from that very moment they understood each other better than they had done in all their lives, and neither from that instant of their meeting sorrowed the land nlessed—the land over which their track together was yet but faintly marked—with dust, and looks sad heavy sighs, as though the sunshine was never more for either.

They did not speak of love one word; that was to come when John Woodhatch was more assured that forty-five might be a fitting match for three-and-twenty, taking the entire facts into consideration, and remembering how patiently he had waited for her, and in all his life had cared for no one else; when Lucy was disposed, too, to see the happiness beyond the present time, and link her life with his, making both bright to the end of their days.

In that time of their meeting they simply walked arm in arm together in the garden of Farm Forlorn, and talked of the past and future, like two old friends who had had never a thought of parting between them. They spoke of the one wild act of John Woodhatch at Skegs Shore, and what would come of it.

"I don't think they will hurt me," said the farmer, with a smile, "as I have hurt no one but myself. I was very miserable that night, and awfully alone. But it was rash."

"Yes, John, it was a little rash," said Lucy, quaintly.

"Still, I may hear no more about it."

And he did not, and presently a new farm, which he called Farm Felicity—a happy name of his new life to come—was erected on the old site, and peace and love and faith became presently the household fairies there.

They spoke of Greg Dorward also, and of Kitty.

"Your teaching was not wholly in vain," said Lucy, "when they would not let you come in harm, those two."

"No, not in vain," answered John Woodhatch, thoughtfully.

"And Greg, what will they do to him?"

"They will give him a light sentence for manslaughter, the lawyers think, they will consider his youth, the provocation, and his frank confession, and as a year or two, perhaps less, he may begin life again—life abroad, possibly—under fair auspices, with a true woman at his side to keep him hopeful, and on the right road to the end. I try to see that picture in the future."

And it was near the truth, as if John had had a prophet's vision in that hour.

"I hope the colors are not too bright, and I am not too sanguine," he added, with a reserve, at last.

"You were always sanguine, John, until the last days of Farm Forlorn," she said.

"Yes, that's true. And then?"

"Ah! we will not speak of that again."

They walked away from the farm, and once more along the sands, to the broad, shining sea, they went from the garden of Farm Forlorn to the village nestling in the shadow of the church, from the ruin of a home, and the record of a cash art, to the Methodist's little cottage, where Alec Larcom waited for them—from the despair of ever doing any good, to the hopes which would grow stronger every day, and blossom into love and trust.

And in the far distance, and at a most respectful distance, but with their watchful eyes upon one figure always—lest it should melt away as in a dream, and thus should can be reality after all, but only fancy born of rum imaginings—trudged Reuben Fladge and Carlo, the one the best friend but to him when all the rest had seemed to turn away.

Only seemed! For John Woodhatch had been a man of many friends, and it had been pure fancy that his friends had failed him.

"If you had asked me to remain and be your wife, John, on that day father and I left the farm," said Lucy, some months afterward, when he had asked in earnest, and she had answered Yes, "I should not have said No. And I—I thought you would before I went away."

"It was a thought too kept wonderfully well to yourself," he replied, with a hearty laugh—and so men can laugh at past trouble always—"but then I do not profess to understand human nature now, especially feminine nature, and—especially Lucy Brake!"

But they understood each other very well, and knew that there was no fair sailing in life's stream before them as on the broad deep sea at which they gazed, and where the distant ships, with their great white wings outspread, passed slowly to their journey's end.

THE END.

WHAT SOCIAL CLASSES OWE TO EACH OTHER.

By PROFESSOR W. G. SUMNER.

VII.

THAT WE MUST HAVE FEW MEN IF WE WANT STRONG MEN.

Taxmen men as they have been and are, they are subjects of passion, emotion, and instinct. Only the élite of the race has yet been raised to the point where reason and conscience can even curb the lower motive forces. For the mass of mankind, therefore, the price of better things is too severe, for that price can be summed up in one word—self control. The consequence is that for all but a few of us the limit of attainment in life in the best case is to live out our terms, to pay our debts, to place three or four children in a position to support themselves as a person as good as the father's was, and there to make the account balance.

Since we must all live, in the civilized organization of society, on the existing capital, and since those who have only come out even have not accumulated any of the capital, have no claim to own it, and can not leave it to their children, and since those who own land have parted with their capital for it, which capital has passed back through other hands into industrial employment, how in a man who has inherited neither land nor capital to secure a living? He must give his productive energy to apply capital to land for the further production of wealth, and he must secure a share in the existing capital by a contract relation to those who own it.

Undoubtedly the man who possesses capital has a great advantage over the man who has no capital in all the struggle for existence. Think of two men who want to lift a weight, one of whom has a lever, and the other must apply his hands directly, think of two men tilling the soil, one of whom uses his hands or a stick, while the other has a horse and a plough; or think of two men in conflict with a wild animal, one of whom has only a stick or a stone, while the other has a repeating rifle; think of two men who are sick, one of whom can travel, command medical skill, get advice, light, air, and water, while the other lacks all these things. This does not mean that one man has an advantage against the other, but that, when they are rivals in the effort to get the means of subsistence from nature, the one who has capital has immeasurable advantages over the other. If it were not so, capital would not be formed. Capital is only formed by self-denial, and if the possession of it did not secure advantages and superiorities of a high order, men would never submit to what is necessary to get it. The first accumulation costs by far the most, and the rate of increase by profits at first seems pitiful. Among the metaphors which partially illustrate capital, all of which, however, are imperfect and inadequate, the snow-ball is useful to show some facts about capital. In first accumulation is slow, but, as it proceeds, the accumulation becomes rapid in a high ratio, and the element of self-denial declines. This fact also is favorable to the accumulation of capital, for if the self-denial continued to be of great per unit when the accumulation had become great, there would speedily come a point at which further accumulation would not pay. The man who has capital has secured his future, we know which he can employ as winning secondary objects of necessity and advantage, and emancipated himself from those things in life which are gross and belittling. The possession of capital is therefore an indispensable prerequisite of educational, scientific, and moral goods. This is not saying that a man in the narrowest circumstances may not be a good man. It is saying that the extension and elevation of all the moral and metaphysical interests of the race are conditioned on that extension of civilization of which capital is the prerequisite, and that he who has capital can participate in and move along with the highest developments of his time. Hence it appears that the man who has his self-denial before him, however good may be his intention, can not be on the man who has his self-denial behind him. Some seem to think that this is very unjust, but they get their notions of justice from some occult source of inspiration, not from observing the facts of this world as it has been made and exists.

The maxim or injunction to which a study of capital leads on is, Get capital. In a community where the standard of living is high, and the conditions of production are favorable, there is a wide margin within which an individual may practice self-denial and win capital without suffering, if he has and the charge of a family. That it requires energy, courage, perseverance, and prudence is not to be denied. Any one who believes that any good thing on this earth can be got without those virtues may believe in the philosopher's stone or the fountain of youth. If there were any Utopia, its inhabitants would certainly be very insipid and characterless.

Those who have neither capital nor land unquestionably have a closer class interest than landlords or capitalists. If one of those who are in either of the latter classes is a speculator he loses his advantage. If the non-capitalists increase their numbers, they surrender themselves into the hands of the landlords and capitalists. They compete with each other for food until they run on the margin of land, and they compete with each other for wages until they give the capitalist a great amount of productive energy for a given amount of capital. If some of them are economical and prudent in the midst of a class which saves nothing and marries early, the few prudent suffer for the folly of the rest, since they can only get current rates of wages; and if those are low, the margin out of which to make savings by special personal effort is narrow. No instance has yet been seen of a society composed of a class of great capitalists and a class of laborers who had fallen into a state of permanent drudgery. Probably no such thing is possible so long as landlords especially remain as a third class, and so long as society continues to develop strong classes of merchants, financiers, professional men, and other classes. It is more conceivable that non-capitalist laborers should give up struggling to become capitalists, should give way to vulgar enjoyments and passions, should recklessly increase their numbers, and should become a permanent caste, they might with some justice be called proletarians. The name has been adopted by some professed labor leaders, but it really should be considered insulting. If there were such a proletariat it would be hopelessly in the hands of a body of plutocratic capitalists, and a society so organized would no doubt be far worse than a society composed of nobles and serfs, which is the worst society the world has seen in modern times.

At every turn, therefore, it appears that the number of men and the quality of men limit each other, and that the question whether we shall have more men or better men is of most importance to the class which has neither land nor capital.

The discussion of "the relations of labor and capital" has not hitherto been very fruitful. It has been confused by ambiguous definitions. Labor means toil, irksome exertion, expenditure of productive energy, but it is also used, by a figure of speech, to mean those persons who, having neither capital nor land, come into the industrial combination offering productive services in exchange for means of subsistence, and who are united by a community of interest. Capital is a product of labor employed to assist production, but the word is also used in a figure of speech, for those persons who possess capital, and who come into the industrial organization to get their living by employing capital for profit. In order to accomplish this purpose they need the productive services of laborers. Laborers and capitalists are the terms which we will always use when we mean the persons. Three or four classes make contracts on the best terms which their exigencies upon, like buyers and sellers, renters and hirers, borrowers and lenders. Their relations are therefore controlled by the universal law of supply and demand. The capitalist-employer assumes the direction of the business, and takes all the risk, for the capital must be consumed in the industrial process, and whether it will be found again in the product or not depends upon the good judgment and foresight with which the capital and labor have been applied. Under the wages system the employer and the laborer contract for time. The laborer fulfills the contract if he obeys orders during the time, and trusts the capital as he is told to treat it. Hence he is free from all responsibility, risk, and speculation. That this is the most advantageous arrangement for him, as the whole and in the great majority of cases, is very certain. Salaried men and wage receivers are in precisely the same circumstances, except that the former by custom and usage are those who have special skill as training, which is almost always an investment of capital, and which narrows the range of competition in their case. Physicians, lawyers, and others paid by fees are workers by the piece. To the capital in existence all must come for their subsistence and their tools.

It is a common assertion that the interests of capitalists and laborers are identical, that they are partners in an enterprise, etc. These sayings spring from a disposition, which may often be pushed, to find consoling and encouraging observations in the facts of sociology, and to refute if possible any unpleasant observations. If we try to learn what is true, we shall both do what is alone right, and we shall do the best for ourselves in the end. The interests of laborers and capitalists as parties on a contract are antagonistic in certain respects and united in others, as is the case wherever supply and demand operate. If John gives both to James in exchange for wheat, John's interest is that cloth be good and attractive but not plentiful, but that wheat be good and plentiful; James's interest is that wheat be good and attractive but not plentiful, but that cloth be good and plentiful. All men have a common interest that all things be good, and that all things but the one which each produces be plentiful. The capitalist is interested that capital be good but rare, and productive energy good and plentiful; the laborer is interested that capital be good and plentiful, but that productive energy be good and rare. When one man alone can do a service, and he can do it very well, he represents the laborer's ideal. To say that laborers and capitalists are partners in an enterprise is only a delusive figure of speech. It is plainly based on no facts in the industrial system.

THE SOCIETY EXHIBITION.

The concert-pitch of the Sixth Annual Exhibition of the Society of American Artists is higher than that of any of its predecessors. This is the significant fact of the affair: it shows that the self-restraint now of the exhibitors has increased. Few in proportion as the tone of a representative oil-painting differentiates itself from the tone of a composition in black and white do the technical difficulties of the artist increase. He easily obtains the indispensable quality of tone when working in black and white; but he must use great skill to obtain it when endowing his canvas simultaneously with fullness of color and with fullness of light. Very few canvases—perhaps none at all—in the present exhibition can truthfully be said to be so endowed; yet the tendency of the display is unmistakable in that direction, and as a consequence the self-confidence of the artists is notable.

This self-confidence justifies itself by three phenomena of special interest to those who have watched the course of [illegible] Society of American Artists. [illegible] appear at least to have [illegible] that the exhibition for two years past [illegible] and [illegible] cloth [illegible] to [illegible] them, were so slow to point out in several of the earlier exhibitions the virtual effacement of this distinction. "But we don't want 'finish,'" was the reply. "would you have the public put its nose close enough to a painting to smell it? Didn't Rembrandt himself say that the odor of paint was unwholesome?" "True enough," was the rejoinder, "but Rembrandt got atmosphere as well as nearness and ruins, sentiment as well as decentiveness, delicacy as well as robustness, gradations as well as strength. And instead of trying to obtain color and tone simultaneously, he took his tone about it, and merged heaviness and blackness." These elementary facts have evidently become influential in studios where once they aroused strangers. Look at Mr W. H. Gibson's "Hackmatack Landscape," the least conscientious and cohesive also the most successful landscape in the exhibition, and this chiefly because lacking the heaviness and blackness that so much in some of his previous works. It is a picture, in the full sense of the term. It has delicacy of gradations—not, to be sure, to the extent that Wyant's profoundly luminous masterpiece in the earth room of the National Academy has it, but still to a degree very considerable—and it has virility, stability, certainty, snap; while the studio interior by the same artist is not only the best thing of the kind he has ever shown, but the best representative in the exhibition of a color scheme in still-life.

In the next place, the exhibitors, on a rule, have added to their vigor some charm. Vigor they have always had; charm they have seldom had; and if the reader desires an exemplification of what is meant by vigor without charm, let him recall Mr Hunter Brookman's series of oil portraits recently displayed in the Chapel Gallery. Take Mr Wyatt Eaton's Portrait of Mrs S. de K. It has vigor and charm. The delicacy of the gradations, especially in the flesh, is masterly. Mr Eaton has perhaps painted portraits a little nearer absolute perfection in case of unconscious pose, and he could, if he chose, improve the effect of the ensemble by more attention to the flexibility of his sitter's fingers, but one feels that this portrait is so fine a thing that minute criticism of it may be unjust, the very lightnesses that are criticised being perhaps the consequences or concomitants of rather sacrifices made in order to secure a higher general result. The insight of this learned and peculiar painter suggests genius, but it is not difficult to remember works of his that showed vigor without charm.

Still further, the exhibitors have succeeded more nearly than ever before in presenting Nature, not as the nomadic shepherd sees her, but as the artist feels her. There was as much in previous Society exhibitions that smacked of the nomadic shepherd. Let us not do injustice to the nomadic shepherd. The New York public is indebted to him for much immensely diverse. His terrible cañons and Yosemite precipices and impudent mists at the National Academy, his Munich thatched roofs, and normal cents, and tremendous belts of sunset at the American Art Gallery—not a multitude of boors entertained by them? Of course we unanimated boors, as to whom the gods have denied the divine afflatus, the few envy, as we Nature as well as that ourselves. But since all art is a language, and the function of language is to express thoughts, we look to the artist to tell us something which we did not know before, to show us something which otherwise we might have passed by, to put Nature before us in the aspect in which she reveals herself to him, and because he can perform this high deed we respect him. In spite of several infelicities of pose and background—the work would be unexceptionably happy were it a quarter-length instead of a full-length—Mr Jerry B. Sweney's "Portrait of a Lady" in black, she holds a white rose in her extended left hand, exercises the choicest prerogatives of art. The nomadic shepherd never saw the face that Mr Sargent has painted—its warm glow, its soft pliancy, its lithe movement.

This advance in the quality of the exhibition has been made in the teeth of several obstacles. Most of the exhibitors are young, and there are certain indispensable matters of technique and sentiment in which the young do not, because they can not, excel, for instance, the exact adjustment of the thickness of pigment required for the lights, and the thinness of pigment required for the shadows. A painter might have to be sixty and never discover it. Many painters, indeed, die first. Yet the lack of it is never a grievous fault. Moreover, some of the exhibitors, for reasons not to be noted here, even if positively known, are to the country while in Europe better pictures than they have since been able to paint, and thus discounted their reputation in order prematurely to draw upon their fame. Necessarily much time must be lost in overcoming this hinderance. Finally, the public, startled at first into talk about, if not into affection for, "the new style of painting" as promulgated by the Society of American Artists, has at length settled into an attitude of more or less indifference toward triumphs of the brush that are too easy. "Why, the girl pupils of those young masters," it said, "can paint as well as the young modern themselves," and along with the saying came the remembrance that the work which has survived the rapines of taste, and has lived in the admiration of hundreds of successive generations, was not easily done at all.

G. W. Sheldon.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

In a coal mine in Dallas County, Iowa, at a distance of over a hundred feet below the surface of the earth, an [illegible] of the front part of a human head has been found. It is said that the nose, mouth, and forehead are so nearly perfect as to enable us to [illegible] any failed rather than that the image was [illegible] human hands. The circumstances of the discovery are said to be such as to do away with any suspicions which might be entertained by persons familiar with the case of Brown, of Calaveras County, formerly of the South.

It is said that flower buds may be sent almost any distance without withering if the stems are inserted in holes bored in a potato. There is sufficient moisture in a good-sized potato, it is asserted, to keep flowers fresh for two weeks in a moderately cool temperature.

A course in electrical engineering has been established at Cornell University, and costly and extensive apparatus has been ordered. There is already a vast field for the utilization of knowledge such as the course is designed to impart, and the field promises to grow larger every year. The comparatively few persons who have kept up with the rapid progress that has been made of late in this department of knowledge are well paid. "There is room for many more.

A gentleman of death was presented in Chicago not long ago on which the attending physician had written his name, perhaps inadvertently, in the space left for "cause of death."

An interesting question was recently decided in a Paris court. M Menard, a bibliophile, had a French Book of Hours, which was of little value of itself, but there were a dozen fly-leaf [illegible] on which were the autographs of Louis XIV., Marie Therese, and Bossuet. There he [illegible] ly that he insured the book for a thousand dollars. There was a fire in his library, and the fly-leaf of the book was destroyed, though the book itself was uninjured. The insurance company refused to pay the thousand dollars which M Menard demanded, declining to accept any responsibility for the "lost scrap of paper," and it won the suit which grew out of the disagreement.

The Western Union Telegraph Company, anticipating the enforcement of an ordinance adopted in Chicago requiring that the wires in that city be removed, has begun substituting aerial cables. It is estimated that not more than four cables will be required in any street, and it is proposed to string them to poles three feet four above the pavement in such a way that they may be let down in case of fire. In each cable there will be eighteen copper conducting wires. Something similar to this arrangement may be seen in New York, where the cables from the North River are carried under the elevated railway structure at Fifty-Street and up to the roof of the Western Union Building. The skein of several cables gives variety but not picturesqueness to the dazzling of wires that intervenes the street if the Chicago Common Council consents to aerial cables on a compromise, the unsightly poles will remain, and it is probable that in time the number of cables will become almost as great as the number of single wires at present.

The last day of March was the one hundred and twenty-first day of continuous sleighing in Saratoga. On that day the fields around New York were white with snow, and in the interior of the State there was a prospect that the sleighing would last for weeks.

The engravings of the drawings by Mr Smillie and Mr Close in this number of the Weekly are enlarged from illustrations from Charles M Kurtz's Illustrated Art Notes upon the Academy Exhibition. This publication, now in its third year, contains a running commentary on the exhibition, and illustrations—mostly reproduced from drawings by the artists—of objects specially selected pictures. It gives biographical sketches of the artists whose works are reproduced, and diagrams of the galleries, showing the positions of the pictures on the walls.

We copy from the American Car Builder the accompanying cut of the first locomotive constructed in America. It was built in 1829 by Peter Cooper, who at that time owned lands on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, which had been constructed to be operated by horses. Believing that the value of the lands would be enhanced if the cars were run by a steam locomotive which could round the sharp curves of that road, Mr Cooper built one which he called the "Tom Thumb." It had an upright boiler 20 inches in diameter by 5 feet high, fitted with gun barrels for tubes. It had a single cylinder 3½ inches by 14½ inches. The engine drove a large gear, which meshed into another smaller gear on the axle. The fire was urged by a fan driven by a belt. The driving wheels were 2½ feet in diameter. The wheels were "coned," and this was the first use of this principle on applied to car wheels, and was suggested by Mr Knight, chief engineer of the road. On the 28th of August, 1830, the first railroad car in America propelled by a locomotive was tested on the Baltimore and Ohio road. The "Tom Thumb" was coupled to a car in front of it containing a load of 44 men, including twenty-four passengers. The trip of thirteen miles was made in 1¼ hours, the best time for a single mile being 3½ minutes. The return trip was made in 37 minutes.

The East River Bridge was unexpectedly and informally opened to the public a few Sundays ago, under the immediate auspices of the mail boys who had gathered at the New York end of the structure to peer through the picket fence at the long stretch of masonry and iron-work leading up to the central span. After the boys, by stealing past the military watchman, and leaping [illegible] an hopeless chasm up the incline, had brought him to a condition of despair, many other persons improved the opportunity to obtain entrance to the bridge. They found a smooth walk of concrete up on the point where the masonry ends and the approach is suspended from the cables. From there to the beginning of the masonry on the Brooklyn side, nearly a mile, there was an even flooring of boards. Near the middle of the great span, where the promenade rises above the cables and cross-trusses, an interesting view of the expanse of city and of water was afforded. Though it was chilly in the streets where cooperation of the north [illegible] was going on, the air was delightfully [illegible] those who lingered on the [illegible]. It was dark before the police [illegible] the bridge of the [illegible] many [illegible] who [illegible] from [illegible] who [illegible]

"THE QUEEN."—From the Painting by J. G. Brown.

THE COCK TAVERN, FLEET STREET, LONDON.—[See Page 237.]

AN APRIL WEDDING.

I'll never be friends with the swallows again.
In the April sun, in the April rain,
I will not catch
That I may catch
The dip and glint of their glancing flight
In the dewy dawn in the evening light.

They know how it was with my love and me,
For they heard him whisper, "Good-by to thee";
They heard him say,
"Some April day
The swallows and I will come back to thee."
Here are the swallows, but where is he?

We shall not be friends, though they are my guests;
Though they twitter, and chatter, and build their nests
Mid shadowing leaves
Under my eaves;
For they came alone, and they did not bring
The love of my heart and a golden ring.

It was rain and shine, it was dark and clear,
But her border sent hold a trembling fear,
And all was wrong—
The robin's song,
The primrose star, and the larches green—
Till a glad voice call'd her, "Helene! Helene!"

With a golden sun and a silver shower
Came the April joy of the wedding hour.
In earth or air
Now all is fair—
Blossom, and leaf, and the wild birds' strain—
Now one is friends with the swallows again.

"DISARMED!"

By MISS M. BETHAM-EDWARDS,

Author of "Kitty," "Richard the Redeemer," "Bertrand of Eaverel Priory," "Dr. Jacob," "The Starvecrow; or, the Outcast," etc.

CHAPTER I.

I never never understand why a man should be contemptuously spoken of as living by his wits. The surely the most charming compliment in the world. For the clung out existence on five thousand a year requires no uncommon parts. To saw, plane, or dig potatoes is within the narrowest capacity also. But no come into the world unencumbered with earthly goods, as a bird or a butterfly, to make the day's invention suffice for the day's needs! Here is a phenomenon that strikes the slowest imagination.

Can we examine the heartiness of the world without the engaging souls who, as the saying goes, live by their wits? From Homer to Harlequin, from Michael Angelo to Mountebank, the wit of the few alleviates the dullness of the many. Knowledge does not always gladden, philanthropy drives us mad. The contrivor of happy surprises orders society from universal pulvide. Begrudge not, then, thy expense to your poor Salmibungee, O fellow-groaner under the burdens of life! If he ease thee not of a leaden hour, he is sure to do such a service for neighbors in worse plight than thyself. Give him sixpence, ay, a shilling, cheerfully, and bless him into the bargain, for he also is a benefactor of humanity!

The blazing logs of a handsome fire lit up the winter twilight; silver tea service, vermilion hangings, and every other brilliant object in the room glowing with light and warmth, as one of four lazy loungers thus questioned another: "Arthura, what would you have done had you been born dull?"

The young lady never so much as lifted her eyes to the speaker, but continued to turn over the pages of her illustrated paper, dimpled arms and fair hand, on which sparkled diamonds, showing to as much advantage as if the leaves were turned for no other purpose. Then lazily and inoffensively, with eyes still bent on the page, she answered the question by putting another. "What have you done all your life?" Then came a malicious little laugh from the depths of one easy-chair, an interjection of reproof from the other, but the first speaker rose from his seat, and stood glaring at the offender.

"You are growing intolerable," he said. "But since you call me dull, I will be dull to you, and to your cost."

"Oh dear! don't, Mr Valerian," began a timid feminine voice. "Arthura did not mean it."

"Saw, Colley," cried the occupant of the chair opposite, "I forbid you to interfere. If Arthura and Valerian did not hate each other they would be as dull as you and I."

The first fatuo old lady sank back in her chair, breathing a sigh of resignation. The second leaned forward, all alertness. The war between them presented also a striking contrast, the girl quiet, even languid, the man evidently irritated past endurance.

"Such ingratitude it has never been my lot to punish, for punish you I will. Turn no more of your dull people over to me." Arthura only smiled. "The fact is you are fast being spoiled. But your task from to-day will be to make bricks without straw. No appeal shall induce me to have pity on you."

Arthura laughed. "You should not put such questions. I can not help it if I do really find you dull sometimes."

"Do not say that, dear Arthura," again remonstrated Mademoiselle Colette; but she was straightway silenced by her formidable hostess.

"It is your book-learning, perhaps," the girl went on, to the quietest manner. "Nothing but books, books, books, from morning till night. I should grow into a dullard too if I read as many."

"You might be more of a scollard with advantage," retorted the other. "It is surely as well to know the three R's. Don't, however, look to me any more to instruct your ignorance. Find some one else to teach you what every housemaid ought to know." Thus saying, the irate speaker dashed out of the room, Arthura's provoking little laugh reaching him on the threshold.

"What a question to ask! Yet it sets one thinking," she said, looking in the fire. "Why are or many people dull, I wonder? I suppose it is the curse of sin, the old Adam in us. And what should I have done had I been thus afflicted?" A blind man gets a dog to lead him; a cripple can buy a wooden leg, trumpets supply ears. But what shop could I go to for a parcel of wit? And a spy beggar is worth a golden fool, and a farthing's worth of wit fair change for fifty pound, says the proverb."

"Does the proverb really say so?" asked Colette. "But why did you not say this to Mr Valerian? It would have amused him. It would have put him in a good temper."

"Let Mr. Valerian be," answered Arthura. "He tries to crush me with his learning. But I am his match with the tongue."

"Don't quarrel—pray don't quarrel. Try to see his best side," pleaded the little Frenchwoman.

"Will you always be a child?" broke in the laborer of the house. "My dear good Colley, if Arthura and Valerian try to crush each other, where's the harm? Leave the rivals alone."

"Why should they be rivals?" asked Colette, with a tone of pain.

"Why should they not be rivals? That is as rational a question. But now apetwise for the business of dressing! Be sure to look to and give me a finishing touch, Arthura. Benson knows no more how to dress me than if she had been lady-in-waiting to a savage with only shell fringes for wardrobe."

The three ladies rose, Arthura soon to appear in her patroness's dressing-chamber well dressed enough for a handsome girl of twenty-three, even had she been an heiress instead of an underling.

"Are you going to wear all these?" she asked, glancing at the dressing-table with unabashed girlish amusement. It glittered with gold and powder, and from her seat before the mirror their withered owner contemplated the treasure, smiling an odd smile of satisfaction.

"Now, Arthura, the truth. Is it worth while for an old woman like me to trick herself out with rubies and pearls?"

Arthura was curiously turning over the first ornaments that came to hand. Dazzling indeed was the display! Amethyst contrasted with topaz—the violet and the crocus, chrysolites, glowworm among gems; opals for pensive loveliness, and rubies for rosy lips and smiles, the coldest yet bewitching sapphire, azure of heaven's own, pearls for princesses born, and diamonds for nature's duchesses, with heaps of gold and silver beaten into beautiful shapes, broken sun-rays, rippling moonlight—all were here, and the girl contemplated them with the unerring eye of youth content to be itself. Thus questioned, she looked straight at the speaker, then at the reflection of the small shrunken face opposite.

"No," was the prompt answer. "If I were sitting before the glass as you are now, and looking at myself, I should say it is not worth while. But seated at the head of the dinner table, and seeing everybody staring, not at me, but at my diamonds, I should say, Yes, is it worth while."

Miss Hermitage laughed that weirdly little laugh so full of character. "I knew I should get no beating about the bush from you, Miss Speak your mind. Then I am bound to befool myself because jewels impress people?"

"And amuse them."

"You are right. It is our duty to amuse people. What is amusement but another name for happiness?" Miss Hermitage said. "Why was I unhappy in my youth? Because I never got my amusement. Why am I as happy now as the day is long, though but a withered old woman? Because I am amused."

"Then we will wear as many jewels as we can carry, and never mind the preposterous figure we make," Arthura said, culling one or two trinkets of unusual size and splendor. "We will wear this, and this, and this," she added, adjusting circlet and star, clasp and aigrette.

"You are a perpetual riddle to me, Arthura. I do believe you are the only person on the house not afraid of me."

"Why should I be afraid of you, or any one? You can only send me away. I do not wish to go. But I must be unconcerned and outspoken sometimes. Well, yes, preposterous was too plain a word to use, yet I am sure, at my age and in my place, you would have had it in your mind."

"Never mind the word. One thing is certain, I hear all your sharp speeches. You can say nothing harden of me out of hearing."

"These diamonds set off your velvet gown mightily," Arthura said, paying no heed to the last remark. "Yes, after all, age, not youth, is the time for jewels. They fascinate people's eyes, and turn their attention from deficiencies. They do the sparkling we can not do for ourselves. One, just one warm ornament, dearest Benalp. The diamond spray in your head-dress, and just one more, this dewdrop—it is nothing mean—to glisten under your chin."

"As you please, Miss Impertinent. That was not a stupid question Valerian put to you. What would have become of you had you been born dull? We had been talking of it just before, Colette and I, and saying how lucky it is that you can earn so much, and with all your incumbrances and responsibilities too. But now every one is dying to get you. I mean my old cousin, Mr Constantine, and my young cousin, Stephana—the countess, as we should call her."

"I love Mr Constantine, and the Countess Stephana bewitches me. But you are a good old-tyrant; I will stay with you till you turn me away."

"I shall not turn you away," was the good natured reply. "That is to say, as long as you amuse me. I must be amused."

"We will amuse you," Arthura said, gayly. "It would be hard indeed if we could not amuse ourselves when money drops from the trees like ripe apples."

"Money does not seem to have much to do with it. Who so gorgeous as yourself?"

"I think people are like flints," Arthura made quick reply, with that piquant gravity as opposed to her as exuberant mirth; "you must crush them to make the sparks fly."

"My dear Arthura, who has crushed you? Your father had a sweet temper, you say, although he was a rad— But never mind. And your step-mother is as harmless as a pet tortoise."

"Oh! I was not thinking of human beings, but circumstances. I am the luckiest person in the world, still"—here the young face clouded—"what if I should fall ill, should die, my father's debts unpaid, my little brother and sister unclothed, my step-mother helpless as a baby?"

"Well, you are not in the least likely to die just yet; so let us go down-stairs and enjoy ourselves. You answer for it that no one will be bored. The opening night of a season is critical."

But Arthura only laughed away these misgivings. Always gayest after a pensive thought, tonight she seemed irrepressible. Crushed or no, the sparks flew in all directions.

On the threshold of the dining room, just as she had opened the door for Miss Hermitage, she saw Valerian coming out of his study. Closing the door after her mistress, without shutting it, she awaited his just to say, with extraordinary bravura:

"You may be as dull as you please, Mr Valerian, but incivility before Miss Hermitage's guests is quite another matter. You remember the conditions on which you hired me into her service."

He bowed, even more frigid than herself. "I hope I know my duties as host without having to come to you for instruction," he said.

Then he opened the door, and Colette, looking tremblingly from one to the other, saw that they had at least made up their minds to a show of courtesy.

CHAPTER II.

Flirtation is of every age, and Miss Hermitage, who had been starved at seventeen, would eat and be filled at seventy. Do not ice-men relish pomegranates alone under the pole-star, and foggy Londoners delight in roses at Christmas-tide? The ineffable pastime of coquetry has no season, and may be indulged in when wigs are set as a snare instead of sunny curls or locks Hyperion, and are smile adornigh with his parted showing their not our own. Miss Hermitage was now amused in right good earnest. There were frightened maidens and sumptuous matrons in her salon, a fair company arrayed with the respect due to the richest hostess in the place. Our acknowledged beauty and ace finished coquette were there, of course; a last assemblage was ever without that like lovely dimples and queenly figures, arch smiles and eyes irresistible, were neglected for the oldest and least lovely woman present. The irony of the situation pleased Miss Hermitage. There she sat, like a young and beautiful queen on her throne, one knight holding her fan, another her bouquet, a third protecting her complexion from the fire by a hand-screen, a fourth seated obsequiously at her feet. These elevant henchmen, however, would not on the morrow make merry at their hostess's expense. A rich old maid is a Golconda, a river flowing over golden sands, to cavriers. Miss Hermitage was safe from fairer rivals in these hearts, beating calmly, strangers to passion. She accepted the chivalrous homage now paid to her, whether lay or clerical, smiling inwardly. The irony of it! In girlhood neglected, in middle life lodorn, in old age fêted, flattered, beloaded!

The dazzling evening had reached its acme, when two figures brought a new and romantic element into play. In a certain degree outward conformity and commonplaceness must stamp every company in which the men and women are dressed precisely after the same fashion. Here, without any surprise being intended, came one of those happy surprises alone enough to enliven the dullest fellowship.

Among the latest to do homage to their new sovereign was a small spare of ardent yet imposing appearance. He was so old that his dress, which for the most part belonged to the last century, well became him. Nor were his manners wholly of this. Ceremonious, courtly, fastidious, he must through his social observances with a mixture of airiness and solemnity that accorded with his costume—scrupulously fitting black silk hose, black knee-breeches, and long-lappeted coat of silky black cloth, and on his bosom ruffles of finest lawn, on which sparkled a diamond star. Diamonds also adorned his shoe-buckles. But engaging as was his general appearance, the fine, delicate features of the old cavalier attracted still more attention. Curved lines were not finer, more delicate, than this small, rare physiognomy, nor the smoothest vellum of more harmonious texture than his beardless cheek. He wore no wig to hide the baldness of a beautifully shaped head, and his carriage was erect as that of a soldier. This dainty apparition now stood before the lady of the house, kissing her hand, and bowing low, as if in the presence of majesty itself. The little knot of admirers made way, and Mr. Constantine sat down beside Miss Hermitage.

"Praise me, cousin," he began, "I have risen from my bed—I was going to say my grave—to pay my respects to you. Pray be congratulated. A brilliant assemblage, and superbly entertained. Whilst as regards your own appearance, it is faultless."

He bowed low to the diamonds. Miss Hermitage laughed.

"It all amuses me. Why should it not?"

"Why not, indeed? I see with pleasure, too, that the old family plate is at last called into requisition, for I confess that I stopped on my way to invigorate my old frame with a sip of your excellent Madeira. The gold and silver service, the crystal, the cuisine—everything making to a nicety."

"I have not lifted a finger. Valerian and Arthura arranged everything."

"Ah, that inscrutable creature with the legendary name! She ministered to my wants, and flitted about me so charmingly just now that I fairly lost my head."

"You are welcome to lose your head, Constantine, but I can not lose Arthura. I divine your covert meaning, Jessie that you are! But the girl is worth half my fortune to me."

"You are too rich, Christina, you have an admirable steward in your second cousin—sophew, I should say—"

"Valerian and I call each other cousins. I will be nobody's aunt," Miss Hermitage said, tartly. "It is a venerable title, and not to my taste."

"I ask pardon. Then there is that ingenious chirping little Frenchwoman, the dear creature I heard playing so divinely just no a—you here be-low."

"I could no more do without Colette than I could do without the other two. We have known each other for fifty years."

"Oh, misnamed Christina! You will not, then, spare me one out of the matchless three?"

"Cleverness is to be had for money. Go to the right market and bid for it, as I here done."

"Cleverness, yes. But oh, sprightliness, Arthura's bewitching audacity? Where can I find such a paragon? Well, go your ways. Who I am bid—it may be to-morrow—on my narrow bed, you will repent. Poor Constantine, you will say, 'If I had only humored him!'"

"Indeed I shall never think of you in your narrow bed. What good would it do?"

"Take me to your bosom now, then," said the old man, playfully. Make my few remaining days happy. I would go to the length of marrying you, cousin—on my soul I would—for the sake of being cheered be that pretty, pretty thing."

"I am much obliged to you. I will go to the length of saying that you may come and see me as often as you please for the sake of Arthura's society," Miss Hermitage said, with extreme good nature. "But here comes Stephana!—Constantine and Stephana! Will the stars fall next? I am indeed honored."

"I will offer my respects to our kinswoman later; your Madeira tempts me once more down stairs." So saying, Mr Constantine, doing reverence to his hostess after the stately fashion of several reigns ago, made way for the second apparition in Miss Hermitage's crowded reception-rooms. For the pale, pensive lady, almost unearthly-looking in her sadness, was also phenomenal in her dress. There were scorns of above dresses in the room, not one in the least like the white robe of Stephana. Other women wore pearls, but pearls seemed a part of her, and in her whole appearance, from the white flower shining in her dark hair and on her bosom to the diaphanous drapery floating about her like a cloud, was something shadowy, spirit-like, almost ghost-like, if a fair breathing creature can be compared to a ghost.

"My dear Stephana! I am glad to see that you have not quite given up this wicked world, and we are to be neighbors."

Stephana sat down, holding her cousin's hand, and fixing her large, brown, penetrating eyes upon her.

"I am glad also. Then your travels are over?"

"Yes, I shall never travel in foreign parts any more, unless to Paris. In ten years I have seen every place I wanted to see. I intend now to settle down and amuse myself for the rest of my life. I am the richest woman in the country, and I mean to get the utmost entertainment possible out of my money."

The large mesmerizing eyes of Stephana were still fastened on Miss Hermitage.

"Such large-hearted hospitality is much needed here. You will do real good," she added, gently.

"Now, Stephana, please do not talk to me about doing good. I do my charities handsomely to ease my conscience, and there the matter ends. I am always interested to see you, my dear, but the very word philanthropy drives me mad."

Stephana smiled away the other's asperity, and changed the subject. "Were you happy to Italy, on the Nile, in Dresden?" she asked.

"I was amused, if that is what you mean. Valerian and Colette managed every thing beautifully for me. I never had a dull moment."

"And I am sure you can never be dull now. That charming Arthura who came with your message! I fell in love with her at once. It is just the nature that does me good to come in contact with."

"Quite useless for any one to fall in love with Arthura," Miss Hermitage said, unwarrantably emphatic. "She is necessary to me, and nothing in the world shall induce me to part with her."

"You are happy indeed to find Arthura," Stephana answered, resignedly.

Miss Hermitage dropped her voice almost to a whisper. "You need not be lonely. Marry again. But now let us confabulate no longer. I am beholden to show myself—you also, as one of the house."

The pair rose, and Miss Hermitage pacing her arm within that of her tall and beautiful connection, went from one room to another. She had her especial reasons for looking after Valerian and Arthura. "Mind," she had whispered to her steward, "be civil to Arthura before our guests. She would be quite useless to me unless treated exactly as the same footing as yourself. The first person that flouts her shall be struck off my visiting list." She saw now with infinite satisfaction that after setting conversation agoing in the large salon, Valerian was making much of Arthura among the young people. Colette, always gay and talkative where music was concerned, had improvised a carpet dance. There was Valerian leading Arthura through the labyrinths of a cotillion, certainly without a smile on his face, yet cordial enough for the occasion. The dance over, he was introducing her to a partner here, a stately chaperon there, Arthure smiling graciously. "A wonderful piece of acting! Who would suppose them they hated each other?" Miss Hermitage mused. She was well pleased with both as she continued her survey. Apparently without any effort, they had made the evening full of pretty surprises, of which the impromptu ball was but one.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

OUNCES OF PREVENTION.

MOISTURE IN THE AIR.

Of the varying conditions of the air we breathe there are three which especially concern our health. They are its purity, its temperature, and the amount of moisture it contains.

Of these three the first two should be pretty well understood; if they are not, it is not for the lack of abundant discussion. But the questions which relate to the amount of moisture in the air are less discussed; they are seldom, indeed, stated very clearly. Of a dozen writers on hygiene whose books lie on my table, only one (Dr. W. H. Corfield) gives an accurate and adequate account of even the first principles of the subject.

Let us inquire, then, about the moisture that we breathe. We have to ask (1) How is water dissolved in air? (2) how can we know the amount in solution in any given place? (3) how much moisture in the air is desirable? and (4) in what ways can we regulate the amount in our sitting-rooms and houses?

1. Water dissolves in air in much the same way, and almost as readily, as sugar dissolves in water. But there is this unlikeness: the temperature of the air makes a vast difference in the amount that it will hold in solution. A cubic foot of air at the freezing point will contain only about two grains of water in solution, though more may be present in suspension, that is to say, in the shape of fog or cloud. But at 95° F.—with us a not infrequent summer temperature—this cubic foot of air will contain seventeen grains of water, and the two grains of moisture only would be quite lost in it, as insensible. It is as if a glass of cold water sugared should lose its sweetness by being warmed. Still, whether with two grains of water at the freezing point, or with seventeen grains at 95°, the air is said to be saturated, i. e., it holds all the moisture that it can dissolve, and in either case this complete saturation is expressed by the number 100. A half saturation would then be expressed by 50, and that degree would mean about one grain of water per cubic foot at the freezing-point, eight and a half grains at 95°, and some other amount at each point of the thermometrical scale. At the comfortable winter temperature, for in-doors, of 68° complete saturation means about seven grains of water per cubic foot.

Now let us suppose that it is clear cold weather. Two grains of water per foot is all that the outside air, at the freezing point, can contain. But our sitting-room is ventilated from that outside air, which we have warmed to 68°, or perhaps higher, and at 68° it requires seven grains of water for saturation. This heated air, therefore, is at most only two-fifths saturated; in other words, it is dry, and it may contain very much less than the amount of moisture that most persons require for health and comfort.

2. How are we to know, and conveniently measure, the deficiency or the excess of moisture in the air?

The hygrometer tells us the degree of saturation, whether excessive or deficient, at any temperature. Of several kinds, Daniell's hygrometer is the best. It is very accurately made by Tagliabue, of New York. The instrument consists of two precisely similar thermometers. The bulb of one is covered by a little piece of thin linen, which dips into a small receptacle of water attached to it. The capillary attraction keeps it continually moist, and evaporation from the surface of the bulb thus goes on continually, except when the surrounding air is already saturated, or as full of moisture as it can hold. Then, of course, there is no evaporation from the wet bulb, and consequently no chilling of the wet bulb, the water upon it being of the same temperature as the air of the room, and the two thermometers will stand at the same mark, high or low. This means, therefore, that the air is saturated; in winter time the moisture on window-panes will tell you the same thing, at least of the cooler air next to the windows. The warmer air toward the middle of the room may be comparatively dry at the same moment.

But when the air is not saturated, then evaporation from around the bulb goes on, the bulb is cooled, and the mercury falls. This evaporation, and the consequent fall of temperature in the wet-bulb thermometer, give an exact measure of the dryness of the air. A considerable difference (6° or 8°) between the two thermometers means that a considerable evaporation is going on over the wet bulb; and this means that the surrounding air is comparatively dry, i. e., that it does not contain enough water to saturate it at the given temperature. And what does a small difference of temperature mean? It means that little evaporation is possible because the air is not dry, and no difference tells us that the air is already saturated.

3. The practical question is now, What is the proper degree of saturation? We need not know the actual quantity of water per cubic foot of air, for this [illegible], as we see, varies immensely with the temperature. The exact degrees of saturation for [illegible] temperature are expressed in tables which we need not concern ourselves with here. The practical rule is a very simple one. It is this: the difference between the wet bulb and the dry bulb thermometer should not be less than 4° F., nor more than 8°. Where the difference ranges between these extremes, we may consider the air to be about moist enough for health and comfort.

4. In what ways can we regulate the amount of moisture in the air of our apartments and our houses?

The atmosphere of a room may be either too moist or too dry for health and comfort. In the first case, a cold damp air without becomes a dry air when heated within, for the reasons that we have seen, namely, that its capacity to dissolve water being greatly increased by the heat, it is no longer saturated. But the air may easily be made too damp by moisture disengaged within the house itself, as by evaporation from boiling water—a phenomenon especially familiar to housekeepers on Mondays. The exhalations of the lungs and skin in a crowded apartment produce the same effect, and so does the combustion of many lights.

When the outer air is both hot and moist, as often in summer, we can not well warm it in order to dry it; in fact, we can do nothing but to ventilate thoroughly. But we can always make dry air moister; it remains for us to consider another time how that may best be done.

TITUS MUNSON COAN.

ON THE ATCHAFALAYA.

[FROM OUR ARTIST'S CORRESPONDENCE.]

I HAVE arrived at New Iberia after the most astonishing voyage it has ever been my fortune to make. Entering the Atchafalaya River, we found ourselves confronted by the great problem which is of such universal interest through the Southwest. Thirty-eight years since the farmers waded across the present sources of the Atchafalaya, and cattle browsed on the reeds growing in its bed. We found it, as you will see by the diagram, 122 feet deep, and lower down 165, until our line was broken by the current, and we had to stop sounding. As we got well into the river we found it about 250 yards wide, with the wildest kind of primitive forests on either side. The swollen current reached high up on these trees, rushing through them, and here and there undermining and uprooting huge cypresses and flinging them into the stream. The trees lodge against the banks and form drifts and rafts, until they again break away with the current.

At many places the water whirls in great circles, whose centre dips down like a saucer two feet beneath the surrounding current. Here and there it boils up as of a huge caldron, bringing with it various colored earths, showing the nature of the soil its deep channel is tearing away. Here and there it is joined by a sluggish red stream from the submerged forests. It is the overflow from the Red River, thus leaving its former outlet at the Mississippi for the new-found one cut to the Gulf. While crossing these currents or the wake of a steamer, the foam would toss completely over our pilot-house, and deluge our fires.

We stopped at few places; at most we had time only for a hail. Our gallant little steamer sometimes surged along sideways; again it had to back against, and then raced with, the river current, at a speed of sixteen miles per hour. A powerful river boat upward bound had to work back and forth across current to avoid "bows" and "races." Her progress resembled the crawl of a turtle. Alligators, turtles, and wild fowl abound along this wilderness. Our forward deck resembled an arsenal. Shot-guns, rifles, and revolvers lay along the rail, with piles of cartridges beside, and when not engaged in navigating the boat, a continual fusillade was kept up. Our crew was very expert with the "shooting-irons," and [illegible] the river. Whenever an extra large one [illegible] back [illegible] drifting [illegible] of the [illegible] to our keen [illegible] eight [illegible] would [illegible] The swiftness of the [illegible] prevented our saving many specimens; but the [illegible] made the hunt a [illegible] and many a savory dish graced our table toward the last of the "run." It sometimes took three-quarters of an hour to secure a turtle, after shooting, for we had to round to and struggle up stream, and one wounded duck kept us fully an hour, with several involuntary butting matches with the trunk; but it was a case of duck dinner or none, and success at last rewarded our efforts.

I give in my sketch a steamer passing a whirlpool. We were about shooting at an alligator on a log just entering one of these, when the log, caught by the current, "up-ended," and disappeared, "'gator" and all, before our astonished vision. They appeared a quarter of a mile farther down. We sounded—depth 160 feet.

We tied up to elm trees for the night, and were boarded by the curious character marked No. 8. He came aboard to "talk over the news." His face, hair, clothing, and boots were all of the same yellow parchment color. No. 9, the ash cabin, is a well-known place, most of the surveys of this section making their rendezvous there.

The question asked by all along our route is, "Do you think the Atchafalaya will absorb the Mississippi current?" Major WHITNEY, of the New Orleans Times-Democrat, who is in charge of this trip, is constantly visited by delegations from the towns on our route wishing information on this point. His opinion is that, unless immediate attention is paid to this work by the government, the Mississippi will flow bodily to the Gulf through this new-found outlet for the levee-bound flood waters. Such an event will ruin Bayou Sara, Baton Rouge, New Orleans, and all south coast cities depending on the river for support, for it will not only leave them high and dry, but necessitate the changing of the entire established transport system of the Southwest below the mouth of the Red River. The millions spent on the Eads river improvements and the present levee system would alike be thrown away. To be sure the route to the Gulf would be shortened some two hundred miles by allowing the change to take place, but it is still a question whether the new outlet, with its comparatively narrow and more turbulent channel, would not so increase the dangers of travel down, and labor and loss of time up, as to take away all advantages from the shorter cut to the Gulf.

The country we are now in is just as wonder-exciting for its beauty and productiveness as the Atchafalaya was for its wildness and swamps. Imagine a river or bayou two hundred feet wide, running between gently sloping banks covered with stately live-oaks and grass to the water's edge. We pass for days through one continuous scene of beauty and cultivation, while within sight of each other lie quaint little villages, connected with each other by the largest and finest sugar plantations in the world. We meet draw-bridges every few miles, of the most curious build and mechanism. The people are the happiest and most hospitable in the world.

We are besieged by invitations to stop and dine, to stay all night, to remain a week; months would be required to take advantage of their hospitality. The plantations are generally divided by the river into two parts, with a draw-bridge connecting. One old gentleman refused to allow his bridge-turner to open for us until we promised to land and take a "bite" with him. The dinner he served was fit for a king, and we didn't stop "biting" until four o'clock. We landed at one. I told Major WHITNEY to stop again at his peril, for these people would certainly kill us with kindness. Messengers on horseback are sent down-stream to meet and engage us beforehand.

SOME ANECDOTES OF WASHINGTON IRVING.

You ask me to give you a few new anecdotes of Washington Irving.

One bright morning before breakfast, when most of the family were gathered on the western piazza at Sunnyside, our attention was attracted by the loud cries of a beautiful bird which was flying around and repeatedly dashing itself against the trunk of a locust-tree near by. We quickly discovered that a red squirrel had robbed a bird's nest of an egg, which he held in his mouth, and, like an adroit tactician, merely moved a little way around the trunk of the tree, out of the bird's way, when it flew fiercely toward it, and endeavored to peck it with its bill or beat it with its wings. In a little while the poor bird was so injured that it was forced to withdraw. Then the squirrel with the greatest impudence came out on a limb of the tree, gleefully cracked the egg, devoured its contents, and dropped the pieces of the shell almost at our feet. Mr Irving was soon in almost as much distress as the bird, exclaimed against the barbarity of squirrels in general, and ordered all on his grounds to be shot. He loved all living and pleasant things, but birds especially. Every one may not recollect the time when Mr Irving was walking about his grounds with a friend, and passed very near to a bird's nest upon which the mother bird was sitting. His friend noticed the tameness of the bird, when Mr Irving said, "Oh, we know each other very well; I often go by the nest, and we always look at each other, but she is not afraid of me, nor I of her."

He once told inimitably the salient points of a little adventure he had in company with the French and Russian ambassadors and Sir David Wilkie, when they were travelling in the most unostentatious way on the Mediterranean shore of Spain. Wilkie was amusing himself with making sketches of the [illegible] and [illegible] when they were [illegible] surrounded and arrested as spies and taken before a little village alcalde, who in a very fierce and pompous way demanded who they were. The Russian ambassador replied that he had the honor to represent His Majesty the Emperor of Russia at the court of Spain. The outraged functionary burst out in a paroxysm of rage and invective against this supposed attempt to deceive and ridicule him, which was increased when the French ambassador made a similar reply. But turning to Mr Irving, who then looked like an Englishman, he said, "You, of course, will claim to represent his Majesty the King of Great Britain." He sobered down a little when Mr Irving replied, No, he merely represented the United States of America; and became still more thoughtful when Wilkie only claimed to be one of the court painters to his Majesty the King of England. At request they quickly produced documents and [illegible] to prove their identity, when the worthy little fellow fell into great terror from the fear that they would forward complaints against him. They earnestly assured him that he had only done his duty toward such suspicious-looking persons as they were, that they were merely travelling for relaxation and pleasure after their hard duties at Madrid, and that he had furnished them with materials for many a pleasant afterthought. They invited him to dinner, and made so much of him that I fear the report is true that he was left under the table by their good cheer.

In my visits to Sunnyside I generally preferred a short walk along the railroad to a long drive around. Mr Irving was often watching for me at the southern window, and when I passed a curve in the road and came in sight, he would wave his hand or handkerchief to me, and then generally counted at [illegible]. He would be as gay and pleasant at the tea table, and [illegible] take his evening naps, that very frequently I could only learn from others how he had been. He seemed to think I would know all about him by looking at him, and would give my directions to his faithful niece, while all he had to do was to take all the doses he was directed to take as docilely as the best trained child. He never asked for particular information about his disorders, even about his heart, nor what medicine he was taking, or what its effect would be, but accepted whatever he was told. He never made a single impatient or querulous remark to me, and almost spoiled me for the treatment of all troublesome patients. When I expressed any special confidence or hope of benefit from some new prescription, he generally pleasantly wished me a good deal of success. He always came down to breakfast neatly shaven and attired, and I often could only judge from his wan face and trembling hands that he had had an unusually bad night. He always put on a dress suit and fresh linen for his three-o'clock dinner, and presided at the head of his table with old-time courtesy and geniality. But one time when he attempted to carve the dish before him, and found that he could not even force the fork into the meat, much less cut with the knife, he rose from the table uncomplainingly, and while the tears were streaming down all our faces, he turned pleasantly, looked at a long gray shawl which was trailing from his shoulders on the floor behind him, saying, "What a fine long tail our cat has got!" He retired to his sofa in the drawing-room, and soon was his old, cheery, brave, and pleasant self again.

One Sunday he preferred to stay at home, and asked me whether I would not like to go to church. On my return he inquired rather quizzically how I liked the church (which had been newly refitted), and the sermon, and the services, and all the proceedings. I then became aware that he knew what would happen to me if I went. He was a vestryman, and always carried around the plate when a collection was taken up, or sent some male member of his family to fill his place. I had been considerably taken aback in church when a silver plate was gravely handed to me to aid in taking up the collection, and would have been much more embarrassed if Mr George D. Morgan had not stepped forward and taken the plate from me just as I was stepping out of the pew to fulfill my friend's duties.

I once saw Mr Irving rudely jostled while getting into an omnibus by one of those ruffians who force themselves in ahead of any person weaker than themselves or more peaceable, who never give up their seats to a lady. The earnestly reproachful look of Mr Irving spoke volumes; his temper was under as good control as that of Washington, but he had full as much spirit, as many incidents given in his Life and Letters prove. This look was only equalled on another occasion when a wildly drunken and hatless man drove into Mr Grinnell's grounds, down to his house, thinking he was going to New Rochelle, where he wished to return after the celebration at the laying of the corner-stone of the monument to Major Andre's captors at Tarrytown. Mr Grinnell tried to have his horse put up, as it was late at night, and to have him accept a bed in the groom's rooms, and a good breakfast in the morning, when he would be fit to take his long drive of twenty or more miles. In his endeavors to convince the man that he was not fit to go to New Rochelle he asked him what had become of his hat. He felt all over his head, and looking directly at Mr Irving, said, "Some of you d——d b—gg—rs have got it; you have been playing tricks upon me all the afternoon."

Mr Irving was in the city when the first volume of the Life of Washington came out, and securing a copy, put it under his arm. One of his nephews offered to carry it for him; he replied, "No; I have carried it so long in my head that I can easily take it under my arm."

Excepting when he was under the heat of composition, Mr Irving rarely wrote later than two o'clock in the afternoon, stopping in time to dress for dinner, and gave up his afternoons and evenings to relaxation and pleasure. But sometimes he wrote fourteen or fifteen hours a day, and when the mood was on him could hardly sleep, and very unwisely thought it best to go on "until his brain was wrung dry," as he phrased it. He never recollected sleeping six hours consecutively in his whole life, and four hours at one time was a long sleep for him. When reasonably well he always enjoyed his wakeful nights, and often got up to read and write. He had had repeated attacks of intermittent fever both before and after I commenced my attendance, and when feverish or disturbed would "mobile," as he termed it, i. e., write one sentence over a dozen or twenty times, each one of them good and perfect, but none satisfactory to him. He would also re-arrange the chapter of the book in hand several different ways, and rewrite many parts. His nephew P. M. Irving, often at my suggestion, would then take his manuscript away from him and give it at once to the printers. He would then often try to make endless alterations in the proof-sheets, but these would often be withheld from him, and he never saw any, or at least very few, of the fifth volume of the Life of Washington. When that work was finished, and he had nothing to occupy his mind regularly and continuously, he became almost absolutely sleepless. Every remedy of every school of medicine—homœopathic, eclectic, and regular—often failed to procure him sleep, although he sometimes said I actually gave him in one night enough medicine to put a whole congregation to sleep. I then thought that this state came solely from over brain work, but have since [illegible] he had an attack of marked fever [illegible] late as the middle of [illegible], [illegible] he died in [illegible]ber. I [illegible] I had [illegible] as [illegible] as I [illegible] and continued it as long [illegible] broken up or [illegible] find [illegible] that much suffering might have been [illegible]. I always acted kindly and well upon him, but was ever so as to no small doses as could prove beneficial, and its use was stopped as soon as the fever was broken.

JOHN C. PETERS, M.D.

THE HON. W. Q. GRESHAM, POSTMASTER-GENERAL.
Photographed by W. H. Potter.—[See Page 227.]

"JAMES NASMYTH, ENGINEER."

There can scarcely ever have been a happier or more useful life-time than that which "JAMES NASMYTH, Engineer," led, and recorded in an autobiography, which has been edited by SAMUEL SMILES, and could be got otherwise. He dabbled in chemistry; he learned how to temper steel. Before he had left school he knew for himself many things that the school did not teach. After he left school he was abandoned to his own devices, and these were all mechanical. He made and sold working models of steam-engines, and before he was eighteen had made with his own hands a steam-engine which supplied power to a foundry. In his twentieth year he made a practicable steam-carriage for use on common roads. His ambition was to be connected with MAUDSLEY'S, in London, then the most famous iron-works in Great Britain, and he attained it by submitting to the head of the great house a working model of a steam-engine and a series of mechanical drawings.

In London he cooked his own food, and spent his holidays in the search and study of machinery. Shortly after MAUDSLEY'S death, NASMYTH, being then twenty-three, set up in business for himself near Manchester, in the Bridgewater Foundry, which was to become very famous under his conduct. The simple story he tells of his early struggles, which were not severe enough either to break his strength or to embitter his spirit, is extremely interesting, especially the recital of his resistance to the trades-unions, and the successful stand he made for "free trade in ability," and for his right to pay men what they were worth. His first and only strike ended by the importation from Scotland to Lancashire of men to take the places of the strikers. But the labor troubles made him more keen to devise machine tools which did not strike nor get drunk, and inspired many fortunate inventions. The most famous of these was the steam-hammer. The necessity which was the mother of this invention was the discovery by the engineer of the Great Western Company, for which NASMYTH had already built twenty locomotives, that there was not a hammer in England powerful enough to forge the paddle-shaft of a large steamer the company desired to build for the Bristol and New York trade. His own account of the exhibition of the hammer to the Lords of the Admiralty is too good and too characteristic not to be transcribed. "The admiral told them that the most interesting novelty in the dock-yard was the starting of NASMYTH'S steam-hammer. 'Very well,' they said, 'let us go and see that.' I was there, with the two mechanics I had brought with me from Patricroft, to erect the steam-hammer. I took share and share alike in the work. The Lords were introduced to me, and I proceeded to show them the hammer. I passed it through the paces. I made it break an egg-shell in a wine-glass without injuring the glass. It was as nearly effected by the two-and-a-half ton hammer as if it had been done by an egg-spoon. Then I had a great mass of white-hot iron swung out of the furnace by a crane and placed upon the anvil-block. Down came the hammer on it with quick-rain blows. My Lords scattered, and flew to the extremities of the workshop for the splashes and sparks of hot metal flew about. I went on with the hurtling blows of the hammer, and kneaded the mass of iron as if it had been clay."

DANNEMORA IRON MINE.

It was the steam-hammer and the steam pile-driver, which was a modification of it, that made NASMYTH'S fortune. He was sent for to supply machine tools for the dock-yards and arsenals of France, Spain, Italy, and Russia, and every finished contract brought him new customers, so that he was able to retire at forty-eight with a reputation as an inventor in mechanics which has not been equalled in Great Britain except by WATT. His devices, patented or not worth the risk of patenting under the clumsy and costly British system, which has done so much to arrest invention, number more than forty, and nearly all of them are important, and have become part of the commonplaces of mechanical engineering.

It is hope able to read the autobiography without a hearty liking for the author. The very simplicity attracts the reader to the strong-minded and single-minded author, on whom, for example, in says: "My suggestions were zealously carried out by Colonel CHARRINGTON. He was one of the most clear-headed and intelligent men I have ever met with. And another very marked trait of the book is its genuine and kindliness. The optimism of an old man may not prove much in favor of his species, but it proves much in favor of the aged optimist. NASMYTH says: "I have heard a great deal about the ingratitude and self-ishness of the world. It may have been my good fortune, but I have never experienced either of those unfeeling conditions. On the whole, I have found a great deal of unselfish kindness among my fellow beings. They have often turned out of their way to do me a service." A man who talks in this way at seventy-four we may be sure is worthy of all the kindness he can have received.

PATRICROFT—RESIDENCE OF JAMES NASMYTH.

NASMYTH was a man of a type commoner here in this country than in his own—a born mechanician. He came, he tells us, of a family noted for handiness. The great-great-grandfather of JAMES NASMYTH, born in 1643, was a builder and architect, for the profession and the handicraft had not yet been divided, and rebuilt castles, and built houses and even forts. MICHAEL NASMYTH'S son and his grandson successively carried on his business, to which JAMES NASMYTH'S father succeeded in his turn, but abandoned it for painting, in which he had a local success, which was eclipsed by the career of his son PATMORE, the landscape painter, the friend and rival of CLARKSON STANFIELD and DAVID ROBERTS; and the elder NASMYTH is now remembered chiefly as the painter of the only [illegible] portrait of BURNS, that in the Royal Scottish Academy. But he was also a mechanic, with a private workshop, in which he put after the manner of the amateur mechanician, and in which he did many important things, such as the introduction of the bow and string bridge, now so common, and the method of driving rivets by compression instead of by blows.

JAMES NASMYTH underwent the usual classical schooling of the time, which he seems to have shed, without along the least trace of his scholastic reminiscences that he got by turning on his father's lathe better tops for his than the buy, and by making better kites and bows and sent and bored by himself—then published by HARPER & BROTHERS. A man who, starting with nothing, attains a competency at forty-eight, is commonly esteemed enviable, but NASMYTH'S success was far greater than that. He attained his competency by solid and indispensable services to society, the rendering of which had been a continual and high enjoyment to him. He was satisfied with enough, and he retired, not to be idle, but to gain time to prosecute researches and studies of his own, because his interest in life transcended even his keen interest in his business. This is indeed to be fortunate and enviable, and the felicity of such a life is completed when, as in NASMYTH'S case, the employments of his leisure are as fruitful in their way as the employments of what was in the strict sense his business.

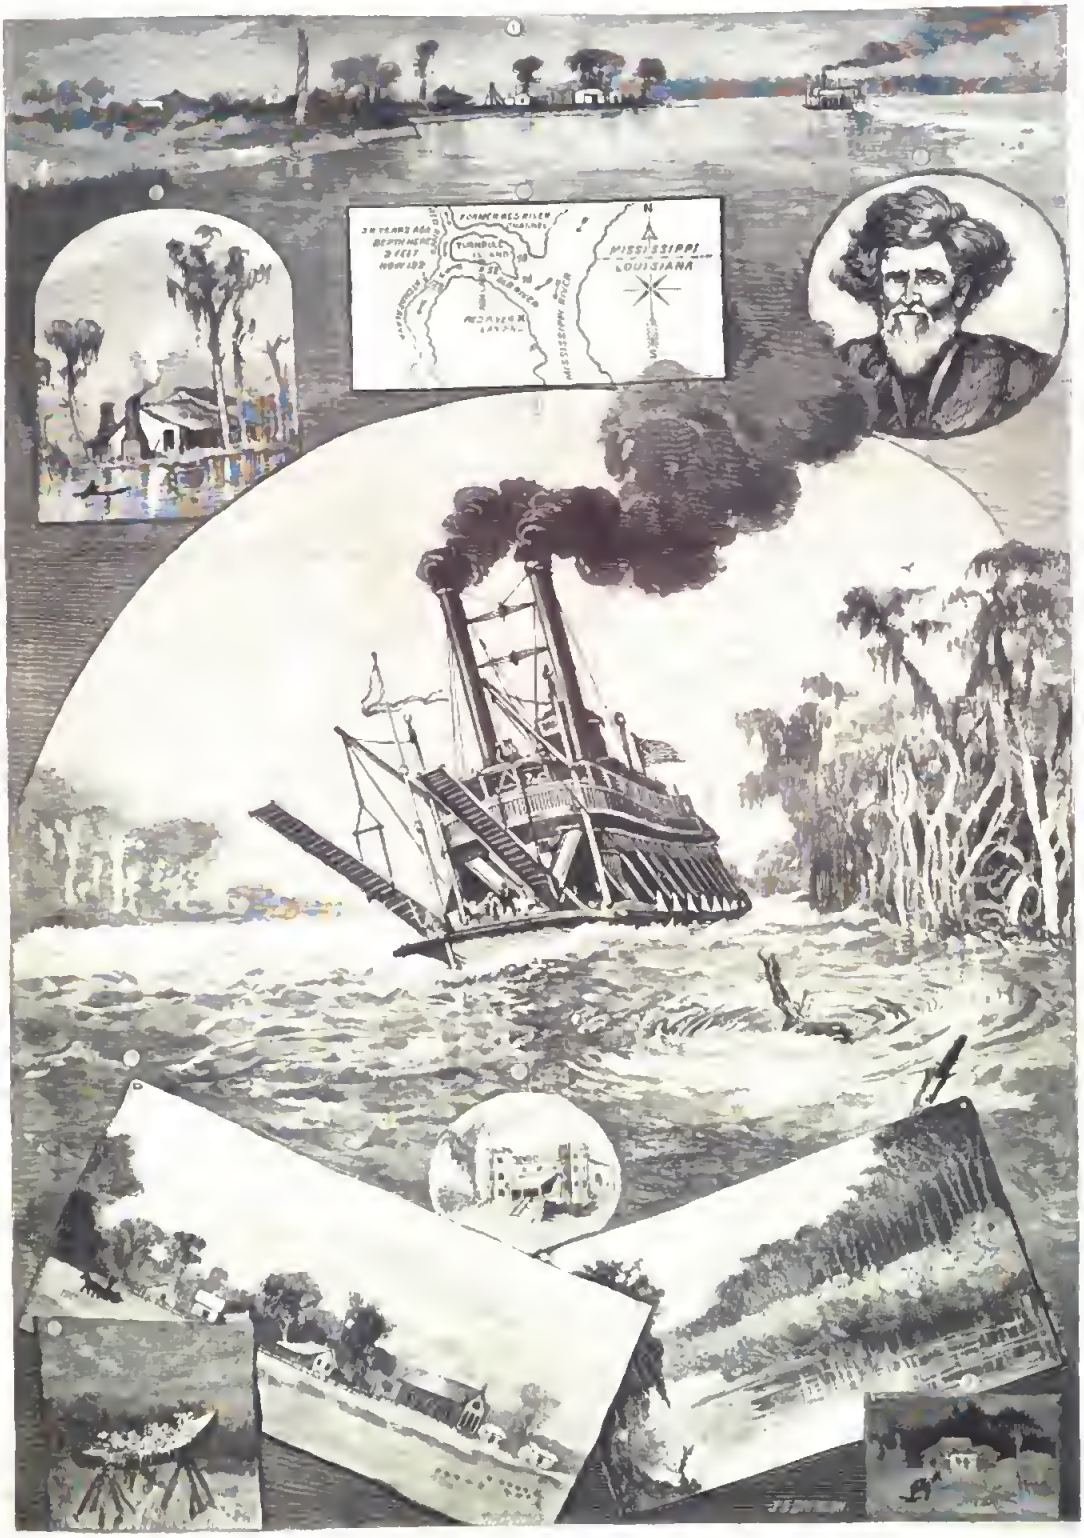
STEAM-HAMMER IN FULL WORK.



1. Entrance to Atchafalaya River. 2. A "Swamper's" House on the Atchafalaya. 3. A Swamper. 4. Steamer running the Rapids of the Atchafalaya.
5. Red River Landing. 6. Castle on the Atchafalaya. 7. Little Whiskey Bayou. 8. A Swamper's Garden (in a Canoe). 9. The Ash Cabin, Atchafalaya.
10. Map showing Changes in the Mississippi's Current.

A TRIP ON THE ATCHAFALAYA RIVER.—Drawn by J. O. Davidson.—[See Page 235.]

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE FOR NERVOUSNESS, INDIGESTION, &c. Send to the Rumford Chemical Works, Providence, R. I., for pamphlet. Mailed free.—[Adv.]

THE SAN JUAN CON. GOLD MINES, Rio Grande Co., Col., owned principally by Hon. Thomas M. Bowen, U. S. Senator. The Company's property consists of two fully developed true fissure lodes — patented. 160 acres of valuable placer claims on which other lodes have been discovered; a town site, upon which is a village of several hundred inhabitants, a gravity railroad, ten mills of 50 stamps, with usual buildings, &c. The mines yielded last nine months $310,219 gold; paid last dividend $30,000. Are the greatest gold mines on the Continent. Investment in its stock certain to pay at least 25 per cent. Brinnows Bros., 167 Broadway, N. Y., have a small block for sale. Full particulars can be obtained from them.—[Adv.]

Thousands of people testify to the merits of Piso's Cure for Consumption.—[Adv.]

BURNETT'S COCOAINE

Will cause the hair and keep it in a strong and healthy condition, because it will stimulate the roots of the hair and restore the natural action upon which its growth depends. Burnett's Flavoring Extracts are absolutely pure.—[Adv.]

For Coughs, Sore Throat, Asthma, Catarrh, and other diseases of the Bronchial Tubes, no more useful article can be found than "Brown's Bronchial Troches."—[Adv.]

Adapted to the needs of faded and failing hair, Parker's Hair Balsam ranks high as a reliable hair restorer.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1878.

BAKER'S

Breakfast Cocoa.

Warranted absolutely pure Cocoa, from which the excess of Oil has been removed. It has three times the strength of Cocoa mixed with Starch, Arrowroot or Sugar, and is therefore far more economical. It is delicious, nourishing, strengthening, easily digested, and admirably adapted for invalids as well as for persons in health.

Sold by Grocers everywhere.

W. BAKER & CO., Dorchester, Mass.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT. FINEST AND CHEAPEST MEAT FLAVORING STOCK FOR SOUPS, MADE DISHES, AND SAUCES.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT. An invaluable and palatable tonic in all cases of weak digestion and debility. "Is a success and a boon for which nations should feel grateful."—See "Medical Press," "Lancet," "British Medical Journal," &c.

CAUTION.—Genuine only with the fac-simile of Baron Liebig's Signature in Blue Ink across the Label. This caution is necessary, owing to various cheap and inferior substitutes being in the market.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT. To be had of all Storekeepers, Grocers, and Chemists. Sole Agents for the United States (wholesale only), C. DAVID & CO., 9 Fenchurch Avenue, London, England.

Sold wholesale in New York by PARK & TILFORD, SMITH & VANDERBEEK, ACKER, MERRALL, & CONDIT, McKESSON & ROBBINS, H. K. & F. B. THURBER & CO., W. H. SCHIEFFELIN & CO.

CATARRH

SANFORD'S RADICAL CURE,

The Great American Balsamic Distillation of Witch Hazel, American Pine, Canadian Fir, Marigold, Clover Blossom, etc.,

For the Immediate Relief and Permanent Cure of every form of Catarrh, from a Simple Head Cold or Influenza to the Loss of Smell, Taste, and Hearing, Cough, Bronchitis, and Incipient Consumption. Relief in five minutes in any and every case. Nothing like it. Grateful, fragrant, wholesome. Cure begins from first application, and is rapid, radical, permanent, and never failing.

One bottle Radical Cure, one Box Catarrhal Solvent and Sanford's Inhaler, all in one package, of all druggists for $1. Ask for SANFORD'S RADICAL CURE. WEEKS & POTTER, Boston.

The Jumbo Catalogue.

Just published, the largest and most complete Catalogue of all sporting-goods ever issued—in Lawn-Tennis, Base-Ball, Archery, Cricket, Foot-Ball, Fishing, Boating, and Gymnasium and Fireman's Goods, and all the latest novelties. 228 large pages, 5000 illustrations, on fine tinted paper. Price, by mail, 20 cts.

PECK & SNYDER, 126 to 130 Nassau St., N. Y.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address H. HALLETT & Co., Portland, Maine.

PORTRAITS! Oldest, Largest and Best House for Agents. Something New just produced. Artists, for terms, territory, &c., apply at once. THE ... & CO., Auburn, N. Y.

RIDLEYS'

FASHION MAGAZINE.

SPRING NUMBER NOW READY,

AND TELLS YOU

WHAT TO WEAR AND HOW TO OBTAIN IT

At the Lowest New York Prices.

THE SUPREMACY OF SPRING HAVING ASSERTED ITSELF, RAIMENTS SUITABLE TO THE SEASON ARE IN DEMAND, AND WHATEVER IS DESIRABLE, WE GIVE ASSURANCES CAN BE FOUND IN EACH OF OUR 52 DEPARTMENTS.

DRESS GOODS.

DRESS AND TRIMMING SILKS, FRINGES, LACES, TRIMMINGS, WHITE GOODS, LINENS, NOTIONS, RIBBONS, FLOWERS, FEATHERS,

AND IN FACT EVERYTHING

THAT CAN POSSIBLY BE NEEDED FOR WIFE, HUSBAND, OR CHILD, AT PRICES WHICH WE KNOW ARE CORRECT, and in EVERY CASE ARE THE SAME AS CHARGED AT OUR COUNTERS.

Orders by mail promptly and carefully attended to.

SAMPLES SENT ON APPLICATION.

MAGAZINE, 15 cents per Number.

EDW. RIDLEY & SONS,

309, 311, 313 to 321 Grand St.,

56, 58, 60, 62 to 70 ALLEN ST.,

59, 61, 63 ORCHARD ST., NEW YORK.

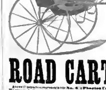
ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

Spring Styles in Misses' and Children's Paris Suits and Dresses; also, those of their own manufacture. Ladies' Tea Gowns, Morning Wrappers, and Dressing Sacques, Paris and Domestic Underwear, &c., &c. Wedding and Infants' Outfits in stock and to order.

Broadway and 19th St.

DRY GOODS BY MAIL. Delivered in any part of the United States at Boston Prices. Correspondence Free, also when desired samples of Dress Goods, from the largest and finest stock in the country. Write to Jordan, Marsh & Co., Boston, Mass.

THE BRADLEY



ROAD CART

Above illustration represents our No. 4 Phaeton Cart. We also make them with shaft... for jogging... The No. 2 Single Park Cart... weighs 140 lbs., and ... for ... use.

THREE STYLES weighing from 90 to 140 lbs. Prices from $55 to $90. All First-Class... Send for Illustrated Price List.

BRADLEY & CO. SYRACUSE, N. Y. ESTABLISHED 1832.

Universally prescribed by the Faculty.

TAMAR INDIEN GRILLON. A laxative and refreshing Fruit Lozenge for Constipation, hemorrhoids, bile, loss of appetite, cerebral congestion, &c. Prepared by E. GRILLON, Sole Proprietor, Pharmacien de 1re Classe de la Faculté de Paris, 27, rue Rambuteau, Paris. Sold by all Druggists. TAMAR, unlike pills and the usual purgatives, is agreeable to take, and never produces irritation.

CARDS. An Elegant New Set of Cards for 3c. stamp. W. H. PRINGLE, Rochester, N. Y.

$72 A WEEK. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly Outfit free. Address True & Co., Augusta, Maine.

Messrs.

JAMES McCREERY & CO.

Invite an inspection of their present stock of

SILKS AND VELVETS,

adapted for Spring and Summer usage.

The facilities they have for obtaining types of cloth and sketches of design prior to production enables them to make the newest distribution of color and combination and exhibit them in advance of any house in Europe.

JAMES McCREERY & CO.,

Broadway, corner 11th St.

THE GREAT SAUCE OF THE WORLD.

LEA & PERRINS'

Imparts the most delicious taste and zest to

EXTRACT of a LETTER from a MEDICAL GENTLEMAN at Madras, to his brother at WORCESTER, May, 1851. "Tell LEA & PERRINS that their sauce is highly esteemed in India, and is in my opinion, the most palatable, as well as the most wholesome sauce that is made."

SOUPS, GRAVIES, FISH, HOT & COLD MEATS, GAME, &c.

Lea & Perrins

Signature is on every bottle of GENUINE WORCESTERSHIRE SAUCE.

Sold and used throughout the world.

JOHN DUNCAN'S SONS,

AGENTS FOR THE UNITED STATES. NEW YORK.

DAKOTA.

Quick, safe, and sure investments for capitalists or residents in Oriska, Barnes County, Dakota. A new town on Northern Pacific Railroad, at crossing of N. W., twenty miles west of Dalrymple Farm. Special openings for Merchants in every line. Mechanics in demand; wages good. Well settled country in the line famous wheat belt. Correspondence solicited. References: Bank, Reed, & Company, New York; Hide & Leather Nat. Bank, Chicago. Address PERKINS, HOBBINS, & CO., Bankers, Oriska, Dakota.

THE ACME LEVER CUFF BUTTONS

Overcome all trouble with STIFF CUFFS.

Ask your Jeweller for them, and TAKE NO OTHER.

THE DINGEE & CONARD CO'S BEAUTIFUL EVER-BLOOMING

ROSES

The only establishment making a SPECIAL BUSINESS of ROSES. 60 LARGE HOUSES for ROSES alone. Strong Pot Plants suitable for immediate bloom delivered safely, postpaid, to any post-office. Splendid varieties, your choice, all labeled, for $1; 12 for $2; 19 for $3; 26 for $4; 35 for $5; 75 for $10; 100 for $13. We GIVE a Handsome Present of choice and valuable ROSES free with every order. Our NEW GUIDE, a complete Treatise on the Rose, 70 pp. elegantly illustrated—free to all.

THE DINGEE & CONARD CO., Rose Growers, West Grove, Chester Co., Pa.

CARLETON'S TREASURY of KNOWLEDGE. The best selling book ever known. The largest discount. Circulars free. Agents, address G. W. CARLETON & CO., Publishers, N. Y.

KEEP YOUR BIRD IN HEALTH and Song by using Sauer's Patent Gravel Paper. For sale by all druggists and bird and cage dealers. Price 25 cents. Depot, 582 Hudson Street, N. Y.

CAMPBELL'S Self-Acting Window Shade Rollers, Admitted Superior to All Others. Ask your upholsterer for them. Salesroom, 320 Centre Street, N. Y.

REASONS WHY MRS. THOMPSON'S PATENT WAVES

PAT. FEB. 6, 1877.

ARE BETTER THAN ALL OTHERS!

1.—The PATENT SPRING conforms itself to shape to EVERY head.
2.—They DO NOT look like a FALSE, wiggy look as all others have.
3.—They cannot tear or break apart, but outwear THREE of any other make.
4.—They CANNOT WRINKLE or SHRINK from dampness, but keep their shape for years.
5.—They do not fade or quality, for they don't require dressing as often as others.
6.—They are only dressed with a WET COMB, when they get RUFFLED, and are known to remain in TRIM for a year without redressing.
7.—I GUARANTEE EVERY ONE to be CURLY HAIR, or refund the money if not.
8.—MOST IMPORTANT: Every lady can look young and attractive with a THOMPSON WAVE, as hundreds will acknowledge it with pleasure.
9.—As I have 50 different styles of THOMPSON WAVES, every fancy can be gratified.

Beware of parties endeavoring to sell you Waves representing them to be the Thompson Wave, as I do not allow any other Dealer to sell my goods.

HEADQUARTERS OF

MRS. C. THOMPSON,

No. 32 East 14th Street, NEW YORK.

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

EPPS'S COCOA.

BREAKFAST.

"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately flavored beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

Made simply with boiling water or milk. Sold in tins only (½ lb. and lb.) by Grocers, labelled thus:

JAMES EPPS & Co., Homœopathic Chemists, London, England.

IMPORTED TILES & MOSAICS IN HEARTHS. FACINGS. BATH ROOMS & FLOORS. GRATES. FENDERS. ANDIRONS &c. EDWARD BOOTE 11 EAST 19TH ST. N.Y.

HARPER'S BAZAR CUT PAPER PATTERNS.

We have transferred our WHOLESALE PATTERN DEPARTMENT to Mr. J. G. CROTTY, No. 180 to 186 Cherry Street, New York, who will conduct it upon his own account and responsibility.

SPECIAL CAUTION.

We are not interested in nor responsible for any contracts made by J. G. CROTTY & CO., whether for HARPER'S BAZAR Patterns or for any other business.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

BOSS' PATENT GOLD WATCH CASES. Economy! Strength! Durability! ELEGANT DESIGNS! GUARANTEED for 20 Years!

PHONOGRAPHY, OR PHONETIC SHORT HAND. Catalogue of works by Benn Pitman, with alphabet and illustrations for beginners, sent on application. Address PHONOGRAPHIC INSTITUTE, Cin'ti, O.

EUROPE EDUCATIONAL EXCURSIONS 1883, Combining Unequalled Advantages. Send for Descriptive Circular, Free. E. TOURJEE, Franklin Square, Boston.

A CHARMING BOOK BY CAPT. FARRAR. "EASTWARD HO! or, Adventures at Rangeley Lakes." Cloth, 376 Pages, 8 Illustrations, by mail, $1.25. JAMAICA PUB. CO., Jamaica Plain, Mass.

CARDS New Styles, Gold Beveled Edge and Chromo Visiting Cards, finest quality, largest variety and lowest prices. 50 chromos with name, 10c., a present with each order. CLINTON BROS. & Co., Clintonville, Conn.

THE LATEST NOVELTY, Magazine Air Rifle. Send for circular to A. S. BRUSH, Manufacturer's Agent, P. O. Box 33, Cambridge, Mass.

AGENTS can now grasp a fortune. Outfit worth $10 free. Address E. G. RIDEOUT & CO., 10 Barclay St., N. Y.

40 Chromo Visiting Cards, no 2 alike, for 1883, name on, and Illustrated Premium List, 10c. Warranted best sold. Agents wanted. L. Jones & Co., Nassau, N. Y.

CARDS Send five 3c. stamps for new set of imported cards, "UMBRELLA." WHITING, 50 Nassau St., N. Y.

30 Fine White Gold Edge Cards, name on, 10c. Sample Book, 25c. E. SNOW & Co., Jersey City, N. J.

THE BIGGEST THING OUT Illustrated Book Sent Free. (new) E. NASON & CO., 111 Nassau St., New York.

50 Large Chromos, New and pretty as ever published. Name on, 10c. VANN & CO., New Haven, Conn.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

40 Gold & Silver Chromo Cards, no 2 alike, with name, 10c., postpaid. G. I. Reed & Co., Nassau, N. Y.

LUNDBORG'S RHENISH COLOGNE.

THE PREMIUM
to the Wives of Grocers has been pronounced by all who have seen it to be the handsomest and most valuable ever offered by a manufacturer to make the trade familiar with his name. The Case itself is a magnificent one, and the Silver Ware elegant, of beautiful pattern, and of the finest quality.

THE INSTANTANEOUS AND UNPARALLELED SUCCESS

Which has attended the introduction of The Frank Siddalls Soap among the readers of "HARPER'S WEEKLY" proves that it must be fully meeting all the expectations raised by the claims made for it;—and the many thousands of ladies who have been led by the advertisements to try the Soap, are now enthusiastic in their praises of it for all uses:

AN ARTICLE OF THE HIGHEST MERIT

TO GROCERS' WIVES
We offer a Special Premium of a beautiful set of Plated Silver Knives and Forks for simply giving The Frank Siddalls Soap a Thorough Trial.

REMEMBER IT IS ONE SOAP FOR ALL USES:—

For Laundry, Bath, Toilet, Hospital, Stable, Scrubbing and Dish-washing.

Better for the Laundry than any other Soap or any Washing Compound! Better for Washing an Infant than the Finest Imported Castile Soap!
Better for the Toilet than any Toilet Soap! Better for Shaving than any Shaving Soap! Better for Stable Use than Castile or Harness Soap!

And Remember, The Frank Siddalls Soap is here PUBLICLY GUARANTEED to do everything claimed in this advertisement, and to contain nothing to injure the most tender skin, the most delicate colors of the finest fabrics!

FOR LADIES TO READ

ONLY THINK! ONE SOAP FOR ALL USES!

To the Housekeeper and her Help, to the Boarding House Mistress and her Lady Boarders, to the Farmer's Wife and her Daughters, for the Toilet and Bath of Every Lady of Refinement, The Frank Siddalls Soap offers great advantages in Economy of Use, in its effect on the skin, and in its freedom from injury to the fabric.

Among the Housekeepers of New England (where thrifty Housekeeping is proverbial) it has gained immense favor, and there is no better evidence of the merits of an article than to be able to say that it meets approval in the Homes of New England.

FOR LAUNDRY AND KITCHEN USE

JUST THINK! No Scalding or Boiling! No Smell on Wash-day!
Clothes Clean and Beautifully White, and as Sweet as if never worn!
No Rough, Red Hands! Clothes remain White even if put away for years!
The Soap Positively Guaranteed not to injure even the Finest Laces!

Where water or fuel is scarce remember that with The Frank Siddalls Soap much less fuel is necessary, and a few buckets of water is enough for a large wash.

JUST THINK! Flannels and Blankets as soft as when New!
The most delicate Colored Lawns and Prints actually Brightened!
A girl of 12 or 13 can easily do a large wash without even tiring tired!
And best of all, the wash done in less than half the usual time!

Use The Frank Siddalls Soap for Washing Dishes—it is the only Soap that leaves the dishes Sweet and White, and the only Soap that can be depended upon to remove the smell of Fish, Onions, etc., from forks and dishes. When you have a dirty dish-rag don't blame your servants: it is not their fault, for you have given them a soap made of Rancid Grease, and the result is a foul dish-rag; use The Frank Siddalls Soap, made of Pure Beef Suet, and you will have a Clean, Sweet-smelling Cloth.

So here is the Housekeeper's Choice:
Common soap and a foul dish-rag—or—The Frank Siddalls Soap and a dish-rag to be proud of!

FOR HOUSE CLEANING

This is where The Frank Siddalls Soap appeals to the real Ladylike Housekeeper. Use it for Scrubbing and Cleaning [illegible] ordinary soap [illegible] not fit for washing [illegible] while The Frank Siddalls Soap is a most elegant thing for [illegible] purpose. Use it for Washing Marble Door Steps, Bureau Tops, Marble Statuary, Mantelpieces, etc.—it is the nicest thing for marble that can be imagined.

For Washing Bed Clothes and Bedding, etc. of Patients with Contagious and Infectious Diseases, and for washing utensils used in the Sick-room, it can be relied on to cleanse and purify without scalding or boiling a single article.

FOR WASHING BABIES AND BABY CLOTHES

Babies will not suffer with [illegible] but The Frank Siddalls Soap [illegible] its ingredients [illegible]

Don't use Soda to wash nursing bottles [illegible] don't even scald them—but wash them only with this Soap [illegible] sweet and clean.

FOR THE SCHOOL BOY AND GIRL

It is the best thing for washing blackboards and school slates, leaving them entirely free from grease [illegible]

FOR MEN TO READ

ONLY THINK! ONE SOAP FOR ALL USES!

The Merchant and his Clerk, the Photographer, the Optician, the Artist, the Printer, the Actor, the Bather at the Turkish Bath, the Barber, the Hotel-keeper, the Stable, the Railroad, the Army and the Navy will all [illegible] great benefit from the remarkable properties of The Frank Siddalls Soap.

FOR SHAVING

Its heavy, lasting lather is so different from that of any Shaving Soap that its superiority is almost incredible. [illegible] no matter how dull the razor, how tender the skin, [illegible] and the Sponge and Soap Cup will always be sweet-smelling.

IMPORTANT FOR SHIPBOARD AND ARMY USE: It washes freely in hard water, and where water is scarce remember that The Frank Siddalls Way of Washing only takes a few buckets of water for a large wash.

FOR HORSES, HARNESS, CARRIAGES, etc.

It is vastly superior to Castile Soap for washing a horse's mane and tail, while for washing Sores, Galls, Scratches, etc., it is indispensable. No stable is complete without it. For Harness, it is better than Harness Soap, thoroughly cleansing the leather and rendering it soft and pliable, while for washing cars and car windows, cleaning the running gear and bodies of the carriages [illegible] the paint and varnish will last much longer, and the Windows and Lamps will be as clear as crystal.

The Frank Siddalls Soap is elegant for washing Printing Ink from the hands, and from Printers' Rollers, Type, and Electrotypes, being much better than Benzine, and takes no shocking accidents by fire often occur from Benzine, and parents whose children use Amateur Printing Presses should remember this.

Type and Rollers washed with The Frank Siddalls Soap are in splendid condition for immediate use [illegible]

SPECIAL FOR PHYSICIANS

To the Physician, the Druggist, the Nurse and the Patient [illegible] and is [illegible] Imported Castile and [illegible] the Nursery and Hospital.

IN CASE OF INGROWING THE NAILS

In place of cotton-wool, a little of The Frank Siddalls Soap should be kept pressed between the nail and tender flesh—one trial will prove its superiority over cotton-wool.

AS AN ANTISEPTIC AND DISINFECTANT

For Washing [illegible] Wounds and Burns, for washing Chafed Places on Infants and Adults [illegible] Salt Rheum, Tetter, Ringworm, Itching, Piles, [illegible] with Scaly [illegible] and which cannot be accomplished by any other soap.

Letters from well known Physicians, describing their experience in their practice with The Frank Siddalls Soap leave no doubt of the truth of these assertions.

[illegible]

FOR THE TOILET IT IS SIMPLY PERFECTION

All Perfumes are injurious to the skin. The Frank Siddalls Soap [illegible] It should always be used for washing the [illegible] Skin [illegible] it always [illegible]

No tooth-powder or tooth-wash will compare with it.
A little on the tooth brush makes the mouth, teeth and gums perfectly clean.
It leaves a pleasant aromatic taste, a sweet breath and a clean tooth-brush.

[illegible]

PERSONS WHO DESPISE A MUSTY SPONGE or WASH-RAG will appreciate The Frank Siddalls Soap. [illegible] it is due entirely to the use of [illegible] toilet soap [illegible] The Frank Siddalls Soap will do it without any [illegible]

When used for washing the head it is better than Shampooing [illegible] Tonic, Bay Rum, Bandoline, Pomade or any hair-dressing [illegible] the hair will not collect dust [illegible] Hat Linings and Neck wear will keep clean much longer.

Try it for washing your Eye-Glasses and Spectacles.

The Frank Siddalls Soap [illegible]

OOO USES QUAINT USES—SPECIAL USES

[illegible]

For Washing [illegible] Coral, Diamonds, and other precious stones, Jewelry, Gold and Silver Plate, and [illegible] Watch Crystals, it is considered by Jewelers superior to any [illegible]

[illegible] with The Frank Siddalls Soap [illegible]

[illegible] taking grease spots out of fine carpets and for cleaning rag carpets, also for [illegible] It is better than Benzine or Hartshorn for cleaning [illegible] and is guaranteed not to injure the fabric.

[illegible] IT KEEPS THE [illegible] BRIGHT, [illegible]

The hands of those who work [illegible] Soap [illegible]

Milk Pans, Churns and Milk Utensils when washed with The Frank Siddalls Soap will be as clean [illegible] and do NOT require scalding or putting in the sun. [illegible]

HOW A LADY CAN GET THE SOAP TO TRY

at Places where it is Not Sold at the Stores.

Send the retail price 10 cents in money or Postage Stamps. Say she saw the advertisement in "Harper's Weekly" [illegible]

Promise No. 1—That the Soap shall be used the first wash day after receiving it [illegible]

Promise No. 2—That the person sending will personally see that the printed directions for using the Soap shall be exactly followed.

By return mail, a regular [illegible] postage prepaid, [illegible]

All this is done for [illegible]

If your letter gets no attention it will be because you have not made the promises, or because you have sent for more than one cake.

Make the promises very plain, as the Soap will NOT be sent.

A Cake will be sent Free of Charge to the Wife of a Grocer and the Wife of a Minister if the above TWO promises are made.

How to Tell a Person of Refinement.

A Person of Refinement will [illegible]

How to Tell a Person of Intelligence.

A Person of Intelligence will have no difficulty in understanding [illegible] the very easy and sensible directions.

How to Tell a Person of Honor.

A Person of Honor will [illegible] as to buy the Soap and not follow the directions so strongly urged.

How to Tell Sensible Persons.

Sensible Persons will not get mad, but will feel thankful that their attention has been directed to better methods.

And now don't get the old wash-boiler mended, but next wash-day give one honest trial to Frank Siddalls Way of Washing Clothes.

Only One Cake must be sent for, but after trying it, dealers will buy it from their wholesale houses to accommodate you, or you can order direct from the Factory.

You must NOT send for more than one cake: [illegible]

And Now for the Clean, Neat, Easy, Genteel Ladylike FRANK SIDDALLS WAY OF WASHING CLOTHES.

There is nothing intricate about these directions—any child over 12 years of age—who has common sense—will have no trouble in following them:—

A Wash-boiler MUST NOT be used [illegible] HEAT THE WASH WATER and as the wash water must only be lukewarm, a small kettle holds enough for a large wash.

A Wash-boiler will have a deposit formed on it from the atmosphere, in spite of the most careful housekeeper which injures the delicate ingredients that are in this Soap.

Be sure to heat the water in the tea-kettle.

THE FIRST TIME, no matter how odd it seems

Wash the White Flannels with the other White Pieces.

Be sure to always make the last water soapy; the clothes will NOT smell of the soap, but will be as sweet as if never worn, and stains that have been overlooked in washing will bleach out while drying, and the clothes will iron easier.

Always dissolve a small piece of Soap in the starch; it makes the ironing easier, and the clothes handsomer.

The Frank Siddalls Soap washes freely in hard water without Soda, Lye, or any washing compound; don't use Borax, Ammonia, or any other soap on any of the wash.

FIRST—[illegible] of lukewarm water; draw it out on a wash-board, and rub the Soap LIGHTLY over it so as not to [illegible] any of the soiled places. Then ROLL [illegible] when it is sprinkled for ironing, lay it in the bottom of the tub under the water and go [illegible] all the pieces have the soap rubbed on them and are rolled up.

Then go away for 20 minutes to one hour—by the clock—and let The Frank Siddalls Soap do its work.

NEXT—After soaking the FULL time, commence rubbing the clothes LIGHTLY on a wash-board AND THE DIRT WILL DROP OUT; turn the garments inside out to get at the seams, but DON'T use any more Soap; DON'T SCALD OR BOIL A SINGLE PIECE, OR THEY WILL TURN YELLOW; and DON'T wash through two waters. If the wash water gets too dirty, dip some out and add a little clean water; if it gets too cold for the hands add some hot water out of the tea kettle.

If a streak is hard to wash, rub some more Soap on it and throw it back into the suds for a few minutes.

NEXT COMES THE RINSING—which is to be done in lukewarm water, AND IS FOR THE PURPOSE OF GETTING THE DIRTY SUDS OUT, and is to be done as follows: Wash each piece LIGHTLY on a wash-board through the rinse-water (without using any more Soap) AND SEE THAT ALL THE DIRTY SUDS ARE GOT OUT. ANY SMART HOUSEKEEPER WILL KNOW JUST HOW TO DO THIS.

NEXT, the blue-water, which can be either lukewarm or cold; Use little or no Bluing, for this Soap takes the place of Bluing. STIR A PIECE OF THE SOAP in the blue-water UNTIL THE WATER GETS DECIDEDLY SOAPY. Put the clothes THROUGH THIS SOAPY BLUE-WATER, wring them, and hang up to dry WITHOUT ANY MORE RINSING and WITHOUT SCALDING or BOILING A SINGLE PIECE.

Afterwards soap the Colored Pieces and Colored Flannels, let them stand 20 minutes to 1 hour, and wash the same way as the white pieces, being sure to make the last rinse-water soapy.

THE MOST DELICATE COLORS WILL NOT FADE WHEN WASHED THIS WAY, BUT WILL BE THE BRIGHTER.

Address all Letters:—OFFICE OF THE FRANK SIDDALLS SOAP 1019 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

ANOTHER FIELD OF AMERICAN INDUSTRY INVADED BY THE CHINESE.
"No more Washee! Playee Base-ball! Jollee out Game, allee same Mellican man!"

PEARS' SOAP
The famous English Complexion Soap

Established in London 100 years.

A SPECIALTY FOR THE SKIN AND COMPLEXION
As recommended by the greatest English authority on the Skin,
PROFESSOR SIR ERASMUS WILSON, F.R.S.,
President of the Royal College of Surgeons.

15 INTERNATIONAL AWARDS.

Good Complexion & Nice Hands

Nothing adds so much to personal appearance as a bright clear complexion and a soft skin, with these the plainest features become attractive, without them the handsomest are but coldly impressive. Many a complexion is marred by impure alkaline and coloured Toilet Soap.

PEARS' SOAP

Is specially prepared for the delicate skin of ladies and children and others sensitive to the weather, winter or summer. In England it is pre-eminently the complexion Soap, and is recommended by all the best authorities, as, on account of its emollient, non-irritant character, Rough Skin, Redness and Chapping are prevented, and a clear bright appearance and soft velvety condition imparted and maintained, and a good, healthful and attractive complexion ensured. Its agreeable and lasting perfume, beautiful appearance, and soothing properties, commend it as the greatest luxury of the toilet. Its durability and consequent economy is remarkable.

THE BEST DRUGGISTS SELL IT.

MRS. LANGTRY.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY VAN DER WEYDE LONDON.

POND'S EXTRACT
THE WONDER OF HEALING!
CURES CATARRH

SYPHER & CO.
AND IMPORTANTE ADDITIONS FROM EUROPE
Antique Silver, Furniture, Clocks, Bronzes, and Articles of Vertu.
720 & 741 BROADWAY.

PUBLIC SPEAKERS

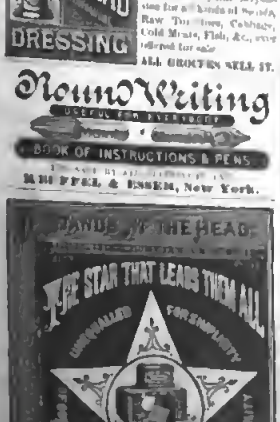
ARE often greatly annoyed, and their best efforts impaired by Bronchitis, caused by ... Hale's Honey of Horehound and Tar ... quickly soothing irritation of the ... and allaying, as by inhaled ... this ... does not only give temporary relief ... many other ... Pike's Toothache Drops Cure in one minute
Dilly's Hair and Whisker Dye, 50c.

BURKEE'S SALAD DRESSING

No Water. No Trouble. No Disappointment.
A GOOD SALAD ASSURED.
The finest Delicacies and the most Popular Mixtures for all kinds of Salads. Raw Tomatoes, Cabbage, Cold Meats, Fish, &c., ever offered for sale.
ALL GROCERS SELL IT.

FISHERMEN!
TWINE and NETTING
MANUFACTURED BY
BALTIMORE TWINE AND NET CO.
WM. J. HOOPER & SON,
No. 6 S. Calvert St., Baltimore, Md.

Round Writing
USEFUL FOR EVERYBODY
BOOK OF INSTRUCTIONS & PENS
MAILED FREE.
MILLER & EISEN, New York.



CONGRESS WATER.
Reports all. Cathartic, alterative. A specific for ... of the stomach, liver, bowels, or ... all impurities of the blood. Avoid ... harsh waters, ... and foreign. Such waters ... and ... the ... to ... Your ...

LOW, SON, & HAYDON'S
Flower de Luce
The Howard Tooth Brushes
HAVE
SECURELY FASTENED BRISTLES
AND CAN BE FOUND WITH ALL DRUGGISTS.

PINS BEARING THIS TRADE MARK. P&A ARE SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS
MANUFACTURED BY
THE PLUME & ATWOOD MFG CO.
WATERBURY, CONN.

THE BEST THE DUEBER WATCH CASE

HOW to Make $300 Yearly Profit with 10 Hours ... to ... ; Warren Street, New York. ... and free

MARLIN MAGAZINE RIFLE

45 Govt. and 40-60 Grain Cartridges.
... STRONG ... SAFE.
THE BEST RIFLE ... the world for Large Game ... Model ... Magazine ... and fewer ... Cost of any other rifle. MARLIN FIRE-ARMS CO. New Haven, Conn.

CATARRH
... am ... with Catarrh in ... phitis who earnestly desire relief, I can furnish a means of Permanent and Positive Cure. A Home Treatment. No Charge for consultation by mail. Valuable Treatise Free. Certificates from Doctors, Lawyers, Ministers, Business men, ... Rev. T. P. CHILDS Troy, Ohio

BABY CARRIAGE.—The Novelty. ... L. P. ... 490 Broadway, N.Y.

MAGIC LANTERNS AND STEREOPTICONS
FOR PUBLIC, SUNDAY-SCHOOL & HOME EXHIBITIONS
C. T. MILLIGAN.
... CATALOGUE ...

ASK FOR ILLUSTRATED CIRCULAR OF THE NEW DISSOLVING STEREOPTICON.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS
SOLD BY ALL DEALERS THROUGHOUT THE WORLD
GOLD MEDAL PARIS EXPOSITION—1878.

AMERICAN STAR SOFT CAPSULES THE BEST.
Also, Star Empty Capsules. All Druggists.

The Celebrated Wooton Rotary Desk.
Received every where with expressions of delight.
The loose sections are pivoted to the frame-work of ... of the desk, and with a slight ... of the ... the operator ... forward ... with, and proper facility ... tention of Books, Papers, &c. Twenty-four Pigeon-... filled with our Patent ... We supply the same ... to Cylinder ... desks. For particulars and prices ... address
THE WOOTON DESK MANUFACTURING CO., 49 Vance Block, Indianapolis, Ind., U.S.A.

WOOD-CARPET
FOR BORDERS RUGS
... Covering Papers, Oiling, ... Bath Rooms, Libraries, Halls, Offices, ... Send stamp for Book of Designs.

HERCULES MALT WINE

The most efficacious, delicious, and PUREST EXTRACT OF MALT in existence. An unequalled ... for INDIGESTION, MALNUTRITION, and DEBILITY, a thorough restorative for ENFEEBLED PERSONS, ... SUFFERERS, and Children of Delicate Health. Sold by all Druggists and fine Grocers, at $1. PER BOTTLE.

GOLD PENS.
PENCILS, HOLDERS, CASES, &c.
THE CALLI-GRAPHIC PEN.
A GOLD PEN and RUBBER HOLDER, combining ink for several days' writing. Can be carried in the pocket. Always ready for use. A luxury for persons who care to preserve their individuality in writing.
MABIE, TODD, & BARD, New York.
180 Broadway, ...
Send for Price-List.
OUR GOODS ARE SOLD BY FIRST-CLASS DEALERS.

EARL & WILSON'S PATENT "SHORT BAND" COLLARS AND "BEAD EDGE" CUFFS ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION

ALLEGHENY COLLEGE LIBRARY.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

Vol. XXVII.—No. 1374. NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 21, 1883. TEN CENTS A COPY $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Copyright, 1883, by Harper & Brothers.

"SHE RUNG HER HEAD."

VINEY'S CONVERSION AND COURTSHIP.

By SOPHIE SHEPARD.

I.

Viney felt that life was hard. Viney was a maid of sixteen, brown of color, and as pretty as one of Stoddard's South-sea Island girls—though for my part I have never quite believed in the charms of those winsome nymphs. In her soul Viney was a frivolous little wretch who loved to feast, flirt, sing, and dance, regardless of the fact that she might have to pay the piper. Her tastes, indeed, did not stand in the way of her usefulness, for Viney was "as handy as the next one"; she worked right royally when she worked, and oiled, it must be owned, after the same fashion. Her discontent now was not owing to the meanness of opportunity, for plenty of gayety went on about her. Fate in the shape of an elder sister stood between her and the desires of her heart. This sister, Mrs. Ally Phil Hancock by name, was a shining light in the Happy Hollow Baptist Church, and she put her foot down too hard for it to become entangled in "de devil's snares," as she called junketings of a worldly nature. Her special duty was to keep watch and ward over Viney, and train her in the way she should go. This was an easy task, for Viney was a born rebel. With a figure supple as that of the Bacchanal-thrower, strong statuesque arms, and extraordinary agility of motion, she would have been a terrific foe to meet in an Amazonian fray. But fortunately she was very good-natured, and extremely susceptible to kind words. "Sis Ally" managed her without the least trouble in life, when she followed her own ideas in the matter and did not allow herself to be too much guided by Elder Samson Buford, who had long regarded Viney as a "brand."

"De trouble is, Sis Ally," complained Viney one day, "you ain't nebber willin' for me ter have no fun."

"What you call fun, chile?" said Ally, good humoredly, resting one hand on her hips. Ally was ten years Viney's senior, "an' ten years ahead of her in looks," her admirers declared. The truth is, the sisters were exactly alike, except that for the last ten years one had been growing tall and the other broad—very broad.

"Well, picnics an' parties an' barbecues an' dancin'!"

"Dancin'! Now see here, Viney, dat's one thing you kin purpose yo' mine on, an' dat is dis: When de devil sees a sinner er-dancin', he is glad on it—powerful glad an it—an' he keeps rattlin' in de light wood knots ter make de fire double hetted for 'em."

"Dunno 'bout dat, but I does know dat you ain't willin' for me ter hab de joys or life."

"You'll nebber know dem joys, Viney, till you is a mother in de sharvard or de Lord, but if let's gaddlin' about you're hankerin' arter, I'm sure we have enough o' dat ter satisfy a cornorus."

"Yes, baptisin's an' funerals."

"Well, baptism's is very joyous occasions, an' funerals is improvin' to de soul, however dey harries de feelin's. An' den look at de two parties we is invited to attend wid our presence an' fat ter eat chicken pie, an' drink coffee, an' praise de Lord."

"'Pears like you don't have no interestin' folks at yo' 'semblages. Now if you would jes' sprinkle in a few young 'uns, like—like—"

"Like Jack Chaney, maybe you're tryin' ter say," said Ally, severely.

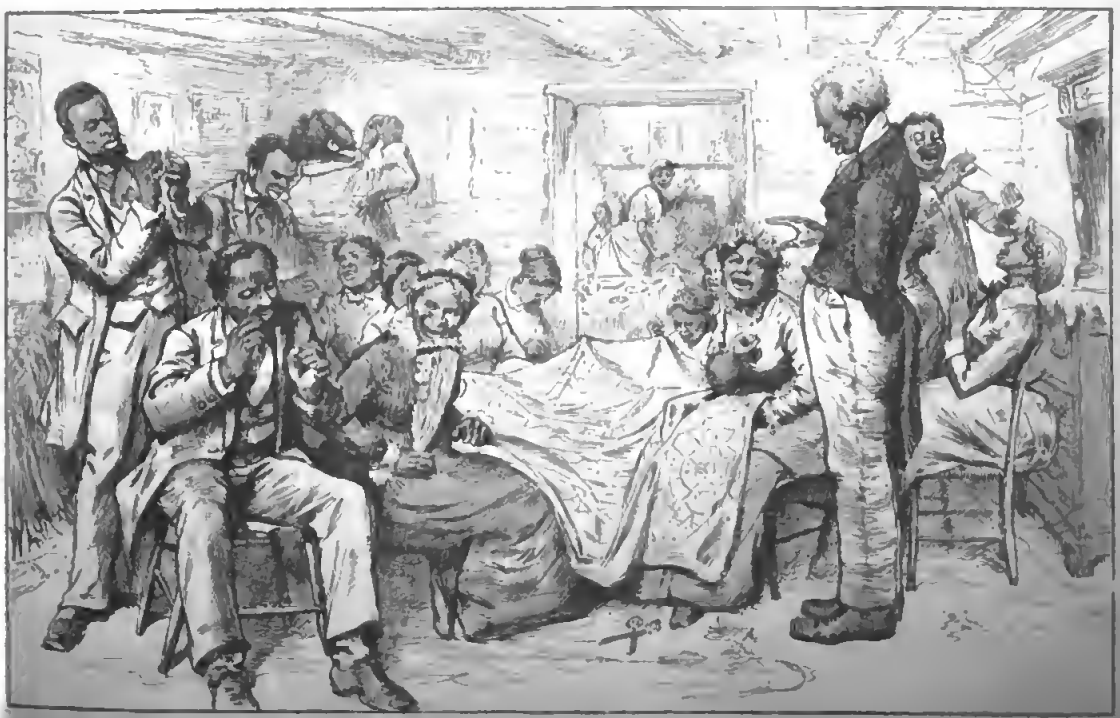
Viney blushed; and Ally knew she blushed, though no sign was visible through her dusky skin. She hung her head too, and dug her toes into the ground, but finally, plucking up heart of grace

"Spozin' I did mean Jack Chaney." I guess you kin cross many a waggin track widout meetin' anybody any fairer spoken den him. Now, Sis Ally, dat gran' quiltin' o' your'n, why don't you give Jack a invite?"

"He can't darken my do'," said Ally, solemnly. "Fur what does de hymn say?

'Blest is de man—'

(Continued on page 305.



THE "BROTHERS" ASSISTED IN THE QUILTING.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 21, 1883.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

AN OFFER TO YOUNG AMERICAN ARTISTS.

For the best original drawing to illustrate ALFRED DOMETT'S "Christmas Hymn"—the drawing to be suitable for publication in HARPER'S MAGAZINE, and to be the exclusive work of an American artist not over twenty-five years of age—MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS offer an award of THREE THOUSAND DOLLARS, upon the honorable understanding that the successful competitor shall use the same for the preparation of art studies in one or more of the best American schools, including also a sojourn abroad of at least six months for the study of the old masters. The award will be paid in such installments and at such times as shall best suit the convenience of the competitor for the purposes specified.

The drawings must be received by MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS not later than August 1, 1883, addressed "Art Competition, Harper's Magazine, Franklin Square, New York"; and each must be designated by an assumed name or motto, which should also be given, together with the real name, age, and residence of the artist, in a sealed envelope accompanying the drawings, and not to be opened until the result of the competition shall have been determined. The name of the successful competitor will not be publicly announced until the publication of the drawing.

MR. C. SWAIN HODGE, N.A., MR. F. D. MILLET, A.N.A.; and MR. CHARLES PARSONS, A.N.A., Superintendent of the Art Department, HARPER & BROTHERS, will act as judges of the competition.

It is intended to engrave the successful drawing on one page for HARPER'S MAGAZINE of December, 1883; and should other drawings submitted be found notable, second, third, and fourth awards will be made, as follows: one page HARPER'S WEEKLY, $2000; one page HARPER'S BAZAR, $2000; one page HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, $1000.

If the judges should decide that no one of the drawings is suitable, MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS reserve the right to extend the limit of time and re-open the competition.

Two Christmas Hymns by ALFRED DOMETT have been published. That published in 1837 is the one for the illustration of which artists are invited to compete, and a printed copy of it will be sent on application to

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

THE DYNAMITE CAMPAIGN.

NOBODY who is familiar with the facts, not even Mr PARNELL or Mr DAVITT, holds that the oppression of Ireland by England is now so cruel and hopeless as to justify armed and bloody [illegible]. Their policy, in view of all the abuses [illegible] corrected, is that of O'CONNELL [illegible] changes are to be sought by [illegible] that there has been no [illegible] injustice in Ireland is undeniable; [illegible] was largely responsible for it is unquestionable, that there is still much individual suffering due to individual wrong and to unwise laws is probable; and that all such injustice ought to be remedied every honest man will admit. On the other hand, that unjust laws in Ireland have been repealed, that immense abuses have been corrected, that the condition of the country has been greatly improved, that there is a general disposition in England to relieve all just complaint in Ireland, and that the head of the present ministry is a proved friend of Irish amelioration, are all familiar facts. In such a situation to begin a system of murder and anarchy as a means of helping Ireland, under the plea that England will do nothing that it is not forced to do, is merely a challenge to tremendous reprisals.

What is called the Dynamite policy is therefore, in the absence of reasonable justification of forcible revolution, simply agitation by assassination. It proposes to carry political objects by murder. If Congress will not pass a prohibitory tariff or decree free trade, it holds that the opposition should blow up the Capitol, and leave Senators and Representatives to their fate. It is, in fact, a project of extermination of the opposition, and Mr. LOWELL tells but the truth in saying that such a scheme is as repulsive to Americans as to all other civilized people. Mr. PARNELL is the leader and one of the founders of the Land League. He is a member of Parliament, and he approves Parliamentary agitation and the relief of Irish difficulties by laws passed in the usual way. To the Dynamite leaders this seems to be a milk-and-water method. Their plan is to blow up public buildings, and to destroy innocent men, women, and children, friends and opponents together, in order to coerce the Government to adopt some unknown and undefined course in Ireland, or to exasperate it to shake off Ireland altogether. Mr. PARNELL and Mr DAVITT and their friends are coming to stand for a Circuit in the Irish agitation, and man like the informer CASEY and his fellow-assassins are apparently to be the accepted leaders. The Dynamite policy is sheer anarchy and social dissolution as against humanity, civilization, and law. The intelligence and conscience of every country are against it as they are against piracy and poisoning. Every Dynamite agent is an enemy of human society, and in every civilized country whatever can be done, with due regard to the just guarantees of liberty and within the forms of law, to suppress criminal actions will certainly be done.

There are some readers who impatiently ask why England does not cut Ireland adrift. But what would happen, and by what right could any civilized country take such a responsibility without a free and fair demand honestly made and ascertained, and without opportunity for a careful and timely adjustment of terms? The condition of the Irish people is summed up in two words—poverty and ignorance. Ireland separated from England would be at once dominated by the most cruel despotism, that of the Dynamite agents. It would not be PARNELL and DAVITT and McCARTHY, but CASEY and BRADY and the assassins of Phœnix Park, who would rule a destitute and superstitious population. The "landlords" would be "brought to justice," and a saturnalia of terror would follow the "independence of Ireland." It is not a decent or an honorable answer to say that England might thank herself for it, because the real question is not the origin of the present situation, but its wise relief. Undoubtedly there may be a very large party in England for summary separation from Ireland. But separation would mean murderous desertion of those whom England is bound to protect, including Irishmen in England and both Englishmen and Irishmen in Ireland. The only humane course is legal remedy of wrongs. But every murder and explosion and outrage makes such remedy more difficult and improbable. It is the misfortune of this country that money is given here for "the cause of Ireland" which is probably devoted to criminal purposes, and it is very irritating to those who suffer by the crimes that money so given should be so used. But such transactions necessarily elude the law, because the money is not given for an avowed criminal object. If a man should professedly receive money to aid the perpetration of crime, the law could interfere. Or if there were declared war between England and Ireland, we should strictly observe neutrality. Or if a conspiracy to commit crime were known to the police, it would be suppressed. But the law can not prevent gifts of money to aid Ireland, or Germany, or France, or any other country. The people of the United States have no sympathy with crime of any kind or degree. They do not smile at the Irish situation because the English opinion of "society," and the clubs, and the ministry, was unfriendly to us in our great struggle. Whenever and wherever the United States can properly lay their hands upon Dynamite plotters and assassins they will not hesitate.

CIVIL SERVICE A SNAG.

THE passage of the administrative reform bill by Congress, in obedience to a very decisive and unmistakable expression of public opinion, naturally led to the introduction of similar bills in the State Legislatures of New York and Pennsylvania. This was especially proper, for it was in both of those States that the abuses and evils of the spoils system first appeared, and the surrender of JACKSON to what CLAY called the New York system, which MARCY defended in his famous phrase, was merely opening the national service to anschefs long established in the States, and which from JEFFERSON'S inauguration had been steadily besieging the general government. There are two bills pending in the New York Legislature, one a bill of the Reform Association, and adapting the Congressional bill to State conditions, and one introduced by Mr. ROOSEVELT, applicable to the city of New York. Mr. MILLER, of New York, also introduced a bill providing for inquiries into the number, duties, appointment, etc., of officers, both in the State and county service, which by his consent has been made a part of the first bill mentioned, which is supported by the Reform Association, and from which Mr. ROOSEVELT'S bill substantially differs, we believe, only in its mandatory character in regard to the city.

Upon the discussion of the bill the Democratic speakers made the same mistake that their fellow-partisans made in the Senate at Washington. They taunted the Republicans as being the sick monk, forgetting that they assumed the position of the well monk. Without denying the justice of their gibes at the trifling and the delay of the Republicans in dealing with the subject, it is evident that such sneering can not take the place of action. The Democrats have loudly demanded reform, and the demand was perfectly well understood to mean this particular kind of reform. Not only the party in general, but individual members of the party, have declared for it, and the country plainly expects and requires it. Nothing, indeed, now obstructs it but the class of professional politicians. In this situation it is useless, even with a party purpose, to say, with Mr. HAGGERTY in the New York Assembly, that the Democratic party is not to be bulldozed into sustaining a bill, but ought to take the subject up in its own time and way. The introduction of a bill providing for the reform to which the Democrats are pledged, and making it a special order, are in no sense bulldozing; and the Democratic party in Ohio, in Pennsylvania, and New York, has shown no disposition whatever to promote reform; while in Congress the opposition was almost exclusively Democratic.

The wise party course under the circumstances is precisely the same for both parties. The Democratic argument for doing nothing is that the Democratic party is sure to elect the next President, and that it is suicidal to abandon tha patronage. But the more obvious this position becomes—and it is already very evident—the more certain is Democratic defeat. The very fact that the Republicans aid their party immensely by favoring this reform should open Democratic eyes. Vague declamation about stopping peculation and correcting abuses, when accompanied by no mention of methods and by derision of all methods proposed, is child's play, and deceives nobody. How do the Democrats mean to stop peculation and correct abuses? Is it merely by electing Democrats? Then the country has only to look at Democratic government in the city of New York, and Democratic speeches and votes in Congress, and Democratic speeches and votes and acts in the Legislatures of New York and Pennsylvania and Ohio, and the tone of the Democratic press, to decide whether Democratic ascendency is in itself a security against abuses of administration. Governor CLEVELAND, who came in upon a "tidal wave," and truly that success in 1884 depended upon party conduct in the mean while. But the Governor is the only man in his party in New York who seems to be aware of the profound truth of his remark.

A NATIONAL UNIVERSITY.

WASHINGTON hoped to see a national university, and JOHN QUINCY ADAMS urged its erection. The project has been often revived, and a few years since it was pushed with some persistence. President ELIOT, of Harvard, in a very sagacious and timely pamphlet, pointed out that a national, in the sense of a national government, university was an institution inconsistent both with our principles of education and with our traditions, and that a true national university was not one supported by the public money, and left, in its organization and conduct, to the mercy of politicians in Congress, but a broad, comprehensive, unsectarian institution, amply endowed by private munificence, appealing to every part of the country by its offer of the most complete and liberal education, and beyond the reach of parties and politicians.

This is evidently also the view of Professor CHARLES STRAGE SMITH in his recent proposition—which is heartily approved by President BARNARD—to erect Columbia College into a national university. He states that large and increasing numbers of young Americans are compelled by the want of adequate scholarly training in this country to go abroad to seek it, and that this proclamation of intellectual poverty is a shame in which we ought not to acquiesce. A fitting site for an institution which shall satisfy every requirement of study he holds, and we think justly, to be the central city of the country, and since the foundations of such a school are already laid in New York, in Columbia College, the work, he thinks, may be considered to be already begun, and to erect the national university it is only necessary completely to develop Columbia College.

This seems to be a very reasonable plan, for whatever sectarian or other limitations there may be in the charter could be readily removed. As we said last week, the munificence and pride of New York might well foster the college, which is so honorably associated with the city, and in which so many eminent New-Yorkers have been trained, into a truly national university. The broader and the more generous the policy of the trustees, the more will the public be inclined to heed the appeal of Professor SMITH. Nothing is more striking in the history of education in the country during the last quarter of a century than the change in the college system from that of a recluse academy into that of a great school of the people, relying for prosperity not upon an antiquated and traditional curriculum supervised by pedants and pedagogues, but upon the perception that the true function of a university is to provide the best instruction in every study, that the chief point is the teachers, not the scholars, because scholars will naturally seek the most accomplished instructors. The recent statement of the trustees of Columbia and the appeal of Professor SMITH will stimulate an interest which can not but be of great service to the college and to the cause of good education.

HUNT'S "BATHERS."

WE have often had occasion to speak of the astonishing progress of steel-engraving in this country, to which we trust something of a fresh impulse will be given by the proposition of the HARPERS for a competition of designs in illustration of DOMETT'S "Christmas Hymn." It has sometimes seemed as if steel-engraving might be left behind in the race, but Mr. J. A. LOWELL, of Boston, has been of another mind, and his interest in the development of steel-engraving has just been rewarded by the remarkable reproduction upon steel of WILLIAM M. HUNT'S "Bathers," by S. A. SCHOLL. Of Mr. SCHOLL'S admirable portrait of EMERSON, which Mr. NORTON chose for the EMERSON-CARLYLE correspondence, we have already spoken. But the "Bathers" seems to mark a distinct epoch of progress in steel-engraving.

The composition of the picture is very simple. It represents a darkly embowered stretch of still water, and a naked boy, with his back to the spectator, and with arms outstretched to balance himself for a spring, stands upon the shoulders of another boy hidden in the water to his armpits. The flesh quality and modelling, the lithe suppleness of the young figure, the delicately balanced pose, are all reproduced with such freedom, vigor, and subtlety that at a little distance the richness and roundness and fullness of the engraving wonderfully replace the picture. The hard-new and fixed precision of the older style are lost in the flowing grace and broad fidelity of characterization, and those who knew HUNT'S delight in every finer form of art can imagine the enthusiasm with which he would have recognized the co-operation of the engraver's feeling and skill with his own.

This work reveals new possibilities in steel-engraving, and, with the amazing progress in engraving upon wood, it is no exceedingly interesting illustration of American activity in art. Mr. LOWELL, to whose energy, confidence, and liberality the result is due, in the honest pursuit of his business, has done also a public service, for each in every advance in the rubber arts.

"DIALECT TALES."

THE pretty volume under this title is peculiarly American. Like BRET HARTE'S frontier stories, these tales treat of aspects of life and of a kind of humor which are unknown elsewhere, and of which there are glimpses in the journals of travellers in the South and Southwest of the United States. They have a certain historic value, also, because the kind of life which they portray is all vanish rapidly before the advance of a new spirit into every remote and secluded part of the country. Already the vivid pictures of life in Mr. OLMSTED'S Seaboard Slave States are strange, like those of ARTHUR YOUNG'S Travels in France, as striking have been the changes in the region which he describes. "Sherwood Bonner," to the profusely illustrated volume of Dialect Tales, which is just published by the HARPERS, has in the same way rescued odd traits of humor and characteristic scenes which will soon be known only in such books.

DISRAELI AS A FRIEND OF THIS COUNTRY.

THERE has been always a feeling in this country that Lord BEACONSFIELD was honestly friendly to the Union during the late war, and his attitude has been cited to disparage that of Mr GLADSTONE. A recent letter to the London Advertiser, however, shows that the impression in regard to DISRAELI is unfounded. The writer says that he had frequent conversations with Lord BEACONSFIELD upon the subject, and that his lordship always regarded "recognition" as a possible card to be played at the right season.

The invasion of Pennsylvania by LEE he held to be the favorable time, and he told the correspondent that he thought that the moment for action had arrived. He was of opinion that the proposition should proceed from the Tory or Confederate side, and that it would come best from him, while Lord PALMERSTON would be glad to accept a Parliamentary declaration of a policy which he personally approved. The correspondent, quoting DISRAELI'S words, says:

"'But,' he continued, 'I can not speak without more knowledge of the subject than I now possess, and I should be glad if you could give me a brief, furnishing the necessary statistics of the population, the institutions, the commercial and political prospects, of the Southern States, in order that when the moment comes I may be fully armed.' I procured the necessary information from the best authorities, and placed it in his hands. Every day seemed to bring the moment for its use nearer, and the general feeling in the House of Commons was perfectly ripe for the motion in favor of 'recognition,' when the news of the battle of Gettysburg came like a thunder-clap upon the country. General MEADE defeated LEE and saved the Union, and from that day not another word was heard in Parliament about recognition. A few days afterward I saw Mr. DISRAELI, and his exact words were, 'We nearly put our foot in it.'"

This statement is corroborated by that of a gentleman who was entirely familiar with the situation in England at the time. He says that although DISRAELI himself wanted to see how the cat would jump, his alter ego, Lord CAIRNES, and all the Tory set, were as actively mischievous as they could be, and shuddered with the connivance of their chief. PALMERSTON swaggered and leaned to the iconic halls about the Trent affair in his usual style. But one of his colleagues assured the gentleman whose view we quote that PALMERSTON was not inclined to recognize the Confederacy. He had been all his life crusading against slavery, from mixed motives, and this undoubtedly restrained him, while he certainly resisted the strongest solicitations of LOUIS NAPOLEON. Thus DISRAELI was friendly in the side of the government in our struggle in a more wondrous Tale of Alroy.

THE BOSTON MUSIC HALL AND THE GREAT ORGAN.

THE statement that the great organ in the Boston Music Hall had been sold is incorrect. But the sale has been suggested, in order, apparently, to provide a few more seats, and there is a strong and very intelligible feeling of opposition to the sale. The organ is one of the largest and finest in the country, and like the great organ at Haarlem, in Holland, it is a pride of the city. There is no other place in which it could be removed, and should it be taken down it must be laid away, and necessarily suffer great injury. Its removal would put an end to the noble oratorio performances of the Handel and Haydn Society, which are one of the great musical traditions of the city, and the Music Hall robbed of its organ would have lost its unique distinction.

For such a loss it can not be thought that the gain of some two hundred seats would be an adequate compensation, and there is a singular misconception of the value of association in the proposition to sell as essential and characteristic a part of such a hall. Surely an organ is needed in the Music Hall, and to replace this magnificent instrument by a meaner one would be only to make permanent a humiliating contrast. It is the great organ which justifies the distinctive name of the building, as it is its most fitting decoration.

We do not quite understand why opposition to the removal of the organ should be regarded as a "sentiment," in the sense of sentimentality. The feeling which consecrates Bunker Hill or Faneuil Hall is undoubtedly a sentiment, and so was the patriotism which is associated with both. To many persons without a musical ear delight in music seems to be only sentiment. It is sentiment which hangs the portraits in Faneuil Hall, and it is sentiment only which would be concerned at their removal. But certainly it is a sentiment worthy of cultivation. Is not any building invested with a noble and elevating sentiment in itself a refining and beneficial possession for any community? And is not the same thing true of the parts of a building, as those objects in it which a similar sentiment invests? The Elgin Marbles in London are not what they were in Athens, nor was the temple from which they were stolen the same after they were gone. The Music Hall when the great organ is gone will have suffered an irremediable loss.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT

THE portrait upon another page is that of one of the youngest Republican leaders of the Assembly, who has fortunately inherited the manly public spirit of his father, with an intrepidity and independence which are as valuable as they are unusual in public life. Mr. ROOSEVELT is one of the very few Assemblymen that the Republican party is able to send from the city to the Legislature, and he and his colleague Mr HOWE have represented the highest character and purpose of the party.

Like many of the younger Republicans, Mr. ROOSEVELT holds the soundest views upon public questions with the feeling that the Republican party is the organization which from its traditional principles and the character of its membership is more likely surely to secure the public welfare. This feeling has been undoubtedly strengthened in the case of Mr ROOSEVELT by his observation of the course of the Democratic party in the Legislature. That party has done nothing whatever to inspire public confidence, and Mr. ROOSEVELT has been among the most active in stripping off the mask of Democratic professions of economy and reform.

With energy and ardor, and with a directness and plainness of speech from which older legislators shrink, Mr. ROOSEVELT in the last session moved the WESTBROOK inquiry, and in the present session he has urged proceedings to vacate the charter of the Manhattan Elevated Railway Company. He has also introduced the municipal civil service reform bill, and his voice and vote are sure for whatever is honest, wise, and progressive.

MRS CARLYLE'S LETTERS.

THE HARPERS have issued in a neat volume the letters of Mrs. CARLYLE to her husband and various friends, and the book is one of singular interest because it is an intimate revelation of a remarkable woman who was well known by her friends to be hardly less striking a person than CARLYLE. The apparently commercial tone of the Reminiscences, and the opinions freely expressed, by Mr FROUDE in his memoir of CARLYLE'S earlier years that MRS CARLYLE was grossly and selfishly neglectful of his wife, persuading a superior woman to become the slave of his whims and inconvenience, produced a strong and general feeling of antipathy to him as a man. But the glimpses of MRS. CARLYLE in the EMERSON-CARLYLE correspondence, and a more correct consideration of CARLYLE'S imaginative richness and extravagance of expression, have favorably modified that feeling.

The present volume, which is one of extraordinary interest, enables the reader to understand still more truly the exact situation. CARLYLE and his wife were both persons of genius most of most positive character and traits. They were both in ill health and very poor. He was absorbed in study and writing. She was contriving and toiling to make both ends meet. Much of her life was sacrificed to the most teasing details, and the only consolation which the attention might have offered—the courtesy and tender sympathy of her husband in lightening somewhat the heavy burden—was wanting, by reason of his temperament and preoccupation.

But that they were very cloudy attached to each other, that she was very proud of him, and happy in being his wife, despite all the checks and irritations and troubles in the household, is evident. He had plainly great defects of character, and she had often the consciousness of powers totally repressed. But the humorous turn of the mind of each, and their remarkable facility and felicity of expression, make it necessary to read very closely between the lines to determine the precise relation. That done, there will be greater justice to both than it seems to us is awarded by Mr. FROUDE. The book is one of extraordinary interest, and it will take a permanent place among the most valuable collections of letters in our literature.

PERSONAL.

THE farewell dinner given to Mr ELIHU VEDDER by the Tile Club of which he is a member [illegible] a special interest [illegible] to Americans [illegible] of their absence [illegible] Rome will be very much missed for A [illegible] of some of Mr VEDDER'S pleasings to new holding in Boston.

—When the news of the steam ship Arizona's collision with an iceberg some months ago, reached New York city, considerable anxiety was aroused in the breasts of the officers of one of the small metropolitan life-insurance companies. Seven members of the organization were on board the vessel, and their simultaneous deaths would have imperiled its life.

—A New-Yorker who recently attended a fancy-dress ball in ordinary evening attire was merely said by a lady to have been "disguised as a gentleman."

—The studio of a celebrated American painter was visited by a collector of rents. "Ah!" exclaimed the latter, standing at the proper distance from a newly hung landscape, and admiring it with enthusiasm, "there's nature for you!" Then approaching near enough to smell the pigments, he added, "But there is a good finishing up to Rule." Such, thought the painter, is popular art-criticism.

—The modern missionary shines also as a pioneer in philology. During the last ten years the Madagascar missionaries have made important discoveries among the words and dialects, the legends and the folk-lore, of the islanders.

—"It is the boast of New York that any charity that can prove itself to be practical and well administered is never allowed to languish for want of funds in that city," says the Pall Mall Gazette. "The Fresh Air Fund of the New York Tribune was an instance. The Tribune had only to show that for every three dollars contributed a poor child could have a two-weeks's vacation in the country, and means were supplied for the holidays of 5000 children. London has in this respect taken a leaf, though as yet, we fear, but a small one, out of the book of New York." Much of the success of this charity is due to the tact, perseverance, and benevolent impulses of the Rev. WILLARD PARSONS, its superintendent.

—A well-known American singer declares that a matinée audience does not tempt the performers on the stage to draw upon their best resources. "We singers, indeed, like to sing to the people, and nothing pleases us more than a representative country audience; but at matinées the listeners are almost exclusively ladies, and the muffled applause of their gloved hands is depressing. What we want is downright noise—with canes, umbrellas, feet, anything. It is the loudness of the appreciation that nerves us."

—The accident to Mr HENRY BERGH, President of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, by which he broke his collar bone after jumping off the platform of a street car, has elicited many expressions of sympathy. Mr BERGH was born in 1823, and is the son of the eminent American ship-builder CORNELIUS BERGH. His useful and successful society was incorporated in 1866.

—The offer of a prize by HARPER & BROTHERS for the best illustration to DORE'S "Christmas Hymn" has created a stir among the young artists of America. At present writing more than fifteen hundred applications for copies of the hymn have been sent in by aspirants for the honor and the prize. A large majority of the applications are from New York city; then follow, in the order named, Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, and Cincinnati. Several have been received from New Orleans and Charleston, and one from Zedil.

—The imagination of Sir WILLIAM HAMILTON could picture mathematics among the fine arts. "To my particular constitution of mind," he wrote, "a mathematical theory presents even more of the intense unity of a living spirit' than the work of a poet or of an artist. Even the Principia of Newton, which is ordinarily perused as a model of inductive philosophy, I consider as being rather a dark, a fabric, an architectural edifice, the external results of which have been, and still be, changed by the progress of experimental science, but which will always be interesting as mathematicians as a structure of beautiful thoughts."

—HANDEL was born on the 24th of February, 1684, and it is suggested that a bicentennial celebration of the author of the Messiah would be appropriate next year. But when DEVRIENT'S remark that "HANDEL is the unequalled master of all masters" is quoted in this connection, it will be remembered that such honors have appeared since his day, and that even BEETHOVEN praised him not absolutely, but as the producer of "great effects with scanty means."

—The Academy advises every bachelor who has the slightest respect for the dignity of his position to consider a well-known Frenchman's statement before investing in a victoria or a landau. "The Victoria marks you as a candidate for gentlemen, and leads you then on an irresistible incline into the landau, where you are inextricably engaged beyond all hope of rescue."

—Lord GREY thinks that England's attempts to prevent the horrors of a war of extermination between the white and black races of South Africa have made matters worse instead of better, and the Cape Argus, a newspaper of that region, declares that the black races are increasing so fast that there is more danger of there proving an Englishman than of Englishmen preying on them.

—Every [illegible] of the British militia recently encamped at Brighton is said to have cost [illegible] much "local entertaining" on the sight of the King's Head Inn, where Charles II spent [illegible] waiting for Shoreham, as did Mrs. THRALE and Fanny Burney many years ago.

—A whisper in New York having become audible in Chicago by means of the telephone, an English editor predicts that before many years the more important debates in Parliament will be delivered in the hearing of Great Britain, and such a speech as Mr JOHN BRIGHT'S recent one at Glasgow will be heard simultaneously by great audiences in every town in the land.

—Mr ALEXANDER WILLIAMS, of the well known Boston firm of A. WILLIAMS & Co., booksellers and publishers, has retired from business. The event is one of interest not only to Bostonians, with whom the "Old Corner Bookstore" has been for so many years an institution, but to the book trade at large. Mr WILLIAMS was the oldest bookseller in the city, and he will take with him in his retirement the best wishes of thousands of friends. His large and prosperous business will be continued by his three partners, under the name of TICKNOR, FIELDS, & Co.

—So an age when young Japan wears the evening dress of Parisian civilization, and when young Honolulu takes unaffectedly to brandy and seltzer or Apollinaris, it is a comfort, writes a foreign editor, to reflect that one corner of the world, Cores, still resolutely refuses to be moulded into the sought uniform, shrouded, Western pattern. "What a pretty, picturesque, curled world it will be, to be sure, when everybody indoes himself in frock-coats and chimney-pots with angular modishness from Kamtchatka to the Cape of Good Hope, and from the converted polar Esquimaux to the polite and cultivated inhabitants of a European-ized Patagonia!"

—An extract from the shooting register kept on a prince's estate in Austria shows that last year more than 75,000 deer, wild boars, roebuck, pheasants, partridges, hares, wild-duck, and other game were killed.

—The vestry of a church near London have resolved that the Athanasian Creed be read no more during service, and that the vicar shall be "guaranteed against pains and penalties" if he acts in accordance with their wishes in this respect.

—Shall the ingenious toll now levied on all visitors to the church in Stratford on Avon, where SHAKESPEARE'S bones lie be used in paying the salaries of the curates or in keeping the edifice in repair? This great question still excites discussion in the land of the immortal bard. If the money must be raised at all, why not expend it in promoting a knowledge of SHAKESPEARE'S works?

—Lady FLORENCE DIXIE refused to sail in a physician after her alleged attack by highwaymen, because, as she said, "I dislike doctors." Thereupon the Lancet asks why people sometimes dislike them. "In part, doubtless, this feeling may arise from the recognition that these doctors lift up the veil, and see the psychic phenomena being behind it, and probably, to a certain proportion as instances, the source of being known is not pleasant."

—In his eloquent funeral oration on the late PETER COOPER, the Rev. Mr CROLLIUS said that the founder of the Cooper Institute "stands where, so far as I know, among the men who would do about great work for the help and [illegible] of the whole nation, and here lived to see that work perfected in [illegible] own life and time."

—Twelve Arabian revolutions, from Fez, Algiers, and Tunis, arrived a few days ago in New York city. To a [illegible] reporter, who addressed them in their native Arabic, one of the number said: "We thought the steamer was going down every moment. We hardly ate anything during the voyage, and we do not feel very strong just now. We made a vow to our Saint, that if we reached land in safety, we would give him an offering of gold; so when we got to New York we took some gold and threw up in a cloth, and threw them into the sea, [illegible] it was no the treasury of the saint just the same as if we put them there ourselves. I said to the one, 'Oh, you like sea, if they ploughed you, and sowed seeds on you, and the grass were to grow all over you, I'll never trust you again.'"

THE HON. THEODORE ROOSEVELT.
PHOTOGRAPHED BY NOTMAN, ALBANY.—(SEE PAGE 243.)

CARTER HARRISON, RE-ELECTED MAYOR OF CHICAGO.
PHOTOGRAPHED BY GURNSEY.

THE BILLIARD CHAMPION.

THE late Billiard Tournament at Chicago, which resulted in a decisive victory for Jacob SCHAEFER over MAURICE VIGNAUX, the most celebrated player of France, has given rise to considerable bickering among devotees of the game. It is asserted that some experts claim that it was understood from the outset that SCHAEFER was to win, in order to create interest in future matches, and that VIGNAUX purposely missed several easy shots when SCHAEFER was playing with luck against him. This is hardly credible, and VIGNAUX's evident chagrin at losing the first prize and the world championship indicates that the match was fairly played.

VIGNAUX complains somewhat bitterly of the conduct of the audience, and of their boisterous applause when [illegible] a good run. He says also the noise [illegible] jogging of [illegible] annoyed him, and [illegible] the coolness requisite for good play. He seems to have good ground for complaint in this respect; and although it is very difficult to control the sympathies of an interested audience, every effort should be made to insure fair play in this as in every other manner to the foreigner.

JACOB SCHAEFER, VICTOR IN THE CHICAGO BILLIARD TOURNAMENT.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY FALK.

THREE MAYORS.

CHICAGO, Cincinnati, and Cleveland have each elected a Democratic Mayor. The success of Mr STEPHENS in Cincinnati is considered a victory for Mr PENDLETON, and as giving that gentleman the leadership of the Democratic party in Ohio. The Chicago election was also considered an important turning-point for the Democrats, who wished by carrying the local election now to secure the Lake City, and with her the State, in 1884. Next to that a victory now was deemed an important step toward the Governatorial boom for the Mayor-elect. Already the strongest Democratic papers in the State are hosting the name of HARRISON for Governor, and should the Democratic National Convention meet in Chicago the boom will be intensified.

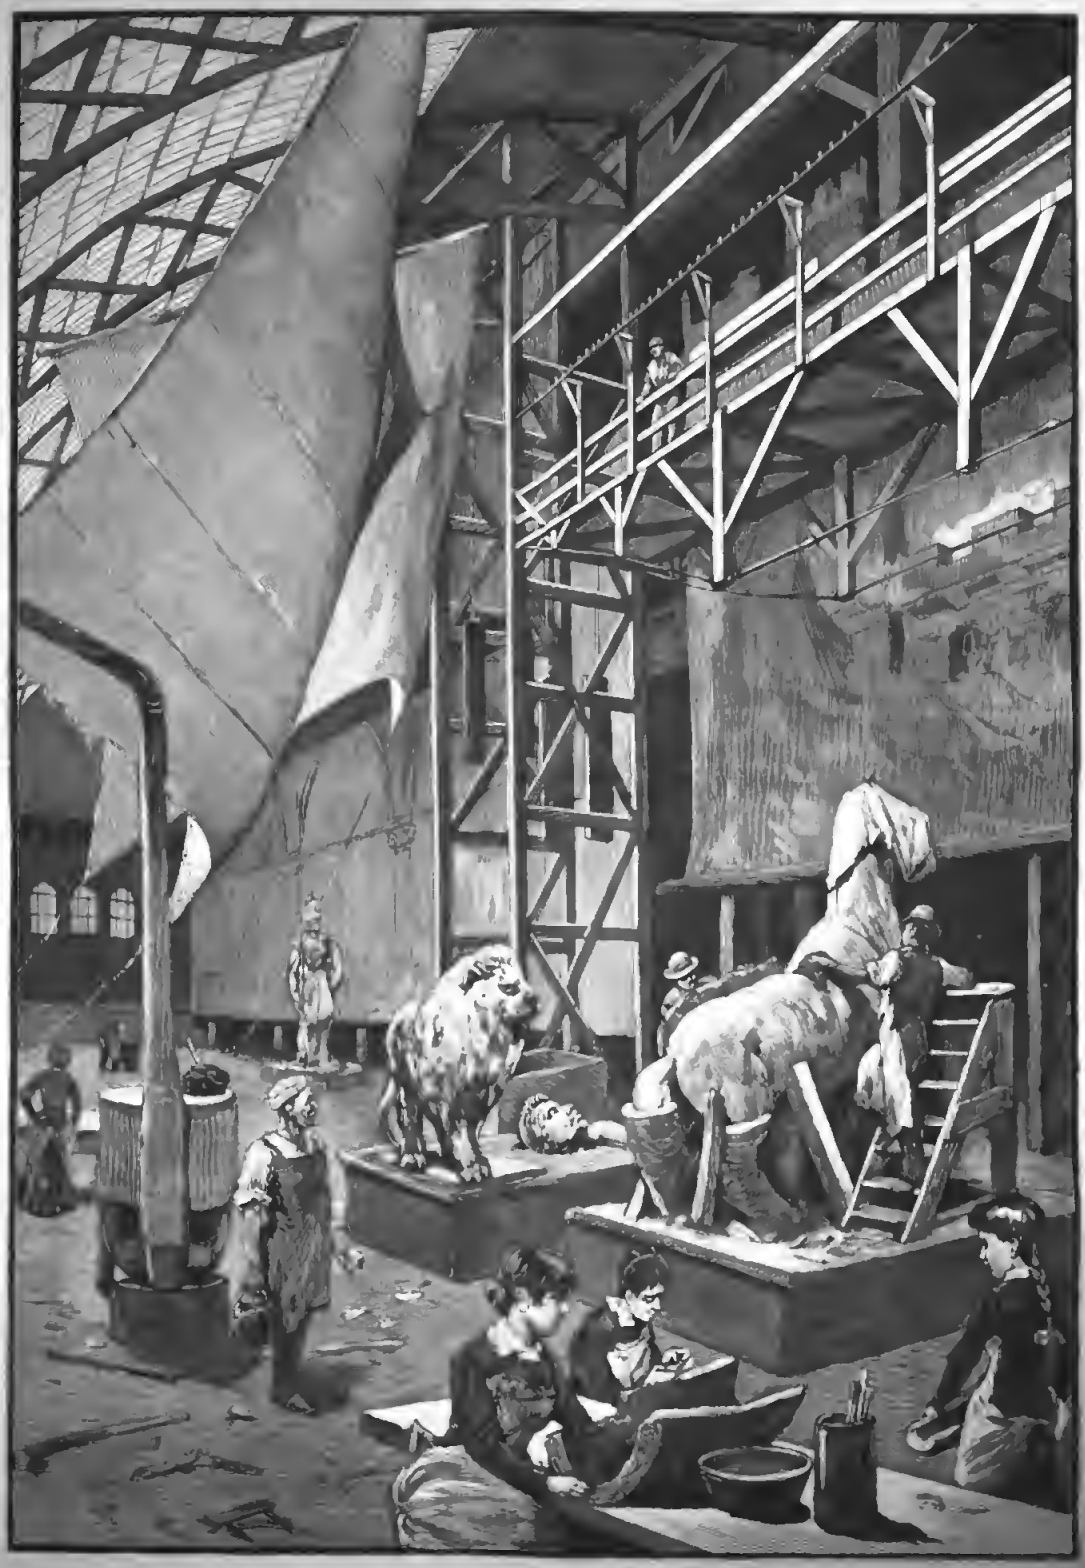
Besides Mr HARRISON, who now enters upon a third term as Mayor, ten Republican and eight Democratic Aldermen were elected in Chicago, leaving the complexion of the Council twenty-one Democrats to fifteen Republicans. The rest of the general ticket is Democratic.

In Cincinnati the Democrats elected not only the Mayor, but twelve candidates on the general ticket. The Republicans elected three. The Mayor, Police Judge, and Prosecuting Attorney elect were indorsed by the saloon keepers and brewers, and eight of those elected were indorsed by the Municipal Reform Association. The Council will stand twenty-six Republicans and twenty-four Democrats. The School Board remains Democratic.

The Democratic clean sweep in Cleveland was not a surprise. The Republicans had conceded the election to their opponents before a vote was cast. Last spring the Democrats carried their ticket by over 2200 majority in the first flush of anger on the part of the Germans and saloon men over the passage of the Pond law. This same cause, added to others, gave them the Congressional ticket in the fall by [illegible] majority. This spring it was thought that the old trouble might have been allayed somewhat, and that a considerable part of the Germans would quietly vote the Republican ticket. The result has shown this to be a failure, as the Democrats have carried the day by a large majority. The weather was fine, and a great deal of work was done. There was less excitement than usual, as the people at large did not seem to be very enthusiastic. In the usual tickets considerable scratching was done from local causes. The Republicans so clearly conceded the election of the entire Democratic ticket that they did not gather to hear the returns read, while the Democrats filled the City Armory in overflowing. The victors are very loud in their boasts that they have come to stay, that they will elect a Governor in the fall, and elect a President in 1884.

H. PAYNE, MAYOR-ELECT OF CLEVELAND, OHIO.
PHOTOGRAPHED BY FALK.

THOMAS J. STEPHENS, MAYOR-ELECT OF CINCINNATI.
PHOTOGRAPHED BY [illegible].



THE CINCINNATI DRAMATIC FESTIVAL—PREPARING SCENERY.—DRAWN BY H. F. FARNY.—[SEE PAGE 247.]

(Continued from front page.)

VINEY'S CONVERSION AND COURTSHIP.

an' ez en'ez it means 'oman too—

'Blest is de man who ne'er consents
By ill advice ter walk,
Nor stands in sinners' ways, nor sits
Whar men ungodly talk.'

Dat's de p'int, Viney—men ungodly. Dat's what Jack Chaney is—ungodly. An' I couldn't have him at my party; he would jes' be de fly in de 'intment."

"Jack don't do nothin' wrong," muttered his champion.

"Oh no! He didn't fight chickens las' Sunday wid Tom Kinkle in settin' sight o' de monuments in de cimetery, did he?" said Ally, crushingly.

"What tattle-tale brought dat ter yo' years?"

"Tawn't no tattle-tale; it were de godliest man in de church—Elder Buford."

"I thought 'e knowed it. I allays did hate dat ole 'coon."

"Dem ez hates is in danger o' hell fire."

"Take keer, den, dat you don't hate Jack Chaney," cried Viney, quick as a cat.

"I 'clar ter goodness I don't, Viney. I owns Jack is a nice, outspoken chap ez ever I seen, an' ef he war on'y a child o' grace, I could shout fur joy. An' ter show you I don't b'ar no malice, I'll let you fix up a nice plate o' goodies when I has my quiltin', an' sen' 'em ter him in a friendly sperrit."

Viney laughed. "All right, Sis Ally: an' I'll do all I kin ter he'p you git ready fur your quiltin', fur I knows you means ter make a gre't occasion ov it."

"De gre'test," said Ally, "dat has been seen in dese parts sence slavery times."

When Ally said this it meant something. She was in the habit of having "companies," all extremely comfortable in plan and execution, and the rumor that she was bent on outdoing herself at the coming "quiltin'" made the mouths water of those who were bidden to the feast. Ally was, indeed, a hospitable soul, and she had good right to be, for the "Phil Hancocks" were the most important people in the colored community. Jolly tastes went hand in hand with their pious convictions, and somehow, in spite of Elder Buford, they had always managed to keep on the sunny side of religion; and besides being jolly and young, our friends were rich—oh! crowning touch! Uncle Phil "drew a team" for a gentleman who paid him thirty dollars a month, and Ally when in need had only to announce to the ladies of Happy Hollow that she was ready to do up their laces, or accept orders for embroidery, to find her hands [illegible] work. It can not be said that our friends laid up any money; but they did better—they enjoyed it. Uncle Phil, indeed, sometimes shook his head over "de way money burnt in his pockets," but, after all, he was not far behind Ally in hospitable feelings, and the flatteries of his friends upheld him.

"Phil says ter me ter-day," remarked Ally, as she and Viney sat beating cake for the party, each with a sinewy hand in a great wooden tray of creamy golden batter—"Phil says dat de money dis 'll cos', fust an' las', would come' put a new L to de house; an' we is cramped fur room, no doubt on't. But I says, 'Never min', Phil; de L 'll take keer o' itself. I ain't been er-talkin' 'bout dis quiltin' party ten year fur nothin'. De time has come, an' Happy Hollow is er-gwine ter see style.'"

II.

Up rose the sun, and up rose Sis Ally, Uncle Phil, Viney, and a graceless grandchild called Tobe, who promised to give as much trouble as Viney in the years to come. He was on his best behavior now, for the day of the party had at last rolled round, and only a few final touches remained to be given. Viney drew up a great bucket of flowers, picked the day before, and hung down the well to keep fresh, and decorated the front room. Ally iced her last cake; Uncle Phil went off on an errand; while Tobe occupied his morning chiefly in grinning and washing himself behind the well. Early in the afternoon the guests assembled, brethren and sisters coming together. This was an innovation, as the brethren usually [illegible] in about supper-time, doing little more than show their prowess as trenchermen. But Ally insisted on the change. "It 'll make things livelier," she said, astutely.

Her cabin had been swept and garnished until it shone with cleanliness. There were only two rooms; but one was adorned with a grand piece of furniture, the very pride of Ally's heart—a mahogany chest of drawers, glittering with brass handles, and surmounted by an old-fashioned mirror. In both there were bits of carpet on the floors, pictures cut from the newspapers hanging against the whitewashed walls, and white curtains [illegible] at the windows.

Uncle Phil [illegible] the doorway, hands extended, a twinkle [illegible] the same words of welcome for all. Ally, regardless of the weather, was arrayed in a gorgeous crimson alpaca, buttoned tightly across her plump bust. On her head [illegible] a wreath of roses, one enormous red "[illegible] of Battle" being planted just above her [illegible] effort. This costume she [illegible] and was by no means unpleasing to [illegible] ing smiles, gleaming white [illegible], and [illegible] consciousness. The "company," [illegible] up in its best. All the finery [illegible] brought out to do honor in [illegible] that "Sister El-[illegible] or a dangling curving. And though the whole effect was slightly suggestive of

[illegible]

"Some in rags,
And some in tags,
And some in velvet gowns,"

it was festal in the extreme; so much so that Elder Buford—restless, uneasy soul!—feared a spirit of worldliness was creeping into the Happy Hollow "professors," and suggested to Preacher Simpkins that he preach a sermon on "dress an' damnation without further delay."

Brother Simpkins, a guileless-looking, white-haired old man, whose expression seemed to struggle between one of cheerful kindliness and anxious care, smiled, but would make no promise. In fact, he had himself to-day sacrificed to the vanities, and was disposed to look with charity on fellow-sinners, though he hoped (good man!) that few suffered as he did. He wore a pair of wide flapping kersey trousers, home-made and of easy fit. So far so good; but his upper half was clad in a tight—very tight—coat of the kind known as swallow-tail, the gift of some former master. Time was when it hung agreeably on the preacher's spare figure, but with years had come pounds. The poor man grew corpulent, and his fine coat had no more "give" to it than Elder Buford's theology. His soul was now distracted with wondering whether the buttons would hold during the long evening, whether it was his duty to forbear eating that the strain on the broadcloth should not be too great, or whether it would not be best to shamelessly unbutton himself at the beginning of the feast, and enjoy it like a man. I fear he leaned to the latter course, for the guests all knew that the hour of the supper was likely to be a season of joy. One "brother" was overheard to whisper to a "sister" that he had "starved hisself sence yistiddy so's ter do full jestice to Sis Ally's cookin'." And though the sister put her kinky head on one side, and intimated that Brother 'Arrison "ought ter be ashamed o' hisself," it was noticed that she cast longing glances through the open door into the next room, where the supper was laid. The long table was covered with a white cloth. "None o' yo' po' white trash linen," Ally would say, "but ginuine damask, not ter be beat in dis town nor de nex' one."

The supply of crockery was made abundant by contributions from friends, who felt themselves honored in "assisting" in ever so small a way so swell an entertainment. All the treasured pieces of "chaney" from the different cabins were brought forward—"chaney" which had been obtained either by gift or—well—otherwise from masters and mistresses of the past. Some of them were very beautiful, but their beauty shone unrecognized among the glittering new pewter spoons and picayune tumblers in which Uncle Phil had invested for the occasion. The table was already ornamented with cakes of goodly size, fruit, and sweetmeats. That part of the supper which was to be served hot was still undergoing the process of cooking. In this room Viney, in her best dress—an outgrown pink calico—presided cheerfully. She was as good as gold at such times, unless good for nothing by reason of a freak of temper or sweet native indolence. To-day, however, all was going right. She hovered undismayed round the open fire-place with its crackling logs, from whence savory odors came. And small wonder! From the cranes in the wide chimney swung a chicken stew à la Hancock, and a pot of gumbo fit for the heroes of Homer; in an enormous tin coffee-pot coffee was being dripped; and on a spit in front of the glowing coals, with a "creeper" or small oven under him to catch the rich drippings, was a lordly turkey, a wild gobbler which Phil had killed the Sunday before, in the teeth, so to speak, of the law and the gospel. He not only profaned the Sabbath, but scouted the enactment of the Legislature which had forbidden the shooting of game during August. One of the doubting sisters had gone to Preacher Simpkins to know what he thought as to "de Lord's people he'pin' ter eat dat ar turkey." Preacher Simpkins was found to hold advanced views. "Well, sister," he said, "I ain't on onys a predjint man. I likes ter see jestice done—jestice to Brother Phil, an' jestice ter de turkey gobbler, an' jestice ter de brethering an' de sisters what [illegible] him. An' while I [illegible] Brother Phil 'Kill dat fowl,' still [illegible] dead on a da' mail, and [illegible] back on him, so I jes' says dis, Let de Lord's people [illegible] joy him, an' say nothin', 'cep'in' ter thank de Lord fur makin' sich critters."

So there the turkey swung before Ally's fire, seeming to preserve his dignity even under the process of being "done brown." Tobe, who gloried in his office, kept him constantly turning, and as he displayed first his broad front, and then his shapely back, he seemed mildly to inquire if ever before had been seen such a glorious development. From time to time Viney basted him with her plump hands, and as often as she did so Tobe observed, with a blissful grin, "Him gwine ter taste good, sho'."

Poor Viney! Very hot, very busy, she gleaned what amusement she could from the scraps of conversation that floated through the open door. She was conscious that she did not stand high in the mind of the assembly, and the girl felt her isolation, though she tossed her head over it.

"I s'pose dey is all elected fur salvation," she mused, "an' ole Satan hisself wouldn't dar ter meddle wid dat crowd." And Viney might have felt herself shut out from companionship with her kind but for a saving remembrance of Tobe.

"He a limb, dat boy is," she reflected, gazing sternly on him as he "basted" the [illegible] boy. [illegible] I didn't hab no [illegible] on him he'd git de [illegible] in spite [illegible] too, even if day was [illegible] done, an' hot as de Bad Man's fires."

Here Viney did Tobe injustice. The noble youth preferred coming in for the "pickings" rather than trusting to the uncertainties of the "stealings."

"Sis Ally" was in high feather. Her quilt was spread in the center of the room, and the quilters' needles flew through the shining fabric. It promised to be finished by "sundown," which also meant supper-time. The "brothers" assisted in the quilting by threading the needles for the "sisters," both parties attitudinizing in their best company manners. Whenever a sister received a needle she made a point of doing so between her thumb and forefinger, while the others were held straight out, as a public evidence that the owner "knowed how ter behave herse'f in sociecty."

"S'pose we take a little breathin' spell," said Sister Elsie, as the work grew warm, "an' let's unroll de quilt, ef Sister Ally is accommodatin', an' take a look at it."

"Ter be shu'," cried Sis Ally; and in a moment the nimble brothers had unrolled the light frame, and the quilt in all its beauty was unfolded before the admiring eyes of Sis Ally's company. It was a magnificent affair. Every shade of shimmering silk, every pattern of glorious brocade, every color of heaven-caught dye, seemed to blend in the shining whole—"a harmony in rainbow," it might have been called; and the only wonder was how so many fine bits of color had ever fluttered into Ally's homely nest. In truth, the silk quilt had its beginning long ago in a fine old Southern mansion when Ally was a "teeny gal." Her mistress, wishing to train her as a maid for her little daughter, taught her to read and to sew. Ally was fond of recalling those days, and of telling how the quilt came to be in her possession.

"I hated my spellin' book, an' I hated my patchwork," she said, "but ole mis' she kep' me at work, a-rappin' my head wid her gold thimble ef I so much ez yawned. But when I saw how hansum dat silk quilt was gwine ter be, I got ter wishin' it was mine. Fust I thought I'd finish it up fur to spread over my big doll dat little missy give me de Christmas befo', den it seemed as ef I'd like ter sleep under it myse'f, jes' fur de grandeur ov it. An' it grew bigger an' bigger in my mind till I decides dat ef it was mine, I'd save it for my weddin' quilt; fur I was a mighty onregenerate young 'un," said Sis Ally, incautiously, "an' my head was always a-runnin' on things it didn't have no call to meddle wid."

Brother Buford groaned slightly; and a subdued chuckle from Viney in the next room showed that she had overheard the rash admission, and scored one against Sis Ally.

"At las'," continued that worthy matron, impressively, "at las' dar come a day. Lor'! Lor'! I remembers it ez ef it was yisterday. Dar was ole mis' in her big cheer by de winder sorter doin' like; an' dar was me a-settin' on a three-legged stool t'other side o' de room, a-puttin' de yaller an' de red an' de black pieces o' silk tergedder, an' a-wonderin' whedder her or me was de mos' likely ter sleep under hit, an' dar was Uncle Tobe—Tobe yonder is his gran'chile. Uncle Tobe he looked in at de do', sneakin' like, an' sez he, 'Ally,' sez he, jes' ez dough he war skeered—er-whisperin' he was—'Ally,' sez he. 'Sar,' sez I, never sturrin' ur look, but ce-prickin' up my years fuss enuff, I kin tell yer—'sar,' sez I. Sez he, 'Ally, eblutiemalion hab tooken place; de Yankees dun kum, chile,' sez he; an' I desser grabbed up de quilt, scraps an' all, an' I went like er streak er lightnin' fur daddy's cabin, an' I snatch up my bes' clothes, an' him hev'n, an' de way we went fur de sojers you never seed, an' I hain't seed ole mis' and she hain't seed her quilt sence. I didn't hab it fur my weddin' quilt," concluded Ally, with a jolly laugh, "bekase I never got pieces enuff to finish it; but I's been beggin' 'em right an' lef' fur a good many years; an' here's de quilt."

"The Egyptians shall be spoiled," pronounced Brother Buford, in a strong voice. "Thus spoke the prophet—thus is was done."

"Well, I all say, Sister Ally," cried Sister Elsie, "dat dar ain't a queen under de skies could hab a prettier spread to sleep under."

"Maybe you'll give it to Viney for her weddin' quilt," spoke up Sister Car'line Elizabeth, who was a new comer in Happy Hollow, and rather given to making unseasonable remarks.

"May de day be fur away!" ejaculated Ally. [illegible] Viney [illegible] now she gittin' to be growed up. Look at her to-day in dat pink calico ov hern. It needs a lettin' out, and a puttin' in, and a makin' over gin'ally, an' I ain't got a piece ov cloth like it no longer dan my thumb."

"I've got a piece o' pink caliker to [illegible] when you's wel[illegible]," said Sister Elsie. "It ain't no way diff'rent from hern 'ceptin' in figger."

"Thank you kindly, sister; I'll do as much fur you some day. De trouble is dat Viney has shot up so sudden ter be a woman dat she foun' me onperpared. It makes me feel ole an' compressed jes' ter look at de chile."

"I understan' she's got a beau, too," says Sister Car'line Elizabeth, with a giggle—"Mr. Jack Chaney by name."

"Well, he do hang roun' Viney considerable," acknowledged Ally, with a sigh. "He's always fetchin' her sugar-cane and goober peas, and wantin' ter take her to parties; and he goes agin me hard ter see her busted out o' dat ar caliker right before his eyes."

"Jack Chaney," said Elder Buford, severely, "is a wild fellow—a wild fellow. He is one of the sinner folks wat plays kyards and dances—fights cocks. He comes to meetin' Sunday arter Sunday, an' de preachin' ob de Word don't have no more effect on him dan so much cold water poured on our yaller dog to cure him ob de mange."

"Well, well," said Preacher Simpkins, "let us not forget charity to de weaker bredren."

"Brother Simpkins," said Brother Buford, "I've done been a-liftin' my voice in testimony a[illegible] on twenty years come Christmas, and I [illegible]'t neber seen no good kum ob [illegible] in de Lord's face, an' a dancin' an' a-playin' kyards, just as dough He had not kum down in fire and brimstone 'mongst de pine-trees ob Lib'nus—"

There is no telling where Brother Buford's eloquence might not have landed them if Preacher Simpkins had not raised his hand.

"Stop right dar, brodder. De Lord ain't no way connected wid brimstone, seein' dat dat article belongs to de debil—and it's false doctrine to say dat it belongs to de Lord; an' false doctrine, bredren, will slay a sinner's soul quick as chain lightnin'."

"Dat's de troof," said Sis Ally, heartily, "an' it's on account ob dat dat I first set my mind to be 'mongst de elec'. I warn't gwine to be lyin' roun' loose on Judgment Day, an' run de risk ob havin' my soul turned into a goat, and sent gallopin' down de slopes ob hell!"

Here the company looked dismal, and a few groans were heard; but cheerfulness was restored as Viney's voice from the inner room exclaimed, "Dis turkey's about ready ter take off, Tobe, an' boy! don't he smell heabenly!"

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

WHAT SOCIAL CLASSES OWE TO EACH OTHER.

By PROFESSOR W. G. SUMNER.

IX.

ON THE CASE OF A CERTAIN MAN WHO IS NEVER THOUGHT OF.

The type and formula of most schemes of philanthropy or humanitarianism is this: A and B put their heads together to decide what C shall be made to do for D. The radical vice of all these schemes, from a sociological point of view, is that C is not allowed a voice in the matter, and his position, character, and interests, as well as the ultimate effects on society through C's interests, are entirely overlooked. I call C the Forgotten Man. For once let us look him up and consider his case, for the characteristic of all social doctors is that they fix their minds on some man or group of men whose case appeals to the sympathies and the imagination, and they plan remedies addressed to the particular trouble; they do not understand that all the parts of society hold together, and that forces which are set in action act and react throughout the whole organism, until an equilibrium is produced by a re-adjustment of all interests and rights. They therefore ignore entirely the source from which they must draw all the energy which they employ in their remedies, and they ignore all the effects on other members of society than the ones they have in view. They are always under the dominion of the superstition of government, and, forgetting that a government produces nothing at all, they leave out of sight the first fact to be remembered in all social discussion, that the state can not get a cent from any man without taking it from some other man, and this latter must be a man who has produced and saved it. This latter is the Forgotten Man.

The friends of humanity start out with certain benevolent feelings toward "the poor," "the weak," "the laborers," and others of whom they make pets. They generalize these classes, and render them impersonal, and so constitute the classes into social pets. They turn to other classes and appeal to sympathy and generosity and to all the other noble sentiments of the human heart. Action in the line proposed consists in a transfer of capital from the better off to the worse off. Capital, however, as we have seen, is the force by which civilization is maintained and carried on. The same piece of capital can not be used in two ways. Every bit of capital, therefore, which is given to a shiftless and inefficient member of society, who makes no return for it, is diverted from a reproductive use. But if it was put to reproductive use, it would have to be granted in wages to an efficient and productive laborer. Hence the real sufferer by that kind of benevolence which consists in an expenditure of capital to protect the good-for-nothing is the industrious laborer. The latter, however, is never thought of in this connection. It is assumed that he is provided for and out of the account. Such a notion only shows how little true notions of political economy have as yet become popularized. There [illegible] prejudice that a man who gives a dollar to a beggar is generous and kind-hearted, but that a man who refuses the beggar and puts the dollar in a savings-bank is stingy and mean. The former is putting capital where it is very sure to be wasted, and where it will be a kind of seed for a long succession of future dollars, which must be wasted to ward off a greater strain on the sympathies than would have been occasioned by a refusal in the first place. Inasmuch as the dollar might have been turned into capital and given to a laborer who, while earning it, would have reproduced it, it must be regarded as taken from the latter. When a millionaire gives a dollar to a beggar the gain of utility to the beggar is enormous, and the loss of utility to the millionaire is insignificant. Generally the discussion is allowed to rest there. But if the millionaire makes capital of the dollar, it must go upon the labor market as a demand for productive services. Hence there is another party in interest—the person who supplies productive services. There always are two parties. The second one is always the Forgotten Man, and any one who wants to truly understand the matter in question must go and search for the Forgotten Man. He will be found to be worthy, industrious, independent, and self-supporting. He is not technically "poor" or "weak"; he minds his own business, and makes no complaint. Consequently the philanthropists never think of him, and trample on him.

We hear a great deal of schemes for "improving the condition of the working-man." In the United States the farther down we go in the grade of labor the greater is the advantage which the [illegible] has over the higher classes. A [illegible] ther or digger here can by one day's labor command many times more days' labor of a carpenter, surveyor, book-keeper, or doctor than an unskilled laborer in Europe could command by one day's labor. The same is true in a less degree of the carpenter, as compared with the book-keeper, surveyor, and doctor. This is why the United States is the great country for the unskilled laborer. The economic conditions all favor that class. There is a great continent to be subdued, and there is a fertile soil available to labor, with scarcely any need of capital. Hence the people who have the strong arms have what is most needed, and if it were not for social consideration, higher education would not pay. Such being the case, the working man needs no improvement in his condition except to be freed from the parasites who are living on him. All schemes for patronizing "the working classes" savor of condescension. They are impertinent and out of place in this free democracy. There is not, in fact, any such state of things as any such relation as would make projects of this kind appropriate. Such projects demoralize both parties, flattering the vanity of one and undermining the self-respect of the other.

For our present purpose it is most important to notice that if we lift any man up we must have a fulcrum, or point of reaction. In society that means that to lift one man up we push another down. The schemes for improving the condition of the working classes interfere in the competition of workmen with each other. The benefactories are selected by favoritism, and are apt to be those who have recommended themselves to the friends of humanity by language or conduct which does not betoken independence and energy. those who suffer a corresponding depression by the interference are the independent and self-reliant, who once more are forgotten or passed over, and the friends of humanity once more appear, in their zeal to help somebody, to be trampling on those who are trying to help themselves.

Trades-unions adopt various devices for raising wages, and those who give their time to philanthropy are interested in these devices, and wish them success. They fix their minds entirely on the workmen for the time being to the trade, and do not take note of any other workmen as interested in the matter. It is supposed that the fight is between the workmen and their employers, and it is believed that one can give sympathy in that contest to the workmen without feeling responsibility for anything further. It is soon seen, however, that the employer adds the trades-union and strike rent to the other risks of his business, and settles down to it philosophically. If, now, we go further, as we must be taken if philosophically because he has passed the buck along on the public. It then appears that the public wealth has been diminished, and that the danger of a trade war, like the danger of a revolution, is a constant reduction of the well being of all. So far, however, as here seen only things which could lower wages, nothing which could raise them. The employer is wanted, but that does not raise wages. The public loses, but the loss goes to cover notes not, and that does not raise wages.

A trades-union raises wages fundamentally in the legitimate and economic means noticed in Paper No. 3) by restricting the number of apprentices who may be taken into the trade. This device acts directly on the supply of labor, and that produces effects on wages. If, however, the number of apprentices is limited, some are kept out who want to get in. Those who are in have therefore made a monopoly, and constituted themselves a privileged class on a basis exactly analogous to that of the old privileged aristocracies. But whatever is passed by this arrangement for those who are in, is won at a greater loss to those who are kept out. Hence it is not upon the masters nor upon the public that trades-unions exert the pressure by which they raise wages. It is upon other persons of the labor class who want to get into the trades, but not being able to do so, are pushed down into the unskilled labor class. These persons, however, are passed by entirely without notice in all the discussions about trades-unions. They are the Forgotten Men. But since they want to get into the trade and are their living in it, it is fair to suppose that they are fit for it, would succeed at it, would do well for themselves and society in it—that is to say, that of all persons interested—concerned, they most deserve our sympathy and attention.

The cases already mentioned involve an legislation. Society, however, maintains police, sheriffs, and various institutions, the object of which is to protect people against themselves, that is, against their own vices. Almost all legislation effort to prevent vice is really protective of vice, because all such legislation saves the vicious man from the penalty of his vice. Nature's remedies against vice are terrible. She removes the victims without pity. A drunkard in the gutter is just where he ought to be, according to the fitness and tendency of things. Nature has set up on him the process of decline and dissolution by which she removes things which have survived their usefulness. Gambling and other less mercenable vices carry their own penalties with them.

Now we never can annihilate a penalty. We can only divert it from the head of the man who has incurred it to the heads of others who have not incurred it. A vast amount of "social reform" consists in just this operation. The consequences is that those who have gone astray, being relieved from nature's fierce discipline, go on to worse, and that there is a constantly heavier burden for the others to bear. Who are the others? When we see a drunkard in the gutter we pity him. If a policeman picks him up, we say that society has interfered to save him from perishing. Society is a fine word, and it saves us the trouble of thinking. The industrious and sober workman who is mulcted of a percentage of his day's wages to pay the policeman is the one who bears the penalty. But he is the Forgotten Man. He passes by and is never noticed, because he has behaved himself, fulfilled his contracts, and asked for nothing.

The fallacy of all prohibitory, sumptuary, and moral legislation is the same. A and B determine on the wretchedness, which is often a wise determination, and sometimes a necessary one. If A and B are moved by considerations which seem to them good, that is enough. But A and B put their heads together to get a law passed which shall force C to be a teetotaler for the sake of D, who is in danger of drinking too much. There is no pressure on A and B. They are having their own way, and they like it. There is rarely any pressure on D. He does not like it, and evades it. The pressure all comes on C. The question then arises, Who is C? He is the man who wants alcoholic liquors for any honest purpose whatsoever, who would use his liberty without abusing it, who would occasion no public question, and trouble nobody at all. He is the Forgotten Man again, and as soon as he is drawn from his obscurity, we see that he is just what each one of us ought to be.

ON THE BAYOU TECHE.

THE subject of our artist's sketch on page 240 is that part of the Bayou Teche which lies between St. Martinville and Breaux Bridge, where the expanse of water narrows considerably, and the live-oaks on either bank are more dense than at any other point. The correspondent of the New Orleans Times-Democrat, who accompanies our artist, writes of this part of the bayou:

"The scenery is wilder, and the cultivated places at most points are some hundred yards back from the water. The negro cabins and those a master's express, assume the quaint varied shapes and seemingly impossible attitudes—sometimes receding from the bank at an angle of fifty degrees, and a little further on stretching their ragged branches far out over the water.

"There is little or no embroidery, and this affords delicious vistas through the heavy trunks back to the fields beyond. The oaks in their new garniture of fresh foliage, and patriarchal in their Mohammedan beards of gray, seem to laugh at the evanescent changes going on around them. Solid, strong, apparently eternal, they have stood their watch over the Teche, have sheltered the dusk-eating Attakapas Indian and squaw, have waved their arms on the approach of the Acadian boats an with measured stroke their sandy navigators came slowly along to give new life to these prairies, and awaken these forests to a day of plenty. The story of Evangeline is familiar to the people of the bayou. They point to the church at St. Martinville as being situated on the site of the old edifice where she worshipped, and LONGFELLOW'S story has touched tender chords among those the history of whose ancestors he has so tenderly written."

THE CINCINNATI DRAMATIC FESTIVAL.

To New-Yorkers, at least, the enthusiasm with which the Cincinnatians entertain a grand new one project, and the success with which they execute it, are matters of some surprise. We do not know what esprit de corps is in the sense in which they understand it. We are for ever and ever getting ready to set up a Westminster statue in Wall Street, and then, after all, we back out of the business; while as for a pedestal for the Bartholdi Liberty light-house, our grandchildren, when hoary, may see that dreaded object, but it does not look much as if we ourselves should. During the week beginning the 30th of April, a Dramatic Festival will be celebrated in Cincinnati on a scale greater even than that of the late music festivals. A constellation of celebrated stars, among whom CLARA MORRIS, LAWRENCE BARRETT, JOHN MCCULLOUGH, MARY ANDERSON, MLLE. RHEA, MARIE WAINWRIGHT, J. E. MCDONOUGH, and NAT GOODWIN shine the brightest, will, in an immense hall capable of seating about four thousand persons, simultaneously give of SHAKESPEARE'S plays on five successive evenings, the first evening [illegible] Julius Cæsar, the second [illegible] Richard III., the third [illegible] Hamlet, the fourth [illegible] Antony and Cleopatra, and the fifth [illegible] As You Like It, and Much Ado About Nothing, and Hamlet, as the first publication announces, "in the complete cast." The management of the enterprise have been in negotiation for some time past, and only the day before the Cincinnati newspapers have not given their readers some new details or some editorial cheer. The illustration in this number of HARPER'S WEEKLY represents a room in Floral Hall, one of the wings of Music Hall, where pictures and sculptures, under the superintendence of Mr. WARDE, are preparing for a more extensive display in Julius Cæsar Week before last, at public auction, 2453 seats were sold for $64,425 50—an average of twenty-seven dollars apiece—thus covering the financial expenses of the undertaking long before a single actor or actress had opened his or her mouth. The drop-curtain is sixty-six feet wide, or three times the width of an ordinary one, and presents a reproduction of BENJAMIN WEST'S picture, "Regulus leaving Rome for Carthage." Several of the paint-frames on which are stretched the canvases to be used in the scenes are on large that, if we may trust a Cincinnati reporter, the painter, a man at one end of the bridge, has to take a field-glass to see what his assistant is doing at the other. It is further announced that all the stars except MCCULLOUGH, who was born in Ireland, and MLLE. RHEA, who was born in Belgium, are natives of the United States of America, and that the second of this grand festival will be the establishment of a magnificent Dramatic Temple, which shall be the head-quarters of a dramatic school, and in which each year dramatic festivals shall be held, "more splendid than any city has yet attempted."

This artistic value of this first Dramatic Festival can not, of course, be determined in advance, but it should be a source of pleasure to every intelligent friend of the drama that the managers of the enterprise have billed SHAKESPEARE for seven-eighths of the performances; and all the more so because, notwithstanding the recent brilliant spurts of SARDOU and ROSE, it can not be said that the general tendency of dramatic art in this country is at present in a Shakespearean direction. In New York city during the season just closing the stage has exerted itself marvelously at all to the true interest of the drama.—Wallack's Theatre, especially, never before rated the capacity of its patrons so low—and the metropolis, in this respect, represents the nation. When, therefore, the projectors of this Dramatic Festival announce five of the greatest plays of the greatest playwright for successive performances in a single week, they command attention and deserve gratitude. So many dramas get out of date, but the classic are beyond the caprices of fashion. So many dramas are not worth a rehearsal; but SHAKESPEARE'S plan has to criticism itself, and, moreover, were written for the express purpose of being acted on the public stage. Acted inadequately they usually are, and perhaps it is too much to hope for many actors who can interpret SHAKESPEARE, as it is too much to hope for many painters who can interpret nature; but the attempts to interpret him by this living presentation is the only way in which his utmost superhuman wisdom will ever be made known to the masses of mankind. G. W. SMALLEY.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

In Canada a young man of twenty years was not permitted to prosecute a mill because he was an infant in the eyes of the law. He has recently obtained his majority, and when he sought to renew the suit the court held that the case had been already decided.

A writer advises Americans who visit Europe this year to provide themselves with passports, to keep away from political gatherings, and to be careful about denouncing the established institutions of the countries through which they pass. Many young Americans who visit Europe have no desire to denounce the established institutions of any country except their own.

The records of the United States Patent-office answer some idea of the importance attained by electrical appliances in the economy of the present age. Only a few years ago the number of patents issued in a year has seventeen of that nature averaged but a few hundred. In the past year the applications numbered about three thousand, and the patents granted were not far from fifteen hundred. The rate of successful applications is smaller than in former years, indicating a closer competition among inventors. There has been of late a large increase also in the number of applications for patents for metal working machinery and fire-escapes.

It has been decreed that the fashionable young man of the immediate future must be accompanied by a dog when he appears on the avenues. The possession of a dog suggests resources which are not at the command of those who occupy half bedrooms in boarding-houses, and thus gives a sort of local status to the individual.

After eluding the swarms of office-seekers at Washington, it would hardly have given the President pleasure to read, while on his way to Florida, that if reports about the enormous numbers of beach flies and midges on the Kissimmee River should prove to be true he would probably change his fishing grounds shortly after his arrival.

A new State law, which is avowed as being intended to facilitate the punishment of Chinese cruelties, went into effect in California a few weeks ago. It provides that the hair of all criminals [illegible] three inches of the neck [illegible] that State already [illegible] of criminals [illegible] Mongolian [illegible] for damages were begun by some of the unwary prisoners whose queues had been clipped. In view of this phase of the question the present sheriff at San Francisco has decided to respect the queues of his prisoners till his counsel reports on to the constitutionality of the law, and the liability of the sheriff in any actions for damages that may be brought. The keeper of the House of Correction was less cautious, and caused the queues of nineteen Chinamen to be cut off on the day the new law was put into effect.

An incident of President Arthur's journey to the waters in which he was to angle for Florida fish—the appearance in the special car of a conductor who was on responsible of persons. This official was in the service of a North Carolina railroad company. He had received an notice that the party was to be "passed," and he insisted upon collecting from the half-dozen persons in the car farm fare as many passengers to them were seen. He was prevailed upon to delay at least until the next station was reached, and there a dispatch informed him that the concession of the road had been extended to the distinguished party.

The ultra-fashionable young woman of Philadelphia is distinguished by "a gold-rimmed hole consistency which she wears on a slender cloth around her neck," and which seems to be a sort of "quizzing glass." It is called a "spy." A reporter who was on the Academy on a recent evening writes: "When she sailed gracefully down to the front, and sank languidly into a crimson velvet chair, hundreds of opera-glasses were levelled at her. Was she embarrassed? Not in the least. Her olive cheek never blushed, she simply lifted her 'spy,' and stared back at the multitude with all the stately grace of a dowager."

If all the sun-spots have been made special pathways for the occasion are present at the coronation of the Czar, the multitude will be the largest that ever witnessed the crowning of a potentate.

In the absence of the President from Washington the improvements in the White House which were begun last summer will be finished. These will include extensive alterations in the vestibule and in the President's bed-chamber.

It is estimated that the canal through the Isthmus of Corinth will be finished in four years. It is to be four miles long, and of the same width and depth as the Suez Canal—seventy-two feet and twenty-six feet. Vessels going through the canal from Mediterranean ports will save ninety-five miles, and those from the Adriatic Sea one hundred and eighty-five miles, besides avoiding the dangers of Cape Matapan.

Small incandescent electric lamps have been used with much success by Mr. C. H. STEARN, in England, for illuminating both opaque and transparent objects under the microscope. In microscopes recently shown by him to a scientific society there were three lamps—one above the stage, revolving around its own axis; one below the stage, fixed to the sub-stage; and one below the sub-stage, for use with the polariscope. Diminutive electric lamps have been used also for lighting up the cavities of teeth under dentists' treatment, and for illuminating incisions made by surgeons in the human body.

The steam-ship Great Eastern cost her owners $3,000,000 for maintenance last year, and earned $60—fees paid by sight-seers. The place for the Great Eastern would seem to be in the United States navy.

An Arizona newspaper says that the climate of that Territory is undergoing a marked change, the snow and hail now being blessed with comparable moisture. The change is attributed "to the deflecting of electric currents by the railroads." The greatest obstacle to the building of railroads in China is the belief that the lines of iron rail would cut off the streams of good luck from influential personages. It may be the office of Arizona to prove to the heathen that the reverse would be the case.

On a recent Saturday, when several reporters of a New York daily were in the counting-room waiting to receive their pay, a bright-looking young Chinaman entered and asked at which window the reporters presented their checks. "What?" exclaimed a salaman man gatherer, "are we to be ruined by Chinese cheap reporting?" The other reporters broke out in the same strain, and for a while the Chinaman was made the object of good natured raillery. He took it in good part, and he greatly enjoyed telling of it later in the day among his countrymen in Mott Street. His work was probably the first reporting ever done for a New York daily by a Chinaman. He had the advantage of the other reporters in at least three respects: he received special rates—nearly double pay, in fact—for work; his manuscript was not revised; and he was permitted to use his signature. The entering wedge [illegible] in the increase!

"THE GLASS-BLOWER."—From the Painting by Charles F. Ulrich, in the Possession of Thomas Bellamy Clark.—[See Page 231.]

ON THE BAYOU TECHE, LOUISIANA.—[Drawn by J. O. Davidson.—[See Page 247.]

"DISARMED!"*

By MISS M. BETHAM-EDWARDS.

Author of "Kitty," "Dr. Jacobi," "Exiles," "Forestalled," "Pen Owen," "The Sylvestrians," etc.

CHAPTER III.

Meantime Mr. Constantine and Stephana, finding a quiet corner behind the camellias and the crystal, talked easily. "Welcome home, sweet Minnie!" said the old cavalier, lifting her hand to his lips. "We have come hither, Christina and I, because we could find no pleasanter place to die in. But what brings you from Italy, from the world?"

"Say rather to the world," Stephana said, glancing at the crowded rooms beyond. "Well, who can give any reason for going anywhere who has no reason for going to one place more than another? But one motive I had in coming here. It was to be near the only kinsfolk I have in the world."

"Say you love me the best of the three, Stephana."

"You have always been kindness itself to me," said Stephana, by way of answer.

"I have been kind to everybody, my dear," Mr. Constantine replied, dropping his voice. "You are a married woman; I may say anything to you. I have not shone in the domestic moralities, but I have never been morose. I have done good-natured things."

"And now you're praise for being what you were [illegible]. But, as you know I [illegible] more of people, I cannot [illegible].

"Quite even; and see me often—cheer my solitude, dear Santa Teresa—and I warrant you the soul shall be found. I am too lonely."

Stephana's eyes moistened with tenderness as she laid one hand on her companion's arm. "I will come as often as you please, Cousin Constantine, and bring that naive Arthura with me. We will amuse you."

"Ah! that is what I want—a little genuine amusement. I know—I feel that you can mesmerize people with those eyes of yours. Force Christian to give up Arthura to me. My cup would then overflow."

Just then Valerian appeared, with Arthura on his arm. The tête-à-tête was broken. Arthura, taken possession of by Mr Constantine, was delighting him with her mirthful oddities. Valerian dropped into a chair by Stephana's side, and chatted after the friendly fashion of a kinsman. "I am sure we have all done the very best thing in coming to this place," he began. "The sea is the only bribe for living in England, and we are here on near London that we can run up for an hour. One cannot be enchanted with all my arrangements."

"You have a genius for making life agreeable," smiled Stephana.

"I may without flattery say that I have. But I hope, my lady cousin, that you find an difficulty in enjoying your own handsome fortune?" asked Valerian, much as if he were inquiring after her health.

"I certainly enjoy it as well as I have any right to do."

"Oh, if you go to the root of the matter, you will never enjoy anything," Valerina said. "You must let me teach you a little of my philosophy."

"Rather of the world, worldly, I fear," Stephana made reply.

"Can any true philosophy be otherwise?" laughed Valerian. "We are of the world, we must live in it—although I believe you do hold intercourse with finer spirits."

Stephana would fain have checked the playful speech, under which, she knew, lurked a certain grave meaning.

"Why relect at the beautiful imputation?" he began. "Were you not in Rome exactly a year ago?"

Stephana bowed her head assentingly.

"And were you not obliged to flee like an outlaw because of those gifts, spiritual, supernatural—call them what you will?"

Stephana held her peace.

Valerina laughed lightly.

"A little bird whispered in my ear that you feared the enviable fame thus acquired might lead you to Rome forever, keep you a perpetual prisoner there like the Pope. But not a syllable more, since it displeases you. Take my arm, and let me introduce you to some of our guests, one also like yourself from Rome."

The last sentence was carelessly uttered and carelessly listened to; then Valerina made way with his companion toward the music-room. What could be going on there? Piano and violin were hushed, alike dance and song were over; yet the doorway was thronged with hungry listeners, and the air breathed expectation. "Listen," Valerina whispered. "It is our Roman friend, the blind improvisator. You knew him; you must have heard of his wonderful story telling?"

The pair stood still, and the narrator began. Was he using rhyme or prose? His listeners hardly knew. They were only conscious of a marvellous voice—music itself—that held them spell-bound, and of a sad, sensitive face that seemed to see, though only inner light could now indicate it. Talk not of the cheerfulness of the blind. What deep, pathetic pensiveness is stamped—must be stamped—on the brow of the night-less!

"Just a year ago, then," began Valerian's guest, "all the world—I mean the world of Rome—was intensely stricken by one of those problematic crimes, that happen once in a generation, as if to remind us the irony of human justice. It was a fratricide, under circumstances so strange that whilst in men's minds the real murderer was convicted past doubt, the evidence of the law fastened the crime upon another. Nemo, humanly speaking, could anything be clearer than that here the innocent was about to suffer in the place of the guilty. Never was a stronger case made out by the lawyers.

"The eldest of three rich brothers is foully murdered, and the deed could only have been committed by one of the survivors, both having equal pecuniary interest in the death. But by which? By him of spotless reputation, austere morality, the devout churchman and lavish almsgiver, the warder of civic honors well earned? Or by the graceless spendthrift, his younger brother, the hero of a thousand disreputable adventures, the wild waster of every pretty girl in Rome, the frequenter of taverns and casinos? Now it so happened, although I can not go into details, that, pointing aside such damning testimony, circumstantial evidence pointed not the younger brother as the doer of the deed, whilst public opinion issued the other way. As fat, indeed, as outward circumstances could go, the culprit was doomed before he appeared at the bar of justice, nor did anything come to light during the trial to shake the tremendous, the crushing conclusions against him; yet the popular judgment never wavered; the elder and not the younger brother was the guilty man, the reputed saint, not the sinner, here had earned the curse of Cain.

"Meantime the unhappy prisoner was condemned to die, and as the day of doom drew near a painful tension held people's minds. No one dared openly to avow his thoughts, and seems a man whom the law held unassailable, for the elder brother had been released after the preliminary and extrajudicial inquest. But some acquainted in the verdict. It was well known, moreover, that an confession within the prison had been made, a palmary proof of innocence in the popular estimation. Yet what could be done? The case had been tried after the usual fashion. The prisoner had been defended by able counsel. From such a sentence there was no appeal. So the fatal day drew near, and no the eve of the execution it seemed as if nothing short of a miracle could avert the catastrophe of the morrow. Just fifteen hours of life yet remained to the victim, when something happened so wholly unprecedented and extraordinary that but for a witness here to hear not my statements I should not ask you to give me credence.

"At five o'clock in the afternoon, therefore, an English lady, a young widow long resident in Rome, was entreated to give secret audience to a priest, a stranger to her, whose very name even she now heard for the first time. Being, however, allied by marriage with an old Italian family, of Catholic persuasion of course, she readily consented, seeing nothing unusual in the request. It was none every day demand on her sympathies and well-filled English purse, nothing more. The stranger proved to be no homely country priest come to beg a little charity. He at once saw a polished, affable man of the world, whose aristocrature speech and bearing bespoke ecclesiastical rank. 'I am not—I could not be mistaken,' he said, perusing her with extraordinary earnestness, 'Yes, rumor and popular belief have not erred. You, if any living creature, can rescue a guiltless head from the scaffold, the soul of another from everlasting perdition.' The lady looked up in deep amazement. 'There is not a moment to lose,' he said, 'and surely there is no need for explanation. You must be aware of the power you possess over your fellow beings, that strange influence with which some are endowed, we know, for some Heaven-sent purpose. No flattering: Now is the moment to exercise it on behalf of two unhappy men, one burdened with discovered crime, the other doomed to expiate it, although guiltless.'

"The lady was silent. He had spoken the truth, and she dared not shrink from the mission confided to her. Yet it was an awful one. No wonder that she turned cold and pale.

"'I have a carriage at the door. Call your tirewoman at once, and arm ready to go with me,' said the priest. 'Although I believe that you are an alien from the one true Church, you can not refuse its mandate in such a cause. Two lives at stake, the one brief and uncertain, the other eternal.'

"He then explained to her how the belief had got abroad of her occult powers; the merest rumor at first, it had gained such force and consistency that nothing but an appeal to her would satisfy people's minds. She and she alone could lift the veil from a guilty soul. In her hands the granite of the real culprit would become as water or a blade of grass.

"'Of course,' whispered the abbé, as they left the house together, 'we must be circumspect. We must resort to stratagem. The unfortunate man now awaiting sentence of death is, in the eye of the law, the fratricide. The man you have to kneel to as an intercessor is presumably innocent of blood guiltiness. We have secured an interview for an English lady on a mission of charity; your pretext must be to beg as a last favor from his brother that he will take leave of him in prison. The rest—'

"They now stopped at the great man's door, and an living soul still probably ever knew what passed between the pair. Was there some talismanic charm in the lady's eye potent to subdue evil and make it obsequious to her will? Or did she use wizardry of speech that we know not of, laying bare the black soul with the lightning flash of a word? All is mystery. But when, pale as a ghost, she re-entered the carriage, his companion read at a glance what was past utterance. That evening the news had spread through Rome like a conflagration: the murderer had avowed his crime; the falsely accused was set free. But the lady whose strange powers—"

The story-teller suddenly broke down, as if thrilled and set a-trembling with the potency of his own words. He bent his head forward in a listening attitude, stretched out both hands as one trying to reach something. Then he said, slowly and wonderingly:

"I feel it—I know it—she is here. Her unspeakable errand let none ask. Where all is good, all is mysterious."

CHAPTER IV.

What cannot than to snap one's fingers at haggard Time, and flout all the demons of dullness that be, when our purse has no bottom? Money, verily, can not turn the hoe into a paragon, but its miraculous powers stop there. It can draw out life to those who have it. It can fling the slow hours into a rushing pace.

Talk not to me, then, of the immorality of squandering. What were we sent into the world for but to amuse ourselves? What were others sent into the world for but to amuse me? Let those sophisticate who may about moral obligation and Christian duty. We bid them pack, and in amusing ourselves do good all round without taking any trouble.

This was very much Miss Hermitage's creed, had she cared to put it into words, but she might have pleaded by way of excuse that she must make up in a few years for the dullness of a life time. She was old, and her chance of amusement had not come till the freshness of feeling was over. "Better late than never," she had said, when coming into fortune and freedom at sixty. "I am a miser's daughter, assuredly. I am sure of it, some spendthrift's heir! How the pleasure of spending tingles through my very veins! And I will be warned by my father's example. At least if nobody mourns, nobody shall rejoice, when I die."

She was resolute, then, to spend, to make merry, and thus, as far as taught be, compensate for the blank monotony of years. If repression had dwarfed her sympathies, it had not dulled her intellect. Above all, it had not shorn her of one natural endowment. She had the wit to enjoy. "I have a frame of iron. If I contrive to get twenty years of satisfaction out of my life I shall have no reason to grumble," she mused.

Certainly she never did grumble. A girl just awakened to the consciousness of beauty and its power could not evidence more than Miss Hermitage over her second, healthy, unflagging appetite for enjoyment.

What, indeed, aroused she but youth and love? Beauties pleased her, but the sight of happy lovers drove her mad. Was it envy? Was it regret? She will not, she only indulged the feeling. If youth and love, however, are not to be bought for money, most other commodities come into the market, and Miss Hermitage could outbid her neighbors' hoes. Whilst the lazy world waits for its pleasures, how little does it divine what pleasure costs! Miss Hermitage might have fitted out armaments, bought Peruvian carpaccios, conquered a heathen people, with the specie put into her steward's hands for the purpose of making time fly. Valerian's lower brain and sunny nature worked night and day on the problem, although, of course, an effort must be apparent. If the perfection of art is to conceal art, it is surely so with this crowning achievement, this rare piece of ingenuity, this almost superhuman victory over mortal dullness. Valerina's brain must work, and Colette's and Arthura's, from morning till night, in order to keep this complex machinery agoing. If the one failed of an expedient, straight way the others were called upon to furnish theirs. The riddle must be read by somebody. But as yet all there had shown themselves equal to the task. The day dawned, and Miss Hermitage woke up like some cradled prince-ling, sure of being dawdled and pampered to and allowed the pretties till bed-time should come round again. "It is wonderful how diverting life is," she often thought; "I am sure I do not mind if I live to be a hundred." She had not even a dim perception of the truth. It never struck her that that light and airy fabric of calmness cost as much labor as the building of a Pyramid. What was the cost to her? She could pay.

So, like a feminine Al Raschid, she had her own poets dashing off pour d'esprit, playwrights in her hire devising drawing-room comedy, prima donne exercising trills for her especial benefit. And there were conjurers in her pay, and melodious stage milliners plying needles for her masquerades, and in far-off quarters of the globe fabulously lovely rats and pyralem toy dogs were being educated, talking birds taught epigrams, floral paragons made to grow, whilst, to come down from wonder land to sober reality, how many pallid artificers sweated by gas-light, how many miners toiled like gnomes in the underworld, how many brown sailors put to sea, imperilling life and limb!—and all for what? To drive away one old woman's ennui!

"Really it is quite astonishing how Valerian and Arthura understand their business," was Miss Hermitage's remark, soon after that opening matinée. "Time is flying so fast I shall soon have to find fault with them for doing their work too well. I shall be a hundred in no time at this rate."

The secret of Valerina's success was simple enough; but has not a great poet taught us that "Doch ist das Lösche schwer"? Just as a wise cook never serves up precisely the same dish to the company that has once pronounced it perfect, so Valerina never repeated a triumph, and if a Soyer or a Francatelli as a romantic earth, air, and water fa search of gastronomic emotion, how much vastier are the resources of the intellectual purveyor! Never had such bills of fare been imagined, much less heard of, as those now placed before Miss Hermitage's guests. Commonness was banished; uniformity knew not its own. The wand of its epicurism was broken, and sparkling novelty reigned in its place.

Moreover, the little circle itself was a daily surprise and a mystery. Who were they all—this audacious, piquant Arthura? this unobtrusive, universal Valerian? the dream like, bountiful Stephana, of whom none whispered so strangely? No one knew more of the group than that Miss Hermitage had lately inherited a princely fortune, and that her cousin, Mr Constantine, had spent one, that Valerian was related to both, though in what degree nobody could tell; finally, that Stephana was really cousin twice removed of the first two, and widow, after two months' wedlock, of a titled foreigner. Curiosity was most alert concerning Stephana—a human rarity in this nineteenth century so side resort, or in any other. A few, now folks called her, and now one of the Illuminati. "A spirit, and a woman too," she was, without doubt, but the spirit predominated over the woman, and that was out of the earth, earthy. Marvellous gifts were hers, they said—unwonted influence for good over her fellows, superhuman insight into things unseen, mysterious kinship with those ineffable souls that have revealed hidden truth to men.

Let it not be for a moment supposed that even the vulgar minded categorized Stephana among those self called interpreters of the unseen world by common means and for the gratification of abject curiosity. From such a halo many the held aloof, moving serenely in a light all the more dazzling to others because they knew not whence it came.

Miss Hermitage made light of her kinswoman's reputation, except as a factor in the sum total of amusement. Stephana excited expectance, she diverted, she was therefore "worth my money" to one who valued nothing but diversion, and measured all things by one rate of exchange. "Of course Stephana will cost me something, will get charity out of me," mused Miss Hermitage; "all diversions do. But what else is money good for?"

When Arthura playfully called her patroness by the familiar name of Gossip, she was but using her veritable patronymic. All four, indeed, Miss Hermitage, Stephana before her marriage, Mr Constantine, and Valerian, styled themselves Gossip Hermitage, the last name having been appended on the death of a kinswoman whose fortune had gone to the Gossip family, and a-hit her cognomen. Mr. Constantine, late ever, partly because he was one of several brothers, and partly because the name (like Steppne Sadgrove's) seemed to cling to him of its own accord, the son of a diplomate, and born at Constantinople, was becomingly called after the city and its founder; his early youth, too, had been spent in the East, and he never kept up connection with a country of which he was inordinately fond.

Mr Constantine was cousin german to Christina and Stephana's father; and Stephana herself having three years before exchanged her two-English names for an Italian one, her real style and title was Countess Carbonara, but when at the end of six unhappy months she was left a widow, she disclosed what seemed to her affectations, and insisted on being called plain Mrs. Carbonara. English by birth, English at heart, determined to spend her life in England, she should she affect an empty title of nobility? Mr Constantine had long ago spent the best part of a handsome fortune in philanthropy, but his cousin and second cousin were rich. What would they do with their money? This problem interested the old man not a little. He had asked followed them to the south in order to solve it. Next to the pleasure of spending your own fortune, thought Mr Constantine, is that of watching another spend his, just as a whist-player watches a game in which he takes no part.

CHAPTER V.

A scene under greenwood shade in a stale contrivance, but surely Valerian was the first to entertain his friends in Nature's own garden since ever frost. But let an one shiver at the notion. What knows opulence of ease and ease? The rich can carry the climate they like best with them wherever they go, and Miss Hermitage and her friends, in well warmed carriages, furred and feathered up to the chin, could afford to call January delicious. How effeminate to stay indoors huddled over a fire, when you can be every whit as warm out-of-doors, and exhilarated and aroused to boot? So it is the greatest possible mistake to make a fuss about English winters," Miss Hermitage said. "Could any one be warmer than we are?"

That she might well say as the well-appointed carriage sped along the shore, between glittering white town and azure sea, to-day hardly rippling into a wave. The lathe bay was flooded with sunshine. It caught the tawny sail of the fishing-boat far away, burnishing the sheer till it seemed made of gold. It burnished the smacks of the sea facing men busy with their nets into hues of battered copper. A mosaic could hardly be more brilliant or purer in tone than this picture. Yet when the carriage climbed an inland road winding high above the sea, it was surpassed by a scene phenomenal even in our fair Southern England. Not a breeze was stirring, and the mists of two days had cleared away, revealing Nature's handicraft, kept secret till all was ready. And what had the enchantress wrought so cunningly? Not the solemn array of snow, that is death like and eerie, but the witchery of the hoar frost, belonging to life and joy. In the dimness of dawn and home every object is veiled in mystery; a glorious burst of sunshine reveals such enchantment as we only see once or twice in a lifetime. The whole natural world is arrayed in white samite and diamonds—a winter bride ready for espousals.

In the woodlands the stateller branches are weighed down with their glittering burden, but the tiniest spray bent shows the magic, not a blade, not a panicle, without its tassels and fringes of crystal, its sparkles of jewelled light. Then the blue clear-swept sky above, and the blue pure sea beyond. It is as if we were suddenly lifted into some beautiful snowy world free from gross elements. All is cold, ethereal, crystalline. The carriage had flanked the bay, and now stopped at the head of a small winding combe, through which a foot-path led to shelving rocks overlooking the shore. In summer-time there is beauty enough and to spare here, and then not a mossy dell or ferny covert without the prattle of happy lovers. To-day, instead of greenery and wild flowers, all was pure, silvery, silent splendor, the dazzling flowerets of the frost making labyrinths everywhere, here and there letting in a peep of the deep winter sea.

*Begun in Harper's Weekly No. 1373.

Valerian gave Miss Hermitage his arm.

"It is very clever of you to find out such beautiful things," she said, delightedly; "and to manage even the weather. No muddy roads, no snow-storms. Surprise upon surprise. But what are you going to do with these good people?"

Valerian smiled rebuke as there emerged from the dry crisp alleys of shining white one guest after another—a bevy of pretty girls for grace, their vermilion-colored petticoats and crimson feathers brightening the scene, and half a dozen for wit, Stephana and the blind story-teller among these.

A bend of the path, and Valerian's little scheme revealed itself. Midway between the sea and the opening of the valley was a small restaurant, much resorted to in summer, but shut up in winter—to-day, however, alive with merry voices. A bright fire blazed on the hearth, curtains had been hung up, rugs laid down; the place was a picture of rustic elegance and comfort, while in the middle of the room stood a flower-decked table ready prepared for a savory feast. "How charming!" cried Miss Hermitage. "Well, really, I wonder, Valerian, what you will think of next. You are, indeed, worth any money."

Never was a more appetizing and animated little banquet. But the marvellous entourage would have moved even a dull company. It was like feasting in a palace of frosted silver under a sapphire dome. What a sight to be seen or missed! Yet the blind story-teller seemed somehow conscious of the beauty around him. The enthusiasm of the others was as a revelation to his inner eye, and when the light part of the banquet had come, he rose, leaned against the wall, and put everything into a fairy tale—the little lodge under the spangled glittering branches, the sea below, blue as malachite, flecked with many a white pinnace, the sea-birds flashing overhead. After the story the party dispersed to see the views, Arthura and Colette staying behind to pack up plate and crystal.

In the midst of this business Valerian came up. "I hate to hurry you away," he said to Colette. "My cousin and Stephana wish to return alone, but a seat is kept for you in the carriage. As for us two," he added, glancing at Arthura with mischief in his eyes, "we must get home as best we can."

Arthura looked dark, but said nothing.

"The walk is charming. We shall quite enjoy ourselves," he went on, ironically.

"Oh," put in the little Frenchwoman, "I am sure you don't mind—do you, Arthura? You will be friends with Mr. Valerian, won't you?"

"Arthura is not bound to be my friend, but can not refuse my company," Valerian replied, still malicious. "I will send Brown for the baskets, and then fetch you," he added, smiling at the discomfited girl. Then giving the little Frenchwoman his arm, he set off for the carriage.

When, however, he came back, a few minutes later, a certain plumed hat and fur cloak he knew well no longer hung on the peg. Arthura had flown. It was evident that she would not have his escort at any price.

From the valley several ways led into the town. Which would Arthura take? He pondered for a moment, then reflecting that she most probably knew but one, set off in pursuit, keeping the high-road. And true enough he did overtake the sulky recalcitrant. Mademoiselle Colette, catching sight of the pair, sighed to herself.

"Always at daggers drawn! I do wish they would learn to tolerate each other!" she mused. "But it is all Christina's fault."

Meantime Stephana, finding Miss Hermitage in the best possible humor, was skilfully leading up to the theme uppermost in her mind.

"I have been thinking a good deal about Valerian since my return to England," she began. "How admirable he is in many respects! So prompt, practical, and good-natured."

"All that he is, and much more. In fact, he is quite indispensable to me," Miss Hermitage replied. "But why should you think about him?"

"Because he is a relation, and yet no relation. I feel that you and Constantine and myself are bound to make up to him for the wrong—shall we say—that [illegible] has done him."

"He has everything his heart can desire. Why should you two do anything for Valerian?"

"That is hardly a position," Stephana said, gently, "and a man should have that. Some kind of career, a future."

"He knows well enough that if he makes himself useful to me as long as I live, he will be pensioned. I never intend to enrich any one. But Valerian shall never want."

Stephana looked unconvinced. "He is of our blood, the last, maybe. He should marry. He should found a family."

Miss Hermitage laughed a little dry sarcastic laugh. "To listen to you one might suppose poor Valerian to be the son and heir of a lord. A nobody he is, a nobody he must remain, [illegible]"—here she laughed again—"unless you marry him yourself."

"Valerian is on my conscience, and I would make sacrifices to help him," Stephana said, with great earnestness, and taking no account of the last part of the sentence.

"Why should Valerian be on your conscience?"

"Is he not on yours, then, and on my cousin Constantine's?" Stephana asked, still very earnest. "A kinsman who should bear our name, yet has none. The son of our blood is here."

"Well, you and I and Constantine, I am sure, are doing all that we can for Valerian, and the world does not concern itself with by-gones. He is better off than most people, after all that may be said," Miss Hermitage answered, comfortably.

For some time Stephana was silent. At last she said, in the same tone of subdued painful thought, "Christina, do you think Constantine could tell me Valerian's history from the beginning?"

"There could be no harm in asking him," was the curt reply. Then Miss Hermitage suddenly became good-natured and alert, and she changed the subject. "Mind and come to our dance, Stephana. Valerian and Arthura are getting up minuets and rigadoons to be danced in costume. It will be as good as a play."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

MR. ULRICH'S "GLASS-BLOWERS."

One of the two or three most notable successes at the National Academy Exhibition is Mr. Charles F. Ulrich's "Glass-Blowers." It is both a professional and a popular success: the studios are talking about it, and the populace admires it—if we may suppose the populace to be represented at the exhibition—and the most interesting thing about it is that the artist, after a course of eight years' study in Munich and thereabouts, should have gone straight to Walker Street, New York city, and found a subject to paint. These seven glass-blowers in their narrow quarters are making artificial eyes for the use of the taxidermist. At the present moment, we will say, they are making owls' eyes. The man at the extreme right has taken a piece of black glass, and by the aid of the three gas jets and a current of air is melting it, as he twirls it, fastened to the end of a wire, into the shape of a pupil. His next neighbor will soon take it and add some yellow; the third, receiving it from the second, will put some gray streaks on what corresponds, in the case of a human being, to the white of the eye; the fourth will back the whole with black. It requires the services of four men to make one owl's eye. The other operatives we may suppose to be similarly engaged.

Mr. Ulrich, who was also a student at the Cooper Institute and the National Academy, and is now about thirty years old, has made himself conspicuous by showing that he knows what he is about. Already he manifests a determined purpose. And while the technical execution of his picture is very admirable, its internal significance is serious and deep. Here is a work which displays the sympathetic and interpretative qualities of the profoundest art. The painter has entered into the life of these humble men. They are his brothers; he makes them ours. This trait is fundamental, and it is the fundamental that counts.

OUNCES OF PREVENTION.

AIR THAT IS TOO DRY.

What is to be done when parched lips and flushed faces, to say nothing of the way the thermometer in the sitting-room, indicate that the in-door air is too dry?

It is a frequent fault of the air during our winters to be too dry, and for most people air that is too dry is more or less injurious, though in different ways from damp air; and while we can not always make damp air dry, we can always do the converse—we can dissolve water at will in dry air.

Most of the stoves in use have some little attachment that is supposed to answer this purpose—an iron [illegible] on a very slender stem or a small projection [illegible] which to place a smaller kettle of water, which [illegible] its [illegible] fury of ebullition may possibly [illegible].

The only trouble to be found with these ornamental arrangements for the evaporation of water is that they do not actually evaporate water—not enough, at least, to make any appreciable difference in the state of the air. One can easily decide this by noting the time required for the evaporation of the small quantity of water that the urn may hold, first removing, however, the ends of matches, to the reception of which that container is often devoted. You will find that a quart of water will last a week or more in that situation; but for a room of ordinary size a quart of water is none too much to evaporate in a single day if it be cold and dry. These æsthetic urns are of little use, because they seldom receive heat enough to make the water boil; and boil the water must if moisture is promptly required to make overdry air comfortable.

In rooms where there is an open grate fire the best plan is to have an evaporator made on purpose of tin or copper, the latter is, of course, the best, because it will last the longest. It should be covered, should hold two or three quarts, according to the size of the apartment, and should have a hollow handle, through which the vapor may escape directly into the room. Place it on a wire hob at the edge of the fire, and the air will soon feel more comfortable.

In the case of a stove it is best to remove the terminal urn of which we have spoken; or if that object of art is firmly secured by a pivot, then turn it aside, and set in its place a pan which will cover the top of the stove at least as tightly as the urn covered it. A pail hung by the side of the [illegible], if the water in it can be made to evaporate fast enough, will serve the same purpose, but it must be put out of the reach of accidental overturning. Watch the hygrometer, or the moisture on the window panes, and check the evaporation or stop it the moment that a comfortable state of the air is produced.

The same method may be used with a furnace; a larger amount of water should, of course, be provided if several rooms are heated by it. The practical points are, first, to be sure that a sufficient quantity of water is actually and visibly evaporated, and second, to evaporate no more of it and no more frequently than is needed.

Who are the more benefited in general by a moister air, and who by a drier?

Warm air may easily be made too moist, its capacity to dissolve water being very great. This should be guarded against, for air that is over-moist relaxes the system, and makes the vital actions sluggish. But for nervous and delicate persons, and especially for those who need to gain flesh, an amount of moisture within the limits that I have indicated is very beneficial; it soothes the nerves, and promotes assimilation of the food, and it tends to brighten pale and pasty complexions. The flower of beauty needs moist air, like any other blossom. A drier air, on the other hand, is better for persons of sedentary habits, and for those who already have flesh enough and to spare. It makes the blood tend toward the skin, and favors perspiration, while the appetite and the rapidity of assimilation are slightly checked. A desirable in-door temperature for sedentary persons is about 66° F.; the delicate will require it a little warmer, but a heat of over 70° is generally too much for the winter.

Two other services of moisture in the air may be mentioned. The first thing to do when symptoms of croup appear in the nursery is to provide a moist atmosphere at about 70° F. The evaporator that I have described is most serviceable in the case of such an exigency. And if there chance to be any escape of carbonic oxide into the air from the stove, the moisture present will go far to neutralize the effects of that active poison.

TITUS MUNSON COAN.

THE CRANE LIBRARY.

"Nearly two hundred and forty years ago, in the early days of Massachusetts, and while Cromwell was still Lord Protector," according to Mr. Charles Francis Adams, Jun., in his address at the dedication of the Crane Memorial Library, Henry Crane, first of the name in this country, emigrated from England, and settled in Dorchester. This Henry Crane became, in the sixth generation, the progenitor of the Thomas Crane (born at Quincy in 1803, died in New York in 1875), for a memorial of whom in his native place this beautiful library has been reared by his children, in pursuance of their wish to do something which should signalize his attachment to Quincy.

In tracing this descent through these generations, Mr. Adams, in the very interesting address from which we have quoted, had occasion to trace not only the history of a typical New England family, but also, in rapid outline, the history of a New England community, in which down almost to our own time there were no rich and few invidiously poor, and in which, of the elements of "plain living and high thinking and heroical acting," the first was not a matter of choice. The Cranes were not men of special mark, but "average citizens" of those earlier days, and, as Mr. Adams says, the character and the career of the Crane who attained fortune by his own exertions and a posthumous local fame by the piety of his children are not less but more remarkable and interesting because they are not exceptional, but typical. The direct ancestors of Thomas Crane were born and reared, and chose their wives, and worked hard with their hands, and were gathered to their fathers, in one or the other of what are now the beautiful suburbs that encircle Boston. Thomas Crane showed more of the spirit of adventure and enterprise than his forebears. When he was a stripling, "Universalism," the first fruit of the reaction against the rigors of an austere Puritanism of an earlier day, had [illegible] been formulated, and young Crane was attracted toward that creed, as perhaps toward its evangelist, "Father Hosea Ballou," who was then preaching it in Boston. There was then no public conveyance on Sunday over the ten miles between Quincy and Boston, and Sunday after Sunday the young stone-cutter, who had lately changed his trade from that of a shoemaker, after working at it all the week, walked those ten miles and back again to hear the gospel in which he believed.

It was in 1829 that Thomas Crane outgrew the opportunities that Quincy had to offer to a stone-cutter, and removed to New York, which three years before, by the completion of the Erie Canal, had been given the decisive impulse to the metropolitan rank which has ever since made it the goal of the active and ambitious of American youths, and whither an elder brother had preceded him. With some other young journeymen he started a co-operative stone yard, and as they became disheartened or impatient he bought them out, and by 1835 had become an employer of labor and the master of a yard. And then came the opportunity of his life, which he turned to use. The great fire of December, 1835, laid waste the business part of New York, and in the rebuilding the Quincy granite, in which Mr. Crane dealt, was employed more freely than it had been before. The first commercial building in New York in which granite columns and lintels formed the first story was the store of Arthur Tappan, in Pearl Street, which is, or very lately was, still standing, and this was built immediately after the great fire. For nearly thirty years of as active construction as any city ever saw, there were few buildings of magnitude in New York in which granite was used to which Thomas Crane did not contribute, and which did not contribute [illegible] him. He [illegible] of business, an owner [illegible], a bank director, an insurance-company director, a street-railway director, and, as has been said, a leading man in his religious denomination, abstaining from more public life, and finding the interests of his life in his calling, his family, and his church, and closing at seventy-two a prosperous and honored life, leaving behind him the widow and two sons who have paid this noble and durable tribute to his memory.

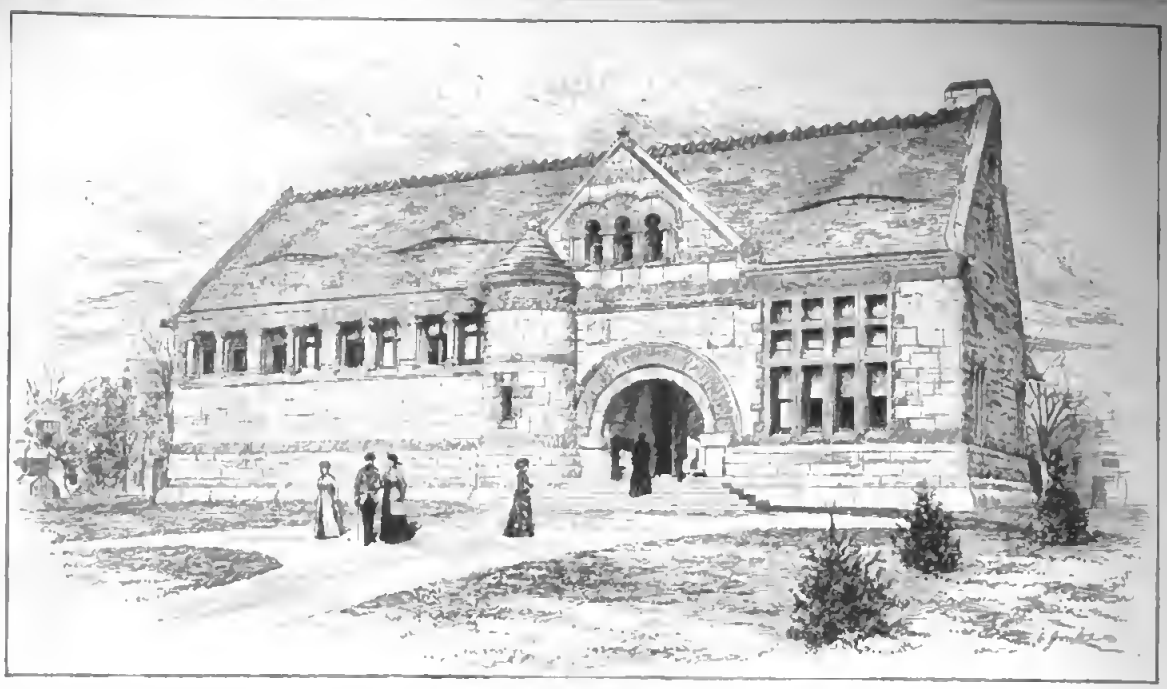
In February, 1880, the family of Mr. Crane offered to the town of Quincy "an edifice to be known as the Crane Memorial Hall or Library," to cost "not less than twenty thousand dollars," on condition that the town should allot a suitable site. At the town meeting of March 22, this offer was "gratefully accepted." An ample and admirable site was secured, which was laid out and planted under the direction of Mr. Olmsted; Mr. H. H. Richardson was chosen as the architect of the building, and the work of construction was begun, and continued until, on Decoration-day, 1882, the simple ceremony of dedication was performed in the presence of the surviving members of the Crane family. The most interesting of the exercises was naturally the memorial address, from which the foregoing account has been borrowed, delivered by a representative of the family that has given the quiet village a long and wide celebrity. Not the least interesting circumstance in connection with the library is that the great-grandfather of the orator, the second President of the United States, bequeathed his private library to the town of Quincy, and this collection of books, after having for two generations been housed where injury by neglect was almost unavoidable, now properly disposed and secure of care, forms a subdivision of the Thomas Crane Library. It is, upon the whole, in excellent preservation, and is intrinsically of extreme interest. John Adams, it seems, was a bibliophilist as well as a reading man, and there are in the collection many sumptuous specimens of the best typography and of the finest bindings of the end of the eighteenth century and of the beginning of our own. More than one volume has the rare interest of the signatures on one fly-leaf of John Adams and of John Quincy Adams. The books themselves seem rather like the collection of a professed scholar and student of "polite letters" than of an active public man; and a glance over the titles of a gentleman's library of the first decade of our century, thus segregated from more modern books, gives the modern reader a sense even more vivid than he gets by considering the mechanical marvels that have been wrought since these volumes were current literature, how short a tract of time has served to antiquate our grandfathers into an almost fabulous remoteness, and how much farther away we are from their precise and classic culture than they from the men of two centuries before.

It would have been a great pity if the completeness of the story we have been telling had been marred, and the pious intention of the benefactors partly frustrated, as so often happens in these cases, by a gift artistically unworthy of its purpose. In this case, however, the memorial is a brilliant architectural success. It is the third village library that Mr. Richardson has designed in Massachusetts, and, upon the whole, the most successful; and saying that is pretty safely saying that it is architecturally the best village library in the United States. The first of these three was the town library and museum at Woburn, and the second the Ames Memorial Library at North Easton. Each of these is of high architectural interest, and the three have a strong family resemblance. But the latest is the most simplified as well as the most refined in treatment, and gains thereby in singleness and force of impression. The library is one room, without even a vestibule, although the deep and sheltered porch serves the purpose of a vestibule. The books and the librarian are protected from the unauthorized incursions of readers by a light open screen of wood-work. The projecting turret contains the staircase that gives access to the attic, in which records and files not in common use are stored, and this is lighted by the triple window in the gable and by the small openings under the pent-house "eyebrows" in the roof.

Nothing, evidently, could be simpler than this plan, and nothing could be more forcible than the architectural outcome of it. The style is the Provençal Romanesque, in which the architect commonly works, and in which he contrives to express an artistic individuality so marked and characteristic. The building owes not a little of its picturesque force to the judicious choice and rugged treatment of the material. The field of wall is a pink granite from North Easton, which is very light without being cold in effect, and is laid rock-faced. The complementary stone is a dark and rich brown stone from the Longmeadow quarries, also rough-faced except where it is moulded or carved in decoration, the darker color being of course always employed where it is intended to give special emphasis to the [illegible]. Mr. Richardson has used this [illegible] in the Albany City Hall and in the Ames Memorial Library at North Easton, and nothing could be more effective.

But "the workmanship surpasses the material." In fact, the choice and combination of the material are part of the design, which, even if it were executed in monochrome, would make a striking and admirable building. Simple as the composition is, it is as far as possible from being bald or monotonous. A parallelogram of these dimensions with unbroken walls and a single roof could scarcely have been saved from baldness and monotony. It is saved here by the emergence of the gable and its attached turret, not in the centre of the f[illegible]d, on the side visible, [illegible] on the side [illegible] the [illegible] of the chimney. [illegible] composition seems as simple and spontaneous as if it came so. There is a complete exposure and balance, with no approach to formal symmetry in the two wings of the front, which is brought about by the skilful arrangement and contrast of the masses of openings. A striking instance of the length to which variety may be carried in skilful hands without becoming restlessness is afforded in the courage with which the entrance is placed "out of centre" in both directions, neither in the centre of the wall which it pierces horizontally, nor in the axis of the central opening of the triple window above it vertically. The impression of rugged strength is everywhere kept by the ample spaces of rockfaced wall either in unbroken wall spaces or in powerful wall-piers. No detail could disturb the impression secured, and the effect of the decorative detail here employed is to enhance it.

Digitized by Google



THE LIBRARY BUILDING.

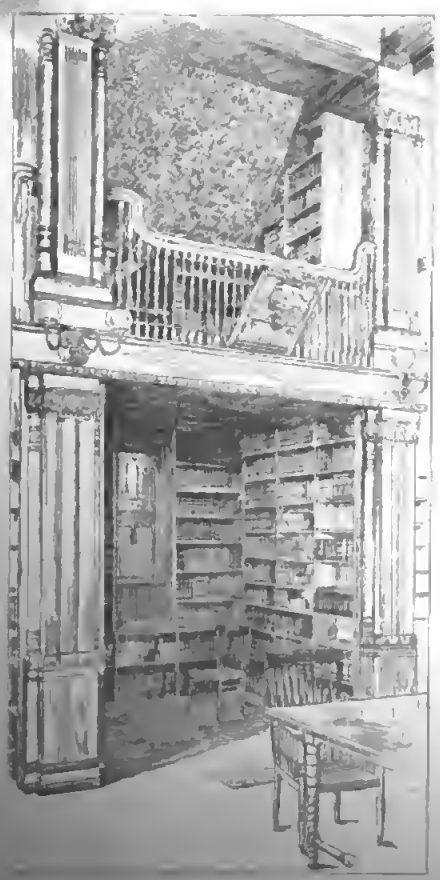
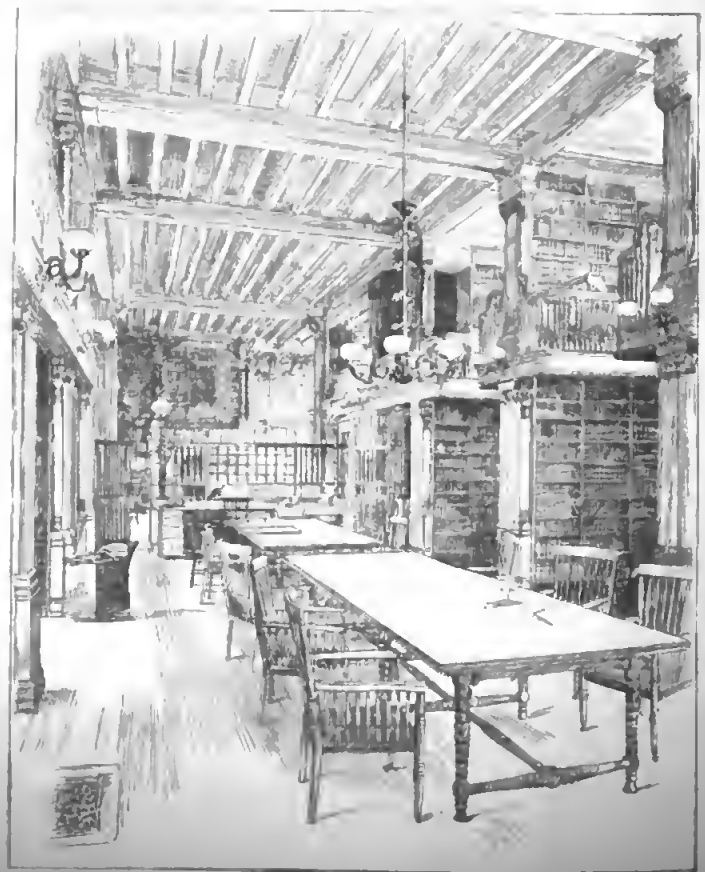
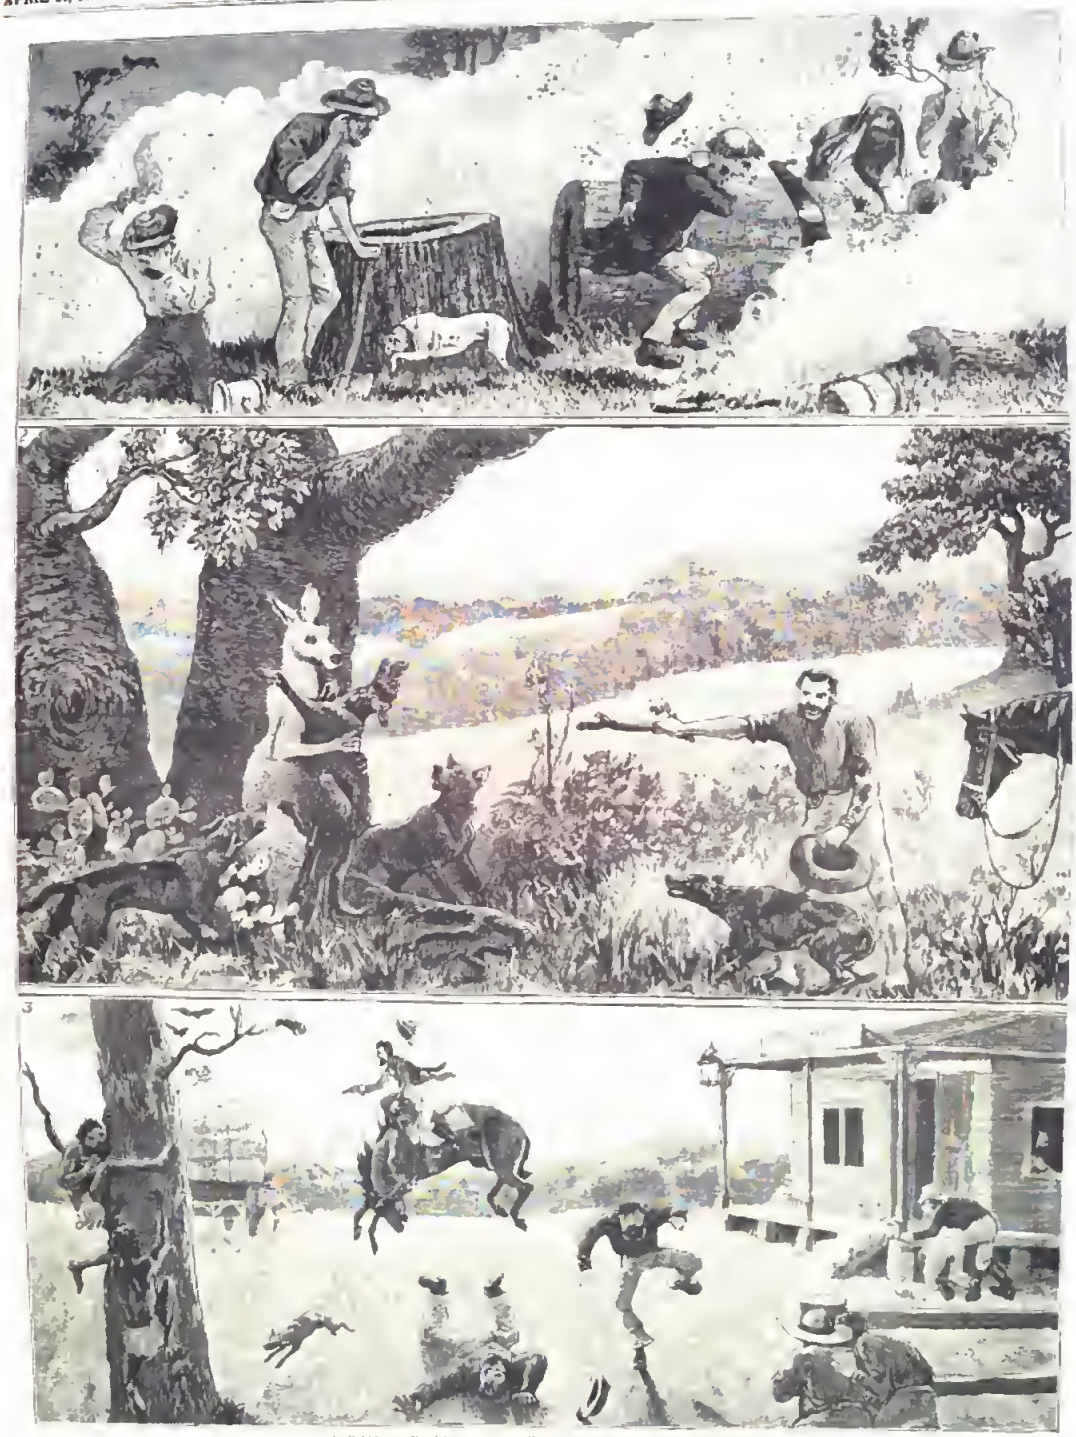
The real successes of detail, however, are in the interior. Here, too, the arrangement is as simple as possible. The posts which divide the alcoves and which are modelled above into pairs of columns corresponding in position to the heavier mullions of the exterior colonnade, carry the principal beams of the ceiling, which is flat at the centre, and follows the slope of the roof at the sides. These sloping sides are covered with embossed leather, while the





INTERIOR VIEWS—READING-TABLES AND ALCOVES.

THE CRANE LIBRARY, QUINCY, MASSACHUSETTS.



1. Robbing a Bees' Nest. 2. A Kangaroo at Bay. 3. Slightly Elevated.

ADVENTURE AND SPORT IN QUEENSLAND, AUSTRALIA.

wood work throughout is of white pine—a choice as felicitous in its use as that of the materials for the walls and roof. It has been carefully chosen, of beautiful and lasting grain, and the "tone" of the interior, given by this wood, the darker leather of the hangings, and the stained glass in the upper lights of the great traditioned window, is rich and harmonious. Over the large chimney-piece at the end of the waiting room, still in white pine, and richly panelled and carved, it is purposed to place a bass-relief portrait of Thomas G'Rank, by Saint-Gaudens. Almost all of the detail of the wood work deserves and will repay study. The greatest part of it is exquisite in design and in execution. The cost of the building is said to have been $50,000; and one's surprise is excited not by the fact that so much was spent upon so small a building, but that so much good art was got for so little money.

LIFE IN QUEENSLAND

THE artist writes: "Robbing a Bees' Nest" is an actual scene of which not long ago I was an unusual witness. These bees are not native insects which have as it were leapt the English variety imported here from the old country, and hence in a wild, healthy state, they know how to use their stings. They are now spread over most of Queensland, and make much better honey than the native variety. The mild gentleman in the centre has a bee of rest in his bonnet, certainly on the top of his pate, and his sensations can be quite understood by his antics.

"A Kangaroo at Bay" shows a common scene in Queensland, and is truthfully represented as I have many a time witnessed it. The kangaroo dogs are usually brave, strong animals, full of fight, but they are often terribly mauled by the kangaroo, which, if he be a large, full grown male, is esteemed dangerous when pinned in the position depicted in the drawing. I have known many instances where the settler, to a stand up fight with one of these creatures, has been nearly killed, and in some instances they have died afterward from wounds inflicted by the long, sharp nails of the kangaroo.

The lower sketch represents our "new chum," who is "slightly elevated" in more than one way. He has been encouraged by an old hand to try his hand at shooting a crow with his colt's revolver, and the result is reported in the sketch. It will be observed that the bewanderers have the language of the poet, "left something at home," and are anxious to recover their possessions. Every time the horse bucks, our elevated friend pulls the trigger, and sends another bullet to seek its billet.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE,

A RELIABLE ARTICLE.

Dr. E. Cutter, Boston, Mass., says: "I found it to realize the expectations raised, and regard it as a reliable article."—[Adv.]

Sing Sing, N. Y., Post-Office, March 10, 1882.

One week ago, while engaged in my duties as Assistant Postmaster, I was taken with a violent pain or kink in my back; it was so painful I could hardly breathe, and I ached all over my body. I immediately sent for an Allcock's Porous Plaster, and applied it over the seat of pain; in twenty minutes I was entirely relieved and cured. I have used Allcock's Plasters in my family for over twenty years, and have found them wonderfully effective in curing coughs, colds and pulmonary difficulties. They are a perfect medicine-chest; they cure without the slightest pain or inconvenience, never leaving a mark on the skin. Thos. Leary,

President of Village of Sing Sing, N. Y.

—[Adv.]

Angostura Bitters is known as the great regulator to the digestive organs all over the world. Have it in your house. Ask your grocer or druggist for the genuine article, manufactured by Dr. J. G. B. Siegert & Sons.—[Adv.]

Thousands of people testify to the merits to Piso's Cure for Consumption.—[Adv.]

BURNETT'S COCOAINE

Promotes the Growth of the Hair, and renders it dark and glossy. It holds, in a liquid form, a large proportion of deodorized Cocoanut Oil, prepared expressly for this purpose. No other compound possesses the peculiar properties which so exactly suit the various conditions of the human hair.—[Adv.]

Sudden Changes of the Weather often cause Pulmonary, Bronchial, and Asthmatic troubles. "Brown's Bronchial Troches" will allay irritation which induces coughing, giving immediate relief. Sold only in boxes.—[Adv.]

Halford Sauce—the standard relish. Of all the choice condiments Halford Sauce is the best.—[Adv.]

A cripple with rheumatism, Parker's Ginger Tonic cured me and keeps me well. M. Gilbeau, Binghampton.—[Adv.]

NEW LIGHT ON AN OLD SUBJECT.

Many people who have tried to throw light on the difficult subject of curing disease have found that what they supposed to be light was nothing but darkness. Those who depended on them for information and relief have been, like the suffering woman mentioned in Scripture, who had spent her money in vain on many physicians, "nothing better, but only worse." This sort of experience is unpleasant for all concerned. When the sick are to be made well and the suffering to be healed, there should be no blundering about it. The common blunder of American invalids is that they think they must swallow great quantities of drugs, concerning which they know with certainty only one thing, namely, that the taste is horrible. There is another thing in connection with these drugs which is not so generally known, namely, that the liquid which carries most of them is bad whiskey. Thus many an invalid goes from bad to worse, becoming a dyspeptic, a hypochondriac, a drunkard, and eventually a wreck. This is bad business, and they who follow it walk in the darkness to their own destruction.

It is better to walk in the light to recovery and health. The old Saxons spelled that word "whalth," and there is a good idea in the way they spelled it. True health is a state of whole soundness. When a man is sick, it is not only lung, or stomach, or brain that is out of order. The entire man is affected, and the trouble is most severely manifested in whatever happens to be his weakest part. When he completely recovers he is well all over, and in a state of "whalth," which is just what everybody wants to enjoy. The blood is the life of the human being. When it is poor and ailing, and clogged with impurities, there is no health. When it is properly vitalized, it courses through artery and vein, carrying to every part of the body the vigor and delight which spring from real health. The blood receives its vitality, or its promptings to decay, from what is taken into the lungs. It verily gets its substance from what goes into the stomach. But substance without vitality is not life. To see how that which is inhaled affects the life which is in the blood, look at the wretched sufferers who inhale poisons. They take in sewer-gas, and the inevitable low typhus fever or quick diphtheria seizes them. They inhale the bad air of undrained swamps, and presently shake and burn with chills and fever. They blow out the gaslight before going to bed, and deliver themselves into untimely graves by taking into their lungs carburetted hydrogen. Now if all this mischief can be done by simply inhaling that which can neither be seen nor handled, it is but fair to recognize the fact that, on the other hand, the inhaling of that which is life-giving can work corresponding benefit. The skeptical drug-swallowers, whose ideas of relief and cure are associated with the taking of nauseous things into their suffering stomachs, may not look on it in this light, but it is just as true as if they did. The facts are against them, and these speak louder than all their theories and objections. The sick can, in the most pleasant and delightful manner, inhale new life for lungs and blood, and, consequently, for the "whalth" of the entire system.

"What!" says a suffering and weary invalid who has swallowed nearly all the drug nostrums that are compounded and sold, "you don't mean that I shall get well by just breathing something that I can't see, or handle, or take with a spoon?"

Yes, Mr. Suffering-and-Weary, that is exactly it. Compound Oxygen will do it, and all you have to do is simply to inhale the Compound Oxygen according to directions.

The lungs are the air-bellows of the body. They are continually opening and closing as air is inhaled or exhaled. They are made of a delicate, yet very strong substance, much like leather. They are divided into thousands of little air-cells. When we inhale (or take in) a breath of air, we fill as many of these air-cells as are in working order. The air with which we fill them is composed of oxygen and nitrogen. What we send out when we exhale (or breathe out) the contents of the lungs, is nitrogen and carbonic acid gas. The latter is the impurities from the blood. The oxygen, coming in contact with the blood through the delicate tissue or membrane of the lungs, gives it its life. The heart is busy all day and all night pumping blood into the lungs and thence all through the circulation in every part of the body. In four minutes from the time a drop of blood has received its oxygen in the lungs, it has gone its round, and is back again to discharge its load of carbon and other impurities, and to receive a new message of life in the vitalizing inspiration of the oxygen. In the Compound Oxygen treatment, the invalid is given something to inhale which is different from mere atmospheric air. Oxygen by itself would not answer the purpose. It is sharp, severe, and irritating, and in its uncombined state is not assimilable. Thousands of faithful trials have proved this. In the atmosphere we breathe there is but one part of oxygen to five of nitrogen. If there were too much nitrogen and not enough oxygen, we would soon die. Compound Oxygen is a skilfully prepared, revitalizing agent, which supplies through the lungs to the blood exactly what the blood needs for its restoration, and for the restoration or renewing of every part of the system on which it acts. It carries with it a magnetic property, reaching the nerve centres, which, in their partnership with the brain, exercise a controlling influence on every part of the body, and telegraph to its remotest corner, either by sensations of pleasure or of pain, their condition of health or of ailment.

America's great disease is consumption. This is, to define it briefly, a wasting or decay of the lungs. The most remote air-cells first refuse to do their duty. Mischievous little tubercles invade the substance of the lungs, producing inflammation and other unpleasant results. The lungs become flabby and poor, like a worn-out kid glove, and grow powerless to vitalize the blood. There has been a prevalent idea that consumption cannot be cured, because no drug has been found to act as a specific for it when taken through the stomach. But it is now a well-attested fact that consumption is really curable, provided only that it is taken in time. Even Compound Oxygen will not convert a worn-out old leather glove into a new one. But it will take hold of consumptive lungs, and, by its searching and invigorating action, build them up to life and health. Its first action is to inflate air-cells which have long been uninflated and collapsed. Then, gently but powerfully, stimulating the lungs to vigorous action, it enables them to throw off the tubercles and regain a condition of soundness. So many consumptives who had been booked for the grave have been cured by Compound Oxygen that there is no reason why persons who are afflicted with lung troubles should feel gloomy about themselves, or regard their cases as at all hopeless, if taken in time.

As to other diseases than consumption. Is Compound Oxygen a cure-all?

It is not claimed for Compound Oxygen that it cures every disease that can afflict the sons of men. But there are a great many over which it has gained the most complete victory. Almost everything that goes wrong in the body is in some way or other connected with vitiated blood. In some cases these ailments are aggravated by local irritations, misplacements, or difficulties which are hereditary. Exposure, over-feeding, improper ventilation, and the abuses of clothing have much to do with them. Vitiated blood produces a lack of harmony among the nerves, and the horrors of neuralgia and sciatica are the result. It sends its messengers of evil to the region lying between nose and brain, and disgusting catarrh is enthroned in all the supremacy of its ugliness. It robs the stomach of its proper juices, and the victim becomes a dyspeptic whose every meal is a burden of sorrow. It reminds the system of the injustice done it by distributing here and there the pangs of rheumatism and the tortures of gout. Sufferers with these maladies, and the victims of exhausted nerve power and the diseases which follow on it, will find in Compound Oxygen the relief they need.

There are many medicines, an important feature of which is that they are kept on sale at every drug store. Not so with Compound Oxygen. It can be had only of its originators, Drs. Starkey & Palen, 1109 and 1111 Girard Street, Philadelphia. It is sent with full directions, so that all invalids can, without trouble, use it for themselves. The pamphlet entitled "Treatise on Compound Oxygen" contains much interesting information in regard to it, with the testimonials of many well-known persons who by its use have been restored to health. This pamphlet is sent to any address on application.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

ROYAL

BAKING POWDER

Absolutely Pure.

This powder never varies. A marvel of purity, strength, and wholesomeness. More economical than the ordinary kinds, and cannot be sold in competition with the multitude of low-test, short-weight, alum or phosphate powders. Sold only in cans.

Royal Baking Powder Co., 106 Wall Street, N. Y.

The Jumbo Catalogue.

Just published, the largest and most complete Catalogue of all sporting-goods ever issued; as Lawn-Tennis, Base-Ball, Archery, Cricket, Foot-Ball, Fishing, Hunting, and Gymnasium and Firemen's Goods, and all the latest novelties. 224 large pages, 3800 illustrations, on fine tinted paper. Price, by mail, 25 cts.

PECK & SNYDER, 126 to 130 Nassau St., N. Y.

TIMKEN SPRING VEHICLES!

Easiest riding Vehicle made. Rides as easy with one person as with two. The Springs lengthen and shorten according to the weight they carry. Equally well adapted to rough country roads and fine drives of cities. Manufactured and sold by all the leading Carriage Builders and Dealers.

HENRY TIMKEN, Patentee, ST. LOUIS, MO.

"BOKER'S BITTERS," THE OLDEST and Best Stomach Bitters known—unequalled for their medicinal properties, and for their fineness as a cordial. To be had in Quarts and Pints. L. FUNKE, Jr., Sole Manufacturer and Proprietor, 78 John St., N. Y. P. O. Box 1029.

LUNDBORG'S PERFUMES, Edenia, [illegible] Rhenish Rose, Alpine Violet.

THE BRADLEY

ROAD CART

Agents [illegible] complete the No. 4 Phaeton Cart. We also make them [illegible] suited for breaking colts. Our No. 3½ Single Perch Cart is used very extensively by Gentlemen [illegible] ing on the road or track, weighs 100 lbs., and is handsomely finished [illegible]

THREE STYLES, weighing from 90 to 100 lbs. Prices [illegible]

[illegible] Send for illustrated Price List.

BRADLEY & CO. SYRACUSE, N. Y. ESTABLISHED 1832.

And by special appointment to the Imperial Russian Court.

Established 1818. Honors of Countless [illegible]

Copenhagen Peter F. Heering's Cherry Cordial

7 Prize Medals. Gold Medal 1878 Paris.

Purveyor by appointment to the Royal Danish Court and H. R. H. the Prince of Wales.

For sale by all the leading [illegible] JOHN DE BEVANS' SONS, Union Square, New York.

IMPORTED TILES & MOSAICS IN HEARTHS, FACINGS, BATH ROOMS & FLOORS. GRATES, FENDERS, ANDIRONS &c. EDWARD BOOTE 11 EAST 19th ST. N.Y.

Keep your bird in health and song by using Sisson's Patent Gravel Paper. For sale by all Druggists and bird and cage dealers. Price 15 cents. Depot, 582 Hudson Street, N. Y.

40 Gold & Silver Chromo Cards, no 2 alike, with name, 10c., postpaid. G. I. Reed & Co., Nassau, N. Y.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1878.

BAKER'S Breakfast Cocoa.

Warranted absolutely pure Cocoa, from which the excess of Oil has been removed. It has three times the strength of Cocoa mixed with Starch, Arrowroot or Sugar, and is therefore far more economical. It is delicious, nourishing, strengthening, easily digested, and admirably adapted for invalids as well as for persons in health.

Sold by Grocers everywhere.

W. BAKER & CO., Dorchester, Mass.

Thirty-Fifth Annual Report OF THE

PENN MUTUAL LIFE Insurance Company OF PHILADELPHIA.

Net Assets, December 31, 1881.....		$7,314,055 30
Receipts during the year,
For Premiums	$1,155,170 03
For Interest	460,707 89	1,618,878 92
		$9,133,[illegible] 96

DISBURSEMENTS.

Claims by Death	$656,[illegible] 04
Matured Endowments	10,000 00
Surrendered Policies	96,[illegible] 22
Cash and Note Dividends	207,394 51
Re-insurance	6,[illegible] 10
Total paid policy-holders	$9[illegible],002 16
Taxes and Legal Expenses	33,[illegible] 10
Salaries, Medical Fees, and Office Expenses	73,[illegible] 01
Commissions to Agents, Rents, &c.	110,[illegible] 98
Agency and other Expenses	65,[illegible] 70
Advertising, Printing, Supplies	17,000 10
Fire Insurance, Office Furniture, &c.	7,640 93	1,[illegible],790 10
Net Assets, Jan'y 1, 1883		$7,[illegible],738 43

ASSETS.

Philadelphia and other City Loans, R.R. and Water Bonds, Bank and other Stocks	$2,[illegible] 10
Mortgages and Ground Rents	2,043,431 08
Premium Notes secured by Policies, &c.	665,[illegible] 70
Loans on Collaterals, &c.	640,967 10
Home Office and Real Estate bought to secure Loans	[illegible]
Cash in Trust Companies and on hand	64,[illegible] 10
Net Ledger Assets as above	$7,[illegible],738 43
Net Deferred and Unreported Premiums	101,[illegible] 10
Interest due and accrued	56,[illegible] 44
Market Value of Stocks, &c., over cost	391,[illegible] 70
Gross Assets, January 1, 1883	$8,[illegible] 72

LIABILITIES.

Losses reported, but not due	$1[illegible],694 10
Reserve at 4 per cent. to re-insure risks	6,[illegible],049 10
Surplus on Life Rate End'ts, &c., and General Surplus, 4 per cent. basis	1,[illegible] 10	$8,[illegible] 79

Surplus at 4½ per cent., Pennsylvania Standard estimated	$1,[illegible] 85
Number of Policies in force	16,[illegible]
Amount of Insurance in force	$38,194,[illegible]
Number of Policies issued in 1882	2,[illegible]
Amount insured in 1882	$6,[illegible]

SAMUEL C. HUEY, President.
EDWARD M. NEEDLES, Vice-President.
H. S. STEPHENS, 2d Vice-President.
JESSE J. BARKER, Actuary.
HENRY C. BROWN, Secretary.

KNOX & DE FOREST, General Agents, 191 Broadway, New York.

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

EPPS'S COCOA.

BREAKFAST.

"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately flavored beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

Made simply with boiling water or milk. Sold in tins only (½-lb. and lb.) by Grocers, labelled thus:

JAMES EPPS & Co., Homœopathic Chemists, London, England.

Illustrated Catalogue 100 pp. Photo. Lecture, 10c.

MAGIC LANTERNS WITH VIEWS $5

MAGIC LANTERNS AND SLIDES WANTED.

Wonderful Polyopticon and Picture $2.50 [illegible] Magical Microscope [illegible] Catalogue FREE.

THEO. J. HARBACH, 809 Filbert Street, PHILADA., PA.

MINTON'S ART AND ENAMELED TILES.

China Works, Stoke-upon-Trent.

Also, THE CAMPBELL BRICK & TILE CO.'S Encaustic and Geometrical Floor Tiles, Renders, &c.

THOS. ASPINWALL & SON, 75 & 77 West 23d St., New York. Sole Agents in the United States.

A CHARMING BOOK BY CAPT. FARRAR. "EASTWARD HO! or, Adventures at Rangeley Lakes." Cloth, 336 Pages, 9 Illustrations, by mail, $1.25. JAMAICA PUB. CO., Jamaica Plain, Mass.

CARLETON'S TREASURY of KNOWLEDGE. The most elegant [illegible] Circulars free. Agents [illegible] Address G. W. CARLETON & CO., Publishers, N. Y.

CARDS. An Elegant New Set of Cards for [illegible] stamp. W. H. PRINGLE, Rochester, N. Y.

War Volumes OF Harper's Weekly.

We would call the attention of persons who have not the files of Harper's Weekly during the War to

HARPER'S Pictorial History OF THE REBELLION,

Same size pages as the Weekly, containing 1000 of the Illustrations that appeared in Harper's Weekly during the War. Messrs. Harper & Brothers have destroyed all the plates and stock of the War Volumes of Harper's Weekly.

2 vols., price, delivered free of express charges: Cloth, $14.00; Half Morocco, Cloth Sides, Marble Edges, $20.00; Full Turkey Morocco, Gilt Edges, $30.00.

SOLD BY SUBSCRIPTION ONLY.

McDONNELL BROS.,
113 Dearborn Street, Chicago.

☞ We invite the attention of General Subscription Book Agents to the attractions offered them in this valuable work.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. PUREST AND CHEAPEST MEAT FLAVORING STOCK FOR SOUPS, MADE DISHES, AND SAUCES.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. An invaluable and palatable tonic in all cases of weak digestion and debility. "It is a necessary and a boon for which nations should feel grateful."—See "Medical Press," "Lancet," "British Medical Journal," &c.
CAUTION.—Genuine only with the fac-simile of Baron Liebig's Signature in Blue Ink across the Label. This caution is necessary, owing to various cheap and inferior substitutes being in the market.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. To be had of all Storekeepers, Grocers, and Chemists. Sole Agents for the United States (wholesale only), C. DAVID & CO., 8 Fenchurch Avenue, London, England.

Sold wholesale in New York by PARK & TILFORD, SMITH & VANDERBEEK, ACKER, MERRALL, & CONDIT, HASKINS & BOBBINS, H. K. & F. B. THURBER & CO., W. H. SCHIEFFELIN & CO.

LOOK
THE BEST OF ALL OFFERS.
[illegible] FREE TO U

DAKOTA.
Quick, safe, and easy investments for capitalists or settlers in Ontario, Benton County, Dakota. A new Loan on Northern Pacific Railroad, at crossing of N. P., twenty miles west of Bismarck. Farm. Special reports for March issue in every line. Mechanics in demand; wages good. Well-settled country, in the Red-storm tribal belt. Correspondence solicited. Reference: Barna, Hare, & Comer, New York; Bank & Insurance Nat. Bank, Chicago. Address PERKINS, ROBBINS, & CO., Bankers, Ortonia, Dakota.

MUSIC [illegible] FREE
"THE LITTLE PIC SERIES."
AGENTS [illegible]
$5 to $20 [illegible]

SHAKESPEARE'S PLAYS.

EDITED BY WILLIAM J. ROLFE, A.M.

THE MERCHANT OF VENICE	ALL'S WELL THAT ENDS WELL.
THE TEMPEST	THE COMEDY OF ERRORS.
ANTONY AND CLEOPATRA	THE TAMING OF THE SHREW.
AS YOU LIKE IT.	OTHELLO.
TWELFTH NIGHT.	TIMON OF ATHENS.
A MIDSUMMER-NIGHT'S DREAM	KING LEAR.
CYMBELINE.	ROMEO AND JULIET
MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING.	CORIOLANUS.
A WINTER'S TALE.	MEASURE FOR MEASURE.
PERICLES, PRINCE OF TYRE.	KING JOHN.
MERRY WIVES OF WINDSOR.	RICHARD THE SECOND.
JULIUS CÆSAR.	HENRY THE FOURTH. PARTS I. AND II.
TWO GENTLEMEN OF VERONA.	HENRY THE FIFTH.
MACBETH.	HENRY THE SIXTH. PARTS I., II., AND III.
LOVE'S LABOUR 'S LOST.	RICHARD THE THIRD.
HAMLET.	HENRY THE EIGHTH.
TROILUS AND CRESSIDA.	THE TWO NOBLE KINSMEN.

This edition of Shakespeare's plays is intended for school and college use, and also for the private student and the general reader.

The Introduction to each volume contains the history of the plot, according to the latest investigations; an account of the sources of the plot, with copious extracts from the chronicles or novels from which Shakespeare drew his materials; and selections from leading English and foreign criticisms upon the characters of the play.

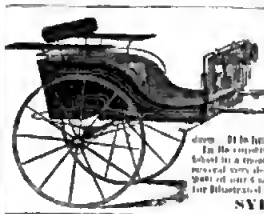
The Text is the result of a careful collation of the folio of 1623 and the other early copies with all the more recent editions that have any critical value.

The Notes are fuller than in any other school or standard edition, except Halliwell's great folios and Furness's "New Variorum." The author has aimed to include all the historical, critical, and illustrative matter needed by the teacher as well as the student and the general reader.

The PICTORIAL ILLUSTRATIONS are a unique feature of this edition. The engravings are illustrations in the best sense of the word, being mainly historical portraits and delineations of places, buildings, monuments, works of art, costumes, antiquities, etc., connected with the poet or his works.

Price, per volume, Cloth, 50 cents; Paper, 40 cents.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, Franklin Square, New York City.



Syracuse Village Cart.

The handsomest and most popular pleasure Cart made. Intended especially for ladies and children. It is light low, to be easy of access; is roomy and comfortable. In its construction the very best of materials only are used, and it is finished in a most thorough manner in every respect. We also manufacture several very desirable styles of Road Carts for gentlemen's driving. Over [illegible] of our Carts to use. All speak in the highest praise of them. Send for Illustrated Catalogue and Price-list.

SYRACUSE CART CO., Syracuse, N. Y.

CASTORIA

for Infants and Children.

Castoria promotes Digestion and overcomes Flatulency, Constipation, Sour Stomach, Diarrhœa, and Feverishness. It relieves health and natural sleep, without morphine.

"Castoria is an well adapted to Children that I recommend it as superior to any prescription known to me."
H. A. ARCHER, M. D.,
82 Portland Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

What gives our Children rosy cheeks,
What curves their lovers, makes them sleep?
'Tis Castoria.

When babies fret and cry by turns,
What cures their colic, kills their worms,
But Castoria.

What quickly cures Constipation,
Sour Stomach, Colds, Indigestion,
But Castoria.

Farewell then to Morphine Syrups,
Castor Oil and Paregoric, and
Quell Castoria!

CENTAUR LINIMENT—an absolute cure for Rheumatism, Sprains, Burns, Galls, &c. The most Powerful and Penetrating Pain-relieving and Healing Remedy known to man.

CAMPBELL'S Self-Acting Window Shade Rollers.
Admitted Superior to All Others
Ask your upholsterer for them
Salesroom, 239 Centre Street, N. Y.

BE GENEROUS! You have some sick friend who is tired, sick, wants pictures to look at and steel stories to read. Send on that friend's address and 10 cents in postage stamps, and we will mail, postpaid, six back numbers of our beautifully illustrated magazine (retail price 60 cents). Address
THE COTTAGE HEARTH CO., Boston, Mass.

Lady Agents [illegible]

FREE NEW ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE OF Scrap-Pictures, Visiting and Advertising Cards, Fulcion and Printing Presses, including new set of Imported Cards, sent to any address for 6 cts. CLARK CARD CO., Box 31, Brooklyn, N. Y.

$72 A WEEK. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly Outfit free. Address TRUE & Co., Augusta, Maine.

SEELEY'S HARD RUBBER PILE PIPE
Another new element directly to pure tobacco. Claimed by curing when other remedies fail. Conveniently carried in the vest pocket, ready for use, without pain or inconvenience, absorbing incendiary matter and all tramping poison, combined with a package of Seeley's Cleansers, by which are purified the pernicious matter left by most pipes. Sold by dealers. Pamphlet, 1,247 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa., or 78 Fleet Street, London, England.

WANTED [illegible] BOOK AGENTS
GENERAL AGENTS to hire and train others to introduce a NEW WORK of extraordinary merit and great popularity. Positions are worth $3,000 to $10,000 a year. Address, for particulars, [illegible]

PORTRAITS [illegible]

Messrs.

JAMES McCREERY & CO.

Invite an inspection of their present stock of

SILKS AND VELVETS,

adapted for Spring and Summer usage.

The facilities they have for obtaining types of cloth and sketches of design prior to production enables them to make the newest distribution of color and combination and exhibit them in advance of any house in Europe.

JAMES McCREERY & CO.,
Broadway, corner 11th St.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

Fashionable Neck Wear for Gentlemen and Youths, Dress Shirts, Collars and Cuffs, ready-made and to order. Cheviot and Flannel Travelling Shirts, Pajamas, Dressing Robes, Smoking Jackets, Bath Wraps, &c.

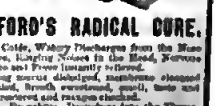
Broadway and 19th St.

PURE INDIA TEAS.

From the Districts of
ASSAM, CHITTAGONG, CACHAR, KANGRA VALLEY, DARJEELING, DEHRA DOON, And Others.

Absolutely Pure, Superior Flavor.
THE MOST ECONOMICAL TEA.
Requires only half the usual quantity.
SOLD BY ALL GROCERS.
JOHN C. PHILLIPS & CO., Agents of the Calcutta Tea Brands, 120 Water Street, New York.

CATARRH



SANFORD'S RADICAL CURE.

Head Colds, Watery Discharges from the Nose and Eyes, Ringing Noises in the Head, Nervous Headache and Fever instantly relieved.

Choking mucus dislodged, membrane cleansed and healed, breath sweetened, smell, taste and hearing restored, and reason cheered.

Cough, Bronchitis, Deafness into the Throat, Pains in the Chest, Dyspepsia, Wasting of Strength and Flesh, Loss of Sleep, etc., cured.

One bottle Radical Cure, one box Catarrhal Solvent and one Dr. Sanford's Inhaler, in one package, of all druggists, $1. Ask for Sanford's RADICAL CURE. WEEKS & POTTER, Boston.

Webster's Unabridged THE 300 North American Engravings, 1,000 Engravings, &c., &c., &c.
"A LIBRARY IN ITSELF."
G. & C. MERRIAM & CO., Springfield, Mass.

40 Chromo Visiting Cards [illegible]

TOO MUCH TAIL TO THEIR KITE

DECKER BROTHERS'

MATCHLESS

PIANOS

33 Union Square, N. Y.

BURKE'S SALAD DRESSING

No Waste. No Trouble. No Disappointment.

A GOOD SALAD ASSURED.

The most Delicious and the most Popular Mayonnaise for all kinds of Salads, Raw Vegetables, Cabbage, Cold Meats, Fish, &c., ever offered for sale.

ALL GROCERS SELL IT.

FISHERMEN!

TWINE and NETTING

MANUFACTURED BY THE

BALTIMORE TWINE AND NET CO.

WM. J. HOOPER & SON,

No. 6 S. Calvert St., Baltimore, Md.

☞ Send for price-list, naming county and State Please mention this paper.

MARLIN MAGAZINE RIFLE

45 Govt. and 40-60 Grain Cartridges.

VERY STRONG, PERFECTLY SAFE.

THE BEST RIFLE in the world for Large Game. Shooting more accurate, Model is very beautiful. Mosquito sights. Finish finer, than that of any other rifle. MARLIN FIRE-ARMS CO. NEW HAVEN, CONN.

Round Writing

USEFUL FOR EVERY ONE

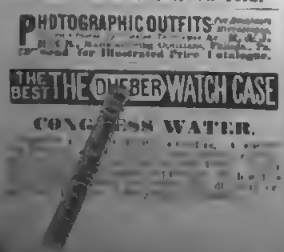
BOOK OF INSTRUCTIONS & PENS

MAILED FREE A. N. KELLY & BRO., New York.

PHOTOGRAPHIC OUTFITS for Amateurs or Professionals. E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO., Manufacturers, 591 Broadway, New York. Send for Illustrated Price Catalogue.

THE BEST THE OMEBER WATCH CASE

CONGRESS WATER.



POND'S EXTRACT

THE WONDER OF HEALING!

CURES CATARRH

A Beautiful Knapsack, Free

A Beautiful Knapsack [illegible] representative of General Palmer's famous feat at Horncastle, will be GIVEN AWAY, FREE, to [illegible] who participate No. 25 of the New York Weekly, to be published A. S. SMITH, and free to [illegible] No. 25 out.

Leave your order to-day with your News Agent for No. 25 of the New York Weekly.

If you [illegible] interest to Newsdealers, send us a postal card [illegible] the office of No. 25 [illegible] New York. We will send you a sample with full terms, A VALUABLE BACK PIECE.

STREET & SMITH,

31 Rose Street, New York.

IT STANDS AT THE HEAD:

HARPER'S BAZAR CUT PAPER PATTERNS.

We have transferred our WHOLESALE PATTERN DEPARTMENT of No. 7 & 9 HOUSTON ST. to 189 to 195 Cherry Street, New York, where will conduct it upon his own account and responsibility.

SPECIAL CAUTION.

We are not interested in nor responsible for any contracts made by J. G. CROTTY & CO., whether for Harper's Bazar Patterns or for any other business.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

EARL & WILSON'S PATENT "SHORT BAND" COLLARS AND "BEAD EDGE" CUFFS ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION

WHITMAN SADDLE COMPANY, [illegible] Ladies' [illegible] WHITMAN SADDLE CO., 5 Murray St., N. Y. City

HOW to Make $1,500 Yearly Profit with 12 Skates. [illegible] Price A. G. CROTTY, 189 Cherry Street, New York. Particulars sent free.

J. W. BOUGHTON, 108 Market St. Phila., Manufr of

WOOD-CARPET

Parquetry or Ornamental Wood-Floors, for Saloons, Vestibules, Private Houses, Hotels, Banks, Offices, Bedrooms &c. Rugs. Send stamp for Book of Designs.

COUGHS, &c.

SUFFERERS from Coughs and Asthma will find a sure relief from these distressing complaints in Hale's Honey of Horehound and Tar—a medicine widely known and esteemed for its valuable pulmonic qualities, being principally compounded from the syrup or honey prepared from the plant so Horehound, skillfully combined with Tar in such a manner as to entirely overcome the unpleasant taste of the latter, thus rendering this medicine extremely palatable, while not detracting from its soothing properties. Chronic as well as Ordinary Colds and Coughs readily yield to this fine medicine. Ask your Druggist for "Hale's Honey of Horehound and Tar" (full name), and take no substitute.

Pike's Toothache Drops Cure in one minute.

Hill's Hair and Whisker Dye, 50c.

Be Sure and Look

A HOME.

TO BUILD A HOUSE

of any kind, [illegible] decade WHAT to build, [illegible] HOW to build, by putting our hand, which gives a wide range of approved and practical designs from dwellings costing $500 up to $50,000. Large quarto, 170 illustrations.

"A large and handsome publication, profusely illustrated, printed on tinted paper and of marked interest to an extensive [illegible] class."—Scientific American.

"We have thoroughly examined the work, which proves to be of great interest to those intending to build and to a reader of a practical reference and a comfortable companion."—Scientific American.

"Contains beautiful and ornamental plans. The wonder is that a publication of this kind has not been issued before."—N. Y. Morning Mercury.

"The only low priced work yet issued, and the most handy, [illegible] we have ever offered. Price $2.00, by mail, postpaid. Stamps taken. Money refunded if not satisfied."

CO-OPERATIVE BUILDING PLAN ASSOCIATION, 27 Beekman St., Box 2707, New York.

"By his work upon 'Progress and Poverty,' a treatise upon political economy, which is written with singular clearness, and which has commanded universal attention as a significant contribution to Social Science, Mr. George has earned the right to be heard and to have his suggestions carefully considered."—Harper's Weekly, March 30th, 1883.

MR. HENRY GEORGE

IS NOW CONTRIBUTING TO

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper,

A SERIES OF ENTIRELY NEW AND ORIGINAL ARTICLES ON

"PROBLEMS OF THE TIME."

In which he will treat in full of subjects [illegible] that are [illegible] also vexed [illegible] touching, [illegible] each [illegible] will be of peculiar [illegible] in [illegible] a series of strong and suggestive articles.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper

is sold everywhere. Price 10 cents. By mail, $4 per year. $1 for three months, entering the name [illegible] on the Time [illegible] is prepaid. Address

Mrs. FRANK LESLIE, Publisher,

53, 55, and 57 Park Place, New York.

LOW, SON, & HAYDON'S

Flower de Luce

The Howard Tooth Brushes

HAVE

SECURELY FASTENED BRISTLES

AND CAN BE FOUND WITH ALL DRUGGISTS.

PINS BEARING THIS

TRADE MARK.

P&A

ARE SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS

MANUFACTURED BY

THE PLUME & ATWOOD MFG CO.

WATERBURY, CONN.

J. P. EDDY & CO.,

SPOT COTTON AND FUTURE DELIVERIES,

182 Pearl Street, New York.

AMERICAN STAR SOFT CAPSULES THE BEST. Also, Star Empty Capsules. All Druggists.

SYPHER & CO.

ARE CONSTANTLY RECEIVING FINE OBJECTS IN

Antique Silver, Furniture, Clocks, Bronzes, and Articles of Vertu.

720 & 742 BROADWAY.

New Prices!

DR. SCOTT'S ELECTRIC CORSET,

$1, $1.50, $2, $3.

In daily use by the Queen and Princess of Wales

Every woman who has any pain, ache or ill-feeling of any kind, should immediately try these celebrated Corsets. Their cures are most remarkable, and yet there is no shock or unpleasant sensation whatever in wearing them. Every lady who is well will keep her good health if she will only wear these beautiful invigorating corsets.

They are now warranted unbreakable, and the price will be refunded in every case where they are not as represented. If you will order one on these terms and send us the price, with 10c added to pay postage, registration, etc., we will send it on trial, guaranteeing safe delivery into your hands. Here's money order, draft, currency or stamps, or ask your [illegible] dealer for them. Address

GEO. A. SCOTT, 842 Broadway, N. Y.

Mention this paper

AGENTS WANTED IN EVERY TOWN.

Print Your Own Cards, &c. Press $5. Large sizes for circulars, &c. $8 to $30. For printing labels, marking clothing or anything else. Everything easy, printed instructions. Send 2 stamps for Catalogue of Presses, Type, Cards, &c., to the factory KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

H.W. JOHNS' ASBESTOS

LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING, Steam Pipe & Boiler Coverings, Steam Packing, Mill Board, Sheathing, Fire Proof Coatings, &c. Send for Descriptive Price List.

H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO. 87 MAIDEN LANE, N.Y.

THE IMPROVED HORSMAN BICYCLE.

A durable and easy running roadster for men and boys.

30 in. 36 in. 40 in. 44 in. 48 in. 52 in. $90 $95 $100 $105 $110 $115

New York Agency for the Columbia Bicycles and headquarters for Bicycle Sundries. Send 3c. Stamp for Illustrated Catalogue.

E. I. HORSMAN, Manufacturer, 80 & 82 William St., N. Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York,

Have Just Published:

I

LETTERS AND MEMORIALS OF JANE WELSH CARLYLE Prepared for publication by THOMAS CARLYLE. Edited by JAMES ANTHONY FROUDE. Library Edition, 12mo, Cloth, $1 50. Also, 4to, Paper, 50 cents. No. 307 in Harper's Franklin Square Library.

II

STRAY PEARLS Memoirs of Margaret de Ribaumont, Viscountess of Beltaire. By CHARLOTTE M. YONGE, Author of "Love and Life," &c. 4to, Paper, 15 cents. No. 308 in Harper's Franklin Square Library.

III

THE STORY OF MELICENT By FAYE MARNE. 4to, Paper, 15 cents. No. 309 in Harper's Franklin Square Library.

☞ Harper & Brothers will send any of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States or Canada, on receipt of the price.

ALLEGHENY COLLEGE LIBRARY.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

Vol. XXVII.—No. 1375. NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 28, 1883. TEN CENTS A COPY. $4.00 PER YEAR, IN ADVANCE.

Copyright, 1883, by Harper & Brothers.

"THE TRANSIT OF VENUS."—From the Painting by J. G. Brown

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 28, 1883.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

AN OFFER TO YOUNG AMERICAN ARTISTS.

For the best original drawing to illustrate ALFRED DOBBIT'S "Christmas Hymn"—the drawing to be available for publication in HARPER'S MAGAZINE, and to be the exclusive work of an American artist not over twenty-five years of age—MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS offer an award of THREE THOUSAND DOLLARS, upon the honorable understanding that the successful competitor shall use the same for the prosecution of art study in one or more of the best American schools, sustaining also a separate absence of at least six months for the study of the old masters. The award will be paid in such installments and at such times as shall best suit the convenience of the recipient for the purposes specified.

The drawings must be received by MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS not later than August 1, 1883, addressed "Art Competition, Harper's Magazine, Franklin Square, New York"; and each must be designated by an assumed name or motto, which should also be given, together with the real name, age, and residence of the artist, in a sealed envelope accompanying the drawings, and not to be opened until the result of the competition shall have been determined. The name of the successful competitor will not be publicly announced until the publication of the drawing.

MR. R. SWAIN GIFFORD, N.A.; MR. F. D. MILLET, A.N.A., and MR. CHARLES PARSONS, A.N.A., Superintendent of the Art Department, HARPER & BROTHERS, will act as judges of the competition.

It is intended to engrave the successful drawing on one page for HARPER'S MAGAZINE of December, 1883; and should other drawings submitted be found suitable, second, third, and fourth awards will be made, as follows, one page HARPER'S WEEKLY, $300, one page HARPER'S BAZAR, $200, one page HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, $100.

If the judges should decide that no one of the drawings is suitable, MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS reserve the right to extend the limit of time and re-open the competition.

Two Christmas Hymns by ALFRED DOBBIT have been published. That published in 1877 as the one for the illustration of which artists are invited to compete, and a printed copy of it will be sent on application to

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

THE POLITICAL CALM.

IT is remarkable that while the political situation in Europe is so critical that one of the most accomplished of publicists describes it as the "European Terror," politics in the United States are so stagnant that the only activity is an endeavor to show some reason for the existence of parties—an endeavor which ends in showing that upon no one immediate question is either party agreed. The Democratic attempt to present the tariff as the crucial question has merely revealed the bitter and hopeless dissension of the party upon that subject, a dissension illustrated by the tone of the Democratic press for or against Mr. RANDALL, and by the protectionist speech of Mr. CARTER HARRISON at a party dinner expressly designed as a free-trade demonstration. On the other hand, a Republican paper declares a protective tariff to be a cardinal Republican doctrine, a declaration which if true would at once exclude from the Republican party the New York Times, the Albany Evening Journal, and the Buffalo Express—to go no further—three of the most representative and powerful Republican journals in the State. It is plainly very doubtful whether the chief issue of an election can be made upon a question about which neither party is agreed. Whenever such a question is felt by the public—not by the Iroquois Club nor by a knot of politicians of any party, but by the country—to be the paramount issue, it must lead to a reorganization of parties, like the slavery question. The effort of politicians and "managers" to fit an existing party to a new question—that is, to a question upon which the party was not formed—is in itself presumptive evidence that the question is not a controlling issue. The endeavor to adjust the Whig party and the Democratic party to the question of slavery destroyed the Whig party and left the Democratic party a mere slavery propaganda, while the Republican party recruited from both, arose swiftly to power, and has maintained its dominance for a quarter of a century.

The conclusion from such facts is obvious. If the Democratic party is to become in good faith a free-trade party, as the Republican was an anti-slavery party, then such gentlemen as Mr. RANDALL and Mr. HARRISON and their friends will be no longer Democrats, and if the Republican party is to be in good faith the party of protection, then the leading journals that we have named will cease to be Republican. If the chief issue in an election be protection, how can a paper which advocates a non-protective tariff support the protectionist nominations, or how can a protectionist orator declare for the free-trade party? To suppose that the parties which are known as Republican and Democratic are to contest the election of 1884 is to assume that free trade or protection will not be the issue. A Democratic correspondent inquires whether we mean to say in a recent article that free-trade Democrats are to renounce their party because it may not yet be ready to take the true ground upon that subject, which, in his judgment, is absolute free trade. We answer that what we said was simply this, that to make free trade the issue would cost the Democratic party the election. But undoubtedly every free-trader will support the party that he believes will most certainly secure the object which he holds to be of paramount importance. Nothing, however, it seems to us, can be more evident to a free-trader than that if there be no free-trade party in the field, it is because free trade has not become a paramount issue.

It is not probable that the position which either party will take upon the question will seriously disturb the party relations of voters. The platforms will proclaim sound and safe and non-committal sentiments, which will hold the stragglers and the rear-guard, and the main reliance of both sides will be party association and tradition, as is always the case when a question has not become strong enough to remodel parties. Yet the situation has one peculiarity. Usually, when old issues are spent and old questions settled, there is a disposition, as in 1820, to re-adjust party relations or to abandon them altogether. But the attitude of parties in the civil war is too fresh in the public memory to permit that kind of indifference. The deep distrust which the Democratic party then inspired has not been removed by the more recent conduct of that party, and whatever Republican offenses may have been, the alternative of Democratic administration is not contemplated with pleasure by the truly conservative sentiment of the country. This, of course, is not a disposition which would maintain itself against a great issue. But so long as the main question is the comparative chance of efficient, economical, and progressive administration under Republican or Democratic control, the probabilities of success are all with the Republican party. Moreover, in view of this distrust, and of the extraordinary course of the Democratic party upon the tariff question, many friends of a revenue tariff who would perhaps co-operate with a new party formed upon that issue would not support the Democratic party, with which they are perfectly familiar, merely because it might declare in 1884 for a revenue tariff, as in 1872 it nominated a protectionist, and resolved "to remit the discussion of the question to the people in their Congressional districts." The Democrats may be very sure that they will be judged not by their professions in a convention, but by their conduct for twenty years.

"THE IRISH CONVENTION."

"THE Irish Convention," as the assembly of certain naturalized American citizens is called, which is soon to be held in Philadelphia, has one plain duty to discharge. Whatever else it may say or leave unsaid, it must unequivocally and completely disclaim all sympathy with murder as a means of agitation. There should be no evasion whatever upon this point. The great body of American citizens sympathize with the honorable aspirations and efforts of all other countries, and with the agitation which aims at juster and humaner laws. In case of evident and hopeless oppression they do not forget the Revolution that secured their own independence, and they look with interest and fellow-feeling upon every justifiable revolutionary struggle. But there is no people in the world more loyal to law, and a policy of assassination directed against Englishmen who are endeavoring to relieve suffering in Ireland by law is a policy so hideous that the instinctive abhorrence with which it is regarded is apt to include all Irishmen who in demanding changes in the law do not clearly and emphatically absolve themselves from all suspicion of complicity in crime or of approval of criminals.

The leaders of the Convention ought to understand that American sympathy with the Irish agitation is not only chilled, but changed into hostility, by any doubtful position of Irish agitators, whether in this country or elsewhere, upon the policy of murder. Whatever may have been true a century ago, and during the cruel Irish repression of the eighteenth century, it is inexpressibly ridiculous to attempt to represent Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. BRIGHT and the Liberal members of the ministry as black-hearted tyrants and oppressors of Ireland. Constitutional agitation, in or out of Parliament, for changes in the land laws, for increase of representation, for "home rule," even for separation, is legitimate, and would have a certain moral support in this country. But agitation which justifies such savage atrocities as the murders in Phœnix Park is not agitation, it is an outbreak of anarchy which every honorable man in every civilized country at once stigmatizes as a crime against humanity and society, and every abettor of such crime in every degree is spurned as an enemy of the human race.

It is to be hoped, therefore, that the managers of the Convention interpret correctly the change of American feeling and tone about the Irish agitation, and that they see the necessary and fatal effect upon Ireland of any hesitation in clearly defining the position of those residents in this country who call themselves Irish Americans. If they prefer that designation, they have only to reflect that they are but a pitiful handful in comparison with English-Americans. But such distinctions are wholly mischievous. Any class of citizens in this country who evidently abuse its name and the immunity which its citizenship gives them may surely count upon profound and universal national distrust and antipathy. If the action of the Convention—which as an "Irish-American" assembly is greatly to be regretted as implying that American interest in foreign questions is not a unisonal but a class interest—shall show that the Dynamite party in this country is limited to a few insignificant rioters who represent nothing but their own vanity and folly, it will do something to retrieve the obloquy which recent crime has cast, however unjustly, upon the name of Ireland. But if it should appear that the leaders are afraid of the criminal element among Irish agitators, they will not change, indeed, the wisdom and propriety of certain reforms in Ireland, but they will have greatly obscured the hope of seeing those reforms accomplished. For Dynamite can not frighten, although it may easily exasperate, England.

THE GOVERNOR'S BUFFALO VETO.

GOVERNOR CLEVELAND is said not to be popular with the politicians of his party, but he is very much wiser than they, and it would have been most advantageous to the party to sustain him cordially. His best actions, however, have produced the most vehement Democratic protests, and his official term has thus far been most serviceable, in a party sense, by disclosing the real spirit of his party. The Governor's late veto of the project to reorganize the Buffalo Fire Department in an act which good citizens of all parties most cordially approve, but which the local Democratic politicians furiously condemn. The present Fire Department of Buffalo was organized in 1880, and it was placed under the control of three commissioners "of unquestioned probity, intelligence, and executive ability," says the Governor, "who enjoy and deserve the respect and confidence of their fellow-townsmen." This excellent board is not political, and manages the department in the public interest and not in that of a party.

The object of the proposed change was to make the board a mere party machine, and to provide more of that patronage which it has been the object of the present Legislature to secure for the party of the majority. The Governor, who, as the late Mayor of Buffalo, is perfectly familiar with the situation, exposes plainly the nefarious scheme hidden in the bill, and remarks:

"The purpose of the bill is too apparent to be mistaken. The tried, economical, and efficient administration of an important department is to be destroyed upon partisan grounds, or to satisfy personal animosities, in order that the places and patronage attached thereto may be used for party advancement. I believe in an open and outspoken partisanship which secures the legitimate patronage of party supremacy, but parties were made for the people, and I am unwilling knowingly to give my assent to measures purely partisan which will sacrifice or endanger their interests."

Nothing could be more manly and honorable. It is by such acts that men in high positions, by serving their country best, serve their party most. But the local Democratic politicians have burst into such an uproar over this just and admirable position of the Governor that if there had been any doubt of their purpose they have entirely dispelled it.

The Governor declares for "the legitimate patronage of party supremacy." But whatever that may be, it is not, in his opinion, such patronage as results from the overthrow of an honest, efficient, and economical administration of a wholly non-political function in order to make it a "placer" for "runners," "rounders," "heelers," and "hummers." In vetoing this miserable scheme Governor CLEVELAND has done what every man who is really fit to be Governor of New York would do. He has proved the sincerity of his response to the inquiry of the Civil Service Reform Association, in which he said:

"When contests between parties are waged for the purpose of securing places for professional politicians of high or low degree, whose only recommendation for appointment is their supposed ability to do partisan service, the people are apt to be defrauded by the displacement of tried and faithful servants well able to perform the duties for which they are paid with the people's money, and the substitution of those who are unfit and incompetent. In this way the interests of the party may be subserved, but the interests of the people are neglected and betrayed."

It is curious that the Democratic politicians do not see that their true party policy lay in hearty support of the Governor's veto. But the action of the Legislature shows how total is their repudiation of his principles, and how complete their abandonment of any pretense of desiring the reforms which they have loudly demanded.

MILLENNIAL YEARNINGS.

SEVERAL Republican journals are improving each shining hour by dropping honeyed words of conciliation of party differences. Why not "close up the ranks"? Why should brothers differ? Is not the good old party good enough for all Republicans? Shall not by-gones be by-gones? Can not the antithesis of GARFIELD and GUITEAU be forgotten? Can not offensive adjectives about the machine be in the deep bosom of an ocean of concord buried? Are we not all devoted protectionists and true civil service reformers, and is there not a universal desire for political purity and the lying down of lambs and Boss? Stalwart Half-Breed, Molly Coddle, Snival Service, Sunday-School, and the Brass-medal Squad—do we not all agree that these are naughty names which no good Republican will take again upon his lips or his pen?

These millennial yearnings must be warmly approved by every sincere lover of his kind. But politics, as we are constantly assured, being a very practical business, how is the glittering goal to be attained? Hurrah for conciliation, by all means, but then how to conciliate? There can be nothing juster than justice, but how shall justice be done? What is the source of the difference which is to be reconciled? This is the beginning of the inquiry, and the answer is that the trouble springs from the exclusion of a large part of the party from any voice or part in its councils, and from the factitious power given to a few men by patronage. An organization of the party in which every member shall have an equal voice, and the overthrow of illicit power based upon patronage, therefore, are necessary to heavenly harmony and perfect conciliation. At present the majority principle is brought into contempt, and the exhortation to abide by the will of the majority is ridiculous, because everybody knows that it is not an honest majority. A seventh part of the party is absolutely excluded from representation in the Convention, and the votes of such representatives as appear are often controlled by patronage. A majority so obtained is fraudulent, and its will, even according to the most scrupulous view, is not binding. Votes controlled by patronage are corrupt, and the action which they seem to sanction is void.

Conciliation will hardly be accomplished by "closing up the ranks," and agreeing not to use "swear words" and contumelious epithets. Indeed, they are not very distressing. They merely indicate a difference; they do not produce it. If the Republican party in New York is to be harmonized, it will be done by getting rid of the causes of the trouble, and it is well to observe that none of these causes are "bygones," and therefore can not be left to be by-gones. Conciliation is not a negative procedure. It can be effected only by doing something, and a party can be united only by agreement upon certain definite principles, and by honest management. We are glad to see, therefore, that a committee, among whom are most excellent gentlemen representing every view in the party, has been appointed to devise a plan of harmonizing all differences. Their action will be watched with great interest. But we trust that the committee will understand that without real and important changes, including personal changes, "harmony" will be, like the will-o'-the-wisp, only a bright deceiver.

THE NEW CITY CHARTER.

MAYOR EDSON'S speech before the Assembly Committee on Cities contained nothing very new, but much that is very true, and only too familiar to every New Yorker. The city, he said, is governed by commissions, and the commissioners are appointed by bargains between the nominating and confirming powers. It is practically impossible to remove unfit officers, and equally impossible to fill vacancies without a "dicker." In the present city government there is really no responsibility, and the situation is both demoralizing and dangerous. Any system, therefore, which would combine power and responsibility would be preferable to the present system, and this union is the object of his charter.

This charter gives the Mayor power to appoint the heads of the municipal departments without the intervention of any other authority, and it would be better, as Mayor Edson's opinion, to intrust that power even to the Board of Aldermen than to leave it divided as it is now. He said that he was not personally anxious for the power, but in response to Mr. ROOSEVELT said that he saw no impropriety in giving the present Mayor the sole appointing power, and there could be no good reason for deferring for two years changes of such pressing importance. The Mayor's views are in harmony with those of his predecessor, and his strong expression of them only confirms with the eloquence of experience the view which commends itself to intelligent students of city affairs.

A grotesque reply was made to the Mayor by Alderman COCHRANE, who holds apparently that a city is a political community like a State or a nation, and that the Mayor was proposing a municipal tyrant, while the great system of popular government had already provided a bulwark of popular rights and liberties in the Board of Aldermen. A more amusing speech could not be made. There is no doubt of the wisdom of the Mayor's general proposition. The power of removal, however, should be strictly defended against abuse, and the inevitable corruption of minor patronage should be baffled by a practical abolition of such patronage. Much would be gained, however, by concentrating responsibility upon the Mayor. It is only a pity that, knowing this when he was a candidate last autumn Mayor Edson had not made his charter his platform. He now states strongly and cogently the impossibility of good city government under the party and dicker system, and the desirability and necessity of the transaction of public business upon business principles. We congratulate him upon his new light. It was because he was nominated by the dicker system that he was opposed last year by those who wish to see the business of the city transacted upon business principles.

WALTER HOWE.

UPON page 260 is a portrait of the Hon. WALTER HOWE, of whom we spoke last week as a worthy colleague of THEODORE ROOSEVELT in the Assembly, another of the young, resolute, intelligent, and independent Republicans who represent the strong convictions and high principles of the party, and who are coming forward in its leadership. Such Republicans must be considered carefully by those who are eager in reorganize the party in New York. They are not Republicans of yesterday, but of to-morrow. They are not old Whigs, but new Republicans, and they equally discard old Whig doctrines which have become obsolete, and old Republican methods which are not honest and of good report.

Throughout the session Mr. HOWE'S vote has been recorded upon the right side of all important questions, and the practical experience which he has gained will be of great service in his future career. If the proposed reorganizations of the party should result in sending such men as Mr. HOWE and Mr. ROOSEVELT to the State Convention from the city of New York, it would secure to the party councils a representation of the wisest and most courageous and most upright sentiment of the party in that city, which is not always present in the conventions.

SOUND ADVICE.

FREDERICK DOUGLASS is still a wise counsellor of the colored race. In an address in Washington upon the anniversary of emancipation he said that three solutions have been offered of the problem of the fate of the colored man in America. The first was colonization, which was certainly not worth talking about. The second was extinction by poverty and disease. But it appeared that in the Southern States the increase of the colored people is ten per cent. greater than that of the whites. The third solution was amalgamation and confliction with the rest of the population, and this seems to Mr. DOUGLASS the natural course.

"There is but one destiny, it seems to me, left for us, and that is to make ourselves and be made by others a part of the American people in every sense of the word. Assimilation, not isolation, is our true policy and our natural destiny. Unification for us is life; separation is death. We can not afford to set up for ourselves a separate political party, or adopt for ourselves a political creed apart from the rest of our fellow-citizens."

This is simple good sense, and may well be pondered by every American. The demand of "recognition," that is to say, of patronage, upon the ground of color or previous nationality, is as foolish as to demand it upon a sectarian ground. The Constitution and the laws do not know German, nor English, nor French, nor Irish, nor colored, or Baptist, or Jewish, or pagan, or atheistic, Americans. They know only equal citizens, who, if they are white or black, may have been born anywhere in the world, and may hold any religious faith, or none. Consequently any body of citizens who, as citizens, try to separate themselves into a class upon grounds of race, or nativity, or religious opinion, are essentially anti-American.

Citizens who hold similar views of public policy will naturally and properly organize to secure the passage of laws embodying their views. But this is very different from organizing to secure advantages as colored, or Baptists, or Catholic, or German, or English. American citizens. Mr. DOUGLASS'S words, like all wise words, are timely and suggestive.

THE GOVERNOR AGAIN.

THE good word elsewhere spoken for Governor CLEVELAND is justified by the appointment of the Superintendent of Insurance, assuming that a change was necessary or desirable. That it is not a political office is plain enough from the fact that Mr. MCCALL, the new Superintendent, who is a Democrat, has been long the efficient deputy, to which post he was appointed by the two late superintendents, who were Republicans. Governor CLEVELAND once promotes him to the headship of the office, and there is no question of his singular fitness for the position.

One peculiarly satisfactory fact in connection with this promotion is that it baffles the efforts of a noted politician to secure the nomination by means of political influence of every kind and degree. This personal pressure has now become so universal that a man who was drum up signatures to a petition and procure certificates and letters is held to establish a kind of "claim" to the place, and no man who does not blow his own trumpet violently and insist upon "recognition" is regarded as a possible candidate. "If he wants the place, why doesn't he ask for it?" is the question. But the sounder form is, "Does the place want him, and if so, why is he not called to it?"

Of course in making important nominations the Governor or any appointing officer will consult those whose opinion he may desire. But advice given under such circumstances is plainly different from a recommendation written at the request of the person to be recommended. Such a letter means only that the writer prefers not to refuse an autocrat. It does not mean that he thinks the applicant to be the best person for the place. The appointment of Mr. MCCALL is another of Governor CLEVELAND'S creditable acts.

PERSONAL.

MR. CHARLES F. CLARK, whom "Glass-Blowers" we engraved last week, is said to have received already this year orders for [illegible] thousand dollars' worth of pictures, his patrons being collectors of American paintings exclusively.

—MR. T. B. CLARKE'S private collection of American works of art numbers more than one hundred examples, and is especially rich in fine examples of GEORGE INNESS. MR. CLARKE began to gather it about ten years ago, and it is now an honor to the city.

—In his Morro To-day, MR. BARCLAY has notes that the coexistence of several small communities of differing Protestants, exhibiting feelings of animosity toward each other in a purely Catholic country like Mexico, is a source of great weakness, as it affords the Catholic priests an opportunity of continuing their tactics against joining a body so divided in itself.

—MR. CHARLES R. MILLER, who has succeeded MR. JOHN FOORD as editor of the New York Times, is a graduate of Dartmouth College, and about thirty-four years of age. Immediately after leaving college he was offered a position on the Springfield Republican, and remained four years with that paper—an excellent school for young journalists. He has been connected with the Times for about two years, is a thorough sympathy with the progressive wing of the Republican party, and by education, ability, and experience is well equipped for the responsible position to which he has been called.

—MR. GOLDWIN SMITH is commended for having, in his new book on Venice, "grasped the aspect of the lagoons in a cast—an aspect seldom touched upon—their vast and solitary desolation, the confusion of sea and sky, the sense that you and your gondola are floating in a medium which is neither one nor the other, the fitful breeze bearing strange sounds across the water."

—Fourteen volumes of Thiers's Parliamentary Orations have already been issued in Paris, where they do this sort of thing more thoroughly for their dead statesmen than in any other city in the world.

—Says the Academy: "We observe that the new edition of LIDDELL and SCOTT'S Greek Lexicon is being actively pushed in America. The literary journals advertise pages of favorable notices. Owing to the fact that American help was sought for in the revision, the book is now copyright in America." The great success of this work is almost commensurate with its deserts, but the college boys whose eyes must to legible and beautiful type are not likely to appreciate their advantage over their predecessors.

—In the new bronze statue of Lord BEACONSFIELD in Parliament Square, London, the Earl appears in his robes and the order of the Garter, and holds a scroll in one hand. The 19th of April was the day set apart for the unveiling.

—CRUIKSHANK declares that he is grateful to England for letting him out of captivity, but very sore at heart because his country has been so much cut up. This division of territory, he predicts, will lead to trouble and complications before long.

—Mr. H. E. WOODBURY'S History of Wood Engraving, recently published by the HARPERS, the Academy has a highly appreciative two column review. The volume, it says, is "clearly the result of a great deal of work; and where the author inserts observations or criticisms of his own they invariably give evidence of thoroughly sound opinions upon fundamental principles. Engravers on both sides of the Atlantic would do well to lay to heart the wholesome criticism and advice contained in the last chapter. The historical portion of the book is the most readable history of the art that has yet been written. Moreover, any one who accepts Mr. WOODBURY as his guide will not be led far astray. Finally, the printing is excellent, the paper is good, and no are the illustrations."

—BISMARCK wrote in 1865: "From all I have heard about LOUIS NAPOLEON'S character during the last few years from people who have known him for half a generation it seems that the impulse to do precisely what no one expects of him is almost a disease with him, and is daily encouraged by the Empress."

—Mr. HARPER SPRAGUE begs the students of St. Andrews University, who have nominated him for the Lord Rectorship, to withdraw his name. Ten years ago, he says, he was compelled to decline the honor on account of the state of his health, and the same reason again prevails.

—MR. ALBERT WOLFF, contributor to the Figaro, has had a biography of himself written, under the title of Albert Wolff, Histoire d'un Chroniqueur Parisien. He was born and educated at Cologne.

—MR. O. B. BRADY observes that a book whose pages bone been cut is always despoiled of something. "Every one who is accustomed to see the folded sheets of a book before it is bound, and the same sheets after they have been opened, crushed, and subjected to the butchering knife of the binder, must feel, if he possesses a sense of beauty, that a certain very lasting quality to the page has been extinguished. The most accomplished book maker in the country once remarked to the writer that in comparing cut and uncut copies of the same volume of a book he found a difference which he was utterly unable to account for—the paper, the ink, the printing, everything about the uncut copies seemed so much superior."

—According to Dr. F. L. OSWALD, fat is the best lung-food, and among all fat-containing substances fresh sweet cream is about the best, and salt pork the worst. Consumptives should avoid all unwholesome articles of diet, salt meat, pickles, indigestible made dishes, spiced fat, pungent spices, cheese, and all kinds of intoxicating liquors.

—MR. MILLAIS'S latest picture, "A Swearing," is a full-length figure of a wayward lad who, having crept into the hold of a ship, is startled by the lifting of the hatch above him. The light streams upon his frightened features, and he crouches in terror. The drawing and painting of the head are said to be marvellously fine.

—The days of profitable stock farming with a small capital are passing away, according to the Pall Mall Gazette, but for the young man with a level head, strong constitution, and ample means the plains of the west and southwest frontiers of the United States and Canada will for many a long day offer no admirable field for enterprise.

—Horse-flesh is sold in some parts of London for beef. It has the peculiarly rosy appearance which the people like, and in order legally to prevent its sale it must be shown that it is unfit for the food of man."

—The General Synod of the Church of Ireland has adopted a resolution petitioning Parliament against any bill which will have the effect of admitting atheists into either House. But it is objected that the present oath is a premium on hypocrisy, not a prohibition of unbelief.

—The Lord Bishop of Rochester entered the House of Peers the other evening, and after seating himself unfolded a newspaper and began to read it. An attendant immediately called his lordship's attention to the breach of order, and the paper promptly disappeared into the offender's pocket.

—The death of Mr. JOHN BROWN, the Queen's personal servant (says the Spectator), has created some interest in society. He has for years been a conspicuous figure in the royal household, and at one time the most absurd stories of his influence with the Queen were greedily believed. The truth is that he was a confidential servant, an trustworthy and devoted [illegible] the Queen trusted him, as he deserved, as a humble friend, and in particular relied more upon his vigilant watchfulness than upon any police or guards. Kings value devotion like Mr. BROWN'S with a feeling [illegible] of true gratitude [illegible] of a master's kindness for a [illegible] naturally consider [illegible] In this light [illegible] with which her Majesty, in the [illegible] one shock" the last [illegible] at the irreparable loss" of [illegible] faithful, and devoted [illegible], a trust [illegible] forward man," whose unceasing care in the [illegible] tion "had secured for himself the real [illegible] of [illegible] There is a ring of true and most creditable [illegible] official notice. Mr. BROWN died of erysipelas [illegible] cold caught while mounting, at the Queen's desire, [illegible] ed attack on Lady FLORENCE DIXIE.

THE HON. WALTER HOWE, MEMBER OF ASSEMBLY FROM NEW YORK.
PHOTOGRAPHED BY NOTMAN, ALBANY.—[SEE PAGE 252.]

JOHN A. McCALL, JUN., SUPERINTENDENT OF THE INSURANCE DEPARTMENT.
PHOTOGRAPHED BY NOTMAN, ALBANY.—[SEE PAGE 259.]

STOLEN BY APACHES.

On the 28th of last March Judge H. C. McComas, his wife, and young son, while visiting some mining property, were met by a straggling party of Apaches at Thompson's Cañon, twenty-five miles from Silver City, New Mexico. The parents were killed, and the boy captured and carried off by the band into Mexican territory.

The name of this unfortunate lad, bereft of father and mother, and carried into a terrible captivity, is CHARLES WARE MCCOMAS. He is only six and a half years old, large for his age, weighing nearly one hundred pounds, and has light yellowish hair.

Judge McComas was at one time a prominent merchant of St. Louis, Missouri, and his wife, a lady of culture and refinement, was considered one of the leaders of fashionable society in that city. Both were very highly esteemed.

THE HON. HENRY D. McDANIEL.

This gentleman, nominated by the Democratic State Convention for Governor of Georgia, was born in Walton County, in that State, and now resides at Monroe, the county seat, engaged in the practice of law. He was educated at Mercer University, a Baptist institution, then located at Penfield, Georgia, where he graduated with the highest honors in 1856, at the age of nineteen. He soon opened a law office, and won a substantial reputation.

As a member of the Secession Convention of 1861 he opposed secession at first, but finally voted for the ordinance of secession, and was one of its signers. A few months later he was in the field as Lieutenant of the Eleventh Georgia Regiment, became Major in November, 1862, and commanded a brigade on the last day of the battle of Gettysburg. On the retreat of the Confederate army he rendered gallant service, and was severely wounded near Hagerstown. This closed his military career. He subsequently served in the State Assembly, and eight years in the State Senate.

CHARLES WARE McCOMAS, STOLEN BY APACHES.
FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.

THE HON. H. D. McDANIEL, DEMOCRATIC CANDIDATE FOR GOVERNOR OF GEORGIA.
PHOTOGRAPHED BY C. W. MOTES.

"WITH A SUDDEN WILD CRY SHE RUSHED AWAY"

VINEY'S CONVERSION AND COURTSHIP.

By SOPHIE SHEPARD.

(1.—Continued.)

THE supper hour was indeed drawing near; the needles flew faster, and the quilting was honorably completed by the time that Viney appeared and whispered in Sis Ally's ear that all was ready.

Sis Ally rose. "Walk right out, ladies an' gentlemen," she said, with a delightful air of mingled triumph and modesty. "Walk into de nex' room for a little refreshment."

At sight of the "little refreshment," Preacher Simphins's hand instinctively sought his buttons. All settled into their seats with a flutter, followed by a hush of expectation.

"Brudder Simphins," said Ally, gravely, "will you please to hab de honor oh axin' de grace?"

Brother Simphins cleared his throat in reply; then began: "We hab come together, good Lord—we hab come together as Thy humble worshippers for to praise an' thank Thee, an' to partake in righteousness oh de sweeter comforts which Thou hast prepared for us from de beginnin' oh de worl'." A pause, during which Preacher Simphins shifts his position. "Fi dar he any sin mixed up in it"—with a mental glance, doubtless, toward the turkey—"why, jes' take it up, O Lord, an' put it right on de Sabbath shoulders. He knee wid us while we are partakin' oh de food what you gib us through de han's oh Sis Ally an' Brudder Plut. If he done wrong to shoot de turkey on de holy day oh de Sabbath, remember Thy Son, who plucked de corn on de Sabbath-day, an' forgib us all, an' forgib de Legislature for makin' a law dat t'warn't nothin' but human natur' to break. Bress dem, O Lord, an' bress all oh us, befo' de sinners an' de righteous, de ole an' de young, de rich an' de poor, de quality an' de quantity, an' don' leabe none oh us out. Bring us all to Thy fold, an' never fail from Thy grace."

An earnest "Amen" followed from all the company. Ally was obliged to wipe her eyes, and so to Viney, such was Preacher Simphins's air of simple piety that a strange feeling came over her that perhaps, after all, there was something a sight better in religion than she had ever been able to grasp.

And now the feast began. Conversation was annihilated. Through the long golden aisles of beer unperceived reigned supreme. Then all was over. Warm, but happy, the company crossed their knives and forks, and leaned back to fan themselves; and then, with the proud smile of a general whose forces are not yet exhausted, Ally brought forth a great bucketful of lemonade, the ice gratefully tinkling against its sides, and ladled it out to her guests. Hap pieces could no further go, and Sister Caroline Elizabeth made a sensation by wishing, in audible tones, that she had a throat like a giraffe, so she could feel the trickles of the lemonade a good long time.

Brother Buford roused like a war-horse upon hearing this, and made some cunning remarks upon the subduing of the carnal nature, adding that it was bad for the health to take cold drinks after such a hearty dinner. For his part, he preferred hot coffee like coffee was furnished him. He drank it, steamed, and felt victorious.

"Fears like dat ole man is powerful contrairy," thought Tobe, who sat in the chimney-corner, with the gravy and "crusted creepers" before him, piled up with odds and ends and scraps of every kind. He was the happiest of creatures, and since he was doing scarcely what his healthy human nature impelled him to, it is a hard heart that refuses to sympathize in his enjoyment.

And now the feast was over. Brother Buford was called on for a second grace. He did not ask another blessing, for there was nothing to bless—"'ceptin' de banes," thought Tobe—but he got on his feet to view the wreck, and returned thanks, very heartily for him—thanks in which Ally's guests, though for the most part too full for [illegible] joined him in their hearts, for the quilting party had been more than a success.

III.

A prayer-meeting had been "called" for the day following the quilting party, and [illegible] the hour of noon Ally sat on the door-step of her cabin [illegible] a pink calico. It was one of those hot, breathless [illegible] in August when the air, charged with electricity, seems [illegible] ready to burst into forked lightning. Ally, however, unalarmed by any sense of danger, plied her coarse steel needle busily, and lifted up her voice in a monotonous quavering nasal hymn. Viney in the cross back of her was busy mixing the corn-bread for supper. As she did so she joined in the singing in a sweet high treble, intoned with the plaintive wail characteristic of the music of a captive race. The words went round in a circle, like the rolling of a hoop:

"Dis air de house what Jee-sus built,
An He built it dest a hammer of a nail,
An in de house sinners lay down dere sins,
An drink de grass oh de Lord by de pail-ful."

The last syllable, like one born out of season, was carried over violently to the beginning of the next verse, in which the same lines were repeated, varied only by altering a word here and there so as to change the scene of action, for example, "Dis air de church what Jee-sus built," or, "Dis air de shop."

Viney, while waiting for the oven to get a little hotter, had placed the tin pan with the bread in it on the table, and setting her arms akimbo, she gave full vent to her vocal powers. As she sang, her thoughts, naturally enough, fell away from the state of her soul, first to Jack Chaney, and from Jack Chaney to one or two stolen frolics she had had with that youth. Then her feet broke out, so to speak, into a gay shuffle with which they seemed easily familiar. Her sister's quick ear caught the deadly sound, and laying down her work, she turned slowly, with righteous wrath.

"Viney," she said, in solemn voice, "hab my ears buried me, or hab I heerd you dancin'—a-dancin' straight-forrards into de lurin' pit?"

"You 'ain't heerd me dancin' into no pit," said Viney, with her hot but invisible blush.

"If you was," continued Ally, censoriously, "you's a unthankful gal, for here's me a-mendin' an' fixin' your dress to wear to de nex' 'spectable religious party we's invited to, for de Lord can be praised widout makin' Him ashamed of His critters. Don't let me hear no mo' sech thowtful games as I" Having thus relieved herself, Ally returned to her hymn, and Viney joined as if nothing had happened.

It must be owned that from time to time she spun round, in a noiseless pas seul, snapping her fingers at the unconscious Ally, excusing her neglect of duty by reflecting that the "creeper" was not yet hot enough for her bread.

It so happened, however, that a certain yellow dog, of the pure mongrel breed, belonging to the Hancock family, was not particular as to the cooking of his food, and so, as silently as Viney danced, so silently he devoured the corn-cake. She only knew it when the tin pan, being too violently licked, came rolling to the floor and stopped bottom upward at her feet.

"For de lan's sake," cried Viney, "de dog done eat de bread fur supper! Git out, you thief!"

The mongrel fled. Broomstick in hand, the girl pursued, with the result that the dog escaped after leading her a long hot chase.

As she came back, breathless and hot, to the house, she glanced with alarm at the suddenly changed sky, an evil wind was blowing. Heavy black sullen clouds were rolling fast across the sky.

"Sis Ally," she cried, "I believe dat's goin' to be a thunder-shower!"

"So dar is, chile," cried Ally, with a look of alarm. "Hurry in an' close de do's an' de winders."

Alas, poor Ally! those were the last words she spoke. The heavy heated August atmosphere, as we have said, was charged with electricity. Suddenly, like a tongue of fire, there darted from the breathless heavens a flash of lightning straight to the door of the little cabin—to the inward, tortured heart of the poor woman; but a moment past sewing and singing in the sunshine. There was an explosion as though the earth itself was rent asunder. To see and hear all this was the act of a second to poor Viney, for an instant she could not move, but stood transfixed with terror and amazement. She saw the keen fiery blade flash upon her sister's head and lay her low on the threshold. Even as she looked it seemed as if her own spirit was wrenched away and had gone out on the raging thunder. She lay prostrate, stunned by the shock.

When she came to her senses she dragged herself to her feet, and looked with wild eyes toward the rigid form which lay over the threshold. She shrank from it like a frightened child. Even to her inexperience it meant death. With a sudden wild cry she cocked a pan and fled into the forest.

The storm was now raging with all its fury. Flash after flash of lightning darted from the darkened sky like stealthy enemies in ambush, striking more than one of the lofty trees, and shivering them from top to bottom. "Lord hab mercy on me!" sobbed Viney. "Judgment Day done come. In de day oh judgment, good Lord, deliber me! Lord, take me from my sins!" With such terror-stricken words trembling from her lips she ran at full speed. She ran for more than half a mile, until she came to the Happy Hollow church. Instinct rather than intention had guided her. A few of the brothers and sisters were assembled, but none of the usual exercises were attempted. All were on their knees in prayer, though an occasional shriek from one of the women testified to her fright at the storm. Panting like a wild creature, Viney rushed in, the door slamming behind her with a bang.

"Viney Hancock," said Elder Buford, severely, "what in de name oh creation does dis mean?"

"Sis Ally," cried poor Viney—"Sis Ally."

"She ain't here, Viney. Did you run all dis way to find her cause you was skeered at de storm? Ah, Viney, chile, you must learn to cling to de Rock oh Ages, an' it 'ill calm you, even at sich a time as dis, when de heabens is torn up from dere berry foundations, an' de wrath oh God is a-ridin' on sinners in high places an' low."

"He done 'fess! Sis Ally, gasped Viney, an He struck her dead wid a flash o' lightnin'!"

A great [illegible] ement fell on [illegible] Ma [illegible] with [illegible]

"JACK STOOD IN THE DOORWAY"

His voice seemed in calm Viney, and she told her story with tolerable composure, and with a simple truthfulness which struck a chill of conviction to every heart. A hush thrilled the little assembly. Then one sister began to weep aloud, another and another followed, while the brothers folded their arms and groaned—piteous sounds mingling with the roar of the storm without.

Elder Buford felt that his hour had come. Now should the smoking flax be quenched, and the bruised reed trampled; now should Viney's obdurate heart be melted, another brand be snatched from the burning, as' to Him the glory. He rose from behind a table which served as pulpit. Angry lightning threw a glare on his face.

"Brethren an' sisters," he cried, flinging open the Bible, and stretching one long sinewy arm toward the congregation, "now is de time for de lessun ob dis great affliction to strike home. It is de Lord's judgment on sin. Not on Sister Hancock, for she was a good woman—a church member an' a prayin' Christian. De Lord neber ketched her a-dancin', nor a-smokin' cyes, nor a-singin' blasphemious songs. Him say member anything ter say of a contrywise nature?"

Sister Elsie rose up, tall, lean, gray-haired, tears streaming over her face.

"I has some right to be called mother in Israel," she said, "for I was one ob de ten members dat first founded de Happy Hollow church. Six ob de same is already gone ter gib an account of deir worke befo' de great white throne. Sis Ally used ter come dere back. I beh knowed her intimate, through de back da' an' de front do', corn-pone days as well as cake days, an' I'll b'ar my testimony dat she was a Christian soul—kind an' generous an' sweet-tempered, an' believin' all de doctrines ob de church, an' keepin' 'em so fur as she was able to her life's end."

The tumult rose again.

"Dat's so!" says Sis Elsie. "Glory be God! Amen!"

One quavering voice began, "I would not live alway."

Brother Buford quelled his flock. "Dat hole was meant for 'nodder sinner," said he. "Let her come forrard an' confess her sins."

"Is it me?" shrieked Viney—"is it me dat's killed my mother, dat is been a mother ter me since I come into de worl'?" She sank to the floor in a heap, like one going into convulsions.

They crowded around her, and as they held her they exhorted her to speak out and confess her sins, for dat de Lord would beh mercy on her, chen at de 'leventh hour, of she would turn to Him; an amid tears and sobs Viney made her confession.

"I hab always hankered after de nickelonion ob de worl'. I wanted to dance wid de sinner folks, an' twice I cen easy wid Jach Chaney to a dancin' party unbeknownst to Sis Ally. I was gwine agin ter-night, an' I meant to wear Sis Ally's ruby breastpin. Dis very day I was dancin' behind her back, while she was settin' in de do' singin' hymn tunes, innocent as de babe unborn, an' she seen to be struck down fo' me sins. I sewed buttons on my chi'es on Sunday, an' slapped Tobe fur tickle' me when I was tryin' ter say my prayers."

Silence followed Viney's dreadful confession, unbroken except by deep sighs from the most sanctified of the company and Viney's convulsive sobs.

Finally Eldre Buford arose and said, "Viney, Viney Hancock, you has spent yer life a-gedderin' wood for de debil's fire; for yer sins in de wood dat burns like seasoned hickory in dat place ob torment, an' de more ob 'em you cen sum up, de hotter hin fire burns."

No one interrupted the elder's eloquence, and he went on to improve the occasion in a strong voice:

"Brethren, de Lord are manifest in all His works. When we see dis po' sinner a-writhin' an' a-sufferin' befo' our eyes, we knows dat de Lord have laid His hand heavy on her, burn-like load; but is not to some her soul, her black sinner's soul, dat ain't never been washed in de 'generation waters. Be was sittin' Viney's sins on Sis' Ally, for, brethren, what saith de Scriptures? De sins ob de fathers shall be visited on de children. Mebbe you think it's kinder pastin' things hind part fust to de victim' 'em on Sister Ally from Viney, for she ain't an chile ob hern; but wid de Lord all things are possible. He can make sin go back'ards as well as for'ards, which accounts for Him sendin' Viney's wickedness straight on to Sister Ally's head in a stroke o' lightnin'. An' now, brethren, it behoofs us, as St. Paul says, dat we abstain from evil things an' meats offered to idols an' such like, an which things de wrath ob God comes on de children ob de 'disobeyin generation, an', brethren, let's pray for de livin', for 'tain't on use prayin' for de dead. Let or pray for po' Sister Viney dat she may 'scape hell fire."

Here he turned directly on Viney, shaking his shinny forefinger in her direction. "Come out ob de pit, Viney Hancock," he cried—"come out ob de pit ob sin!"

His voice sounded to terrible to Viney, he looked so wild and menacing, that she gave a shriek and fell to the floor, this time in real convulsions. The women gathered about her, and Preacher Simpkins came to the front.

"De chile is in gre't affliction, Brudder Buford," said he, quietly, "an' your measures is harsh."

"Brudder Simpkins," said the stern elder, "does you forgit de Lord's own words, 'If any man among you rejoice, let him be un'nited wid He'? An' dis is no season for rejoicing. An' de sins ob de human hearts must be burnt out wid sorrile, an' not an'inted wid He."

"Let us pray," said Preacher Simpkins, gently.

It was a soothing prayer, but its audience was not quite ready to be calmed. There was too much electricity still in the air. Sobs and cries were still heard through the church, and one sister and brother after another lifted up a voice in prayer for Viney, until the excitable girl could bear no more. As she lay on the floor, crushed by remorse, they began to sing. The melody tranquillized her, and suddenly a great wave of joy seemed to sweep through her soul. Springing to her feet, throwing her arms above her head, she cried, or rather shouted:

"Glory! glory! my sins is done gone. De Lord has forgiben me." And springing from those who no longer attempted to hold her, she clapped her hands, and ran toward the mourners' bench, where she knelt, crying, "Glory to de Lord! My soul is saved. Sis Ally, I'll meet you in heaben after all."

Like an electric thrill, her words and motions seemed to run through the crowd, first one and then another yielding to the infectious enthusiasm. They began to shout and sing, to clap their hands, and to embrace each other, and throw themselves hither and thither like distracted creatures. More than one woman with her baby in her arms threw the infant from her like a ball, "expectin' de Lord would heer fo it, 'cos 'twas throwned for His sake." It was believed that an child, however small, had ever received injury from this treatment, some one always seemed to be ready to catch it.

The sudden August storm gradually died away, and the noisy mourners in Happy Hollow church, yielding to nature's mysterious influence, grew quiet and still.

"Silence like a poultice comes
To heal the blows of sound."

Through the western window the sun streamed in broad farewell rays, and the light wind blowing over the fresh earth seemed to whisper "Peace."

Preacher Simpkins dismissed his congregation with a blessing, and bestowed a solemn handclasp on his new convert.

"Sis Elsie an' my wife will take you home, my po' stricken lamb," said he, "an' I'll follow befo' long," and clinging on either side by her motherly supporters, poor Viney was half led, half carried, through the forest back to the house of death, from which she had fled in such frantic terror.

IV.

Three months have gone by, and another and a different Viney sits in Uncle Phil's parlor, clothed in decent black, and sewing with downcast eyes. She pores daily over the little Testament that Preacher Simpkins has given her, spelling out the long words, and marking such as she did not understand, for Brother Phil to explain when he came home in the evening.

For three long months Viney had devoted herself entirely to religion, and for a while something like peace had stolen into her poor storm-tossed heart, but to-day Viney sighed at her sewing. Something like unrest had taken possession of her, sober and demure as she looked.

She thought, as a redeemed sheep of the house of Israel, she ought to feel happy, but she did not; she was very lonely.

Of late Brother Phil had not seemed to care so much for the Bible readings and hymns that had been his only comfort just after Ally's death. Viney had begun to find that there were serpents within the church as well as without. Envy, hatred, and malice often confronted her, and the half frightened thought came to her mind that the line was not so broad nor the gulf so deep as she had been told between those chosen ones and the sinner folks outside, and naturally she remembered Jach Chaney. Regarding him as a temptation and a snare, she had kept very carefully out of his way, and Mr Chaney used to attend church with very tolerable regularity, for the double purpose of looking at Viney and scowling fiercely on Elder Buford when that worthy blew a blast chilling on an east wind over the ferrid worshippers.

Unfortunately for Viney's resolve of forgetting him, she had met Mr Chaney the day before—in fact their eyes had met, and for the first time since the catastrophe. He had taken off his hat with a bow whose thrilling nature no words could describe. It was an accurate copy, indeed, from that of a young gentleman for whom Jack acted as occasional valet, and humbly admired as a pattern of manners and graces.

"He couldn't have bowed on prettier to a queen," thought Viney, showing her teeth, in spite of herself, in a little smile. "Poor Jach!"

"Miss Viney," said a voice.

What a start she gave! Jack stood in the doorway.

Off went his hat, with one of those same wonderful bows, and while he held it in one hand, he extended the other to Viney, with a basket laid with straw.

"Here's some fresh aigs," said the youth, modestly. "You see, Miss Viney, I knowed things was gittin' skeerce to'ards Christmas, so I tuk de liberty ob fetchin' dese roun' ter you. I kin vouch for dem bein' fresh, seein' as how I laid 'em myself—"

"Law!" broke from Viney, with an unwilling giggle.

"I mean my hens," cried Mr Chaney—"my hens laid 'em. Hain't I bin a-feedin' 'em on ran meat, an' oyster-shells, an' roast corn, an' what not, to bring 'em up in deir duty? An' if it ain't tokin' too much ob a liberty, Miss Viney, of you would let me fetch you over a dozen short week till after de holidays, it would be a real pleasure to git shet ob de aigs."

"Plenty of use for eggs at dis time ob year," cried Viney, with a slight toss of the head. "De white folks would buy 'em ob you at most any price."

"Yes," responded Jack, "I know white folks is terrible shiftless when day has a Christmas fit on 'em, an' don't heer how de money goes. So, if you didn't want de aigs, Miss Viney, you might sell 'em an' buy Christmas ribbons."

"I am not wearing ribbons just now," said Viney, fingering her black frock with an air of dignity.

Mr Chaney was at once stricken with contrition. "Pray excuse me," he cried. "I hadn't thought of your bein' in mourning."

"Will you take a cheer, Mr Chaney?" said Viney, wiping her eyes.

"Wouldn't you call me Jack, as you used to do?" said Mr Chaney, to a bowing measure.

"In de days ob de past," said Viney, "I was too keerless as to what I did."

Jack waived this question, and asked if Viney meant to mess black all her days.

Viney sighed heavily, and declared she ought to do so, if she didn't wear sackcloth and ashes, which Elder Buford had suggested on "more fitten" for such a sinner.

"Elder Buford he hanged" cried honest Jack. "Now see here, Viney. Every dog has his day; don't you think mine has come? I've been pretty good, in my opennin, a-keepin' out ob de way while de church folks was a-takin' hold ob you so powerful. I ain't raisin' an objections ter you bein' converted; religion is a gre't thing for de ladies. I been ter hear you singin' in church, though it goes agin me dat Elder Buford should raise de chune, snake in de grass dat he is."

"You mustn't speak ebil of de dignities."

"Not much ob dignities. But here's what I wanted ter say. I think I hep' myse'f a little too much in de background. I s'pose you done forgot me."

"You neber axed me not to."

"Naw, Viney, I'm sure I give you plenty ob hints—hints as big as elephants—as to what you was to me. Sho'ly you knowed, honey, how much I was a-lovin' you?"

"I was a-thinkin' maybe Sally Pettis was the one," said Viney, faintly, telling, alas! no awful fib for a converted sinner.

"Sally Pettis!" and deep, dark disgust shone in Jack's face. "Lor, Viney, don't you know dat I wouldn't look at her on a procession? Here's de p'int," continued Mr Chaney—"is all to be ober between us yer because poor Ally got struck by lightnin'?"

"I'm afraid so, Jack."

"Come, now, don't go an' harden your heart ag'inst me. Nothin' won't bring her back."

"Jack, what made her die?" said Viney, in a hollow voice.

"De will ob de Lord, an' de fac' dat she was in de track ob de lightnin'."

"An' what made her in de lightnin's track?"

"Because she went to do de' ter get a good light on her accunt."

"She was makin' fur me," cried Viney, "on my pink calico, an', Jack, she was struck down for me dat I might be brought to see de errors ob my ways an' save my soul."

"Viney," said Jack, soberly, "I kin tell you dis—de good Lord died fur us all. After dat does you s'pose any human life would be axed or token fer Him who had give His only Son?"

Viney stared at Jack. How comforting and beautiful his words sounded! But perhaps the evil one was at his elbow, though Preacher Simpkins had once said something like that, only to be overawed by Elder Buford. But she was too dazed to think it all out.

"Well, Jack, you is one ob de unconverted; an' I has been tuk inter de church on bad all my sins washed away."

"Dat's all right, chile. I'll try to make you a decent sort o' heathen."

"But, Jack, you don't see," cried poor Viney, despairingly—"you don't see what I mean. dat de Lord has his eye on you now, an' if we was ter marry an' He couldn't bring you roun' an ollers ways, I should be struck for your salvation jest as Ally was for mine."

The murder was out now with a vengeance. For a moment Jack was struck dumb. Then he gave a long whistle. Finally, although Viney's soft black eyes were swimming in tears, he quite of himself he laughed a great laugh. But no smile answered on the face of his beloved.

"See here, Viney," he said at last, "don't you know dat all our family line up in Tupper, an' heben always been religeous—reggular shoutin' Methodists? Why ain't some ob dem been struck?"

"Reason enough. You don't keer nothin' about yo' family in Tipper. I don't believe you so much as remembers all deir names."

"But's no, cheefly for de reason dat I was mostly raised by Aunt Chaney Harris. So why warn't Aunt Chaney took? She is powerful fond ob me, an' yes' no power on yo'hy is ever made. An' I've loved her longer dan I has you—"

"An' maybe better," finished out Viney, with that quick jealousy of her sex which is ever the wonder, the admiration, the vexation of men.

"No, I couldn't never love nobody half so well. I reckon you is what de song calls de apple ob my eye," said Jack, waxing poetical.

The girl burst into tears. "An' dat is de very reason why I would be de victim. De lightnin's would play roun', an' you would continuer in yo' sins, an' it would be good by to poor Viney. It's too much to on ah me, Mr Chaney."

Poor Jack! he was a smart fellow, but he did feel tremendously nonplussed. What was he to do with this impracticable sweetheart?

"I don't expon' ter marry nobody," continued Viney, mournfully. "I'll jest live on here, an' keep house for brother Phil, an' go ter church, an' vex de sillicted, an' go to de house ob mournin'."

"An' you calls dat a pleasant sort ob life?"

"No, Jack," said Viney, with great dignity—"emphasis, but godly."

"As fur keepin' house for your brother Phil," said the artful Jack, not without malice, "maybe he'll spar you dat trouble. Dar is a nidder—a yeller widder livin' over on de east side o' town, dat dey do say makes mighty big eyes at him, an' wouldn't mind a-talkin' on' a-reignin' over here."

"Jack Chaney, you say dat ter my face!"

"Gospel truth!" nodded Jack.

"An' Sis Ally not cold—not cold!"

"I wouldn't take on about it, honey; but don't you see dis ain't no place for you? Now I is gittin' up a pretty little house ob my own, an' you should be queen ob it, of you'd only say de word. An' as for de rest, while not wantin' ter say too much, I would try, Viney, ter be a good man to' mend my ways jes' for ter please you."

"Would you jine de church?" said she, eagerly—"would you become a perfesser?"

"Not while old Buford is at the head ob things," cried Jack, coming out of the region of sentiment with a sounding slap on his knee, "I'll be shot if I let myself down to that!"

"You'd better leave," she said; "dar ina great gulf fixed."

Jack rose to go, and with him arose a fast, a new inspiration.

"Viney," said he in his most insinuating tones, "what do you think about love, anyhow?"

"I 'ain't thought much about it," said Viney, rising to the occasion like the noble coquette she was, "bein' too much occupied wid other matters dat I ain't no knowledgeable maybe as yourse'f," and here she took a sly glance at Jack.

"Well, I'll tell you my opinion," said that artful dodger, "am' it is dis—dat when a man as a woman loves each oddier, dey ought to be willin' ter die each for de oddier. For instance of you was married ter me, an' you was a sinner an' couldn't be on achieviow saved, I'd be willin' to be struck by lightnin' forty times over to save you—yes I would. An' I expec's my wife ought ter love me jes' dat same way."

And now Mr Chaney felt that he had indeed played his last card.

Poor Viney! Her heart left torn topieces. The emotions of the last hour had been too much for her. She felt herself grasping for breath, and rushing to the window, flung it open.

"Oh," she cried, "I wish Sis Ally could give me a sign."

At this instant—so Viney and Jack afterward told the tale—a beautiful white bird of unknown kind flew in through the window. Circling fearlessly about the room two or three times, it finally alighted on Jack's shoulder, and allowed him to extend a petting hand.

"Viney," said Jack, in a whisper, "perhaps it's the speerit of Sis Ally come back to tell us to jine our hearts an' hands."

And then the bird uttered one sweet note, and flew slowly away. An' we 'ain't set eyes on him sence," Viney would say long after, "dough Jack s'arched de neighborhood, an' I would 'a pitted it like a chile of I could 'a got hold ob it."

They watched the bird's flight until it was lost in the blue above, then turned to each other. One glance at his sweetheart's face, then Jack put his arms around her and gave her a hearty kiss.

Viney was certainly won, but Jack never knew exactly how he had gained his point—whether through superstition, love, or the force of his argument. But they were married about Christmastime.

Viney has not yet been struck by lightning; and as she has a rapidly increasing family of babies, to each of whom Jach is a slave, her chances of ably are proportionally increased.

It is observed, however, that in time of storm she manifests great terror, and always establishes herself and the last baby—Jack's ringing favorite—on a large feather-bed, which Jack has rolling to the centre of the floor.

As for Mr Chaney, his persuasive tongue was not given him for naught. He became a man of influence among his people, and they were proper to send him to the Legislature. Elder Buford, however, only shakes a woolly head when his name is mentioned, and says:

"A man may be a Greekite or a Latinite, or a member ob de Washingtons Congress, or a fightist like dat poor critter Wise, because he didn't hab no man's wife to conquer, nat down as'erred no' died; an' yet if he 'ain't got de kingdom o' God in him zeal, he 'ain't no man' account dan last year's foanel."

But cheerful Jack only laughs when such speeches come to his ears, and says that a man must draw a line somewhere, and he draws his at Elder Buford.

WHAT SOCIAL CLASSES OWE TO EACH OTHER.

By PROFESSOR W. G. SUMNER.

X.

THE CASE OF THE FORGOTTEN MAN FURTHER CONSIDERED.

There is a beautiful notion afloat in our literature and in the minds of our people that men are born to certain "natural rights." If that were true, there would be something on earth which was got for nothing, and this world would not be the place it is at all. The fact is that there is no right whatever inherited by man which has not an equivalent and corresponding duty right alongside of it as the price of it. The rights, advantages, capital, knowledge, and all other goods which we inherit from past generations have been won by the struggles and sufferings of past generations; and the fact that the race lives, though men die, and that the race can by heredity accumulate within some circle its victories over nature, is one of the facts which make civilization possible. The struggles of the race as a whole produce the possessions of the race as a whole. Something for nothing is not to be found on earth.

If there were such things as natural rights, the question would arise, against whom are they good? Who has the corresponding obligation to satisfy those rights? There can be no rights against nature except to get out of her whatever we can, which is only the fact of the struggle for existence stated over again. The common assertion is that the rights are good against society; that is, that society is bound to obtain them and secure them for the persons interested. Society, however, is only the persons interested plus some other persons; and as the persons interested have by the hypothesis failed to win the rights, we come to this, that natural rights are the claims which certain persons have by prerogative against some other persons. Such is the actual interpretation in practice of natural rights—claims which some people have by prerogative on other people.

This theory is a very far-reaching one, and of course it is adequate to furnish a foundation for a whole social philosophy. In its widest extension it comes to mean that if any one finds himself uncomfortable in this world, it must be somebody else's fault, and that somebody is bound to come and make him comfortable. Now the people who are most uncomfortable in this world (for if an should all sell our troubles it would not be found to be a very comfortable world for anybody) are those who have neglected their duties, and consequently have failed to get their rights. The people who can be called upon to serve the uncomfortable most be those who have done their duty, as the world goes, tolerably well. Consequently the doctrine which we are discussing turns out to be in practice only a scheme for making injustice prevail in human society by reversing the distribution of rewards and punishments between those who have done their duty and those who have not. We are constantly preached at by our public teachers as if respectable people were to blame because some people are not respectable—as if the man who has done his duty in his own sphere was responsible in some way for another man who has not done his duty in his sphere. There are relations of employer and employé which need to be regulated by compromise and treaty. There are sanitary precautions which need to be taken in factories and houses. There are precautions against fire which are necessary. There is care needed that children be not employed too young, and that they have no education. There is care needed that banks, insurance companies, and railroads be well managed, and that officers do not abuse their trusts. There is a duty in each case on the interested parties to defend their own interest. The penalty of neglect is suffering. The system of providing for these things by boards and inspectors throws the cost of it, not on the interested parties, but on the tax payers. Some of them no doubt are the interested parties, and they may surmise that they are exercising the proper care by paying taxes to support an inspector. If so, they only get their fair deserts when the railroad inspector finds out that a bridge is not safe after it is broken down, or when the bank examiner comes on to find out why a bank failed after the cashier has stolen all the funds. The real victim is the Forgotten Man again—the man who has watched his own investments, made his own machinery safe, attended to his own plumbing, and educated his own children, and who, just when he wants to enjoy the fruits of his care, is told that it is his duty to go and take care of some of his negligent neighbors, or if he does not go, to pay an inspector to go. No doubt it is often his interest to go or to send rather than to have the matter neglected, no account of his own connection with the thing neglected, and his own secondary profit, but the point now is that if preaching and philosophizing can do any good in the premises, it is all wrong to preach to the Forgotten Man that it is his duty to go and remedy other people's neglect. It is not his duty. It is a harsh and unjust burden which is laid upon him, and it is only the more unjust because no one thinks of him when laying the burden so that it falls on him. The exhortations ought to be expended on the negligent, that they take care of themselves.

It is on especially vicious extension of the laissez-faire doctrine above mentioned that criminals have some sort of a right against or claim on society. Many reformatory plans are based on a doctrine of this kind, when they are urged upon the public conscience. A criminal is a man who, instead of working with and for the society, has turned against it, and become destructive and injurious. His punishment means that society rubs him out of its membership, and separates like from its association, by execution or imprisonment, according to the gravity of his offence. He has no claims against society at all. What shall be done with him is a question of expediency to be settled in view of the interests of society, that is, of the non-criminals. The French writers of the school of '48 used to represent the badness of the bad men as the fault of "society." As the object of this statement was to show that the badness of the bad men was not the fault of the bad men, and as comedy contains only good men and bad men, it followed that the badness of the bad men was the fault of the good men. On that theory of course the good men owed a great deal to the bad men who were in prison and at the galleys on their account. If we do not admit that theory, it behooves us to remember that any claim which we allow to the criminal against the "state" is only so much burden laid upon those who have never sent the state anything for discipline or correction. The punishments of society are just like those of God and nature. They are warnings to the wrong-doer to reform himself.

When public officers are to be filled, numerous candidates at once appear. Some are urged on the ground that they are poor, or can not earn a living, or want support while getting an education, or have female relatives dependent on them, or are in poor health, or belong in a particular district, or are related to certain persons, or have done meritorious service in some other line of work than that which they aspire to do. The claims of the public service are to be condemned on account of the harm to the public interest, but there is an intentional injustice of the same general character with those which we are discussing. If an office is granted by favoritism or for any personal reason to A, it can not be given to B. If an office is filled by a person who is unfit for it, he also keeps out somebody somewhere who is fit for it, that is, the social injustice has a victim in an unknown person—the Forgotten Man—and he is more person who has no political influence, and who has hence no way in which to secure the chances of life except to deserve them. He is passed by for the noisy, pushing, importunate, and incompetent.

I have said something disparagingly in a previous paper about the popular rage against combined capital, corporations, earners, selling interests, etc., etc. The popular rage is not without reason, but it is easily misdirected, and the real things which deserve attack are thriving all the time. The greatest social evil with which we have to contend is jobbery. Whatever there is in legislative charters, watering stocks, etc., etc., which is objectionable, comes under the head of jobbery. Jobbery is any scheme which aims to gain, not for the legitimate fruits of industry and enterprise, but by diverting from somebody a part of his product under guise of some pretended industrial undertaking. Of course it is only a modification when the undertaking in question has some legitimate character, but the occasion is used in graft upon it devices for obtaining what has not been earned. Jobbery is the vice of plutocracy, and it is the especial form under which plutocracy corrupts a democratic and republican form of government. The United States is deeply afflicted with it, and the problem of civil liberty here is to conquer it. It affects everything which we really need to have done in such an extent that we have to do without public objects which we need through fear of jobbery. Our public buildings are jobs, not always, but often. They are not needed, or are vastly beyond all necessities or even decent luxury. Internal improvements are jobs. They are not made because they are needed to meet needs which have been experienced. They are made to serve private ends, often incidentally the political interests of the persons who vote the appropriations. Pensions have become jobs. In England pensions used to be given to statesmen, because aristocratic had political influence, in order to corrupt them. Here pensions are given to the great democratic mass, because they have political power, to corrupt them. Instead of going out a here there is plenty of land and making a home there, some people go down under the Mississippi River to make a farm, and then they want us all of the people to the United States to make dikes to keep the river off their farms. The California gold miners have washed out gold and have washed the dirt down into the rivers and on the farms below. They want the Federal government to now clean out the rivers and restore the farms. The silver miners found their product declining in value, and they got the Federal government to go into the market and buy what the public did not want in order to sustain (as they hoped) the price of silver. The Federal government is called upon to buy or lose unsalable ships, build canals on which will not pay, to furnish capital for all sorts of enterprises, and to provide capital for enterprises of which private individuals will win the profits. All this is called "developing our resources," but it is, in truth, the great plan of all living on each other.

The greatest job of all is a protective tariff. It includes the biggest log rolling and the widest corruption of economic and political ideas. It was said that there would be a rebellion if the taxes were not taken off whiskey and tobacco, which taxes are paid into the public Treasury. Just then the importations of Sumatra tobacco became important enough to affect the market. The Connecticut tobacco growers at once rallied for an import duty on tobacco which would keep up the price of their product. So it appears that if the tax on tobacco is paid to the Federal Treasury there will be a rebellion, but if it is paid to the Connecticut tobacco-growers there will be no rebellion at all. The farmers have long paid tribute to the manufacturers; now the manufacturing and other laborers are to pay tribute to the farmers. The system is made more comprehensive and complete, and we are all living on each other more than ever.

Now the plan of plundering each other produces nothing. It only wastes. All the material over which the protected interests wrangle and grab must be got from somebody outside of their circle. The talk is all about the American laborer and American industry, but in every case in which there is not an actual production of wealth by industry there are two laborers and two industries to be considered—the one who gets and the one who gives. Every protected industry has to be placed on the unjust premise of its argument that any industry which does not need to be carried on at the expense of the consumers of the product, and as its minor premise that the industry in question does not pay, that is, that it cannot reproduce a capital equal to what is that which it consumes plus the current rate of profit. Here every such industry needs to be a parasite on some other industry. What is the other industry? Who is the other man? That is the real question, and it is often overlooked.

In all jobbery the case is the same. There is a victim somewhere who is paying for it all. The doors of a state and extravagance stand open, and there seems to be a general agreement to squander and spend. It all belongs to somebody. There is somebody who has to contribute it, and who will have to find more. Nothing is ever said about him. Attention is all absorbed by the clamorous interests, the importunate petitioners, the plausible schemers, the pitiful cases. Now, who is the victim? He is the Forgotten Man. If we go to find him, we shall find him hard at work filling the soil to get out of it the fund for all the jobbery, the object of all the plunder, the cost of all the economic quackery, and the pay of all the politicians and statesmen who have mortified his reasons to his enemies. We shall find him an honest, sober, industrious citizen, enthusiastic little circle, paying his debts and his taxes, supporting the church and the school, reading his party newspaper, and cheering for his pet politician.

We must not overlook the fact that the Forgotten Man is not infrequently a woman. If so should forget that we should not half deal with our subject. The Forgotten Woman is more thoroughly forgotten than the Forgotten Man, and her case has a great deal worse. I am told that there are sewing women who earn twelve hours a day for fifty cents a day, and provide the thread. For such a woman the thread costs, as near as may be, one hour's labor. In the price of the thread one and three-quarter cents are her. If the woman uses a spool of thread a day, she must work fifteen minutes every day to pay the tax. This labor, then, she spends, not to get the thread, for she could get the thread without it, but to get the Williamsville Linen Mill, which is not an institution, therefore, for getting thread for the American people, but for making it harder for us to get thread than it would be if there were no such concern. The mill and its operatives make a great effect on the imagination. The sewing women, the farmers' wives, and the laborers' wives and daughters who are scattered in all the garrets of the great cities and in all the humble homes of the country are paying for it all, and they are all forgotten.

It is plain that the Forgotten Man and the Forgotten Woman are the real productive strength of the country. The Forgotten Man works and votes—generally he prays—but his chief business in life is to pay. He never gets into the newspapers except when he marries or dies. He is an obscure man. He has a generable sometimes to his wife, but he does not frequent the grocery, and he does not talk politics at the tavern. So he is forgotten. Yet who is there whom the statesman, economist, and social philosopher ought to think of before this man? If any student of social science comes to appreciate the case of the Forgotten Man, he will become an unflinching opponent of strict scientific thinking in sociology, and a hard-hearted sleeper as regards any scheme of social amelioration. He will always want to know, Who and where is the Forgotten Man in that case, who will have to pay for it all?

The Forgotten Man is not a pauper. It belongs to his character to save something. Hence he is a capitalist, though never a great one. He is a "poor" man in the popular sense of the word, but not in a correct sense. In fact, one of the most constant and trustworthy signs that the Forgotten Man is in danger of a new exaction is that "the poor man" is brought into the discussion. Since the Forgotten Man has some capital, and one who cares for his interest will try to make capital secure by securing the inviolability of contracts, the stability of currency, and the firmness of credit. Any one, therefore, who cares for the Forgotten Man will be sure to be considered a friend of the capitalist and an enemy of the poor man.

The point to social importance today is very clear. It is to relieve the Forgotten Man of some of his burdens.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

The device of the Indians who burn pine knots on the bows of their canoes and stand with uplifted spears to strike the fishes that are attracted by the light has been improved upon. Professor Beebe's expedition carries an apparatus which consists of three incandescent electric lights of sixteen-candle power each, inclosed in a glass globe capable of resisting the pressure of the water at a great depth. This globe is to be sunk in the sea, and the water illuminated by turning on the electric current. It is expected that all sorts of "queer fish" from the lower depths will be attracted to it. Then a net ten feet in diameter at its mouth, sunk below the glowing ball, will be drawn up, capturing such of the finny tribe as have lingered around the strange light to gratify their curiosity.

In No. 61 of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, published July 26, 1881, the little readers of that paper were asked to send in their contributions for the purpose of endowing a cot in St. Mary's Free Hospital for Children, New York. The amount specified was $2000, and the treasurer of the fund announces that it has been wholly paid in. Her final report will appear in YOUNG PEOPLE No. 123, May 2, 1882. The children deserve great credit for the order with which they have worked to earn Harper's Young People's Cot.

A resident of Hartford, Connecticut, gave permission to a telephone company to string on a tree temporarily across the roof of a building which he owned. Then no occasion of time was asked for and obtained by the company, the limit being named. When the time expired the company did not remove the wires nor heed the homeowner's warning that he would remove them if they were not taken away within a specified period. He cut the wires, and the company brought suit to recover damages. The jury, after twenty minutes' deliberation, made a verdict in the homeowner's favor. The result of the action settles, for the time being, an interesting question.

About six weeks ago several ladies got together and proposed to enliven the ill fortunes of the Barthaldi Statue Fund by getting up some entertainment of an eminent nature. The creation of Tennyson's "Princess" prepared by Professor Shields, of Princeton, was adopted as a good vehicle for declamation and stage effects, and Mrs. James B. Potter promised to play the title role. The effort has been beset with difficulties, and yet the ladies persevered. The result promises to be very fine, and, with the addition of another little drama, the afternoons of April 25, 26, and 27 will be full of interest. The play comes off at the Madison Square Theatre at three o'clock on those days. The ladies have invited the President to occupy a stage box on the afternoon of Friday, the 28th. The Central Committee of the Bartholdi Statue Fund have written a complimentary note to the ladies, have thanked them for their "spirited action." Although the size of the theatre precludes the making of a very large sum of money, the ladies hope for a substantial result for their six weeks' toil and infinite worry.

A writer, describing some of the especially interesting features of the private library of Mr. George W. Childs, of Philadelphia, says that among the books in a copy of Tam Hood's Comic Annual for 1842, from the library of Charles Dickens. It contains an inscription in Hood's handwriting, which, the writer says, is published for the first time. It runs as follows:

"Pshaw! away with leaf and berry
And the rubbish-stuffed cup!
Bring a goblet and bright sherry,
And a bumper fill me up.
Though I had a pledge to deliver,
And the biggest ever was,
Ere his vessel leaves an river,
I'll drink a health to Boz.

"Here's success to all his nature,
Since it pleases him to roam,
And to public and Atlantics,
After such a pair of homes.
May he shun all such whatever,
And the shallow canal that lacks,
And the passage to an clever
As the best among his works!"

A private secretary is described as "the person who makes everything public."

It is customary in New England for the Mayors of cities to preside over the Memorial day services. The Mayor of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, was an officer in the Confederate army, and the question has been raised whether he can with propriety take the most prominent part in the exercises of the day. The Boston Herald offers this suggestion: "If anybody ought to be able to feel and show respect for our brave soldiers, it is an officer of the cause against which they fought, and which they finally crushed."

Complaint is made in Boston because of an alleged loose way of claiming descent from persons who were of the only original band of Pilgrims—with an "upper case" P. There were Mayflowers and Mayflowers, it is explained, and even the Mayflower made a dozen voyages, thus bringing several bands of pilgrims who were not first class, so to speak.

The Prison Association of New York, of which Dr. Theodore W. Dwight is president, finds that of fifty nine county jails not more than six are in good condition. In only eight are children separated from adults; the number in which convicts are kept wholly apart from the unconvicted is only seven; and in more than half of the jails the sexes are not entirely separated. The jail system of this State is declared to be in an inferior condition than that of England a century ago, and to be a disgrace to civilization and to the community with. The Association is in need of money with which to carry on its work. Its office is at 45 Bible House, in this city.

In the past twenty years the Working Women's Protective Union has done much for a class which is growing larger every year in the metropolis. Its benefits are conferred free of cost, and the expense of the Union—about five thousand dollars a year—was paid from the fund of voluntary contributions. No salaries are paid to its officers. Its objects are "to prevent frauds and impositions upon working women, and to secure for them, free of all cost or expense, honest pay for honest work; to seek employment for the unemployed, and to open to them, when possible, new fields of labor hitherto unoccupied by women." The office of the Union has been lately removed from 38 Bleecker street to 19 Clinton Place.

A diplomate was entering the system of government of an Eastern country. "Why," he said to the friend Vizier, "not a single one of your Sultans has died in his bed during the last two hundred years."

"You mistake, sir," was the reply, "four of them have died in their beds during that period, though I must admit that in each case the royal sleeper was found with the mattress on top of him."

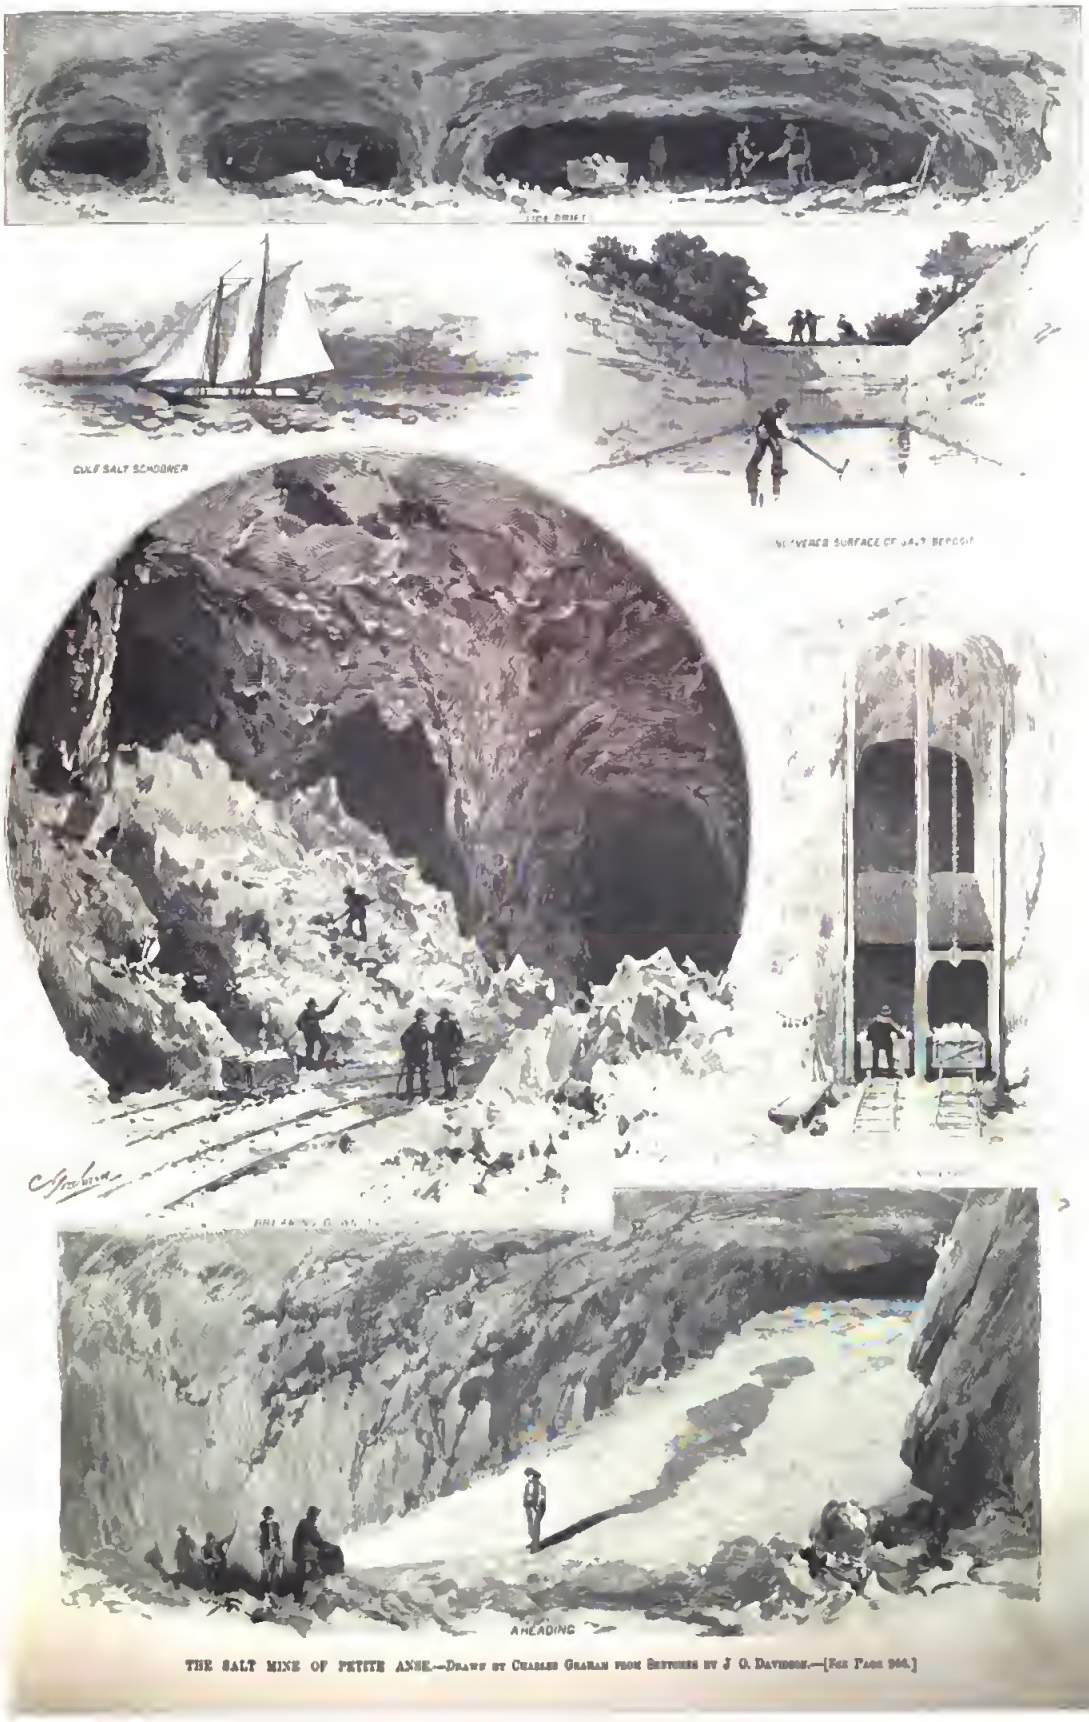
Says a Mississippi paper: "He made a most excellent matrimonial insurance agent, and we can not see why he would not make a wife and able legislator."

Not all the mechanical ingenuity of Russia has been employed of late in devising infernal machines for the destruction of royalty. A specialist Jew, a watchmaker in Kalisch, has devoted two years to constructing a clock which he will offer to the Czar and Czarina immediately after their coronation. At certain hours it plays the anthem "God Protect the Czar," and gives a mimic representation of the coronation. As it strikes the hour two doors fly open and a model of the Cathedral of the Assumption in Moscow, where the ceremony takes place, is disclosed. Then the gates of the cathedral open. In the nerve the Metropolitan of the city, surrounded by gorgeously robed dignitaries, awaits the arrival of the Czar and Czarina, and sprinkles them with holy water when they arrive at the altar. The Czar thereupon takes the crown from the hands of the Metropolitan and places it on his own head, and then places another on the head of his consort, after which the doors of the cathedral close.

Digitized by Google

1 Bottom of Gorilla's foot. 2. Back of Gorilla's hand. 3 Orang-Outang's foot. 4 Orang-Outang's hand. 5, 6, 7 Mamma, Papa, and Baby Orang Outangs, from Borneo. 8 Bearded Saki, South America. 9 Tartarin, North Africa. 10. Marmoset. 11 Male Gorilla. 12. Proboscis Monkey, Borneo.

REMARKABLE QUADRUMANA AT THE MUSEUM OF NATURAL HISTORY, CENTRAL PARK, NEW YORK CITY.
DRAWN BY DANIEL BEARD.—[SEE PAGE 247.]



THE SALT MINE OF PETITE ANSE.—Drawn by Charles Graham from Sketches by J. O. Davidson.—[See Page 264.]

"DISARMED!"*

By MISS BETHAM-EDWARDS,

Author of "Kitty," "Exchange no Robbery," "Holidays in Eastern France," "Dr James," "The Silverdales; or, the Outsiders," etc.

CHAPTER VI.

The like of Valerian and his signboard had never been seen in those parts, and although in his latest achievement he was always said to have surpassed himself, here praise stopped short for want of a word.

What so like one fashionable masquerade as another? But when at a signal from the master of the ceremonies the band sounded, and Mr Constantine led Miss Hermitage, both in the costume of Queen Anne's time, through the rhythmical paces of a minuet, drawing-room etiquette was for once set at naught, and ringing applause filled the place. Youth and beauty felt themselves eclipsed. All eyes were fixed on the antique exquisite pair treading their measures so exactly, yet with such statuesque and dainty grace. Exquisite they both certainly were, and not only as far as dress was concerned. If Miss Hermitage wanted Mr Constantine's perfect features and ivory complexion, there was still a likeness between them. The faultless build, the small stature, the correct carriage, were hers also, and Arthur had done the business of dressing so beautifully that there was no outward inferiority. As a picture Miss Hermitage could bear comparison with her cousin, but as a picture only. The sumptuous little old lady in hoop and brocade nicely matched her no less superb cavalier. The fire animating Mr Constantine's physiognomy lacked in Miss Hermitage's. Two versions were here fashioned after one model, but from different materials, and whilst through the alabaster the pure flame burned bright, feebly by comparison glimmered the wick through the rose. It was, above all, the little performance that captivated lookers-on. Handsome old ladies and gentlemen in antiquated costumes may be seen any day, but to see them do anything peculiar as it would have been done in the days of our great grandfathers is wholly another matter. Mr Constantine had been one of the most finished dancers of his time. Miss Hermitage had never been taught any other accomplishment but the dance, and could go through her steps and courtesyings to perfection. The pair, bowing and courtesying to each other when the minuet was over, afforded a piquant spectacle. For the ills of them people could not help clapping their hands and shouting.

"Our last appearance in the world, most likely," said Mr Constantine, as he led his companion to a chair. "The next new clothes we have to buy may be much simpler."

"Speak for yourself, if you please," retorted Miss Heraltage. "Though, if you had left me a legacy, and I wanted it, I should have to poison you. You look witness itself."

"Don't you really feel ghost-like sometimes?—as if you belonged to a world of shadows?" asked the other, playfully.

"Now, Constantine, if you make yourself disagreeable, you shall come to no more of my parties."

"He dear Christina, how many more do you expect to give?"

"You are older than I am, ten years to least," Miss Heraltage made tart reply.

"Well, let us not quarrel. I am longing for a glass of your well-remembered Madeira. Will you bear me company to the buffet?"

"No; I am well pleased to sit still; you must go by yourself," was the reply; whereupon Mr Constantine made a stately reverence and left her.

"How unpleasant Constantine is at times" thought Miss Hermitage. "Like Stephana, always harping on disagreeable topics. I do believe life might be perfect without relatives. Yet Constantine and Stephana can be vastly entertaining when they choose. I could not do without them."

As she spoke her eye rested on the beautiful figure of Stephana, at that moment the cynosure of many eyes. She was sitting beside the blind story-teller, and, utterly unconscious of general admiration, was describing one gorgeous figure after another, as the dancers flashed by in dream of the olden time. Now, strange although it may appear, the effect of Stephana's description on her blind companion was because a much more vivid impression on the by-standers than the spectacle itself. The outward, visible pageant before them, so alert with life and movement, so glow with color and richness, lost somewhat of its charm and reality, and all were bent upon the realisation of the scene through the delicate poetic medium of a blind man's perceptions. Perhaps, indeed, none of us see things so vividly as those who behold them by the aid of memory or imagination only. Stephana but described the lines and lustres as man hath no every day. Her listener saw with the inner eye something maybe of the splendor that irradiated the hired prophet of Pathos. And just as the crimsons, the purples, the gold and gems, now passing before him became a thousandfold more dazzling, than exaggerated by a blind man's fancy, so the little crowd of listeners saw what their own eyes could never have revealed to them. Unbroken appreciation was changed to deep, pathetic twilight.

"I see it all," said the story-teller, breathing a sigh of enjoyment as the dance ended. "And now, dear lady, tell me what your own dress is like. Yet stay—I can divine. Those sumptuous peacock splendors are not for you: only white, and not the white of snows and sea-foam; something pearly and pensive; and for jewels only pearls, or perhaps the melancholy opal. No flashes, no scintillations. Only your eyes, deep, dark, unutterable, to make a glory of the picture."

"You shall fancy what you please," said Stephana, smiling. "Now tell me what brought you from your beloved Italy?"

"Ah," he replied, "my answer in easy enough. But your own to the same question, which I have been tempted to put a dozen times? You had a mission in Italy. Sin and mystery chimed you."

"Are not sin and mystery everywhere?" asked Stephana.

"Hardly here," he made reply. "It seems to me that you have planted yourself in just the kind of world to make us forget their very existence. Since I came to this place I have breathed an air of perpetual light-hearted enjoyment. No need, surely, for a recruiter of dark secrets, an apocalypse of doom and retribution, here."

Stephana smiled away the grave question. "But misery at least is to be found in every corner of the earth. You may perhaps hear of me as an evangelist among the Indian folk? If I undertake to preach sermons for the good of my fellows, will you tell stories?"

"You have anticipated my reply to your first question," he said, quite seriously. "What else, indeed, can a blind man do? And why should not story-telling be a medium of spiritual instruction as well as the painter's block? Now I do not know if it has ever struck you, but it has long weighed upon my own mind, and painfully and importunately—a conviction that must sooner or later take the shape of deed—how few, comparatively speaking, of even civilised human beings, realise the music there may be in the human voice. Most folks, at least English-speaking folks, hear once in their lives the music of the sea. Some sort of musical harmony, too, is brought to the door of the meanest. But the subtle spell that lies in a rare human voice, how seldom is that exercised on the souls of the masses?"

"And such a gift is indeed yours," answered Stephana, eagerly. "Not the gift alone; you have the spell to use it."

"So I believe," answered her companion, in a tone of deep humility. "A blind man, above all others, has constant need of fellowship and sympathy. In darkness mine can live alone. I have put the question to myself. Might not story-telling become not only a medium of social intercourse, but absolutely a career, an avocation? Outside the pulpit, outside the tribune, what a field lies open for him who would move the souls of men by the magic of fastidious, impassioned, flawless speech! For the most part, to what dull, gross uses is put the human voice! Listen at the threshold of a tavern, a cottage parlor, any place in which average humanity is congregated together. The language is mean enough, but the manner is more deplorable still. Never once will you hear an exquisite word."

"A beautiful ambition!" replied Stephana. "And of course your stories will point a moral?"

"Was ever any story written by conscientious man or woman without a moral? Therefore, dearest lady, you will picture me and hear of me as a wanderer stopping wherever he can get a dozen folks to listen to him, or even one; for I shall not only accept invitations to fashionable places, but to hospices, deathly silent but for the groan of pain, and to lonely chambers of poor sick men. Think of what a story may do for one blank day! Nor will sin fright me. Shall I not be as safe in the dens of vice as yourself? for I have heard of a certain angel that troubles the waters—" He broke off with a rapturous expression, and added, still using Italian, and speaking in under-tones: "Ah! if I might but be that angel's attendant cherub!—ministrate there not my to whom can a blind man minister? But if we could only go through the world hand in hand, you to speak to men's consciences, I to their hearts, what happiness would life still have in store for me?" And lower and lower still he dropped his voice. "Did you not know it? I could not stay behind. Italy was not Italy without you."

Before Stephana had time to reply, if indeed she intended to make any, Valerian came up petitioning for a story. Nothing else would now satisfy Miss Hermitage and her guests.

So, leaning against the mantel-piece, his tall, attenuated figure wearing almost a look of shadowy unsubstantiality, his pale rapt face riveted as it seemed on some spot from whence light should come, he looked as strange and out of place among these carrion masque-raders as Satanus herself. It was, indeed, perhaps the contemplation of the narrator as much as the wild weird story he now told with such quiet insinuating eloquence that struck the fancy of his listeners.

When he ended there was a ringing shout of applause. Miss Hermitage went straight to her guest with blustest thanks.

"I am much obliged to you, Mr Markham. Really what a pity it is you are not some poor under-graduate in search of a livelihood! I would give you handsome wages, and you should tell us a story every day of my life."

CHAPTER VII.

"Ah, Arthura," said Miss Hermitage, when the flushed, triumphant girl came to her patroness's unbidding, "what should I do without you? Your comments on these evenings is the best part of them."

"Are they really?" Arthura asked. Then, as she took off one ornament after another from the gold brocade, she said, "Who got the most admiration to-night, you or I?"

Miss Hermitage laughed grimly. "What a question to ask! People admire you, my dear, because you are young and handsome, and me because I am a rich old woman they can get something out of."

"But it is all admiration, and foolish compliments may as well be paid to one's pocket as one's self. What difference can it make?" laughed Arthura, gayly.

"You are in extravagant spirits to-night. I am sure you have been quarrelling with Valerian. You may try to crush him. You never will," Miss Hermitage said. "But quarrel as much as you please, so long as you do it amusingly."

"I do not want to crush any one," Arthura replied. "But if any one, why not Mr. Valerian?"

"Because he is a man and you are a woman. That is why."

Arthura laughed in merry scorn.

"If Mr Valerian were not a man I could like him well enough."

"Well, we can not transform him into a parrot, like Jadin. So you must put up with him as he is."

"Do tell me, my Gossip," said Arthura, "can you remember how you felt when you first fell in love?"

"What next, Miss Malapert? I wonder why I in that your impertinence never displeases me?"

"Is not impertinence common-sense, and common-sense Christian feeling?" asked the undaunted Arthura. "Why should I not treat you like a human being, just because you are rich and I am poor? I am sure, were you in my place, you would ask such a question."

"Why, you are not falling in love, are you?" asked Miss Hermitage, glancing at the sparkling, animated apparition before her. "Be warned, Arthura. Falling in love would be ruin to your prospects."

Arthura bent more and more gayesome. She actually stooped down and kissed the tip of Miss Hermitage's nose. Never before had she ventured on such a caress, but it was not taken amiss.

"Why should you throw yourself away on a course, when I give you the pay of three? No, my dear, stay with me, and amuse me," Miss Hermitage said.

"But I can do that and fall in love too."

Then she threw herself playfully on her knees before her patroness, and asked in a tone of entreaty:

"A favor, a favor, or I stay here all night. May I go home to-morrow to get a peep at my darlings?"

"If Valerian makes no objection, certainly. What is the programme?"

"Expectation is the better half of enjoyment, as the spider said before swallowing the fly. Wait and see, dear mistress. But I am not wanted."

"I can hardly believe that. Still, if Valerian raises no objection, go and see your step-mother and the children by all means. But home early, remember."

"May I settle it all with Mr. Valerian?" asked the girl.

"Yes, settle it with Valerian," Miss Hermitage made answer. "Though what pleasure you can see in going to London for an hour or two this cold weather I can not conceive. But now tell me amusing things. What did people say and do worth repeating to-night?"

"It is were only possible to be to clever as some people are stupid! But I won't be ill natured, except to the curates. And Mr Bacham—well, can you imagine what Mr Bacham said?"

But her listener had dozed off, and Arthura glided away, the tire-woman replacing her. Still radiant and wide-awake, she went down-stairs to look for Valerian. He had just lighted Mademoiselle Colette's candle, and the pair were bidding each other good-night when she entered the dining-room, bringing so much freshness and beauty with her that they could but look up admiringly. Yes, the dark haired, dark eyed Arthura, with her rich complexion and easily acquired sumptuousness of dress, was a picture worth looking at just then. She might indeed wear anything, and be in any mood. But the dash of wild spirits no less than the gown, red as a cardinal's mantle, became her mightily.

She went straight up to Valerian, and dropping a courtesy, asked, with the prettiest house-maid's simper in the world,

"Please, sir, may I have a day out to-morrow?"

"What have you done to deserve it?" he asked, looking in the best possible humor also.

"You can spare me," she said, now herself again; "I am not wanted to-morrow. Do, Mr Valerian, for once be amiable to me."

"Oh, be friends," interposed Colette. "I am sure can might like each other if you only tried. Do begin this very day. Let her go home, Mr Valerian, and she will show her gratitude by being friendly to you ever after."

"I make no conditions," frowned Arthura. "The day's holiday is in the hand."

"Not any special day," said Valerian, tauntingly.

"I will have to-morrow or none," was the vindictive reply.

"Oh, dear Arthura—oh, Mr Valerian—do not begin quarrelling. You were quite pleasant to each other this evening. I watched you."

"We must be civil before the world—No, Arthura, it is inconvenient to me to spare you to-morrow. Ask me some other time."

"Never again," Arthura said, as she took up her candle sullkily and made for the door.

"Dear Mr Valerian," put in Colette, "she looks terribly disappointed. Why not say yes? Stay, Arthura; I am sure he will say yes."

But Arthura vanished quickly as she had come. "Let me go to her with the permission. She is young. She clings to her step brothers and sisters. Remember that this is not her home," pleaded the little Frenchwoman.

"Of course she can go," Valerian answered, with perfect good nature. "But it does me good to see that girl in a passion. She is really very handsome."

"One would think women were only made to be looked at from the very men talk of beauty. She has a knot of gold; that is really something worth mentioning. But good-night, Mr Valerian. I will do anything that in me lies to fill her place to-morrow. I must now let the poor child have the happy news to sleep upon."

"Good night, Mademoiselle Colette. Tell Arthura, no more holidays for her unless she comes back in a tractable spirit. Henceforth all favors to depend on good behavior."

"Indeed I shall say on each thing. I will not aid and abet you in spoiling a generous temper. The sin be on your own head."

(to be continued.)

* Begun in Harper's Weekly No. 1373.

THE SALT MINE OF PETITE ANSE.

Southwestern Louisiana is justly regarded as the garden of that State, and the Bayou Teche the picturesque water-path into its delights. Longfellow in his "Evangeline" has in clear outline and brilliant coloring given to the world a youthful description of its dreamy bayous, sepia-tinted prairies, and Druid cubs. The subject is full of luxurious as were the poet's imaginings, and those who are familiar with this land of the Attakapas Indians are lost in wonder at Mr Longfellow's accuracy of delineation, knowing he never had visited the land he so graphically paints.

Our artist on the little steamer Stone R, of the New Orleans Times-Democrat, has penetrated this fertile land of flowers, and has caught some of its curious pictures and remarkable formations. About sixty miles above the mouth of the Teche, where it enters the Atchafalaya River, the thrifty town of New Iberia is situated, built on the site of New Town, one of the oldest settlements in the State. Within its precincts are still preserved many of the quaint houses of the Acadian settlers, with their low sloping roofs and cool verandas. Eight miles south of New Iberia is the island, as it is called, of Petite Anse—a remarkable elevation in the sea-marsh bordering the bay of Vermilion. Nowhere on this continent has nature built such a storehouse of salt as is here found—a formation which even in the present has not been accounted for by the most proficient of our geologists. Petite Anse, as one approaches it over the level prairie, looms up in the distance, a thickly wooded series of hills, whose highest elevation is 180 feet above sea-level. Here and there gorges of orange and bursh visible between the trees indicate that no soil bears no relation to the black earth of the surrounding country, and kindles the curiosity at its unlooked-for presence in the almost limitless sea marsh which fringes the coast of Louisiana. In extent the island is about three miles square, and contains 2240 arpents, the old Spanish measure generally adopted here. Formerly occupied by Indians, of whom traces are found on every side, tradition has it that owing to some terrible calamity within the memory of its earliest settlers the soil was refused to make it a place of habitation, and no inducement would prevail upon them to revisit the spot. A number of artificial mounds are found upon it, and explorations here brought to light arrow heads, hatchets, ear pans, and tomahawks, once the property of the prehistoric dwellers.

The first authentic history of this strange upheaval—for it is generally conceded that it was an upheaval—comes from one JOHN HAYS, hunter and trapper, who squatted on its hills in the latter portion of the last century. In the year 1791, whilst out after deer, he discovered there a salt spring, the brine from which was soon afterward manufactured into salt. The supply of the brine was too limited for profitable manufacture, and the spring was neglected until 1812, when the high price of salt, on account of our war with Great Britain, gave an impetus to its production, and small works were operated until 1815, when the cessation of hostilities lowered the price of that article of prime necessity. Judge D. D. Avery, who subsequently became the owner of the island, in 1841, after the establishment of the blockade of Southern ports, conceived boiling the water from the spring long neglected, and so salt was scarce throughout that section, all the product of his factory was eagerly sought for. To increase the production it was resolved to enlarge the well, and hands were engaged in that work, when an obstruction was met. Mr John M. Avery, son of the proprietor of the island, in 1862 descended to the bottom of the well, and whilst striking the hard object impeding the digging, chipped off a piece of transparent rock salt. An investigation followed, and a solid bed of salt was found. A report was made to the Confederate government, and mining commenced. Borings show that the deposit underlies about 150 acres of surface area, and wherever struck was identical in quality. The depth of the deposit is unknown, but already 115 feet of solid rock salt has been penetrated, and as the workings show the stratification to be nearly perpendicular, the indications are that its present width was its original depth, and its present depth its round majesture. The floor of the present workings is 140 feet from the surface, the shaft penetrating 25 feet of surface soil and 115 feet of salt, of which 80 feet is left for a roof.

As this level alone will yield 15,000,000 tons, the supply may be considered almost inexhaustible. This salt, which is now being mined by a New York company is of the purest quality, and, strange to say, chemical analyses show the entire absence of many of the invariable constituents of sea water. The manner of mining is by driving galleries or tunnels into the solid rock-salt, and crossing these by others at right angles, giving a width to each of about thirty-five feet and a height of seventy feet. The salt is blasted out with dynamite by miners imported from the salt mines of Strassfurth. After it is mined it is carried on a tramway to the shaft, and hoisted to a platform some sixty feet above the ground, where it is dumped into a powerful rock-crusher, which reduces it to a suitable size. It thence descends into a bin, which in turn supplies three ordinary mills, as shown in the illustration. The present yield is about 250 tons per day, including the coarse for packing and fine for table use.

The descent to the mine is made on the platform used in hoisting the salt cars, and when the bottom of the shaft is reached it requires some time for the eye to accustom itself to the darkness. Down the broad galleries miners' lights flit about, tiny fire-flies in this subterranean night. The salt crystals of wall and roof reflect their rays on all sides with wonderful brilliancy; and as the chambers were illuminated by a locomotive head-light on the occasion of our artist's descent, the pure white rock-salt was brought out with ghostly effect. Salt was everywhere. The floor was solid salt; walls, roof, above, below, and on either side, one vast cavern of this valuable deposit. The advance of the chambers is made by under-cutting or blasting out for a considerable distance a space about eight feet from the floor, and then blowing down this overhanging mass as it is needed for shipment.

Whilst the visitors were watching our artist sketching a group of miners boring in an under-cut, suddenly a sharp crack was heard, like the explosion of a musket cap, and this was almost immediately followed by a deep roar, as of the sound of an earthquake. The sound was dull, heavy, and tremulous, vibrating from gallery to gallery, accompanied by rapid concussions and an unpleasant pressure on the tympanum of the ear. The very foundations of the earth seemed to tremble, and little bits of salt, long after the sound had died away in a dry musical cascade, fell from the roof and sides. Hardly had the first report ceased its reverberations when it was followed by another, and another, until the mine was shivering with sound. A convulsion of nature could have been hardly more grand and awe-inspiring. The surprise of the party caused much merriment to the phlegmatic miners, who had gathered from an adjacent chamber, where the dynamite blasts had been fired.

Some ten hundred yards from the present shaft another has just been opened, almost sixty feet square and about thirty in depth, to the upper surface of the salt. This is intended for ventilation, and is of itself a curiosity. The exposed salt—so pure in its condition—resembles a sheet of smooth ice, and looking down upon it one can hardly believe that it is salt, and not clear water in a frozen state. In digging this, but a week or more ago, the workmen unearthed the bones of a huge mastodon, some of the teeth of which weighed over five pounds each, and the thigh-bone was over nine inches in diameter. Just above the mastodon was found a large amount of Indian crockery, some of which was ornamented with imitation of basket-work and circles. An ivory horn not unlike that of the rhinoceros was also discovered. These curiosities are to be forwarded to the Smithsonian Institution for examination.

Leading up to this singular island from Vermilion Bay, an arm of the Gulf of Mexico, with graceful curves, a silver ribbon on the brown sea-marsh, comes the serpentine Bayou Petite Anse (Little Cove), affording water communication for the fleet of salt vessels to New York, Galveston, and New Orleans. A tramway runs from the mine down to the wharf on the bayou, a mile distant, where are large quarters for the hands engaged in loading the craft. Looking seaward from the high hills, the distant waters of the bay are just visible, a thin steel rim on the horizon, whilst the intervening space is spread out a long low level of reeds and grasses, dotted with groups of live-oaks forming islands of foliage, or chenières, as they here are called. Some five miles to the north-west, just peeping above the cool green forest, the handsome residence of Mr. Joseph Jefferson can be seen, his delightful retreat where he enjoys his respite from the stage. Shoreward the Attakapas Prairie lies in its carpet of apple green, stretching off into hazy invisibility, with herds of cattle and horses roaming about in blissful freedom, mere specks to the eye. Here and there a newly fenced field, with its modest cottage, tells of freshly arrived settlers, and just beyond these the spires of New Iberia show their points above the live-oaks.

On the island the scenery is unlike anything found in any of the surrounding country. Rolling hills with gentle declivities velvety with soft grass; stretches of forests of walnut, live-oak, elm, and other trees; gorges of shadow festooned with trailing vines—all unite to make this an artist's Ultima Thule. It is an island of Summer-land, where the air, perfumed with orange blossoms and camel flowers, intoxicates the senses, the hum of bees and murmur of southern breezes woo voluptuous languor and perfect rest. The mocking-bird and the cardinal whistle in the underbrush, the lazy pelican rises from the bayou, startled deer vanish into the thicket, whilst myriads of wild fowl cover the many ponds on the prairie. Nature holds her court here; but her rule is to be short-lived, and is soon to pass away. Gangs of workmen have already graded a road-bed from New Iberia to the mine, and within four months this sylvan retreat will re-echo with the shrill whistle of the locomotive and rattle of cars. Salt, an hour before resting within its solid bed, will then be whirling on its way in both to the markets of Chicago, St. Louis, and Cincinnati, and the [illegible] resources of this remarkable deposit [illegible] open to supply the needs of our continent. The sugar which grows with such tropical prodigality on the surface, with the salt below, [illegible] both go into the markets on the same [illegible]. Petite Anse will then be open to the traveller, and its romances of Lafitte's buried treasures, Indian traditions, and bountiful hospitality will be a thing of the past.

Charles E. Whitney.

SOME REMARKABLE APES.

It will be a gratification to those interested in the growth of our free institutions, especially those identified with the advancement of public-school interests, to know that the Museum of Natural History, that a few years ago stepped into its new building on Manhattan Square, has already outgrown the space then designed, and that its rich collections more than fill the cases.

The varied collections are not alone pleasing to the eye, but have been, through the lectures on natural history delivered by the Superintendent, made directly available to the pupils and teachers of the public schools, and thus the Museum has become an adjunct of the public school system, and its growth watched with equal interest. The trustees have taken especial interest in the various departments, and a recent gift will place the collection of mammals on a par with, if not superior to, any in the world. Already some of the most interesting forms shown in the accompanying illustration have arrived.

New York has long been supplied with gorillas elaborately and expensively manufactured from bear-skin; but here is the bona-fide animal, of such extraordinary dimensions that it is difficult to realize that it is not the work of the skilled taxidermist.

The specimen in the Museum is that of an adult male, and seems to equal in general bulk at least two men. It is represented resting upon a limb, and the thick neck, long retreating forehead, and deeply sunken eyes give it a demoniacal expression. Its height when erect was about that of a tall man. The resemblance to the human frame is striking in the extreme; the proportions of the leg to the body, of the foot to the hand, the size of the heel, the curvature of the spine, and the capacity of the skull—twenty-nine to thirty-five cubic inches*—being all points of similarity.

But it is the evidence of enormous muscular power that perhaps most impresses the observer. This is particularly noticeable in the limbs, hands, and feet, where, in the latter particularly, the opposable thumb is seen to be of great power. The animal probably weighed, when alive, over two hundred pounds, and was shot in the mountains of interior Guinea; and as their range, now evidently wide, is now restricted presumably to the country between the Gaboon and Congo rivers, it is evident that their extinction is to be expected in the near future.

In a case adjoining that of the gorilla is a remarkable group representing a family of five orang-outangs, two adult males, one young and one old female, and a baby, with their nests, at the top of a durion-tree—especially valuable, as it is the exact reproduction of a family party observed by W. T. Hornaday on the Sadong River, Borneo, where he shot the specimens. Three of the group are represented in the accompanying illustration—a male, female, and young. In the Museum group the platform nest is shown with a young orang reclining upon it, fast asleep, clinging with its hands and feet to convenient boughs.

They are known to science as the Simia wurmbii, and if we are not mistaken the present illustration is the first one that has shown correctly the remarkable cheek callosities that distinguish the male. In many works this is represented as a fold of the neck, but it is a fibro-cellular outgrowth of the cheek, giving the animal a most singular appearance. The group represents a characteristic scene. The mother orang hangs from a limb, greedily eating a durion from one hand, while another is clasped in the free foot. Behind [illegible] the baby is swinging from limb to limb, while directly in her rear is a male suspended by one arm and leg, his long hair giving him a weird appearance, reaching out to snatch the coveted fruit. The fruit, leaves, branches, and all are exact reproductions. The largest specimen measures about four feet three inches in vertical height, and the reddish-brown hair in some portions is twelve or fourteen inches long. Across the face, including the strange callosity which is a sexual characteristic, it measures thirteen inches, and in fact resembles a great moon. Another characteristic that strikes the visitor is the enormous length of the arms, that touch the ground when the animal is erect, the animals resting upon their knuckles. The skull in shape is much nearer the human than that of the gorilla, yet its capacity is only twenty-five cubic inches. In many points the orang differs materially from man, yet in the number of ribs, the form of the cerebral hemispheres, and certain other features interesting to the physiologist, they approach him.

The orang is truly arboreal, never leaving the trees, and even in the tree-tops they are clumsy, and never attempt the gymnastic feats that form the characteristics of so many of their tribe. They are extremely heavy, weighing one hundred and fifty pounds, more or less, and they are obliged to move with great caution, swinging themselves along by collecting the branches, never leaping from one to another.

In general appearance they are only a degree less repulsive than the gorilla, their long reddish hair, spider-like arms, weird faces, ferocious canine teeth, and shining black skin, which often hangs in loose flabby folds, all tending to give them an uncanny appearance. As with the gorilla, they are tailless, and the feet and hands, as shown, exceedingly powerful. The latter are exceedingly long, but the thumb short, not reaching to the end of the metacarpal bone of the adjacent (index) digit. The toes of the feet are also equally long, with the exception of the great toe, which is extremely short, and often destitute of a nail.

Among the smaller monkeys of this unique collection perhaps the most striking, certainly for the possession of an enormous nasal appendage, is the proboscis monkey of Borneo. Instead of the flat nose of the forms already mentioned, we see an organ nearly four inches in length, that seems an absurd caricature of the human nose. This feature is extremely small in the young, and turned upward instead of directly downward. Quite recently another monkey with that organ excessively turned upward has been discovered in Thibet.

The proboscis monkey is mild and timid. It is fond of insects as well as vegetable food, and is shown in the act of creeping upon a butterfly that has alighted upon the limb.

In point of resemblance to the human African face the bearded saki of South America is remarkable, and when the head alone is seen is still more striking. The face is jet-black, the hair of the head stiff and high, while the cheeks and chin are ornamented with a perfect glossy beard. Its coat is a rich uniform black, and the tail large and brush-like. They are exceedingly cleanly, and are said to hold aside their beard when drinking, and to pass the water to their mouth with their hand. According to Humboldt they are vindictive, and when enraged will grind their teeth and leap about, displaying extraordinary mobility in the muscles of the face. They live in pairs, thus differing from other South American monkeys, are nocturnal, and have a strange unearthly cry, extremely resonant and far-reaching. The species is represented in the collection by several fine specimens of both sexes.

The interesting group of dog-faced monkeys, of which there are a number of specimens of different genera in the collection, is also well represented by the tartarin, that from its curious ruff or mane is often called the lion monkey. They are indigenous to Northern Africa, and are extremely powerful. In Southern Africa the chacma (cynocephalus) is much dreaded. It attains the size of a large dog, and far exceeds that animal in strength. They rarely, if ever, take to trees, and travel about the rocky country in bands of several hundred, often carrying devastation to the crops of the Boers. They are, however, extremely intelligent when domesticated, and it is said that one almost starved to death before it would eat poisonous food prepared for it. They have been employed as watch-dogs, for driving oxen, or attending the fire of a blacksmith, but generally require the watchful eye of the master.

The famous Gibraltar monkeys, that are protected by the government and allowed to live about the rock, are of the dog-faced variety, and were probably introduced from the African side.

Among the smallest and most interesting of the monkeys peculiar to South America are the marmosets, and in the illustration their relative size, when compared to the gorilla, is well shown. Their habits are seemingly more like those of squirrels than of the monkey tribe. The fur is long and wonderfully soft, the tail long and bushy, while the face with its twinkling bead-like eyes has a most interesting and human expression. They have the same number of teeth as in man, but the hands and feet are not so well adapted for grasping as in other monkeys, the thumbs being poorly developed, not at all opposable, and provided like the other fingers with a long sharp claw; hence the hands approach the claws or fore feet of other mammals. The tail is never prehensile, and they are all of exceedingly small size. In their habits they are truly arboreal, living high in the tree-tops in troops and companies. There are many different species collected in two genera. Several have been successfully kept in the zoological gardens of this city and Philadelphia, and recently one was born at Central Park. They are, however, exceedingly susceptible to climatic changes. Unlike all other monkeys, they bring forth as many as three young at a birth.

* That of the lowest Australian is seventy-five.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[From Our Own Correspondent.]

Kings and Crowns.—Furs Worn by Eminent Persons.—The Claimant.—Crime and Citizenship.—The Missing Heiress.—English Literature at Cambridge.

Military persons of distinction will henceforth be more popular than ever. It has hitherto been a drawback to them that since every one wears mustaches, and no one wears his uniform at evening parties, these heroes are too often taken for civilians, whose only notion of a weapon is an umbrella, and of service, the putting it up. Now, however, the edict has gone forth from the Horse Guards that "officers may wear miniature decorations at private parties in plain clothes." I can fancy a miniature cross or star, but I can't understand how one of those broad ribbons that half cover the waistcoat can be "quite small." If it is made thus, it will look less like a memorial of valor than a "remnant" from Whiteley's, and if it is cut short it will look like a pocket-handkerchief. However, these decorations will no doubt make a sensation, and at all events be pretty things for a fair neighbor at the dinner table to talk about, and military persons who have not served will be wild to do so and become similarly distinguished.

Certain eminent personages are known to affect various kinds of fur. The Emperor of Russia wears sable, the Emperor of Austria Astrakhan, and the Queen of Spain beaver. If Mr. Parnell should ever be President of the Irish Republic, and he [illegible] doubt [illegible] a fur [illegible] let me recommend—as eminently [illegible] of himself [illegible] of the odor in [illegible] regarded—the skunk. It is impossible to conceive how a man who has once occupied an honorable position, a "white" man, as the Americans say, could permit himself to sink so low. Silence and shame go at least decently together, but silence without shame is base indeed. The characterless creatures that form his following avow their sympathy with outrage loudly enough, but some fragment of conscience restrains him, and, on the other hand, he dare not denounce murder lest he should lose the suffrage of "the party of assassination," or even be its next victim.

The Claimant is again in high spirits, which, one is glad to observe, happens once in three months at least. News is regularly conveyed to him every quarter concerning Mr. Arthur Orton, who is perpetually being found in Australia, though always under most un-get-at-able circumstances. He has just now been discovered in the Paramatta lunatic asylum. Poor as I am, I would give five pounds to be at the back of that fat man's mind, to know what he really thinks about the Tichborne he pretends to be, and the Arthur Orton who he is, or does he shut his mental eyes altogether to his own nefarious proceedings, as Mr. Parnell shuts his mouth?

There are some books pretty sure not to be read which one is tempted to wish that the community should be compelled to read, whether they like them or not. This is always the case, of course, with one's own books; but there are sometimes books written by other people teaching excellent lessons and circulating the most wholesome principles. Sir Fitz-James Stephen's History of the Criminal Law of England is one of these. He is one of the few judges on the bench who seems to give himself the trouble to go into the motives of crime, and to estimate its general effect. He has a soft place in his heart for poverty and stress of circumstances, and he sets his face against the Brutal and the Cruel. This latter attribute has become most rare upon the bench. A rough was brought up last week for kicking a man in the face who had refused to supply him with drink without payment; lock-jaw set in, and the man died. The jury found the prisoner guilty, "and," says the report, "as it appeared that he had been several times convicted of violent assaults, the judge sentenced him to three months' hard labor!" If the man had stolen five shillings to keep himself from starving, the same judge would, without doubt, have given him a severer sentence. Sir Fitz-James Stephen, however, has a brain which is not composed of poached eggs. He does not deny that there are cases even of murder which do not call for capital punishment. There are circumstances, indeed, when murder may be justifiable. Suppose, for example, that unhappy cabin boy who was done to death by a series of prolonged and unimaginable cruelties by his skipper the other day had had enough vigor left in his tortured body and broken heart to kill the beast as he slept, what human being could blame him? The contention of our author is that we have gone too far in laying capital punishment aside for crimes short of murder, but which may testify to a more incorrigible hostility to society. These persons—savages and worse than savages, like the aforesaid skipper—"are as much misplaced in civilized society as wolves and tigers would be in a civilized country." This is a lesson which our legislature, and especially those who administer the law, have got to learn. At present, while property is protected by the severest enactments, the fate of children and women is left at the disposal of the cruel, and human life is made miserable to thousands from the brutality of a few. What good is to be hoped for from the professional wife-kicker and rough as husband and father? What benefit can he possibly be to the state? The idea of citizenship—though we hear so much talk about "a stake in the country"—never seems to enter into the heads of our lawgivers. Yet surely it ought to be fostered, while those who dwell amongst us only for the purpose, as it would seem, of increasing the sum of human misery, ought to be cast out. Surely a wretch who wilfully pollutes a public fountain, devastates a garden intended for the public, or robs a box the contents of which are dedicated to the poor, ought to be more severely punished than the petty thief who steals from individuals.

The story of the Irish heiress who, having been left on a door-step alone, has so opportunely come into her £14,000 a year just as she comes of age, to use an expression racy of the soil, "beats Banagher." I don't know who Banagher was, nor how to spell him, but I mean that her story outtops all others for romance. It is strange enough (though exceedingly admirable) that her uncle "the Colonel"—whose name, however, has not yet, I regret to say, been made public—should have made such generous efforts to find her, [illegible] he himself was in enjoyment of her property; it is rather unusual (though most [illegible] him) to learn that the young lady has at once offered to halve the money with him, and that the offer has been declined; but what [illegible] the most surprising feature of the case is the convenient way in which both her parents expired of heart-complaint on the same morning! From their behavior to their infant it would not have been supposed that they had a heart even between them. Every one is saying, "What a subject for fiction!" To which I reply (1) that no novelist would have been permitted to use materials to which the terms "impossible," "incredible," "monstrous," would have been applied by every critic, and (2) I [illegible] not quite sure that the whole story is not a fiction.

Thanks to the late Mr. W[illegible] every Trinity man will recall with [illegible] affection—a lecturership in English [illegible] founded at [illegible]. The [illegible] of English [illegible] gentlemen [illegible] contemporaries in America [illegible] knowledge of their own language. This [illegible] should [illegible] but not so all [illegible] (1). All thanks to dear W[illegible] Clark, who [illegible] dead, yet speaketh, and even, by proxy, [illegible]

R. Kemble, of [illegible]

Digitized by Google

Bonny, from the River, with the Hulks where the Merchants live lying in front.

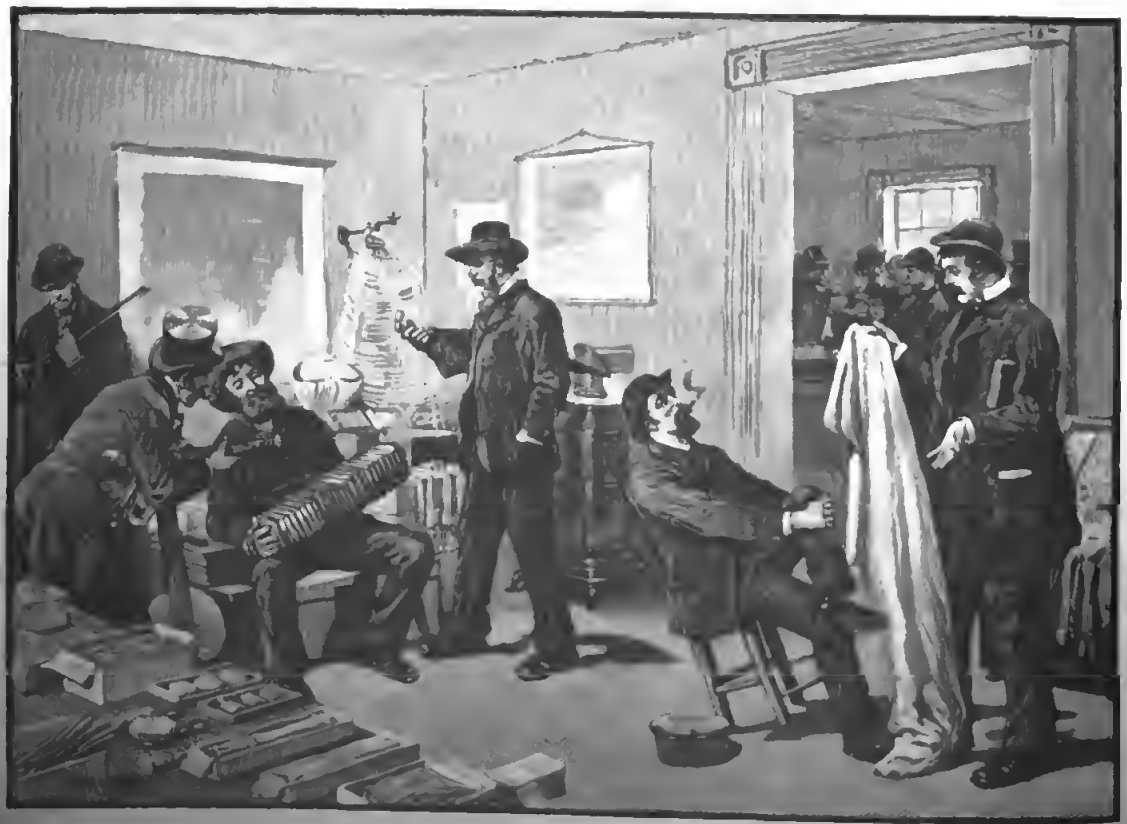
Old Calabar, seen from Palm-tree Factory.

A Palm-tree hung with the Nests of the Weaver birds.

Kru boats [illegible]

The King's "Mouth," with Stick of Office given to H. B. M.'s Government.

SKETCHES ON THE WEST COAST OF AFRICA [illegible]



THE DRUMMERS' ROOM IN A WESTERN HOTEL.—Drawn by T. de Thulstrup from a Sketch by Theo. R. Davis.—[See Page 269.]

PALACE OF THE GOVERNOR OF BENI MESKIN.

CAMPING OUTSIDE MOROCCO.

DRUMMERS.

THE "drummer" has become an important personage in the transaction of business between the importers and manufacturers of the Eastern cities, and their customers in the interior of the country. Formerly the country merchant was obliged to make the journey to New York, Boston, or Philadelphia several times a year in order to replenish his stock of goods. But now the "drummer" visits him at his own place, with samples and prices, so that he can order whatever he may be wanting at the time in just the same advantage as if he had made the trip to the metropolis.

These "drummers," of whom several thousands are employed by New York merchants alone, are generally active, intelligent, and reliable young men, thoroughly acquainted with business and with the requirements of their customers. As a rule they are also jovial and companionable, and when several of them meet at hotels are not averse to having a lively time.

AFRICAN SKETCHES.

THE sketches on the preceding page represent scenes at various trading stations on the west coast of Africa, in the region of the Niger Delta and the Calabar River. The district of Calabar is flat, and closely intersected by rivers. The climate is unhealthy, and there is not a single lighthouse on the coast. The inhabitants, mostly slaves, are employed by the chiefs in various kinds of labor connected with the palm-oil trade. There are two settlements on the Old Calabar River, Duke Town and Creek Town, where Christian missions have spread civilization and religion quite extensively among the natives.

Bonny, or Boni, is a town near the mouth of the river of that name. It is in the midst of a pestilential swamp, and is inhabited by degraded savages. European merchants live in hulks anchored in the river. A large business is done in palm-oil.

Until very lately travel in the empire of Morocco has been dangerous and exceedingly uncomfortable. The fanatical natives looked with suspicion and anger upon all foreigners, and treated them with the utmost incivility. Affairs have mended somewhat of late, but travellers must still be protected by an escort if they would be safe from maltreatment by roving bands. The sketches on this page present scenes and incidents of an artist's tour from the seaport of Tangier to the capital of the empire. The city of Morocco was founded in 1072, and was once flourishing and important, but for generations it has been decaying, and it is now nearly half in ruin. War, plague, and a detestable government have united in accomplishing this result. From the outside it presents a picturesque appearance; but within, the streets are narrow, irregular, and unpaved, and the houses are generally of one story, flat-roofed, with the side toward the street plain and glaring with whitewash, with one or two narrow unglazed slits for windows.

THE WALLS OF MOROCCO.

BRIDGE ON THE TANAYPT.

A HORSEMAN OF [illegible]

FROM TANGIER TO THE CITY OF MOROCCO.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE
MAKES A COOLING DRINK
Into half a tumbler of ice-water put a teaspoonful of Acid Phosphate; and sugar to the taste.—[Adv.]

PREMATURE LOSS OF THE HAIR
May be entirely prevented by the use of Hobbert's Cocoaine. The superiority of Hobbert's Flavoring Extracts consists in their perfect purity and strength.—[Adv.]

Thousands of people testify to the merits of Piso's Cure for Consumption.—[Adv.]

The charming combination of flower perfumes attained in Piverman make it an exquisite cologne.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1878.
BAKER'S
Breakfast Cocoa.
Warranted absolutely pure Cocoa, from which the excess of Oil has been removed. It has three times the strength of Cocoa mixed with Starch, Arrowroot or Sugar, and is therefore far more economical. It is delicious, nourishing, strengthening, easily digested, and admirably adapted for invalids as well as for persons in health.
Sold by Grocers everywhere.
W. BAKER & CO., Dorchester, Mass.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. FINEST AND CHEAPEST MEAT FLAVORING STOCK FOR SOUPS, MADE DISHES, AND SAUCES.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. An invaluable and palatable tonic in all cases of weak digestion and debility. "As a success and a boon for which nations should feel grateful."—See "Medical Press," "Lancet," "British Medical Journal," &c.
CAUTION.—Genuine only with the fac-simile of Baron Liebig's Signature in Blue Ink across the Label. This caution is necessary, owing to various cheap and inferior substitutes being in the market.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. To be had of all Storekeepers, Grocers, and Chemists. Sole Agents for the United States (wholesale only): C. DAVID & CO., 8 Fenchurch Avenue, London, England.
Sold wholesale in New York by PARK & TILFORD, SMITH & VANDERBEEK, ACKER, MERRALL, & CONDIT, M'KESSON & ROBBINS, K. & F. & THURBER & CO., W. H. SCHIEFFELIN & CO.

THE ACME LEVER
CUFF BUTTONS
Overcome all trouble with
STIFF CUFFS.
Ask your Jeweller for them, and
TAKE NO OTHER.

DAKOTA.
Quick, safe, and sure investments for capitalists or residents in Dakota, Kanton County, Dakota. A new town on Northern Pacific Railroad, at crossing of N. W. (recent million west of Dubuque Farm. Specially opening for Merchants in every line. Mechanics in demand; wages good. Well-watered country, in the immediate west belt. Correspondence solicited. Refer-ences: Hayes, Jones, & Comfort, New York; Hunt & Lennon, New Haven, Chicago. Address PERKINS, ROBBINS, & CO., Bankers, Ortiska, Dakota.

BRIGGS & CO.'S

A curse from passed over the back of these PAPERS TRANSFERS the Pattern to any fabric. Designs in Stencil, Embroidery, Braiding, and Initial Letters.
Neat Book bound in cloth, showing all Briggs & Co.'s Patterns, including over 40 new designs, sent on receipt of seven 2-cent stamps.
104 Franklin St., N.Y.
Retailed by the leading Zephyr Wool Stores.

HARPER'S BAZAR
CUT PAPER PATTERNS.
We have transferred our WHOLESALE PATTERN DEPARTMENT to No. 3 G. CROTTY, No. 130 to 136 Canary Street, New York, who will conduct it upon his own account and responsibility.
SPECIAL CAUTION.
We are not interested in nor responsible for any contracts made by J. G. CROTTY & CO., whether for Harper's Bazar Patterns or for any other business.
HARPER & BROTHERS.

IMPORTED TILES & MOSAICS
IN HEARTHS, FACINGS, BATH-ROOMS & FLOORS.
GRATES, FENDERS, ANDIRONS &c.
EDWARD BOOTE
11 EAST 19th ST. N.Y.

A CHARMING BOOK BY CAPT. PAMMAR.
"MARYARD NO!" or, Adventures by Barnard Lodge. Cloth, 276 Pages, 8 Illustrations, by mail, $1.50. JAMAICA PUB. CO., Jamaica Plain, Mass.

CARLETON'S TREASURY of KNOWLEDGE
The most selling book ever known. The largest demand. Circulars free. Agents, G. W. CARLETON & CO., Publishers, N.Y.

LUNDBORG'S
16H COLOGNE.

THE GREAT SAUCE
OF THE WORLD.
LEA & PERRINS
Imports the most delicious taste and zest to EXTRACT
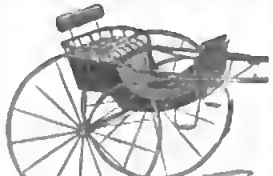
of a LETTER from a MEDICAL GENTLEMAN at Madras, to his brother at WORCESTER.
May, 1851.
"Tell LEA & PERRINS that their sauce is highly esteemed in India, and is in my opinion, the most palatable, as well as the most wholesome sauce that is made."

SOUPS,
GRAVIES,
FISH,
HOT & COLD
MEATS,
GAME, &c.

Lea & Perrins
Signature is on every bottle of GENUINE
WORCESTERSHIRE SAUCE.
Sold and used throughout the world.
JOHN DUNCAN'S SONS,
AGENTS FOR THE UNITED STATES.
NEW YORK.

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.
EPPS'S COCOA.
BREAKFAST.
"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately flavored beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.
Made simply with boiling water or milk. Sold in tins only (½-lb. and lb.) by Grocers, labelled thus:
JAMES EPPS & Co., Homœopathic Chemists,
London, England.

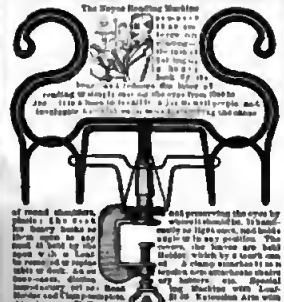
THE BRADLEY



ROAD CART
Second Premium at Centennial Exhibition.
Illustrated Catalogue No. 4 Mailed Free.
We guarantee the Bradley Road Cart to be the finest Cart ever manufactured in the United States. Our Bradley Road Carts stand very conspicuous for their excellence, both as a beauty and for easy draft. Over 100 list, and all satisfactory.
THREE STYLES weighing from 90 to 100 lbs. for One or Two Persons. Speed guaranteed.
BRADLEY & CO., SYRACUSE, N.Y.
ESTABLISHED 1818.

First Prize Medal, Vienna, 1873.
C. WEIS, Manufacturer of Meerschaum Goods, Wholesale and Retail. Send for Price-list. 29 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

All issues of WESTERN BONDS! SOUGHT & SOLD by T. J. CHEW, Jr. Investment Banker, ST. JOSEPH, MO.
City of ST. JOSEPH, BUCHANAN CO., Mo., and other DEFAULTED BONDS purchased at Best Rates.



BOSS' PATENT GOLD WATCH CASES
Beware! Strength! Durability! ELEGANT DESIGNS! GUARANTEED for 20 Years!

40 Gold & Silver Chromo Cards, no 2 alike, with name, 10c., postpaid. G. I. Reed & Co., Nassau, N.Y.

HARPER'S
MONTHLY MAGAZINE
(No. 396)
FOR MAY
CONTAINS:
"The Sisters,"
Frontispiece. From the Picture by M. A. Ancey;
San Francisco,
By William H. Bishop. Illustrated;
The Treaty of Peace and Independence—II.,
By George Tiemann Curtis. Illustrated.
The National Academy of the Arts of Design, and its Surviving Founders,
By Benson J. Lossing. Illustrated.
Roman Carnival Sketches,
By Anna Bowman Dodge. Illustrated by Hamerton;
Anthony Trollope,
By W. H. Pollock. With Portrait;
The Brooklyn Bridge,
By William C. Conant. With Twenty-one Illustrations;
A Castle in Spain—I.,
A New Serial Novel. Illustrated by Ancey;
Nehemiah's Plan,
A Short Story. By Kate W. Hamilton;
The Middle Colonies before the Revolution,
By John Fiske;
Art Study at Home and Abroad,
By Professor John F. Weir;
Fresh Air in Summer,
By Dr. T. M. Coan;
Poems
By Henrietta E. Clarke, Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, and Lucian Charlton Moulton;
Editor's Easy Chair.
Frailties of the Women of Feeblers, and their Cause. —The Woeful Prophet.—Wagner.—Authors and Publishers.—The Correspondence of Carlyle and Emerson;
Editor's Literary Record.
Editor's Historical Record.
Editor's Drawer.
Anecdotes.—Norristown Etchings (J. H. Williams) —"Forcing his Hand" (Wilton Carter).—"Love's Victory" (R. K. Munkittrick).—"Blue Stockings" (Charles Follen Adams).

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE	Per Year	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY	"	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR	"	4 00
The THREE above publications	"	10 00
Any TWO above named	"	7 00
HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE	"	1 50
HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE	"	5 00
HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY (52 Numbers)	"	10 00

Index to Harper's Magazine, 1 to 60. 8vo, Cloth . $ 00
Postage Free to all subscribers in the United States or Canada.

HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY: a weekly publication, containing works of Travel, Biography, History, Fiction, and Poetry, at prices ranging from 10 to 25 cents per number. Full list of Harper's Franklin Square Library will be furnished gratuitously on application to Harper & Brothers. Subscription Price, per Year of 52 Numbers, $10 00.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE, comprising the titles of between three and four thousand volumes, will be sent by mail on receipt of Nine Cents.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N.Y.

THE DINGEE & CONARD CO'S
BEAUTIFUL EVER-BLOOMING
ROSES
The only establishment making a SPECIAL BUSINESS of ROSES. GOLDEN GEM HOUSE for ROSES alone. Mammoth Pot Plants suitable for immediate bloom delivered safely, postpaid, at every post-office. Beautiful varieties, your choice, all labeled, for $1; 12 for $2; 19 for $3; 25 for $4; 35 for $5; 75 for $10; 100 for $13. We GIVE A HANDSOME Present of pruning and culture ROSES free with every order. Our NEW GUIDE, a complete Treatise on the Rose, given away. Illustrated. Price all.
THE DINGEE & CONARD CO.
Rose Growers, West Grove, Chester Co., Pa.

LADIES!
Beauty Without Paint, only Hair Dresser known. Produces instantaneously magnificent hair; rose and brunette. Is not a dye, contains no poisons. Gentlemen or ladies. Clemgraine's Imperial develops the finest in proportion of perfect nature. Safe and certain. Sold a charge for particulars. Free Circular. Clemgraine Co., 205 Spruce St., Philadelphia, Pa.

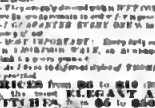
THE BIGGEST THING OUT (new) E. NASON & CO., 111 Nassau St., New York. Illustrated Book Sent Free.

50 Large Chromos, New and pretty as ever published. Name on, 10c. VARN & CO., New Haven, Conn.

REASONS
WHY
MRS. THOMPSON'S
PATENT WAVES
ARE BETTER THAN ALL OTHERS.

1.—The PATENT SPRING enables her to change to EVERY head.
2.—They DO NOT HAVE A FAULT—they are natural hair.
3.—In a second can be turned apart, for several SIDES of any coiffure made.
4.—They CANNOT WEIGHT or SHRINK with dampness, for it will be always in proper.
5.—They do not fade or tarnish, for they don't require dressing as other do.
6.—They are specially dressed with WITCH OIL, as a proper SCALP, and after the appearance in order for a proper and healthy dressing.
7.—I GUARANTEE EVERY GRAY to COVER it WELL, or refund the money if not.
8.—MOST IMPORTANT: Every lady can do a quick and attractive up-to-date FASHION WAVE, as my system will accommodate the fashion as it may present.
9.—As I have 10 different styles of PERFECT PATH every lady can be perfected.
PRICES from $6 to $10 (Short and long extra). Long enough for KLEGANT AMORTENT OF SWITCHES, $5 to $50. GRAY HAIR A SPECIALTY.
☞ Beware of parties endeavoring to sell you Waves, representing them to be the Thompson Waves, as I do not allow any other Dealer to sell my goods.
SEND FOR CATALOGUE TO HEADQUARTERS OF
MRS. C. THOMPSON,
No. 39 East 14th Street, NEW YORK.

SUPERIOR FISHING TACKLE.



We offer a fine 8 joint Fly Rod, 10-yard Brass Reel, best E Linen Line, 3 Flies, 3 Hooks to gut, and Leader, complete, by express, for $3 00; by mail, postpaid, $3 50. Sample flies by mail, prepaid, for 25c., per dozen, $1 00. 3 three-piece Trout Rod, 1 Float, 1 Brass Reel, 100 ft. Linen Line, ¼ dozen Hooks, 1 Sinker, 1 Gut Leader, all for $2 75.
Just published, the largest and most complete Catalogue of all sporting-goods ever issued—is Lawn-Tennis, Base-Ball, Archery, Cricket, Foot Ball, Fishing, Boating, and 165 engravings and Pictorial Cards, and all the latest novelties. 200 large pages, 60x40 illustrations, on fine tinted paper. Price, by mail, 25 cts.
PECK & SNYDER, 126 to 130 Nassau St., N. Y.

"I owe my Restoration to Health and Beauty to the CUTICURA REMEDIES."
Testimonial of a Boston lady.

DISFIGURING Humors, Humiliating Eruptions, Itching Tortures, Scrofula, Salt Rheum, and Inherited Humors cured by the CUTICURA REMEDIES.
CUTICURA, the great Skin Cure, instantly allays Itching and Inflammation, clears the Skin and Scalp, heals Ulcers and Sores, and restores the Hair.
CUTICURA SOAP, an exquisite Skin Beautifier and Toilet Requisite, prepared from CUTICURA, is indispensable in treating Skin Diseases, Baby Humors, Skin Blemishes, Sunburn, and Greasy Skin.
CUTICURA REMEDIES are absolutely pure, and the only infallible Blood Purifiers and Skin Beautifiers ever compounded. Price, CUTICURA, 75 cents; SOAP, 35 cents; RESOLVENT, $1.
POTTER DRUG AND CHEMICAL CO., Boston, Mass.

¿ HABLA V. ESPAÑOL ?
PARLEZ-VOUS FRANÇAIS ?
Sprechen Sie Deutsch ?
IN TEN WEEKS
You can, at your own home, by
Dr. Richard S. Rosenthal's
MEISTERSCHAFT SYSTEM,
Learn to speak fluently either Spanish, French or German, for the nominal price of $5.00.
All subscribers receive SIX languages—lessons exclusively people of Dr. Rosenthal, who corrects all exercises and corresponds with them in regard to any difficulties which may occur.
Specimen Copy.
Spanish, French or German, 25 cents.
Says The Nation, New York: "This is without doubt the best system ever devised for learning to speak a foreign language to a short time."
☞ Send $5.00 for full subscription, with privilege of having all your exercises corrected and questions answered.
ESTES & LAURIAT, Publishers,
299-305 Washington Street, BOSTON, MASS.

CLERGYMEN
Who are now out of employment, or engaged at nominal salaries, can have a very profitable employment through the introduction of M'CLINTOCK & STRONG'S CYCLOPEDIA OF BIBLICAL, THEOLOGICAL, AND ECCLESIASTICAL LITERATURE, which is meeting with the most enthusiastic reception. No agent cannot fail to be a successful canvasser, and the orders already received through agents assure its success. Address, with three-cent stamp, for Catalogue, &c.
H. W. DERBY & CO., Cincinnati, O.

Messrs. Derby & Co. have the sole right to sell this subscription book of M'CLINTOCK & STRONG'S CYCLOPÆDIA in Ohio, Indiana, and Kentucky.
HARPER & BROTHERS.

RIDLEYS',

Grand, Allen, & Orchard Sts., N. Y.

SUMMER SILKS.

IN STRIPES, ALL COLORS, 49c.
PEKIN STRIPE SATINS (BLACK), 89c. A YARD.
ALL-SILK FOULARDS, POSITIVELY 39c. INCHES WIDE.
40 PIECES PLAIN COLORED SILKS, ALL SHADES, 49c.
ALL-SILK OTTOMANS, $1, $1 25, $1 50, $1 75.
BLACK MOIRE FRANCAISE, ALL SILK, 49c.; WORTH $1.

BLACK GROS GRAINS.

20-INCH HEAVY AT 89c.; WORTH 25c.
20-INCH RICH SATIN FINISH, $1; WORTH $1 50.
22-INCH CACHEMIRE DE LYON, VERY FINE, $1 50; WORTH $2.

LACES.

COLORED SPANISH, 20c., 25c., 30c., 39c. to $1 a yard.
BLACK AND CREAM SPANISH LACES—FULL LINES.
BLACK BEADED AND BLACK AND STEEL LACES 25c., 30c., 35c., 49c., 70c. a yard.
WHITE AND BLACK BEADED CROWNS, 75c., 89c., $1 each.
SILVER AND GOLD CASHMERE CROWNS, 39c., 49c., 65 each.

NOVELTIES IN VEILINGS.

SPRING MAGAZINE

CONTAINS FULL PRICE-LIST OF OUR ENTIRE STOCK, AND IS A VALUABLE MEDIUM TO HAVE AT HAND.

Single Number, 15c. 1 or, 50c. annually.

SAMPLES SENT ON APPLICATION.

EDW. RIDLEY & SONS.

309, 311, 313 to 317 Grand St.,
36, 38, 40, 42 to 52 ALLEN ST.,
40, 42, 204 & 206 ORCHARD STREET.

The Stock of Colored Silks that is now shown by

Messrs. JAMES McCREERY & CO.,

for variety of texture, completeness of assortment, and positive value, surpasses anything that has ever been exhibited.

They make a special offering this week of 500 pieces of Colored Gros Grain at $1 a yard that are worth $1 25. Also, three beautifully assorted lines of Colored Gros Grains, Gros de Londre, and Ottomans at $2 that are excellent value for $2 50.

JAMES McCREERY & CO.,
Broadway, corner 11th St.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

DRESS GOODS.

Have just received an elegant assortment of Tweed Suitings, Dark and Medium Shades, suitable for Summer and Mountain wear; also, a large line of High Novelties adapted for Evening, Carriage, and Street Costumes.

Broadway and 19th St.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

SOME AUTHENTIC DUDESQUE POSITIONS

This above can only be obtained under the following conditions:
1. An absolute obliteration of the shoulders by an English tailor.
2. A stick or staff a great deal too long for the wearer.
3. A queer and inexplicable wrecking of the right leg, which, when at rest, appears ever so much longer than the left.

Syracuse Village Cart.

The luxuriousness and novel popular pleasure Cart made. Adapted especially for ladies and children. It is handy [illegible] to be easy of access; in strength and comfortable [illegible] In its construction the very best of materials only are used, and it is followed in a most thorough manner in every respect. We give [illegible] are several very desirable styles of Road Carts for [illegible] driving. Over [illegible] one hundred in use. All speak in the highest praise of them. Send for Illustrated Catalogue and Price-list.

SYRACUSE CART CO., Syracuse, N. Y.

CASTORIA

for Infants and Children.

Castoria promotes Digestion and overcomes Flatulency, Constipation, Sour Stomach, Diarrhœa, and Feverishness. It insures health and natural sleep, without morphine.

"Castoria is so well adapted to Children that I recommend it as superior to any prescription known to me." H. A. ARCHER, M. D., 86 Portland Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

What gives our Children rosy cheeks, What cures their fevers, makes them sleep? 'Tis Castoria.

When babies free and cry by turns, What cures their colic, lulls their worries, Hail Castoria.

What quickly cures Constipation, Sour Stomach, Colds, Indigestion? But Castoria.

Farewell then to Morphine Syrups, Castor Oil and Paregoric, and Hail Castoria!

CENTAUR LINIMENT—an absolute cure for Rheumatism, Sprains, Burns, Galls, &c. The most Powerful and Penetrating Pain-relieving and Healing Remedy known to man.

CAMPBELL'S

Self-Acting Window Shade Rollers.
Admitted Superior to All Others
Ask your upholsterer for them
Salesroom, 259 Centre Street, N. Y.

DRY GOODS BY MAIL. Delivered to any part of the United States or Europe. Price Catalogue Mailed Free. Also when desired samples of Dress Goods, Silks, Woolens, from the largest and finest stock in the country. Write to Jordan, Marsh & Co. Boston.

SCRAP PICTURES, 280 Fine Pictures 75 cents, stamps. 9 Hill Place, 30 Nassau St., N. Y.

THE AUTOMATIC POCKET
Adjusts itself in the pocket, so how-ever carelessly put in, holds the watch secure, protected from loss from the screw being out or wearing. Every person Accepts and Orders Agency. The only reliable watch pocket. Sent for $1, by the Automatic Pocket Co., 917 Market St., Philadelphia, Pa. Sixty per cent. profit. Agents wanted.

30 Fine White Gold Edge Cards, name on, 10c. Sample Book, 25c. M. SHAW & CO., Jersey City, N. J.

WANTED 8 or 10 BOOK AGENTS at once, and employment to purchasers. Apply at 1 o'clock this afternoon to operate in TENNESSEE. AGENTS to hire and paid others to introduce a NEW WORK of extraordinary merit and great salability. Prof. Tyng says worth $1,000 to $10,000. Also dress goods, full cloth shawls, capes, &c. RICHARD BROS., 28 Chestnut St., Phila. Pa.

40 Chromo Visiting Cards, no 2 alike, for 1883, name on, and Illustrated Premium List for 10c. Warranted best out. Agents wanted. L. JONES & CO., Nassau, N. Y.

CARDS New Styles Gold Bevelled Edge and Chromo Fringed Cards, finest quality, largest variety and lowest prices. 25 all styles, no two alike, 10c., 2 packs with name and order Clipper Press & Card Co., Unionville, Conn.

$72 A WEEK. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly Outfit free. Address TRUE & Co., Augusta, Maine.

CARDS. An Elegant New Set of Cards for 10c. Sample, W. H. PRINGLE, Rochester, N. Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS' LIST OF NEW BOOKS.

I

LIDDELL & SCOTT'S GREEK-ENGLISH LEXICON. A Greek-English Lexicon. Compiled by Henry George Liddell, D.D., Dean of Christ Church, Oxford, and Robert Scott, D.D., Dean of Rochester, late Master of Balliol College, Oxford. Seventh Edition, Revised and Augmented throughout, with the Co-operation of Prof. Drisler, of Columbia College, N. Y. 4to, Sheep, $20 00.

II

LETTERS AND MEMORIALS OF JANE WELSH CARLYLE. Prepared for Publication by Thomas Carlyle. Edited by James Anthony Froude. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents. Also, Library Edition, 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

III

BRYDEN'S DICTIONARY OF DATES and Universal Information relating to all Ages and Nations. Comprising Chronology, Universal History, Treaties, Discoveries, Inventions, Commerce, Manufactures, Religions, Literature, Science, Art, Biography, Geography, Statistics, Mythology, and Antiquities of the World to the Present Time. By Benjamin Vincent. Revised for American Readers. Large 8vo, 800 pages, Cloth, $6 00.

IV

ENGLISH LITERATURE IN THE 18TH CENTURY. By Thomas Spencer Baynes, University Lecturer in English Literature, Harvard University. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

V

A HISTORY OF LATIN LITERATURE, from Ennius to Boethius. By Howard Augustus Strong, M.A., Fellow of Queen's College, Oxford. In Five Volumes. 12mo, Cloth, $6 00. Uniform with Mahaffy's "History of Classical Literature."

VI

DIALECT TALES. By Thomas Hardy. Illustrated. 8vo, Cloth, $1 25.

VII

JAMES NASMYTH, ENGINEER. An Autobiography. Edited by Samuel Smiles, Author of "Lives of the Engineers," "Self-Help," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50; 4to, Paper, 20 cents.

VIII

XENOPHONTIS LIBRI SOCRATICI (De Socratis Commentarii, Œconomicus, Convivium; Amoyntæ Socratis Apologia ad Judices). Ex Recensione Caroli Benedicti Chavanii. R. B. Winans. 12mo, Cloth, 90 cents; Paper, 50 cents.

IX

WHY WE LAUGH. By Samuel S. Cox, Author of "Buckeye Abroad," "Eight Years in Congress," &c. 4to, Paper, 10 cents.

X

TIM AND TIP; or, The Adventures of a Boy and a Dog. By James Otis, Author of "Toby Tyler," &c. Illustrated. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

XI

PERICLES PRINCE OF TYRE. By William Shakespeare. Edited, with Notes, by William J. Rolfe, A.M., Formerly Head Master of the High School, Cambridge, Mass. With Engravings. 16mo, Cloth, 50 cents; Paper, 40 cents.

XII

THE TWO NOBLE KINSMEN. By John Fletcher and William Shakespeare. Edited, with Notes, by William J. Rolfe, A.M., Formerly Head Master of the High School, Cambridge, Mass. With Engravings. 16mo, Cloth, 50 cents; Paper, 40 cents.

XIII

JAMES AND PHILIP VAN ARTEVELD. Two Lectures on the History of the Fourteenth Century. By James Morison. 4to, Paper, 10 cents.

XIV

CHARACTER READINGS FROM "GEORGE ELIOT." Selected and Arranged by Nathan Sheppard, Editor of "The Lakeside Reader." With Illustrations. 4to, Paper, 25 cents.

THE NEW NOVELS

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Mary Barton. A Tale of Manchester Life. By Mrs. Gaskell. 20 cents.

Pipsy Pearle. Memoirs of Margaret de Rheinstrut, Viscountess of Helldon. By Chansonetta M. Tonson. 15 cents.

The Story of Bellcoul. By Pere Marcel. 10 cents.

The Bandit of Jamica. By F. W. Hemmens. 20 cents.

Dolce Miller, and other Stories. By Henry James, Jr. 20 cents.

The Wreck of the "Grosvenor." By W. Clark Russell. 15 cents; also 8vo, Paper, 20 cents.

Who is Sylvia? By A. Pasco. 20 cents.

Shandon Bells. By William Black. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50; Paper, 20 cents.

Unspotted from the World. By Mrs. O. W. Goreary. 20 cents.

Bid Me Discourse. By Mary Cecil Hay. 10 cents.

It was a Lover and his Lass. By Mrs. Oliphant. 20 cents.

My Democratic Cousins. By the Author of "The Queen of Connaught." 15 cents.

George Vanbrugh's Mistake. By H. Green Pearson. 20 cents.

Dukesborough Tales. By Richard Malcolm Johnston. Illustrated. 20 cents.

☞ Harper & Brothers will send any of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

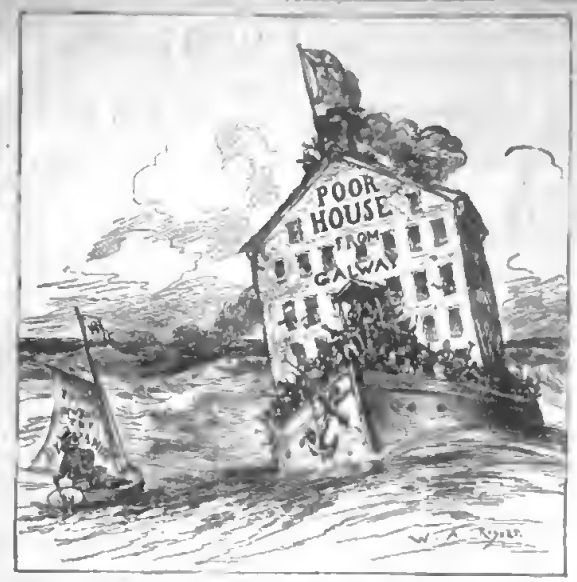
☞ Harper's Catalogue mailed free on receipt of Five Cents in stamps.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

PORTRAITS! Oldest, Largest and Best House for Artists' Materials. Something New. Just introduced. Artists' Outfit, Artists' Universal Sketching Box, $5 00 up. THE KYLE & CO., Austin, Tex.

AGENTS can now grasp a fortune. Write us and see. $10 free. Address S. M. SPENCER & CO., 10 Barclay St., N. Y.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address H. HALLETT & Co., Portland, Maine.



THE BALANCE OF TRADE WITH GREAT BRITAIN SEEMS TO BE STILL AGAINST US.

600 Paupers arrived at Boston in the Steamship Nestoria, April 13th, from Galway, Ireland, shipped by the British Government.

HALE'S HONEY.

ONE of the best and most reliable remedies for Throat and Lung affections is found in the old-established and well known remedy, Hale's Honey of Horehound and Tar. This is especially the case in Croupous where there is nothing children so much administered upon the first symptoms of Croup will cut it short. Effective relief to the little sufferer, but in cases where expectoration prevents the formation of the false membrane, which is at once the terror of physicians and the despair of parents. This remedy should always be kept in the house as it may sometimes save the lives of little ones when no physician is within call. Ask your Druggist for Hale's Honey of Horehound and Tar (50 cents), and take no substitute.

Pike's Toothache Drops Cure in one minute.

Hill's Hair and Whisker Dye, 50c.

Kissena Nurseries,
Trees and Plants.
Parsons & Sons Co., Limit'd.
Flushing, N. Y.

DURKEE'S SALAD DRESSING

No Worse. No Trouble. No Disappointment.

A GOOD SALAD ASSURED.

The most Delicious and the most Popular Mayonnaise for all kinds of Salads, Raw Tomatoes, Cabbage Cold Meats, Fish, &c., ever offered for sale

ALL GROCERS SELL IT.

H.W. JOHNS' ASBESTOS

LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING,
Steam Pipe & Boiler Coverings, Steam Packing, Mill Board, Sheathing, Fire Proof Coatings, &c.
Send for Descriptive Price List.
H. W. JOHNS MFG CO. 87 MAIDEN LANE, N.Y.

GOLD PENS.

PENCILS, HOLDERS, CASES, &c.

THE ALLI-GRAPHIC PEN.

A GOLD PEN and HOLDER, containing ink sufficient for several days writing. Can be carried in the pocket. Always ready for use. A luxury for persons who wish to preserve their individuality in writing.

MARIE, TODD, & BARR,
Broadway, New York.
Send for Price-List.
ALL GOODS ARE SOLD BY FIRST-CLASS DEALERS.

Print Your Own Cards, &c. Press $3

KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

CONGRESS WATER.

Superior as a Cathartic, Alterative, A specific for [illegible] Liver, Kidneys, Stomach, Bowels, Blood, Avoid substitutes. Sold by druggists generally. Beware of imitations. Ask for Congress Water, and refuse all others. Physicians prescribe it in preference to all other mineral waters.

SYPHER & CO.

ARE CONSTANTLY RECEIVING FROM EUROPE

Antique Silver, Furniture, Clocks, Bronzes, and Articles of Vertu.

720 & 722 BROADWAY.

HORSMAN'S CELEBRATED

LAWN TENNIS.

Send Stamp for Illustrated Catalogue.

E. I. HORSMAN, 80 & 82 William St., N.Y.

LOW, SON, & HAYDON'S

Flower de Luce

The Howard Tooth Brushes

HAVE

SECURELY FASTENED BRISTLES

AND CAN BE FOUND WITH ALL DRUGGISTS.

PINS BEARING THIS

TRADE MARK.

P&A

ARE SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS

MANUFACTURED BY

THE PLUME & ATWOOD MFG CO.
WATERBURY, CONN.

J. W. HOFFMAN, 116 Market St., Phila., Manufr of

WOOD-CARPET

Parquetry or Ornamental Wood-Floors,

For Steamboat Saloons, Private Houses, Hotels, Stores, etc. Also Borders for Rugs. Send stamp for Book of Designs.

CATARRH

I am suffering with Catarrh or Bronchitis who earnestly desire relief, I can furnish a means of Permanent and Positive Cure. A Home Treatment. No charge for consultation by mail. Valuable Treatise Free. Certificates from Doctors, Lawyers, Ministers, Business men. Rev. T. P. CHILES, Troy, Ohio.

AMERICAN STAR SOFT CAPSULES THE BEST. A [illegible] per Capsules. All Druggists

1883---New Prices!---1883.

DR. SCOTT'S ELECTRIC CORSET.

$1, $1.50, $2, $3.

Owing to the unprecedented success attending the sale and use of our $3 Electric Corset, and the numerous demand for Electric Corsets of less price, but of the same theoretical value we have decided to place upon the market A HANDSOME LINE OF ELECTRIC CORSETS, ranging in price from $1 to $3, thus bringing them within the reach of all who desire them. They are equally charged with positive magnetism, the difference being only in the quality of material. The higher grades are made of extra fine [illegible] while those of most popular use are composed of [illegible] All are named on the lining in gold, "Dr. Scott's Electric Corset," thereby protecting the public against imposition, a practice recently introduced by unscrupulous dealers. We are entitled to this protection, as we have spared no pains or expense in the production of these Corsets, and have succeeded in securing the services of the most skilful Electricians in the country, and by a recently invented process of manufacture we are enabled to offer to the public an ABSOLUTELY UNBREAKABLE Corset, and will guarantee them to outwear two ordinary ones.

Being "Electric," as well as unbreakable, the Corset assumes a graceful and natural shape, and of better material than any ordinarily sold at the price, thereby securing to the wearer the greatest comfort and the preservation of the shape. They are manufactured on scientific principles, guaranteeing perfect fitting, and giving ease of motion to the whole system. Their superior value to proportionment and their quality are due to a marvellous combination of Electricity, Spinal Health, Rheumatism, Paralysis, Neuralgia, Dyspepsia, Liver and Kidney troubles, Impaired Circulation, Constipation, and all other diseases peculiar to women, positively those of nervous habits. They also to relax, and constantly wear, equalizing organs in all cases of [illegible] Corsets or brassiere, by imparting to the system the required amount of "vitalic force" which Nature alone demands.

Below cuts are daily passing hands in the world the undoubtedly beneficial effects of Electro Magnetism, as prophylactic and scientifically applied to the human body in this manner; and it is also affirmed by prominent men that there is hardly a disease which Electricity as Dr. Scott's system will not benefit or cure, and all need not take our assertion for it, but prove the same. Ask your own physician!

DR. W. A. HAMMOND, of New York, late Surgeon-General of the U. S. Army, writes of Scott's Electric Corset: "I have witnessed most marvellous cures coming under my notice. Always using good, never harm. Have no hesitancy or compunction in recommending them. Ladies enjoying good health should also wear them, as they prevent as well as cure diseases."

Dr. Scott's Electric Corset or ordinary corsets are usually worn, a gentle and exhilarating influence is lovingly and agreeably perceptible, quickly accomplishing that good for which they are worn. They will never harm even in the most sensitive cases.

Ladies who have once tried them say they will wear no others. The prices are as follows: $1, $1.50, $2, and $3. The two latter kinds are made of beautiful English Satteen, and all in White and Drab only. Each corset is sent out in a handsome box, accompanied by a silver-plated corset steel, by which the wearer can test the influence of the Corsets can be tested. We will send either kind to any address, postpaid, on receipt of the price, with 10 cents added for packing, registration, etc., and guarantee safe delivery. Remit by P.O. Money Order, Draft, Check, or in Currency by Registered Letter.

In ordering, kindly mention this publication, and state exact size of Corset usually worn or where the size is not known, take a tight measurement of the waist over the linen. This can be done with a piece of common string, which send with your order. Make all remittances payable to AGENTS WANTED. GEO. A. SCOTT, 842 Broadway, N. Y.

Dr. Scott's Electric Hair Brush—new prices, $1, $1.50, $2, $2.50, and $3—sent, postpaid, on receipt of price.

FISHERMEN!

TWINE and NETTING

MANUFACTURED BY THE

BALTIMORE TWINE AND NET CO.

WM. J. HOOPER & SON,
No. 9 S. Calvert St., Baltimore, Md.

Send for [illegible] County and state
Please mention [illegible]

BIRD'S ARMLAGE—The Novelty. Has no strings to cut, just to weight. L. P. TURNER, 820 Broadway, N. Y.

MARLIN MAGAZINE RIFLE

45 Govt. and 40-60 Grain Cartridges. Very STRONG, PERFECTLY SAFE.

THE BEST RIFLE in the world for Large Game. Shooting more accurate, Model more beautiful, Manipulation easier, Finish finer, than that of any other rifle. MARLIN FIRE-ARMS CO. New Haven, Conn.

Round Writing

TAUGHT FOR EVENTS BY

BOOK OF INSTRUCTIONS & PENS

KEUPPEL & ESSER, New York.

THE BEST THE QUEBER WATCH CASE

HOW to Make $500 Yearly Profit with 12 Hens. 43 medals awarded. Invention Free. A. COBBETT, Warren Street, New York. Particulars sent free.

JOSEPH GILLOTTS
STEEL PENS

SOLD BY ALL DEALERS THROUGHOUT THE WORLD
GOLD MEDAL PARIS EXPOSITION—1878.

A TREATISE ON STOCK-BROKERS
AND STOCK-EXCHANGES.

A Treatise on the Law of Stock-Brokers and Stock Exchanges. By JOHN R. DOS PASSOS, of the New York Bar. 8vo, 1052 pages, Law Sheep, $5 00.

LAW CHAMBERS, NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE,
New York, 31st April, 1882.

JOHN R. DOS PASSOS, Esq.:

Dear Sir,—I have read with much care and interest your book on "Stock Brokers and Stock-Exchanges," and cannot refrain from expressing to you my appreciation of the excellence of the work. I shall not attempt to give an opinion or to its value from a strictly legal standpoint, inasmuch as I am not a lawyer; but I am greatly pleased with the extent and accuracy of the information concerning the history and customs of stock-exchanges, and the dealings of brokers. In view of the magnitude and importance of the interests involved, and the general lack of knowledge concerning them which has hitherto prevailed, I feel that you have conferred a favor both on brokers and the public by your intelligent and exhaustive labor.

Yours, very sincerely,
(Signed) HARVEY FISK, Chairman.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

Whatsoever of principle or precedent exists, whatsoever of lawful usage and custom has been established, in relation or stock-brokerage in transactions and remedies between broker and dealer in the city or elsewhere, will be found exhaustively stated and discussed by Mr. Dos Passos. No investor or speculator or banker or banker ought to transact his business affairs without owning and consulting this treatise.—N. Y. World.

Mr. Dos Passos has produced a valuable service to the legal profession, to the stock-brokers, and to the large circle of dealers at the stock-board by the complete and intelligent chart he has furnished to guide them in their always perilous operations.—Philadelphia Times.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the

EARL & WILSON'S
PATENT "SHORT BAND" COLLAR AND "BEAD-EDGE" CUFF
ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION

AGENTS Wanted.—[illegible] Catalogued specimens by [illegible]

ALLEGHENY COLLEGE LIBRARY.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XXVII.—No. 1370. NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 5, 1883 TEN CENTS A COPY $4 00 PER YEAR, IN ADVANCE.

Copyright, 1883, by Harper & Brothers.

IN THE PATH OF THE CYCLONE.—[See Page 279.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 5, 1883.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

AN OFFER TO YOUNG AMERICAN ARTISTS.

For the best original drawing to illustrate ALFRED DOBSON'S "Christmas Hymn"—the drawing to be suitable for publication in HARPER'S MAGAZINE, and to be the exclusive work of an American artist not over twenty-five years of age—MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS offer an award of THREE THOUSAND DOLLARS, upon the honorable understanding that the successful competitor shall use the same for the prosecution of art study in one or more of the best American schools, including also a sojourn abroad of at least six months for the study of the old masters. The award will be paid in such installments and at such times as shall best suit the convenience of the recipient for the purposes specified.

The drawings must be received by MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS *not later than August 1, 1883, addressed "Art Competition, Harper's Magazine, Franklin Square, New York", and each must be designated by an assumed name or motto, which should also be given, together with the real name, age, and residence of the artist, in a sealed envelope accompanying the drawings, and not to be opened until the result of the competition shall have been determined. The name of the successful competitor will not be publicly announced until the publication of the drawing.*

MR. R. SWAIN GIFFORD, N.A., MR. F. D. MILLET, A.N.A., and MR. CHARLES PARSONS, A.N.A., Superintendent of the Art Department, HARPER & BROTHERS, will act as judges of the competition.

It is intended to engrave the successful drawing on one page for HARPER'S MAGAZINE of December, 1883; and should other drawings submitted be found suitable, second, third, and fourth awards will be made, as follows: one page HARPER'S WEEKLY, $200; one page HARPER'S BAZAR, $200; one page HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, $100.

If the judges should decide that no one of the drawings is suitable, MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS reserve the right to extend the limit of time and reopen the competition.

Two Christmas Hymns by ALFRED DOBSON have been published. That published in 1877 is the one for the illustration of which artists are invited to compete, and a printed copy of it will be sent on application to

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

SETTING THE TUNE.

FOR a year or two before every Presidential election the Democratic managers engage in an animated controversy to decide what the party shall profess for the purposes of the election. But for more than twenty years it has uniformly taken the wrong position. In 1860, in obedience to its tradition and practice of many years, it presented itself as the friend of slavery. In 1864 it proclaimed an ignominious surrender to the rebellion, and nominated a Union soldier who had lost the confidence of Union men. In 1868 it asserted the unconstitutionality of reconstruction, and nominated an opponent of the war. In 1872 it shouted for shaking hands and forgetfulness, and nominated a Republican protectionist. In 1876 it professed reform in general, and nominated a Copperhead. In 1880 it pronounced for a revenue tariff, and nominated a brave soldier, who knocked over the revenue plank with one hand and gave the other to the paper-money charlatans. It has left no "cry" or "dodge" untried. But with every fresh effort it has only shown that as a party it represented nothing whatever but a desperate desire for place and patronage. Even in the midst of the extraordinary result of the election last autumn, when the Republicans were everywhere defeated, nobody acknowledged more fully and frankly than leading Democrats that it was not a Democratic triumph, but merely Republican discontent.

The contest over the profession which the party should make in 1884 has already begun, and is already very warm. It will be practically decided, before the Convention meets, by the election of Speaker next December. If Mr. RANDALL should be elected Speaker, the Democratic Convention would evade the question of protection, and it would probably select Mr. RANDALL as the candidate for the Presidency. Should he be defeated as Speaker, the Convention would pronounce strongly for something which would be generally interpreted as free trade, and the party would lose the active and efficient support of the RANDALL element, while the Republican platform would be so drawn as not to exclude men of Mr. RANDALL'S views. The defeat of Mr. RANDALL as Speaker, after the contest which is now raging solely upon his tariff views, and which will be very thorough by the time that Congress meets, would be fairly interpreted as conclusive evidence that the Democratic party does not hold the views for which he stands; and as he is but a moderate protectionist, his defeat would be held to foreshow a free-trade policy in the event of Democratic success in 1884.

This view is rejected by many of the free-trade Democrats upon the ground that the phrase free trade is improperly applied to their position, which is that of tariff revision in the interest of revenue instead of protection. Nobody, they allege, in the actual situation is for free trade, because vested interests and established industries must be considered. Here, however, is the weakness of the anti-RANDALL Democratic view. An open declaration for free trade, if combined with an honest demand for civil service reform, would dissolve the Democratic party, and probably lead to party reorganization. But the present Democratic party, which is hostile to civil service reform, and which is profoundly distrusted for many reasons, could not renounce the free trade cry, and demand merely tariff revision in the interest of revenue and with careful regard to established interests, without provoking the immediate rejoinder of all independent free-traders that for such results, in view of the character and career of the Democratic party, they preferred to trust the Republican party. A new party might entice such voters. But, after the contest which is now proceeding within the Democratic party, they would no more expect a wise revenue policy from it than they would expect administrative reform. There would be a profound conviction that "somebody was to be cheated." Policies make parties, not parties policies.

MAYOR EDSON'S APPEAL.

MAYOR EDSON'S plain and vigorous appeal to the intelligent citizens of New York to save the building of the aqueduct from degenerating into a mere job for the benefit of disreputable politicians is a summons which deserves the cordial response of all honest citizens. Whatever mistakes the Mayor may have committed—and we have not hesitated to comment upon them—his present movement is indicative of a courage and a perception which are in the highest degree admirable.

He says plainly that an effort is making to change the wise safeguards of the bill by those who desire to control for their own selfish purposes the vast power which the Aqueduct Bill confers, and that the conspiracy will succeed unless the citizens of New York protest in the most emphatic and resolute manner. The work of building a new aqueduct is one which necessarily involves the outlay of an immense sum of money, and men who make a mercenary trade of politics will fight desperately to obtain for themselves the handling of the money. They would not hesitate to double the indispensable expense, and to make a work which might reasonably cost twenty millions of dollars cost forty millions, to be paid by the people of this city.

It is well for those who do not pay taxes directly to remember that they do pay them indirectly in higher rents and prices. It is the great body of the community whom the political jobbers and swindlers swindle while they pretend that only tax-payers suffer. The money stolen by the TWEED Ring came at last out of the pockets of poor men equally with those of rich men. The Mayor's appeal is to no party or class except that of the honest citizens, and we presume that by the time these words are printed they will have moved in response to his warning.

CRIMINAL CONSPIRACY.

THE questions of extradition and of repressing criminal conspiracy are very different. When the London Standard suggests that we should "extend our extradition laws so as to include Dynamite bravos," it forgets that the extradition treaty concerns only the surrender of persons accused of overt acts, under evidence which would hold them for trial in this country. The question of punishing "Dynamite bravos" is the question whether a conspiracy in this country to commit crime elsewhere shall be made penal. The Standard, we apprehend, is mistaken in saying that such a conspiracy is forbidden by English law, because JACOB THOMPSON and his confederates in Canada plotted to commit crime in New York and elsewhere during the rebellion, and were not molested by English law; and Lord PALMERSTON was defeated in a proposition to make conspiracy to murder a felony, although Mr. GLADSTONE, who opposed the project, demanded that the existing law should be amended if it were found necessary. The fact that the United States were at war when THOMPSON and BENJAMIN conspired did not justify English inaction, if there was a law to restrain such conspiracies, because a plot to infect cities with pestilence, and to poison and burn enemies, could not be regarded as lawful acts of war.

It is not, however, a question of precedent, but of public expediency and comity. Ought the United States to prevent conspiracies within their jurisdiction to commit crime elsewhere? If there are Dynamite plots and plotters in this country looking to the destruction of life and property in England, there being no lawfully recognized state of war, ought they to be tolerated? If it were known that a knot of men in New York had contrived a torpedo which was to be taken to the Mediterranean and attached to any English ship for the purpose of destroying it and all its company, in order that Parliament might be terrorized into passing certain laws which the plotters professed to desire, would the Government of the United States look on quietly, under the plea that political refugees must not be touched, or that its own citizens—supposing them to be such—had committed no offense? If a naturalized Irishman in New York arranges with accomplices in England to murder Englishmen because he disapproves the course of the British Government, is he to be regarded as engaged in a legitimate political movement, and to escape scot-free while his agent is hung? And if so, why? What would prevent any such crime plotted in this country from being cloaked as a political movement?

It is a puerile pretext that to plot the destruction of innocent persons in England is an act of war upon the part of Ireland. England is not at war with Ireland, and no authorized body of Irishmen has declared that, in the inability of Ireland to organize armies and warlike operations, every kind of violence against Englishmen is justifiable. On the contrary, the most eminent and trusted of the Irish leaders disclaim any such view. The question, therefore, whether American law should permit crime to be organized here to be committed beyond its reach answers itself. Our position should be that of Mr. GLADSTONE in the PALMERSTON debate: "Let the existing law be vindicated, and then proceed to amend it if found necessary." The man who is detected in printing counterfeit notes is amenable to the law whether he has uttered them or not. The man who abuses his asylum or his citizenship in this country to procure the commission of nefarious crimes, not legitimate acts of hostility, elsewhere, should be summarily dealt with by our own law. This is undoubtedly the best American opinion, and there is no question that it is the opinion also of intelligent and honorable Irishmen in this country.

A SURPRISE AND A DISAPPOINTMENT.

THE Chief Examinership under the Civil Service Commission is a very important place, because the incumbent is really the executive officer of the Commission. He acts under its control, indeed, but he has great opportunities, and can largely mould the whole work. If the President had offered the place to Mr. BURT in a manner which would have enabled him to accept it with proper self-respect and without betraying the reform—as we have already explained—he could not have declined the position. But under the circumstances he could not honorably have accepted. That he was singularly fitted for the post was universally conceded. To great administrative ability and urbanity he adds profound confidence and long experience in the reformed system, with the reason and methods and details of which he is fully acquainted. Some such man is indispensable in the position. The selection of any examiner-in-chief who is not fully identified with the reformed system by conviction and sympathy must necessarily affect unfavorably the public impression of the good faith with which the work is to be undertaken.

The appointment has been awaited with great interest and with great hope, as it was known that the President would be governed largely by the preference of the Commissioners, and the result, due to their recommendation, is a serious disappointment. The gentleman selected to be Chief Examiner is Mr. DUDLEY RANDOLPH KEIM, of Pennsylvania, a gentleman well known in Washington, but who is wholly unknown anywhere as a friend of reform. What is said in explanation of his appointment is not re-assuring. That he has knowledge of men is vague praise, and that he is familiar with the work of the Departments is a recommendation of all the professional politicians at the capital. We know that in making such appointments many things must be considered, and many concessions must be made. But whatever these may be, and however pressing, one thing is absolutely indispensable at the outset of this new movement upon the part of all concerned, and that is hearty faith and interest in the necessity and practicability of reform. It is evident that if Mr. KEIM had been nominated as a Commissioner instead of Mr. EATON, the selection would necessarily have impeached the good faith of the President. In the same way his selection by the Commission as Chief Examiner is inexplicable, because it lacks the primary and vital qualification.

The new Examiner is not known to have convictions or knowledge or experience to fit him for the duties of the place. It was not impossible, however, to find those who combined all these qualities, and a selection from among them would have been the most satisfactory earnest to the country of a simple resolution to carry out the law in its spirit—the only way in which it can be made effective. It will be a cause of sincere regret if the selection shall prove to have been intended as a stroke of miscalled "diplomacy"—a choice made to conciliate the politicians. Half-way reform in the civil service is impossible. It is like a scheme of modified slavery or limited gambling. Modified slavery is slavery, and gambling is not less gambling because it is limited. "Influence" and favoritism and personal patronage can not be blended with selection by proved merit or, as in this case, by obvious and known fitness. The President, so far as appears, left the selection to the Commission, which is therefore really responsible for it. The Commission certainly will not doubt the disposition of every Reform Association and every individual reformer in the country to co-operate with it in the most friendly manner. But as the National League did not hesitate to criticise and censure certain acts of the President which it thought prejudicial to the cause, every friend of reform must frankly criticise and condemn whatever appears to be similar injury to the cause upon the part of the Commission.

OUR LOST STREETS.

A CITY without streets is only a little less absurd than a city without houses. Yet New York is in a fair way to be deprived of her streets, so far as their usefulness for the original purposes of streets is concerned. The surface and the elevated railroads, the telegraph, the steam-heating, and the electric-lighting companies, and the men who never cease to dig up the pavements on the pretense of laying gas, water, and sewer pipes, have done their best to make our streets not only useless, but dangerous. If we do not fall into sewer excavations, we are liable to be blown up by exploding steam-pipes, crushed by the fall of telegraph poles, or cut to pieces by railway cars; and traffic is interrupted by the sappers and miners who are constantly digging pitfalls for horses and vehicles.

Not content with having taken most of our avenues and important cross-streets from us, the municipal marauders are now trying to dig up Broadway, apparently with the view of carting it away to Harlem flats as elsewhere. The promoters of the Arcade railroad scheme propose first to convert Broadway into a deep trench, and then to cover it with a roof at the level of the present pavement, to be used by vehicles and pedestrians, as the pavement is now used. Thus we shall have a surface Broadway and a subterranean Broadway—the latter to be used by railways, and to contain gas, water, and sewer pipes, as well as electric wires and steam-pipes. Could the work be done in a single night it might be regarded as a benefit to the city, but as it will take months and probably years to blast a vast trench out of the solid rock and to cover it in accordance with the Arcade plan, of what possible use will Broadway be either to shop-keepers or to the general public while the work is in progress? It is true that the promoters of the Arcade scheme profess to have invented a plan by which the work of excavating and covering Broadway can be done without the slightest interruption to traffic. Perhaps they are sincere; but hitherto no method of digging the earth from underneath the feet of horses and of men without attracting their attention and putting them to more or less inconvenience has been devised.

If our streets are to be entirely taken away from us, we might as well accept our fate and try to provide ourselves with some tolerable substitute for streets. We might, for example, cut passages through the centre of each block for the use of pedestrians only. On these passages the shops and the front doors of dwelling houses and public buildings could be placed, while the present so-called streets could be wholly given up to the corporate brigands. Or we might take a hint from the elevated railroad companies and provide ourselves with aerial streets, laid out on the roofs of houses, and provided with bridges between every two adjacent blocks. Surely our condition is a pitiable one. New York is popularly supposed to possess some measure of self-government and some of the privileges of freedom; but the people of the cities of monarchical Europe and despotic Asia have one great advantage over us—their streets have never yet been taken from them either by legal trickery or by bold and reckless robbery.

ANOTHER WISE APPOINTMENT.

GOVERNOR CLEVELAND was warmly and generally commended last week, except by mere politicians, for the appointment of the Deputy Superintendent of Insurance to succeed the late Superintendent. President ARTHUR has shown the same loyalty to sound principles in appointing Mr ARTHUR MASON, an accomplished expert in the Assay Office at New York, to succeed Mr VAN WYCK, the late Superintendent. Mr MASON is not an active politician, and is conceded to be peculiarly fitted for the position.

The universal satisfaction with which such appointments are received shows how deep and strong is the public feeling that places in the civil service should be filled by those who are proved to be competent, and not by the mere parasites of politicians. The reasons for such appointments as those of Mr MCCALL and Mr MASON are equally applicable to selections for other positions which require either special knowledge as only intelligence, business habits, diligence, and integrity. The latter qualities can never be assumed to exist in persons who are appointed as a reward of political activity of a very questionable kind.

Promotions, indeed, should depend very largely upon meritorious service. The object of formal examinations and probations is to ascertain fitness which actual service demonstrates, and when admission to the service is regulated so as to baffle personal influence and intrigue, promotions should be determined chiefly by actual conduct. This is the view held by the Reform Associations, and it is that which the President and the Governor in the two signal instances mentioned have put into practice.

AUSTIN DOBSON'S "FIELDING."

THE charming lecture upon FIELDING which THACKERAY—whom Mr DOBSON calls FIELDING'S "literary descendant"—delivered thirty years ago revived that interest in the great novelist which has never since flagged. There is very much in sympathy between the two men and writers. Of both the word comely, in its richest and fullest sense, is most descriptive, and the younger author's tribute to the older is one of the heartiest and most touching in literature.

Those who are familiar with the verse and prose of AUSTIN DOBSON will feel at once his fitness to be the biographer of FIELDING, and in the latest issue of the "English Men of Letters," which the HARPERS have just published, he has told the simple story with a fine appreciation and gentleness of tone which are very delightful. He enters into no elaborate criticism; but there is no more sagacious account of all FIELDING'S works, with a shrewd and sympathetic commentary, and a general estimate of his powers which is no more generous than just.

SCOTT called him the father of the English novel, and he still remains one of the sturdiest and strongest figures in English literary history. The undoubted fact that the time mirror which he held up to nature reveals much that modern taste and manners do not tolerate does not affect the honest purpose of his work, nor the comprehensive, sweet, and kindly humanity of his genius. At its best—and by his best must every man be judged—it was a healthy and corrective power, in its joyous rouge like that of CHAUCER, and in no naught even Shakespearean. Mr DOBSON has made an exceedingly interesting addition to this notable series, which is the most valuable collection of complete and satisfactory literary biographies. In no other way so handy, concisely, and adequately as in this series can the literary history of England be studied. Each neat and convenient volume contains the life of a conspicuous author, based upon all the biographies and all modern information and annotation. The collection is a very valuable and most delightful household literary library.

A WISE WOMAN.

A WASHINGTON correspondent of the Tribune reports a conversation with a very sensible woman in the government service, and some of her observations have a general application. The "practical woman," as the correspondent well describes her, says that she anticipates from the reformed system the appointment and advancement of capable women in the service, and the prevention of the appointment of incompetent women by mere influence. This kind of appointment has long been one of the scandals of the public service. The odium of the inefficiency of such women, as this shrewd observer truly says, falls upon all women in the service, "for men judge themselves as individuals, and women as a class." That is a very significant remark. If a man is a useless clerk, intemperate, an idler, or ignorant, he is as much a nuisance and loss in the office as a woman of the same kind. But, says our critic, "you never hear the remark, 'He is a great mistake to appoint men to these places.'" Yet why not generalize in the one case as in the other? If an incompetent woman proves that women should not be employed in an office, why does not an incompetent man prove that men should not be employed?

The same wise observer, who has been eighteen years in the service, thinks that it is an unfair discrimination against women to assume their inability to fill any but the lowest places, and to grant them peculiar privileges. The head of a bureau permits women to do as they please, and then grumbles that they are less efficient clerks than men. She anticipates fair play for women under the new rules, and she says, undoubtedly with truth, that there are no better clerks in the Treasury Department to-day than women who were appointed and promoted under the original rules in 1872-3.

BRYANT'S POEMS.

WITH Mr GODWIN'S Life of Bryant, of which we recently spoke, was issued by the APPLETONS the final and complete collection of BRYANT'S poetry, in two beautiful volumes uniform with the Life, and the series will be completed by two more volumes, one of orations and addresses, and one of sketches of travel. The volumes now published are exceedingly handsome books, the usual unglazed paper, broad page, and black, legible type giving a dignity of aspect befitting the grave and vigorous verse. This will of course remain the permanent library edition of BRYANT'S poems, including some thirty or more which were never before published. The simplicity of his verse, its total freedom from mere literary artifice or fashion, its truthfully personal Americanism, and its natural feeling of nature, will give it a permanent place in literature. It is always cool, observant, reflective, sometimes deepening into solemn feeling, but never kindling into passion or ecstasy. But this sobriety of tone is in itself a charm.

Mr GODWIN'S duties as editor are admirably done. He has wisely given the date of every poem, and the place in which it was written, and he has supplied whatever notes were necessary. We have already spoken of the delightful and delicate biography, and we have to add only that in his biographer and editor Mr BRYANT is singularly fortunate.

PERSONAL.

MR HENRY HUNTOON has been so successful in securing orders for portraits that it is said he will return to England with fifty thousand dollars of American money in his pockets.

—That enterprising place of operation, the boot blacks, are cutting rates. One of them greeted a pedestrian the other day with the cry, "Shine, sir?—three cents." Five years ago the offer to do the business for five cents was considered especially condescending.

—Amateur stock raising is sometimes profitable. Three gentlemen in a New Jersey suburb ten months ago paid nine thousand dollars for a bull calf six weeks old. He was a nice little beast, sired by Duke of Darlington, whose dam, Evelyn, was the distinction of making 778 pounds of butter in eleven months and six days in 1879-80, and he had solid color, a fine yellow skin, a fleet-chaps escutcheon, and full black points—black tongue, black muzzle, and black switch. To-day the handsome and spirited brute is worth four thousand dollars, as my nothing of the pleasure his owners have had in watching his rise and progress.

—"If you said to see something picturesque," said a painter to a friend the other day, "come to my studio, and look at an aged derelict dressed in a pair of old blue army trousers with a patch of red flannel on the seat. The color scheme is superb."

—"Were I an artist," remarked a man of letters to a painter, "I should never read a line of criticism on my pictures, and should pitch anybody out of my studio who repeated anything of the kind he had seen. I should ask some of my most capable professional friends for their candid criticism when I was finishing a painting, and then should follow one on my own bent. The brutality and contradictions of most of the current printed art criticisms irritate and discourage artists without helping them."

—A Western newspaper, discussing the drama of Romeo and Juliet, observes, very judiciously, that though "Juliet is much exalted by the critics as a display of young love, she is not commendable as an example to girls' seminaries."

—Mr James Orrin Mendenhall has been reading a paper before the Browning Society, of London, on "Browning's Poems on God and Immortality as bearing on Life Here." Though Browning has been called a preacher, he is, says Mr MENDENHALL, a singer more than a preacher or teacher. The God of BROWNING'S poetry may be regarded as, on the whole, of a very lofty type. This poet avoids God infinitely above the best and noblest of men; whereas, in popular speech, God is too often degraded below them. And so for the doctrine of immortality, this is what we find: there needs another life to remedy and atone for the evils and miseries of this. If there be not another, this deserves to be hurled back with scorn as "a poor shock, a wretched failure."

—The Astor Library, under Mr LITTLE'S superintendency, is running very smoothly. Courtesy and complaisancy characterize the assistants who fill orders for books, while the alcoves reserved for scholars in pursuit of special information are as quiet and inviting as the contents of their well-stocked shelves. During the last four years no damage has been done to a book by an alcove reader, and no book has disappeared.

—Whatever may be said of CARLYLE'S treatment of his wife, the philosopher was affectionate enough toward RALPH WALDO EMERSON. "It is indubitable," he wrote to the latter, "I love you very well, and have long done and mean to do. Deep as is my dissent from your Gymnosophist view of heaven and earth, I find an agreement that enables up all conceivable dissents. In the whole world I hardly get, to my spoken human word, any other word of response which is authentically human."

—In the diary of RICHARD COCKS, an English merchant in Japan in the year 1615, we read how that country impressed a one of Britain two hundred and fifty years ago, especially how the pagodas (which he calls "pegoda") took his fancy. He "found houses scattered here and there in pleasant valles betwixt divers mountains a hasts are divers pagoda very sumptuous," and he "did never see such pleasant walkes among pyne and spruce trees as there are about those pagoda."

—Referring to Mr. H. M. STANLEY'S peaceful occupation, by permission and purchase, of a tract of African soil, a correspondent notes that one of the ideas most firmly fixed in the African brain—the brain of the settled Africans of the interior of the continent, who are not savages—is the non-alienability of the soil. Africans freely allow the stranger to locate among them, to work land, and to build as he please. But they hold the grant to be a personal concession, and when the grantee dies his successors is expected to pay succession duties—in other words, to repurchase.

—A Frenchman has written a book describing the curious proposals of marriage made to Queen ELIZABETH, and the environment of them. He quotes from a French ambassador of her day who wrote: "The said lady [ELIZABETH] thinks it expedient always to have some one on the hook. She is convinced that all the princes of Christendom who are in a position to marry are aspiring for her hand, and that the slightest suggestion is enough to bring them incontinently to her feet."

—Mr W. H. GIBSON'S Highways and Byways; or, Sauntrings in New England, published by the HARPERS, is reviewed con amore by the Athenæum: "The letterpress of this handsomely printed volume shows an unconfortable degree of rustical liveliness, much intelligence, and keen observation of nature in landscape and animal life. Every one who has admired—and very few have failed to that respect—the executed term 'American mode of engraving on wood, which is peculiarly meaningless, should possess himself of the book, for the sake of the soft and delicate cuts which enrich its pages with the charm of finish, breadth, and beautiful draughtsmanship.... The book is a superb example of its kind, a treasury of modern taste, skill, and graceful humor, fun superior to the foreign rumour, Pastoral Days, by the same author and publishers."

—It rained hard at Urbino on the 29th of March, the fourth centenary of RAPHAEL, and the priests who had assembled from Paris, Vienna, Copenhagen, and the principal Italian cities to honor the memory of their great predecessor were compelled to defer until the next day their visit to his house. In the Ducal Palace a great crowd assembled, and listened to speeches. Upon some modern painters—MUSSORGSKY, ZAMACOIS, FORTUNY, and their followers, for example—RAPHAEL'S influence is or was almost nothing.

—The story of the sufferings undergone at Warsaw by Mr SAYOUR'S daughter and the other girls who accompanied her will, says an English journalist, cause young women to be very cautious in accepting proposals for theatrical engagements on the Continent. There was here no conspiracy to entrap young girls for wrongful purposes. The London agent of the Berlin manager appears to have been a respectable man anxious to do his best both for manager and engaged. Mr SAYOUR'S experience teaches that where such personal precaution is taken a totally different character from that which they have represented it as is very difficult for a girl, who once has left her native country, to extricate herself from the web which has been woven around her.

—M. PICARD, who bought the ruins of the Palace of the Tuileries for fifteen francs, is not likely to make anything out of the contract. He has been digging up and removing the debris ever since the 1st of January, and must finish the job by the 1st of August. It is not yet decided what shall be done with the site of the old palace.

—"With all his merit and distinction as a novelist, Mr HOWELLS generally presents us," remarks a London reviewer, "with the heroes and heroines about on decent

> "'Each casual stone on which she trod
> But not suppose a pearl—
> Nay, it is not a little odd
> How I dislike said girl.'"

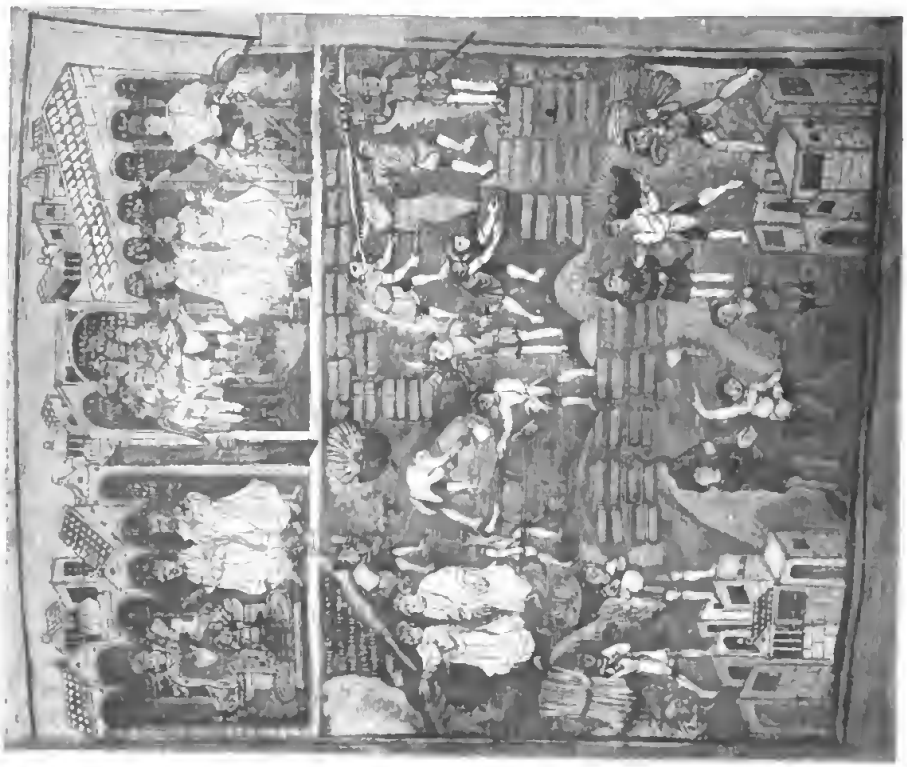
—A late reviewer suggests that the familiar nursery story of Old Mother Hubbard and her dog is derived from the legend of St Hubert, the patron saint of dogs. The derivation commonly accepted for the surname Hubbard is that it is from Hubert. The title "Mother" may have been given in a contemptuous sense, just as we style a certain kind of man an "old woman." Mother Hubbard as a good old soul, but in all her coarse assistive and efforts quite futile. Her dog is none the better for her patronage. And so possibly in her person the saint himself may be derided, the current version of "Old Mother Hubbard" being a sort of parody of the old saint legend, composed when the belief in the saints and their powers was dying out.

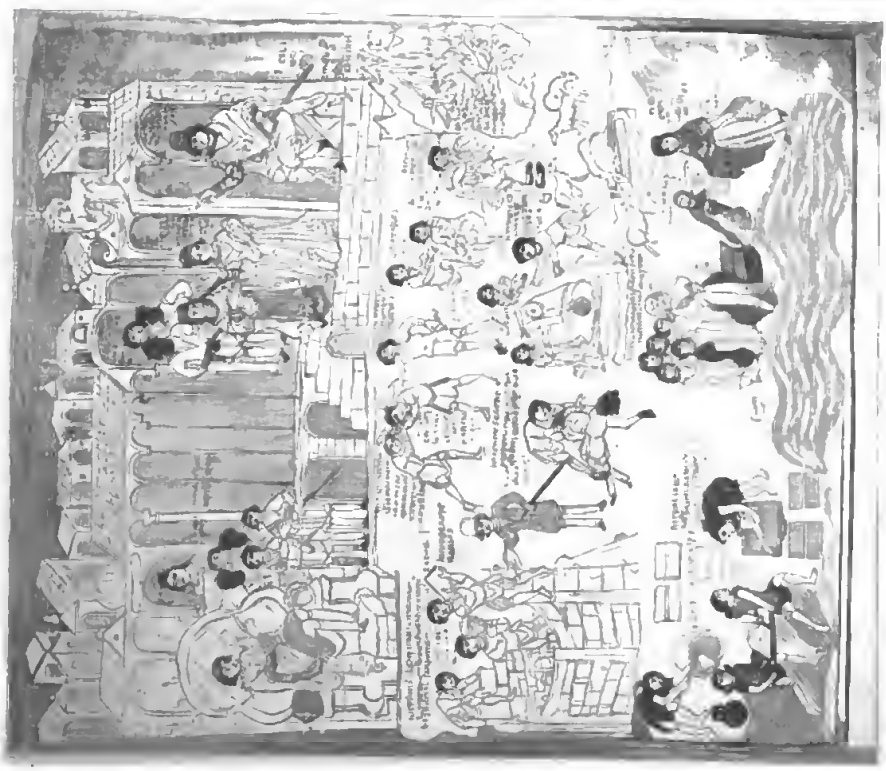
—King HENRY VIII of Italy, who is troubled by shyness, said once to a friend: "To me one of the most terrible things in the world is to have to meet strangers; and just see, my lot in life compels me to do so constantly."

—Mr HAMERTON PEARSON, while trying to set one of his critics straight, lays down the following doctrine: "Though it is impossible for correction to overtake error on all the roads it takes, it may overtake it on a few of its roads, and it seems in some cases needful to point out the error, lest silence should be construed into assent. Especially it seems needful when the error is a gross one, and repetition of it seriously mischievous."

—"The intelligent foreigner," observes the Saturday Review, "has two types of British female around which he [illegible] his colosseum to play freely. One is that of the 'blonde'—the lass 'a lovely lide,' as Mr DE MAUSSIN'S German lady says—a lovely lide, 'so exquisite complexion.' She is blonde and passionate, but she is shy and difficult of access. Scarcely she plays for Alphonse, but when introduced to him, she shrinks from his conquering glances. Her conversation consists of the words, 'Oh yes.' The other baneful conception of an Englishwoman is mainly surrounded by the romance of a detective in one of M. ZOLA'S or HOUSSAYE'S charming romances. She is red-haired, has a pert, long teeth, and enormous feet—she must be an Englishwoman. The long projecting teeth and the sharp ringlets of the British fair are known to us in all French caricatures. Some of our countrywomen have, let us admit, very long teeth. The possession of this charm sometimes gave an advantage to literal [illegible] and ideas about deceased wife's sister and female suffrage.

Digitized by Google





PICTURES FROM THE ASHBURNHAM MS. PENTATEUCH.

THE ASHBURNHAM PENTATEUCH.

Among the MSS. of the Ashburnham Collection which have been offered to the Trustees of the British Museum, one of the most ancient, and at the same time most curious, is the famous Pentateuch. This volume, which, however, is very imperfect, forms a large quarto, and was executed in Italy in the seventh century. From internal evidence it appears to have been removed, as early as the beginning of the tenth century, into France, where it passed into possession of the cathedral church of Tours, and remained there till quite a recent date. The text is in Latin of St. Jerome's version, and is accompanied by a series of large illustrative paintings, the greater number of which refer to Bible history, as told in the Books of Genesis and Exodus. Executed in Italy, these paintings give most interesting and valuable details of the architecture, the costumes, and the domestic manners and customs of that country at that early period. They may in composition be reproductions of still earlier paintings; but the artist assuredly followed the usual practice of representing his figures and buildings and other details as he saw them in every-day life around him, and only for the more sacred characters, such as Moses and Aaron, is the traditional costume retained. We give two of the pictures.

The first picture carries us through the story of the first three chapters of Exodus. In the upper portion stand the buildings of the royal city, the front being occupied by the palace of Pharaoh, in the interior of which two scenes are depicted. On the left the king, seated in state on a cushioned throne, gives orders to his servants for the oppression of the children of Israel. Above his head a half-defaced inscription, which, like others in the volume, is rendered still more indistinct by having been written twice, explains that "Hic Farao rex dicit servis suis, Opprimamus filii Israel operibus ut non multiplicentur" ("Here saith Pharaoh unto his servants, Let the children of Israel be afflicted with tasks, that they multiply not"), or, as our version has it, "Let us deal wisely with them, lest they multiply." In front of him his servants, two of whom are black, stand ready to obey his commands: "Hic servi faciunt preceptum regis" ("Here the servants do the king's bidding"). Above them, in the part of the building surmounted by the cupola, is seen the head of the queen, "regina." The group on the right represents the scene between Pharaoh and the midwives. Here the king wears a tall hat, and is girt with his sword. The remains of the inscription above suffice to show that he is upbraiding Shiphrah and Puah for disobedience in saving the male children of the Israelites; and they are excusing themselves, as explained in the words, "Obstetrices dicunt, Non sumus sicut Egyptie mulieres" ("The midwives say, We are not as the Egyptian women"). Behind them are the servants who have brought them before the king. "Hic servi obstetrices perducunt Faraoni" ("Here the servants bring the midwives to Pharaoh").

Now, taking the lower portion of the picture, we see, on the left, the children of Israel at their tasks. Below, they are making bricks, sacking the clay, carrying it, and kneading it into the form: "Hic filii Israel operantur operibus et faciunt lateres" ("Here the children of Israel are afflicted with tasks and make bricks"). Above, a group is engaged at a walled city. We are told in our version that "they built for Pharaoh treasure cities, Pithom and Raamses," and, with variations in the names, the inscription here announces how "Hic filii Israel edificant civitatem Lampiton et Rameses ad preceptum Faraonis" ("Here the children of Israel build the city of Lampiton and Rameses at the bidding of Pharaoh"). The task-master, "Hic superpositarius" ("Here the foreman"), stands by, dressed in a very modern looking garb, consisting of trousers, frock-coat, and tall hat.

The rest of the picture is composed of scenes from the life of Moses. The finding of the child is represented at the foot. On the bank of the river, "fluvius," Nile, stands Pharaoh's daughter with her attendant maidens, and orders the little foundling, just rescued from the ark of rushes, to be cared for: "Ille filia Faraonis precepit nutriri sibi Mosen" ("Here the daughter of Pharaoh ordereth Moses to be nursed for her"). The little sister, "soror Moysis," hands the infant "Moyses" to the mother "mater Moysis." Above, in the middle of the picture, Moses is seen burying the body of the Egyptian whom he has slain. "Hic Moses obtit Egyptium in arena quem occidit de calce" ("Here Moses looketh in the sand the Egyptian whom he slew"); and again, above this, the two Israelites are seen fighting and Moses interfering, with inscriptions "Hic ubi rixant filii Israel, et dicit Moyses, Quare rixatis" ("Here is where children of Israel strive together, and Moses saith, Wherefore do ye strive?"), and "Hic Moyses dicit, Quare rixatis" ("Here saith Moses, Wherefore do ye strive?"). The scene is then transferred to the Land of Midian, where the daughters of Jethro, "filie Jetro," stand at the well, and their sheep are watered by the fugitive: "Hic Moyses adiuvat eum Jetro" ("Here Moses succoureth the sheep of Jethro"); while above are seated two of their enemies, the shepherds, "pastores." And lastly, on the right, is the burning bush, with the hand of God issuing from it: "Hic vocat eum Dominus de rubo dicens, Moyses, Moyses" ("Here the Lord calleth unto him out of the bush, saying, Moses, Moses"); and in front of it is Moses, who has laid aside his shoes, and is covering his face with his hands: "Hic Moyses abscondit faciem suam" ("Here Moses hideth his face").

The second picture contains fewer subjects. In the upper portion, on the left, Moses and Aaron appear before Pharaoh, on the right, they again stand in the presence, accompanied by the officers of the children of Israel, whose complaint is contained in the inscription above them: "Filii Israel clamant ad Faraonem, Quare sic agis cum servis tuis" ("The children of Israel cry unto Pharaoh, Wherefore dealest thou thus with thy servants?"). Below are the Israelites making bricks, bringing in stubble, the substitute for straw, and directed and beaten by their task-masters. The cities of Pithom and Raamses occupy the two lower corners. On the left, Moses and Aaron appeal to the Almighty, whose presence is indicated by a hand issuing from a cloud: "Moyses et Aaron dicunt Domino, Quare non liberas populum tuum" ("Moses and Aaron say unto the Lord, Wherefore deliverest thou not thy people?").

Digitized by Google

MARKET-DAY IN A SOUTHERN CITY.

In the "Black Belt" of Florida, where the colored voters outnumber the white three to one, and which includes the town of Tallahassee, every Saturday is a market-day and a holiday for the plantation negroes, who flock to town to spend money if they have it, or, if they have none, to sell a little cotton, a little wood, or a little truck, and thus obtain some, which will most certainly be expended before they turn their faces homeward. And the prices that they pay for the few third or fourth rate articles of necessity or luxury that find their way into the homeward-bound wagons! One hundred per cent of profit is moderate, and satisfies but few of the merchants, who depend for their business almost entirely upon the black and the poor white trade.

But, overreached or not, the Tallahassee negro rarely allows business trifles to interfere with his full and hearty enjoyment of a Saturday market-day. On that day the scene presented in Tallahassee streets is indeed animated and full of interest. From early morning until high noon the darkies pour into the town over its several avenues of approach—the Augustine road, the Miccosukee road, the Meridian road, the Wakulla road, the Thomasville road, and several other roads, whose names denote their termini. Some walk, but the majority ride on horseback, mule back, and even ox back, and in wheeled vehicles which for novelty and ingenuity of construction would shame the cart of a Yankee peddler. Relics of the faded glory of the past in the shape of ancient buggies or chaises, only held together by innumerable bits of rope, with frayed ends giving a peculiarly [illegible] look to the structure, and drawn by wheezing spavined animals whose ears proclaim them to be mules, mingle with [illegible] of the [illegible] poverty of the present, represented by carts with bodies and shafts roughly hewn from slabs [illegible] and mounted on wheels which [illegible]. Most of these are drawn by single [illegible] to the shafts by [illegible] harness [illegible]. Where teams of burden and draught [illegible] half-grown steers and heifers must be [illegible] seem strange that the [illegible] and why, that [illegible] it be only because they [illegible] "high [illegible]"

Amid the motley throngs flocking to the town the old slaves are distinguished by the respectful manner with which they touch their hats to the white men whom they meet, while those of the present generation pass by with an independence of carriage that almost amounts to rudeness. Among the lines of vehicles may be seen every now and then a fairly good pair of mules attached to a substantial wagon laden with the family of some comparatively well-to-do negro farmer. The young women, buxom, smiling, brave in gaudy finery, and often beguiling the tedium of the way with the music of a harmonica, or mouth-organ, which is most popular with the negroes, occupy hide-bottomed chairs, and exchange good-natured banter with the occupants of other carts. Over the sides of the wagon peer the comical faces of the pickaninnies, and on bunches of corn-stalk fodder in the corners sit the old aunties smoking pipes and wearing gay bandana turbans.

When the main street of the city is reached the wagon and team are left, generally at the side of the street, but very often in its middle, to take care of themselves, and the family scatters, the men going to the cotton market or the bar-rooms, and the women and children to the stores. Here they handle and price every article within reach, and cause much vexation of spirit to the white clerks who are forced to wait upon them and answer their innumerable questions. Meantime the throngs in the streets increase until the sidewalks and stores are packed with a mass of black humanity, independent, conscious of their own importance, noisy, good-natured, [illegible] but rarely boisterous or quarrelsome, and [illegible] to their [illegible] with a [illegible] that the few whites whose business calls them into the town [illegible] prefer [illegible]

[illegible]ed, not only by the would-be purchaser, but by a group of interested friends, who tender much advice and indulge freely in comment. When finally bought, the article is unwrapped a dozen times to be shown to as many friends on the street, and each of these passes judgment upon its texture, price, and other qualities, until, reduced to a state of despair, nine times out of ten, the purchaser returns to the store and makes a vain effort to have it exchanged for something else.

Disappointments of this kind are, however, quickly forgotten amid the various attractions and divertisements of the street. Most of these are so simple that one is astonished that they can attract the attention of even a plantation negro. A group of grown men and women will gather about a child with a jumping-jack, and laugh immoderately at the movements of the toy as long as the child continues to pull the animating string; then it is passed from one to another, and regarded as a most cunning device and triumph of mechanical skill. The vendor of a [illegible] drives his gaudily decorated wagon through the [illegible], stopping at a corner [illegible] a negro melody [illegible] refrain, and [illegible]

Itinerant Players

THE MARKET-PLACE.

Digitized by Google

ground. Everybody eats, but where and how they eat are matters of little consequence so long as the simple fact remains. They climb into carts, sit on the edge of sidewalks, gather under the shade trees, or loaf at the corners of buildings—standing, sitting, squatting, or lying down—but all mating what they have brought from home with them, or what they have procured from the restaurants established for their especial benefit. These restaurants are comical affairs, most of them being the rudest of tables, built of slats or packing boxes under live-oak shade trees. Near by burn the fires over which fish is fried and coffee boiled, and the guests eat or drink while standing or wandering about in the immediate vicinity. Occasionally one more pretentious than the rest is opened in a rude shanty, built of such waste material as has been gathered from the wreck of old houses, or refuse lumber picked up about the streets.

The most elegant colored restaurant of Tallahassee is that of Paul Scott. It stands in the middle of an unoccupied square, and is built of great sheets of tin that once covered the roof of a neighboring hotel, but were blown off during a recent hurricane. The structure is about ten feet high, thirty long, and fifteen wide. The windows are holes punched in the tin, and above the whole affair is a board, supported by two upright pieces of something, on which is painted in rude letters, "Paul Scott His Eating House. Meals at all hours. Fish, Coffee." In the eyes of Paul Scott and his colored patrons fish and coffee occupy the same prominent position upon the bill of fare that ice-cream and oysters assume in more pretentious establishments. To these inland negroes fish is one of the luxuries that can only be obtained by coming to town, where it is received daily from St. Mark's, twenty miles away, on the mail.

After dinner, trade and sight-seeing are resumed with a notable increase of noise, and much hilarity in the exchange of the compliments of the season. Order is, however, well maintained by the police, who, as in the case in many other Southern cities, are colored, and severely strict in their dealings with offenders of their own hue. In Tallahassee not only are the police colored, but the City Council is largely composed of negroes, and the Postmaster is black, as are also the Street Commissioner and the incumbents of all the minor municipal offices.

Half a mile outside of Tallahassee, where a running stream is spanned by a rude bridge, on one of the principal roads leading in from the country, the picturesque groupings of form and color to be seen on a market day are the delight of artistic eyes. It is here that the female field hands stop on their way to town to complete their toilets. Strapping wenches who have guided a plough or hoed cotton all the week, barefooted and bare-legged, with their dresses gathered about their waists by an encircling cord until the hems reach only to their shapely ankles, and who have trumped to town over miles of the red-clay roads in the same guise, find here a place to rest, restore their dresses to their proper length, and don the shoes that they have thus far carefully carried. The old aunties stop here to replace muled turbans with others fresh, clean, and vivid in coloring. The younger girls, straight and lithe, bearing upon their heads baskets of eggs or other articles with the grace and skill of Eastern watercarriers, set down their burdens, and often, milk the clear water on a mirror, pin to their dress bright bits of ribbon, or display various trifling ornaments and trinkets reserved for festive occasions.

Although the negro, his rule, and his old master are gradually fading away together from this warm, indolent Tallahassee country, and with a change of people there is also coming a change of custom, the Saturday market-day will long remain a feature in the life of what must always be a distinctly agricultural community.

Before many years, however, much of its present picturesqueness will have vanished. The tide of improvement is setting steadily in this direction, and will sweep away the quaint restaurant shanties, the rickety rope-bound carts, the sleepy mules, and, above all, the lazy, almost worthless, fat light-hearted negro, perfectly happy while sitting in the sun and twanging a Jew's-harp, and regarding with profound respect a market-day or any other holiday that furnishes him with a valid excuse for idleness. KING MILNOR.

A HOUSE-HUNTER'S REPRIEVE.

"Yes," said mamma, "you'd better tell the doctor, Betty, that we have concluded not to take his house for another year. It is a great blow to me, Betty. My pecuniary arrangements with the doctor have been very advantageous, and strict economy in domestic matters is highly important with us just now. The little money we had when your papa died is sadly diminished. Fred's education has cost us much, and it is so expensive to dress and educate Blanche suitably to her style and beauty. I had hoped—I was almost certain—"

Here mamma began to cry. I felt very sorry for her. She suffered in her way as much as she made me suffer in mine.

"We'll get another house, mamma," I said, hoping to ward off the topic that I knew mamma was dying to talk about, but nothing would do.

"It's not the house I'm dissatisfied with," said my poor mother; "it's Dr Steele, the owner of it, of whom I have cause to complain."

"I think you have misunderstood the doctor's old-fashioned politeness, mamma. It is always, perhaps, too pointed."

"Altogether too pointed, so far as your sister is concerned," said mamma. "He as much as said me he was in love with her down at the beach last summer. Don't you remember the day he invited us all to go, and was so vexed because you would not leave the house with the new servants that he talked about it all the way down in the train, and appeared to be very sorry that your domestic duties were so engrossing? You must acknowledge, Betty, that he has been very kind to you."

"I do acknowledge it, very gratefully indeed, mamma."

"And then," continued mamma, "he got Fred that situation in the bank. Why, no man could have been more pronounced in his attentions to the family of the young lady he professed to admire, and strawa show which way the wind blows, but it would not be so humiliating if he had not come right out and told me that he cared for her. A man has no right—a man in his position—to lead a mother to believe that he is about to propose for her daughter's hand, and then seem to forget all that he has said. I remember his very words, Betty. Your sister had started down to the water's edge, and the doctor sat upon the seat beside me, following her with his eyes and poking his cane into the sand. 'Madam,' said he, speaking very deliberately, as a man does when he has made up his mind, 'I must tell you that I had a motive in asking you and your daughters to share my holiday at the beach. I am very much interested in your daughter.' And here Blanche came strolling back again, looking so lovely that I thought the best thing I could do would be to leave them together. I made an excuse to go back to the hotel, and supposed that when I returned all would be settled, but from that day to this he has never opened the subject again either to Blanche or to me. Your sister is young and thoughtless, and accepts his attentions as she does those of everybody by whom she is admired, but a parent is bound to look at the matter in a more serious light."

"Blanche don't care a fig for him, mamma," I said.

"She would try to care for him if he offered himself," said mamma. "She has owned to me that she might be brought to view the matter in a favorable light."

"Oh, mamma," I said, jumping off my chair in a heat of mortification and impatience, "do let's get out of his house as soon as we can! I'll tell him we're going to move, and go out house-hunting this very day."

"Yes, do, Betty," said my mother; "and watch him when you tell him—see if he is surprised and vexed. And, Betty my child, you have such a plain old-fashioned way, you seem so much older than you really are, and the doctor and you have always been such good friends, he may confide to you—"

"Excuse me, mamma," I said, coming to the door. "I'm sure I hear the vegetable man, and I must see about luncheon before I go."

Away I ran down the stairs as fast as I could go, and rapped upon the door of the doctor's study.

He opened the door, and already had his hand in his hand and his overcoat on his arm. He put both of them aside, and with genie cordiality bade me come over to the open fire.

"For the sir is chill, Miss Betty," he said, "though we are getting on toward April. I be flatter—"

"Yes," I said, and rushed immediately into the subject in hand. "I will not detain you, doctor. I must tell you that mamma has concluded to move. I am going out house-hunting to-day."

Mamma ought to have been there, for if ever surprise amounting to consternation was depicted anywhere, it was painted on the doctor's face at that moment.

"House-hunting?" he cried. "What the—the device would you do such an insane thing as that for? Move! What does your mother want now? Papering? painting? redecorating? a hanging garden on the roof? a calcium-light in the hall? a steam calliope in the parlor? Tell me what she wants, and if it's possible to accomplish it without the aid of Aladdin's lamp it shall be done."

How could I say that she wanted him to marry my sister Blanche? It made me keen from the crown of my head to the soles of my feet to remember the conversation between mamma and me.

"You are very generous, doctor," I said, "but my mother wants to move. Don't you know that women are changeable sometimes, and get tired of the one place?"

"And the one party?" he rejoined—"the one old fossil who began to hope he might settle down to certain surroundings and be happy? Are you one of those women, Miss Betty? Do you want to leave your landlord?"

I knew that it was nothing but a generous pay for my condition of mind and body that made him look upon me with such sweet compassion. He threw his gloves aside, and took both my hands in his own. That was his unfortunate manner, his all too friendly way, as easily misunderstood, as I tried to persuade my mother. If it had been my beautiful sister instead of my plain little self, it might have been thought that the consummation to mamma's ambition was about to be reached.

"You look already as tired" he said. "Sit down here in this easy-chair, and tell me what I can do to save you from the awful fate of a house-hunter. Did you ever hear of Monheer Von Glihan, who every morning said, 'I am the richest merchant in Rotterdam'? He came to grief, my dear little woman, from too much walking. Haven't you eaten enough upon your poor little shoulders? If your mother will move, why don't she go herself upon this hunt that she desires?"

"My mother is never quite well," I said.

"And your sister?" he said.

"That would never do," I replied, quickly; "she is in—" and here I hesitated.

"Too beautiful," he said, with a wry grimace.

"Yes," I exclaimed, resolving to make one little struggle in mamma's behalf. "Don't you think that my sister is beautiful, Dr Steele?"

"Yes," he said, with all the vehemence that could be required of him; "too beautiful altogether. I wish she was as ugly as a storm fence."

A red flame leaped into his dark cheek. He was certainly agitated by some unwonted emotion. I thought perhaps he loved her, but distrusted his fate because of her beauty and her youth. Who could tell? The moment passed while I hesitated, not knowing just what to say in mamma's behalf. If I only could have gained courage to ask him what was the motive that he spoke of to mamma upon that day at the beach, but how could I? It was impossible. I got upon my feet. He picked up his gloves and followed me out into the hall.

"You must persuade your mother to abandon this idea of moving," he said, gently.

"Oh, please, no!" I exclaimed. "I can not, doctor. We must go."

"I can not force you to stay," he said, coldly; then turned to his man John, who watched his horse outside. "Go get a bill," he said, "and put it upon the horse."

"To bet?" said John, with curious surprise.

"Yes," said the doctor. "No—for sale. I'll sell everything out," he added, "and go to the dee—desert of Sahara." Then he leaped into his buggy and drove away, leaving me to ponder over the wretched frustrations of this miserable world.

Dr Steele had lived twenty years at least in this dear old house, for he had often said that he came there when a boy of fifteen, and he could not be far from fifty now. He was the only child of a widowed mother who had idolized him. When she had died, two years before, the doctor had put an advertisement in the paper that, I well remember, seemed very attractive to mamma. Our arrangements with him were indeed very satisfactory. He was generous to a fault, simple in his tastes, punctual in his habits. From a boarder he had become a friend, almost a benefactor. Had it not been for the beauty of Blanche, or the ambition of my mother, or the extreme warmth of the doctor's politeness, or perhaps a tenderer sentiment of his that he scarcely dared nourish for so young and beautiful a creature as Blanche—had it not been for one or all of these, we might have lived happily here for years. Now we must go adrift again, Heaven knew where and how. I went out that very afternoon upon my dreary quest, and grew sick at heart when I saw the signal of misery and disintegration hanging at the doorway: "For sale. Inquire within." I read it, and acknowledged to myself then that the deed was done. We were homeless, homeless wanderers again upon the face of the earth. I wished Blanche were not so very beautiful; perhaps it would have been better, as the doctor had said, if she had been as ugly as a stone fence, whatever style of ugliness that might be. For, wherever we went, my mother would begin again plotting, manœuvring, hoping, fearing, despairing. I went to all the agents in the neighborhood. I looked at impossible houses—houses like the doctor's, but with rents that reached to the thousands. I found to my blushing horror that we had absolutely been living gratis upon the doctor's bounty—the rent we had paid for his house was ridiculously small. A mere farcical sum, which he must have known long ago. He could not have been conscious of his reckless generosity, and the advantages we were reaping from it. My cheeks tingled with every new knowledge I gained, but my chief sorrow lay in the fact that we could no longer go on living in the old blissfully ignorant way. The doctor could afford it, seemed rather to enjoy it, and I had no longer that intolerable spirit that chafes under even a suspected obligation. If that spirit had ever existed, it had long ago oozed out of my scary toes, and every aching joint in my body.

But it was useless to mourn over lost happiness. The only thing to do now was to get a house within our means and live in it. I resolved to spare my people all the misery that I could, and let them enjoy their last days at the dear, comfortable, roomy, sunshiny, never-to-be-forgotten home of the doctor's. It was necessary to prepare them a little for the plunge downward they were to take. Mamma was the only one that suffered in the anticipation. Fred was at that happy period of a male existence when the "serious adachief" of a boy begins to merge in the "rackets" of adolescent youth. He was absorbed in the transition—didn't care what kind of a shelter I secured, so long as it would serve the necessity for sufficient sleep to tide him over from day to day.

Blanche was still less interested. She laughed to scorn all my efforts to prepare her pride, and begged of me not to borrow trouble. Once in a while she bade me to remember that she was not an absolute drone in the hive, and had her own schemes for our mutual advancement. I shuddered when the conversation took this turn, for she was more beautiful than ever, and consequently there were more matrimonial rocks ahead.

Poor mamma began to look gray and old, and took double doses of her nervous medicine. Her constant recurrence to that day at the sea-shore made the bleak winds of March seem to be beating about my ears like pitiless waves against a ship in the trough of the sea, and her haggard and anxious surveillance of every movement of the doctor's drove me at last to securing a house. It was a coffin-shaped building that savored of ornar gas a little, and of mould and mildew very much more; the paper was hanging from the walls; the ceilings were cracked and dangerously baigy; cobwebs fantastically festooned it from the draughty garret to the gloomy kitchens down in the bowels of the earth. It was unhomely, dismal to desolation, on the damp and shady side of the street, and had the uncanny reputation of lately being occupied by a chiffonnier who had never come back from one of his trances. But the agent spoke vaguely of repairs, and it was absolutely the only house in the whole metropolis that seemed available to our family.

There was a final humiliation to suffer—security was demanded for the rent. There was nobody to ask it from but the doctor. I dare to think he might be so glad to get rid of us that this would seem a trifling favor. For the doctor, after the first shock, had appeared to be resigned to the loss of our separation. His hands yet hung upon his breast, it was neither he nor said, but the doctor went upon the even tenor of his way, apparently undisturbed by the rise in fall of real estate.

March happened to be going out as a lion on the day that I secured the house. The heavens opened, the rain fell, and beat upon my defenseless head, that had ached and ached for many a day. I had almost lived in the streets for the previous fortnight, and ought to have grown accustomed to my nomadic miseries. But they seemed to culminate in my final success, and when the agent handed me over a document which he said would secure me the house if properly signed, a cold shudder went to the marrow of my bones, and I felt as if it was my death-warrant. I staggered home, resolved to have done with the whole torture that day, and found a rumored looking person on the door-step anxious to negotiate with the doctor about his property. Then was the hot iron to the thumb-screw, but I hastened to the doctor's study and asked him his price.

"A hundred thousand dollars, cash down," shouted the doctor, without even turning his head.

I thought I had misunderstood him. I was so faint and weary that every voice I heard went humming in my ears like a spent bell.

"I beg your pardon, doctor," I faltered: "what did you say?"

He turned and looked at me, got upon his feet, and reached me just as it seemed to me I could no longer stand. He carried me to an easy-chair, undid my bonnet strings, dropped some liquid in a little glass, and pushing back my head, poured it down my throat.

The bell rang loudly. The party at the door had waited all this time to know the price of the house.

"Tell him I've changed my mind," said the doctor. "Take the bill down, John, and tell Miss Betty's number to step down here at once."

"Your daughter is very ill," he said, as poor mamma came into the study. "She must be put to bed immediately. I will carry her up the stairs."

My poor mother, who could never restrain herself, burst into a passion of tears and reproaches.

"It is all your fault," she cried to the doctor. "If you had not trifled on with Blanche, and actually told me that day at the beach that you cared for my daughter, and had a motive in inviting us to go there, and then thrown her over in such a humiliating way, things would never have come to this pass."

But the doctor had already picked me up in his arms and started for the stairway, my poor mother stumbling after him.

"I did care for your daughter, madam," said the doctor, in a clear ringing voice that might have been heard upon the house-top, "and will care for her to my dying day, and my motive has always been to make her care for me; but it is your daughter Betty that I love, you blind and foolish woman, and not your beautiful Blanche."

I felt his rough beard graze my chin, his lips touch mine, in the twilight of the upper hall and then I sank away into paradise. When I came back to the world again I was lying in my mother's bed in the second story back room of the dear old house of the doctor's. I must have forgotten a long time in that queer and shadowy land to which I had drifted on that last wonderful day of my dreary house-hunting. A soft balmy air floated in at the top of the window that looked over the old fashioned garden, the thick knobby old lilac-tree must have been bursting into bloom, for the faint sweet fragrance reached me where I lay; the tulip bed must have been one blaze of color. My mother sat in a low chair by my bedside with her prayer-book in her hand. But she looked younger by ten years than when I had seen her last. Poor dear woman! she was reconciled to my struggle with life and death, as long as more important matters had been doubtless comfortably settled. But she was overjoyed to find that I was there again. Poor mamma had always depended on upon me, and loved me well in her own way. Now it seemed that she almost loved me in another way too, as she did her beautiful Blanche. Amid her tears and smiles she began to twist some wisps of lace upon my forehead into curls, and arrange the blue bows that decorated my night robe.

"Thank God," she said, "for all his mercies! My dear, dear child, compose yourself. Betty, before the doctor comes—he has forbidden any excitement, any confession—but, my darling, you must know—it is necessary, it is right, that you should know, and perhaps it will do you good, it ought to, I'm sure; it has sustained me through all those weary weeks—Betty, my love, my darling, wonderful as it may seem, it was you that the doctor admired, it was you that the doctor spoke about at the beach, and his motive was perfectly honorable and creditable. I'm sure if I'd only known it all this trouble might have been saved. But it's recognized now by everybody. He openly acknowledged it the day that you fell ill, and I must say he has acted up to it ever since."

"Who are you talking to, mamma?" said a voice at the door. "Has Betty come to?"

And in ran my beautiful sister. She had tears, but they fell from her magnificent eyes upon my sunken cheeks and washed hands; they fell in torrents; and although she was always so careful of her clothes, she flung herself by my bedside, rumpling all the pretty breadths of her marvellous spring outfit. She looked like a gor-

in porcelain. She was a hundred times more beautiful than ever. No wonder my mother was so astonished. It seemed a miracle that the doctor had cut a narrow slant Blanche. And my beautiful sister also loved me in her own way. She had determined to save me from a hot she considered an impossibility.

"You mustn't talk, Betty," she said, "and we mustn't talk to you any more than we can possibly help. You've been very ill, dear, and we've been wild about you. The doctor has gone about like a ghost, and as'ro followed him around like phantoms. I must say I think a great deal of the doctor; he's a very nice, splendid man in a great many ways. But you needn't marry him, Betty, when you get well, unless you want to. I know how queer you are about these things—how you'd hate to marry him if you didn't just worship the ground he walked on; and yet you'd feel badly about the rest of us. And I want to tell you as quick as I can, before he comes in, that you needn't think of anybody but yourself any more. You've worn yourself out for me about long enough. I'm engaged to Fitz-Edward Smythe, and only waiting for you to get well to marry him."

"Oh, Blanche!" I gasped, for the young man was little better than a poodle-dog.

"I'm fond of him, Betty, I am indeed!" she exclaimed; and she really looked as if she meant what she said. "I actually love him. He'll do anything in the world I tell him to do, and we shall have a most elegant time together, because his money is all his own, and I can help him take care of it, and show him how to really enjoy it in a proper way. There will be money enough for us all. You and mamma and Fred are to live with me, and it's all arranged between Fitz-Edward and myself that my family is to be held in the greatest consideration. I'd have been buried alive with your doctor, and any one that marries him will be worse than a door-mat.—Oh, goodness gracious me!"

For the doctor walked softly in, with a big bunch of roses in his hand. Blanche slipped out the door, my mother noiselessly followed her, and I was left alone with my benefactor.

The same fell out of his hand. He scanned me at first with the eye of a physician. He felt my pulse, my forehead, my hands, my feet; he watched me for fully ten minutes, his face softening the while from the Æsculapian rigidity to an ineffable tenderness.

At last he took a long breath, and seating himself in my mother's chair, he pushed back his hair from his forehead. I could see how grey it had grown. I could see the lines in his face. I held out both my hands to him.

"You would have been very sorry," I whispered, "if I had not come back to you?"

The strong hands trembled that closed about my own. He put his head down upon the pillow beside me. "Betty," he said, "I think I should have gone and got some dynamite and blown the whole property and its owner into fragments."

His eyes still devoured my face. I sighed auxiliarly, and pulled the blue bow off my night robe and began to smooth back the hair that my foolish mother had tried to curl.

"I wish I had ever been the least bit in the world pretty," I said.

The doctor picked up one of his roses that lay scattered about the counterpane, and putting it upon my breast, he said, in his old tender way,

"'Go, lovely rose,
Tell her that wasted her time and me
That now she knows,
When I resemble her to thee,
How sweet and fair she seems to be.'"

MRS. FRANK MCCARTHY.

THE CINCINNATI DRAMATIC FESTIVAL.

Since the first dramatic festival ever instituted on so large a scale in this country, the Cincinnati Dramatic Festival, which began on the 20th of April, is directing to the Queen City of the West the eyes of every other city of the United States. Not the cities only, but the towns and villages, are interested in its progress, of each step of which the Associated Press dispatches keep them well informed, while the rosy dawn of a general dramatic revival that seems about to rout this country lends to the enterprise its smile. Comparatively few persons are aware of the costliness and beauty of the opera-houses or theatres recently erected in many towns that make no pretensions to the honor of being metropolises—towns, for example, like Northampton, Massachusetts, long famous for its natural charms—and amateur entertainments similar to those organized in New York by the ladies of the Battledell Dramatic Committee are sure to be successful. Ever since the early days of Pinafore, a local church choir transformed themselves into pit rats as public theatrical companies to act Mr. GILBERT'S play and sing Mr. SULLIVAN'S music, recalling the times of the sixteenth century, when the choristers of St. Paul's, in robes of silk and satin, appeared in secular dramas in Queen ELIZABETH'S chapel and in various royal houses, with such intelligence as to become one of the most popular troupes of actors in London, the signs of this approaching dramatic era have been obvious enough, and the Cincinnati Festival will doubtless accelerate its coming as much as it has gained an impetus from it to advance.

For, the spirit with which our Ohioan brethren are laying the foundations of this artistic enterprise is resolute and pervasive. Everybody who has a hand in it, no matter how humble, is transfigured by his environment. Even the man employed to provide the calcium lights is called by the local newspapers an "artist", and "as a preliminary to the display to be inaugurated the coming week," an old Cincinnati actor is announced to deliver in the Grand Opera-house a lecture on "The Drama, and its Influences." Nor is this the only preliminary. A Cincinnati publishing house has issued a cheap popular edition of the six plays to be acted, with critical introductions, marginal notes, and glossaries to each play, the whole edited with judicious intelligence, and a leading Cincinnati newspaper is printing a series of "Shakspeare Studies," in which those dramas of the mighty playwright that are to be put on the Festival stage receive learned and thoughtful attention. One of the latest of these disquisitions is an elaborate defense of the personal character of Hamlet's mother from the attacks made by "the fiery of her ill-conditioned son." Even the show-dealers share the enthusiasm. One of them, in anticipation of the arrival of certain celebrated actresses, advertises as "elegant stock of ladies' slippers; the names of the latest novelties are Miss Rhea, Clara Morris, Mary Anderson."

These things are significant. The noblest triumphs of dramatic genius to Athens, when the citizens, high and low, crowded to witness the dramas of EURIPIDES and SOPHOCLES, were always popular festivals, and it was at the popular festivals that followed the advent of peace and liberty in the dress of good Queen Bess that the revival of the drama in England began. The very nature and impulse of the drama is to make its appeal to the people—to the people collectively, to all classes together, to widen the horizon of their thoughts and feelings, to awaken in them emotions which the hum drum round of daily existence does not stir, and thus to give them pleasure which otherwise they could not experience. Consequently the people have always liked the drama, and it was this natural affection that the clever clergy of the Middle Ages took advantage of in establishing those dramatic representations of the Life of Christ which were known as Mysteries, and this natural affection is it that the Catholic Church still takes judicious cognizance of in the pomp and pageantry of the celebrations at her altars. The severity of the Puritan spirit naturally was directed toward the drama, as toward every other representative of the fine arts, inside of the church edifice and outside of it—toward painting, toward sculpture, toward music, toward architecture, toward poetry—and the drama, in childish spite, tried to shock the Puritan spirit by becoming as licentious as the licentious canons of James and the two CHARLESES would permit. But JOHN MILTON, sturdy Puritan though he was, went to the theatre when the plays suited him; and MARTIN LUTHER, sturdy reformer though he was, encouraged his friend the Elector MAURICE to establish an opera. Our Cincinnati brothers seem to believe that since man has a natural affection for dramatic representations, the part of wisdom is to guide that instinct in a wise direction. Accordingly, they have made a beginning by organizing a grand Shakspearean revival. Next year doubtless they will continue their undertaking by treating us to something modern, but not less sterling.

G. W. SMALLEY.

THE DEATH OF MR. PARK.

THE career of Mr JAMES PARK, Jun., of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, which closed so peacefully on the 21st of April, at the end of sixty three years, is one of which his native city may well be proud. The pioneer of steel manufacture in the United States, he lived to see his infant industry grow to stalwart maturity, battling its way to recognition in the markets of the world, for the establishment and conduct of his business Mr PARK performed much hard work. The greatest care was exercised in making new experimentsas improvements, and it was the custom to always go through new boilers, about to be put up, with a candle, and thoroughly inspect them before he would allow fire to be put under them. It was some time before the firm recovered from their early struggles, and when, at the end of their first profitable year, the book-keeper brought in a balance sheet showing they had made some fifteen thousand dollars, there were great hopes for the future.

To-day the Black Diamond Steel Works have the largest capacity for crucible steel in the world, two of the largest open hearth furnaces, and the largest steam-hammer in the United States, while their business is conducted through five branch houses and more than a dozen outside agencies.

OUNCES OF PREVENTION.

THE THERMOMETER AS A HEALTH-MEASURER.

In a last year's issue we of a popular health journal once we found an article on "Missing in Hot Places," the Countess Minz in Nevada being meant. In this article, which was quoted from a Western journal, I came across the following statement: "The temperature of the blood is about 98° F.; therefore, when a man remains in a hot place for an hour, or even half an hour, his blood and his whole body become heated to a temperature of 115°, 120°, so whatever may be the temperature of the place in which he is at work."

This statement is given without a word of comment by the editor of the popular journal in question, who writes A. M. and M. D. after his name. Let us hope that his readers, and also my own, are acquainted with a fact in physiology of which the learned health journal editor has perhaps never heard—the fact, namely, that the healthy human body preserves nearly the same temperature everywhere and under all circumstances, whether in the hottest mine or upon the coldest arctic iceberg, and that a slight departure from that standard heat, whether produced by exposure or by disease, means the speedy death of the sufferer.

What is this standard heat of the human body? what is the source and degree of this natural animal heat? Its source is the oxidation or burning of the food taken into the system. The food is consumed as in a fire, only far more slowly, but with about an equal disengagement of heat as the result. Throw a sugared almond into the fire: it will burn longer probably than you would think, some two or three minutes, throwing out a considerable volume of flame. In the human body the sugar, starch, and oil of the almond will give out about the same amount of heat during the process of assimilation, which may last many hours. Part of this heat is converted into force, part is subsided. The total amount of heat radiated by a healthy human body is estimated as equal, on the average, to that of two burning candles. Ten persons sitting in a room, that is to say, would warm it as much as twenty candles in the same time.

The degree of this heat, as indicated by the temperature of the blood, varies with different animals and classes of animals, but for each kind and individual it remains very nearly the same. Birds are the warmest blooded; their annual heat ranges from 106° to 111° F. The temperature of mammals low between equally narrow limits—that of the porpoise is 97°, of the horse 99°, and of the ass and the hare 101°. On that point the cat and the rat are in complete accord, having each a vital temperature of 102°. The sheep, the goat, and the sea-cow have the warmest blood of all the mammals, its heat reaching 104°. But how small is this range, especially in view of the immense difference to the natures, habits, and surroundings of the different animals I have named!

The temperature of the human body has been studied with great care. Its average height was first determined by the researches of Dr Brechet. In health, as measured by an accurate thermometer placed in the armpit, it is 98.6° F., or 37° C. The actual heat of the blood is about 1° F. higher than this. The differences between the temperatures of different individuals are extremely small, 1° or 2° F. The spontaneous variations in the temperature of the same individual during health are also slight, seldom as much as one degree in the course of a day. Twenty three degrees is the utmost range for health. Any range lower than 97.2° as higher than 99.5° (in the axilla) is very suspicious, more than this means disease, a little more means danger, still a little more derangement of the natural heat means death. In the large hospital practice of Dr Wunderlich the lowest temperature among severe cases which yet recovered was 92.3°. At the other extreme, there is on record of a life which has survived a blood temperature of 113°. So delicate is the adjustment of the flame that we call life!

It is by the clinical thermometer that we study the movement of these temperatures from the normal standard of health upward or downward as disease. The instrument forewarns us of the danger and describes it; a barometer of health, is it one that is so easily used, and in its simpler indications so easily understood, that it should be familiar in every family. Has more clearly than the barometer foretells the weather does the clinical thermometer warn us of the approach or foretell the close of the storm of disease in the microcosm of the human system.

The instrument is made by the best teachers, as by John Taghaber, of New York, is graduated by inches of a degree from 93° to 110° F.—an extreme range of figures, I hope, than any of my readers will ever be called on to note at the bedside of a loved one. And what are the indications, for better as for worse, of the thermometer, or health-indicator, as the clinical thermometer might properly be called?

1. The standard of health being a temperature of 98.6° F., a constant temperature, as one that varies in health not more than one-quarter of a degree either way from this mean in the same individual, is a proof of a normal conditions.

2. And conversely, "inability of temperature under the action of external influences is a sign of some diseased condition" (Wunderlich).

3. A natural temperature does not prove health, though it is a presumption of health. But as I have said, any variation from the normal temperature that exceeds two degrees, either upward as downward, is to be taken as almost certainly meaning disease; while temperatures above 108° or below 93° F. are, with very few exceptions, fatal.

4. Each and every disease that is well marked in its course and symptoms—that is, typical, in scientific phrase—produces in each of its stages its own effects upon the temperature of the blood, and gives, therefore, numbers that may be figured in curves which are characteristic of the particular disease.

These latter details are for the physician to record and study; they are too complex for description here. But any other person—even the patient himself, unless a child—can make the preliminary observations of which I speak, and the nurse should know how to make them in the absence of the physician. Even a single observation with the clinical thermometer will tell us whether the patient is really ill. Two or three observations will tell us whether the kind of danger is, and will sometimes determine the probable coldness or severity of an attack. In most familiar illness is threatened, at least, an intermittently, and it is of great service to be able to know promptly whether to send for the doctor or not. The general rule on the point, subject of course to slight modification for the individual, is to call medical aid if the temperature rises above 101° or falls below 97°.

5. Influences which do not disturb the temperature of the healthy derange that of the sick. The occurrence of abnormal temperatures in persons who have been previously healthy points to the existence of disease. The thermometer indicates, for instance, the existence of tuberculosis by evening elevations of three or four degrees.

Such in brief is the clinical thermometer, the most recent and one of the most important appliances that medical science has given us. Its use requires intelligence, but no special skill. It is only necessary to handle the instrument carefully, to keep it dry and clean, and in using it to leave it in the closed arm-pit for not less than four minutes. Read the result carefully and promptly, and note it down at once, with the day and hour, for the use of the physician. A permanent record of the temperatures of each child should also be kept from infancy. It will prove serviceable to the physician, and will form a part of the physiological history of the child.

TIMOTHY MERCER COAN.

THE GREAT CYCLONE.

THE awful storm of wind and rain which on Sunday, April 22, swept over Mississippi, Georgia, and South Carolina, leaving ruin and devastation in its track, was one of the most extended and destructive cyclones ever known in this country. Between two and three hundred lives were lost, and nearly a thousand persons were injured.

The towns of Wesson and Beauregard, in Mississippi, suffered more severely than any other places in the track of the cyclone. At the former town the first signal of the approaching storm was noticed at three o'clock in the afternoon. Dark and low lying clouds enveloped everything in gloom, and a few minutes later the cyclone burst upon the inhabitants. Houses and other buildings were swept away in an instant, and their fragments blown and scattered in every direction. The loss of life was appalling, and the destruction of property is estimated at many thousand dollars. Hardly a vestige marks the site of the village of Beauregard. The entire town was swept away, and the surrounding valleys were strewn with twisted and splintered timbers. Human beings, freight cars, houses, and iron mark were whirled through the air with frightful rapidity. The total loss of property in the two towns will aggregate, it is said, $300 000.

Many sad stories are related of the destruction of life and property outside of the towns. Hundreds of farm houses, hundreds of small cabins, were swept away, and their inmates killed or wounded. In the picture on our first page our artist, who has witnessed similar storms to the South, has endeavored to convey an idea of the awful scenes that accompanied this cyclone—the blackness of the air, illuminated by terrific flashes of lightning, the flying debris of buildings, fences, and trees, the utter helplessness of humanity in the wild uproar and tumult of the elements.

TAXIDERMISTS' EXHIBITION.

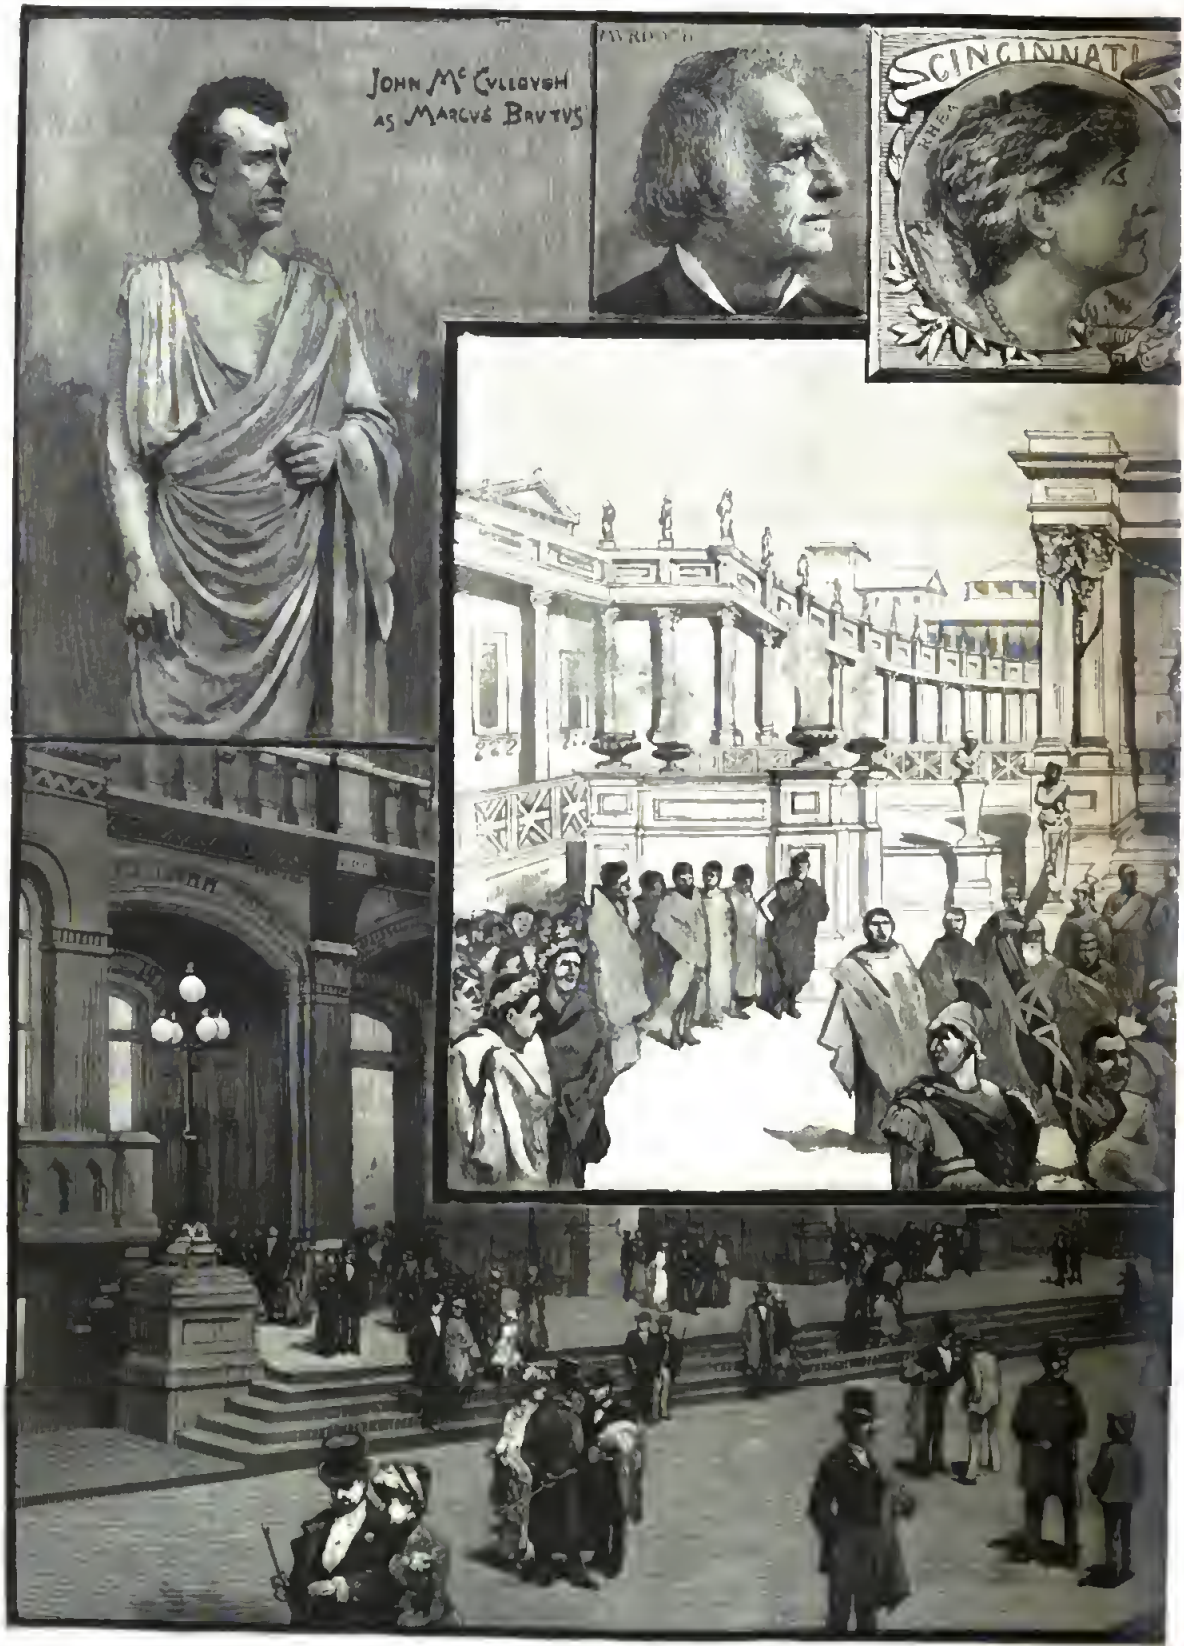
Something very novel and interesting in the way of an exhibition is to be found in that of the Society of American Taxidermists, held this week in Lyric Hall in this city. The object of the society is to improve the quality of taxidermy, both for ornamental and scientific purposes, and raise it to the dignity of an art. The present exhibition, the third held by the society since its organization, is by far the best exposition of the possibilities of taxidermy which has been opened to the public. The display is arranged under twelve heads, comprising groups of mammals, birds, reptiles, and fishes, single specimens, animals grotesquely mounted, and articles for use or ornament, such as screens, umbrellas, dust pans, etc. It affords a new idea of the possibilities of taxidermy to those who have known it chiefly through the medium of stuffed cats and canaries.

THE NEW ASSAY OFFICE SUPERINTENDENT.

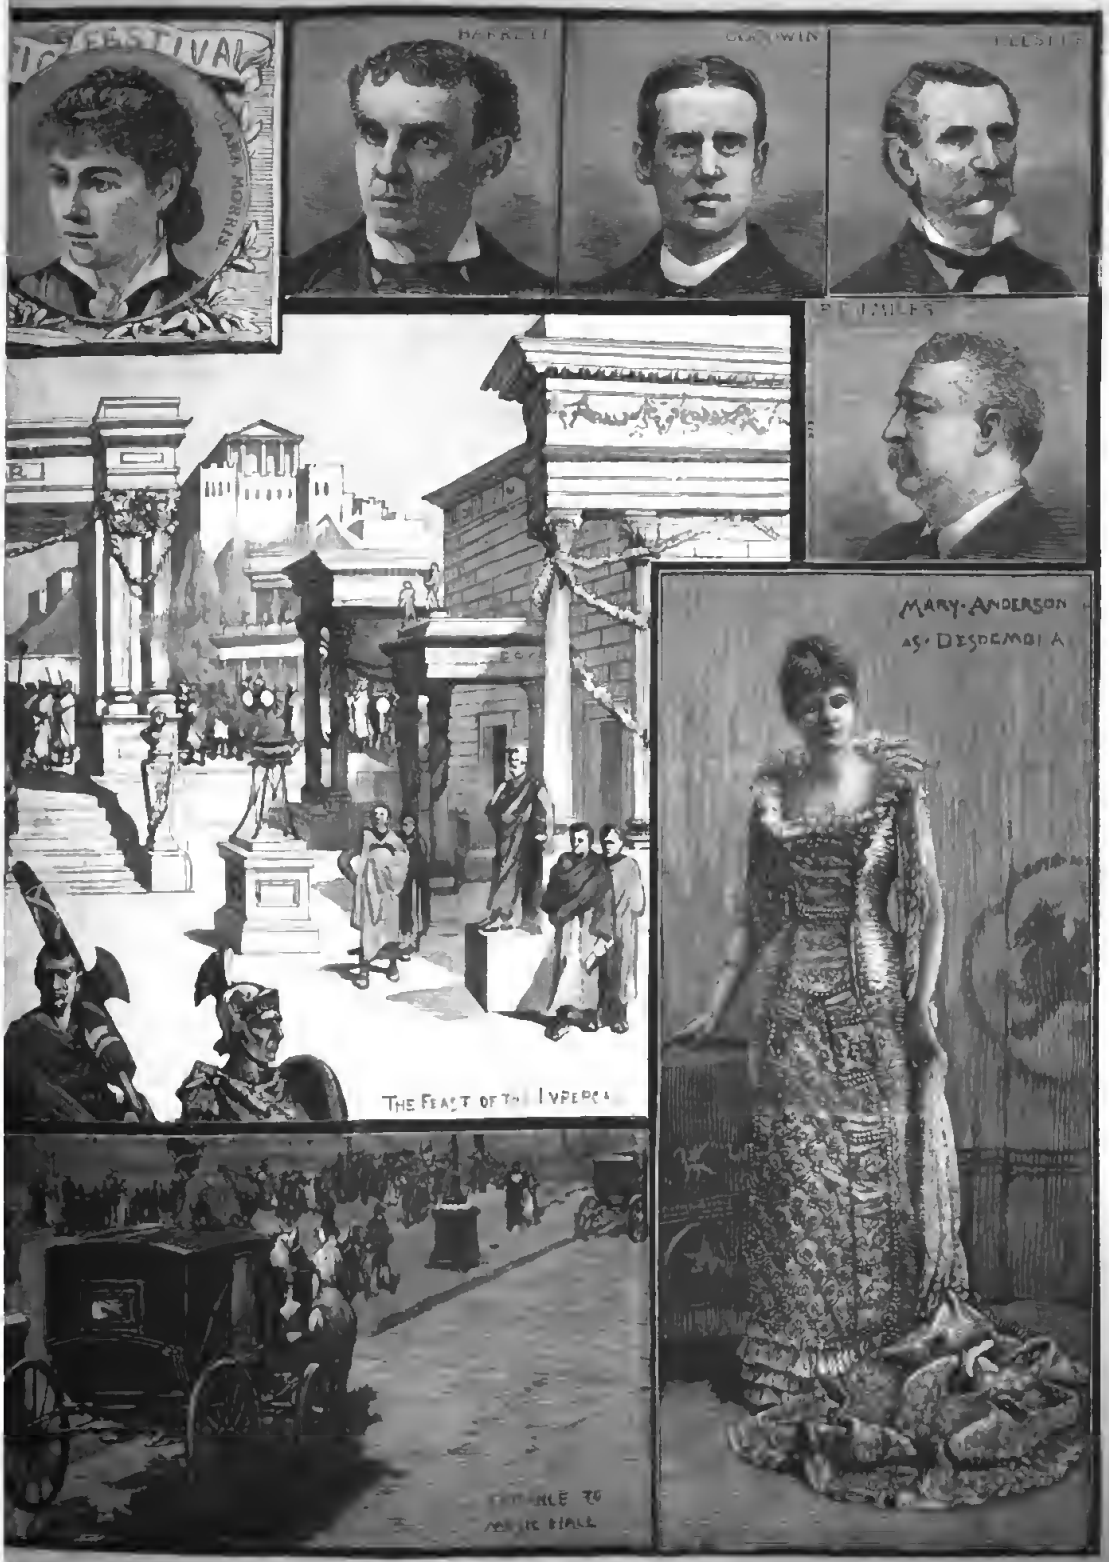
MR. ANDREW MASON, whom the President has appointed to succeed Dr PIERRE C. VAN WYCK, deceased, as Superintendent of the United States Assay Office in New York, was born May 27, 1829, at New Mains, Ayrshire, Scotland, during a visit of his parents to their native land. He was brought up in Philadelphia, his parents' adopted home, and received his education as the public schools of that city, graduating from the well-known Central High School. For several years after leaving school he was employed in the commission house of the late General ROBERT PATTERSON. In 1850 he was appointed to a position in the Philadelphia Mint, and in 1854, on the reorganization of the New York Assay Office, was made Assistant Assayer under Dr JOHN TORREY, for many years Chief Assayer of that institution. Mr MASON has therefore been connected with the New York office almost twenty nine years. In July, 1883, he succeeded the late EDWARD S. KNAPP as Melter and Refiner—a position which he has held up to the present time.

Soon after his appointment as Melter and Refiner Mr MASON introduced the sulphuric acid process of separating gold from silver in place of the much more costly nitric acid process in use in all the mints and assay offices until then—a change which has very largely reduced the cost of the operation to the depositors, and at the same time resulted in the saving of thousands of dollars annually to the government. In consequence of this important service Congress in 1876 voted him a special appropriation of $10,000, and he was given leave of absence for about three months to recruit his health, which had been seriously impaired by close and long-continued application to his public duties. Two years ago he was commissioned, as one peculiarly fitted for the service by his intimate knowledge of Mint affairs, to investigate the condition of the Carson City Mint—a task which he performed to the entire satisfaction of the Department. While in San Francisco, engaged on this business, at the request of the Mint officers he supervised the introduction there of the sulphuric acid process.

Digitized by Google



THE DRAMATIC FESTIVAL AT CINCINNATI.—FROM A



H. F. Farny and Photographs by J. Landy.—[See Page 270.]

"DISARMED!"*

By MISS BETHAM-EDWARDS,

Author of "Kitty," "Exchange no Robbery," "Bridget in Exotic France," "Dr. Jacob," "The Sylvestres; or, the Outsider," etc.

CHAPTER VIII.

Arthura lived in two worlds, divided only by an hour and a half of railway, yet unlike each other as remote antipodes. The place she groaned at rapturously on a day was wholly sad and unlovely. Instead of tossing waves and exhilarating breezes, a white town glittering along the sea-margo, and resting on hills verdurous even in November, she saw a picture as sordid as may be. It was certainly not London in tatters, but London out at elbows—London shorn of its noble pomp, and shivering in the thin garments of poor gentility. The towering within a town was one of those numerous suburban colonies of poor people ashamed to be held poor. One street of ill-built little houses was precisely like its fellow. There were precocious little serving maids cleaning windows, gardens in front narrow as hearthrugs, clothes that would never dry hanging out at the back, and nothing in one window that you did not see in the next. Yet a fire blazed on every hearth, the cheap red curtains had a warm look, no every sill was a flower or bird-cage for grace. As Arthura tripped along the narrow street her step became buoyant, her cheek glowed with happy expectation as her heart leaped. She breathed the air of home.

"Arthura! my own Arthura!" cried a young voice from within. Straightway the door flew open, and a delicate-looking boy of eleven was almost throttling her with embraces, a girl two years younger was clutching her gown, the young mother followed, leading a third, and all was joyous connection. "You should have written, Arthura," began her young step-mother, affectionately, but with a tone of melancholy reproach. "We have nothing fit to give you for dinner."

"My dear little Steppie"—her pet name for a step-mother little older than herself—"you must not bewail the dinner, but be merry. I could not tell you, because I did not know. I am to have a day's holiday once a month. Only think of that!" Then she kissed the little company over and over again—Steppie, the boy Walter, Benjamine, and her three-year-old sister. "My own, own Arthura," cried Walter, clinging to her, gazing up into her face as if his very life were there. "Kiss me a thousand times, my Arthura."

Whilst Steppie very carefully and admiringly disrobed Arthura, putting away plumed hat, rich fur cloak, and silver-handled umbrella, little Benjamine's face presented an interesting study.

First with large eyes, pale blue as milk and water, she inspected the muff. Finding it absolutely and hopelessly empty, she sniffed gently round the cloak, lifting up the lappets, peering slyly into the pockets. Like the muff, they held nothing. Benjamine next glanced at the umbrella. No little parcel was fastened to it. She at last sadly and resignedly sat down by Arthura's side. "What beautiful things you wear now!" she said.

"It is my livery," Arthura answered, merrily. "Miss Hermitage's servants all wear livery—the men powdered wigs and artificial legs covered with silk stockings, the women furs and feathers."

"Arthura," Steppie cried, ready to shed tears of mortification, "how can you talk to that way to the poor children?"

"Would you have them believe that I like wearing a hundred pounds' worth of clothes whilst they are fitted out at the slop-shop?" Arthura asked, with almost bestial frankness.

"That reminds me," Steppie began—"I am very sorry I always have something disagreeable to say when you come home. The children must have new shoes. I could not take them to church last Sunday because they were so badly shod."

Arthura took out her purse, and with ourselfied spirits emptied its contents on the table. There were several pieces of gold, a number of shillings, and one sixpence. She picked up nothing but her railway ticket, and pushed the money toward her step-mother. "There, dear little mamma, I wish I had more to give you."

Benjamine crept up to her mother's side.

"May I have the sixpence for the doll you promised me?" she said.

"Yes," cried Arthura, overhearing the question. "And give Walter something, and Baby too. I was too delighted at the prospect of seeing you all to think of presents."

"I hope you are happy?" asked Steppie.

"As happy as I can be away from you. My person of perfect happiness is to have nothing to do all day but lie here on the sofa with the children jumping over me, and little mamma feeding me with a spoon."

The children laughed immoderately.

"How amusing you always are!" sighed Steppie. "'Tis but a dull companion I am to the poor children. I could cry sometimes to think how dull I am."

"That is an odd way of trying to be livelier," laughed Arthura. "You should read some funny story that makes you laugh till the tears run down."

"Tell us such a story. Make mamma's tears run down," said Walter.

"No, when we have had dinner we will do something better than have stories. Wait and see," replied Arthura, looking mysterious.

It was soon one of the clock—dinner-time—and the little maid-of-all-work having laid the cloth, the party sat down.

"A wretched dinner for you," moaned Steppie. "Now had you come the day before yesterday, you would have dined off a hot joint."

The dinner was no worse than it generally is in households where means are straitened and gentility at a premium. But the savor of home was there. Arthura, with Walter by her side and the rest of her little family in sight, could have swallowed anything short of ogre's fare.

Grace said, and the cloth taken away, she sprang up joyfully. "Little mamma shall play to us, and we will dance," she said—"dance madly till we hear the muffin bell."

Dancing and muffins! Each word conveyed to the children's minds the very apex of enjoyment. They knew not which to enjoy most—the delectation of the moment or the thought of the pleasure to come. Steppie, proud and happy to have her one accomplishment called into requisition, sat down to the piano. Arthura danced now with Walter, now with demure Benjamine, now with one-syllabled Baby. It was wonderful how much contentment Baby managed to express with her monosyllables. All were in frolicsome mood. Even Steppie declared that she was enjoying herself.

"At least, not enjoying myself: I can not say that I ever do that. But I am enjoying you, I suppose, Arthura."

The minutes flew by desperately. There was the muffin bell.

But although the muffin bell heralded tea, and ten Arthura's departure, all kept up their spirits till the last moment. How could they help it? First of all, Arthura, all tears, sighs, and depression, acted the woe-begone figure she should make entering Miss Hermitage's drawing-room. Then with inimitable mimicry she showed how, to the midst of her despondency, Miss Hermitage's pet parrot would shout, "Fetch the doctor!" changing her tears to laughter. Lastly, standing on the hearth-rug, she acted alternately the part of Colette, vinaigrette in hand, offering consolation and of herself utterly inconsolable, yet laughing between her sobs.

This comic scene sent the children into ecstasies, but no time for encores! only just enough to berry on hats and cloaks and catch the train Arthura did, however, find a moment before they set out to put her arms round her step-mother's neck and whisper,

"Of course, Steppie, as soon as papa's debts are paid, you shall be made much more comfortable."

Then they all started, prattling cheerfully as they made their way through the fog.

"Tell me," Steppie said, to the train came up. "Nobody is unkind? You are not snubbed and flouted?"

Arthura laughed merrily.

"You have never been to court, little mamma. Everybody is good to the court fool, the zany. I am as the apple of Miss Hermitage's eye."

Before Steppie had time to remonstrate, the train was off.

CHAPTER IX.

Valerian could gild refined gold and paint the lily in matters of enjoyment, but how to plant Miss Hermitage's bower with mosy and emeronah, and shut out breaths from the cold dark underworld of Shades?

Do what he might, mortal reminders would come in the likeness of such minter ailments as flesh is heir to, the cough and catarrh one-genuine from age to expectant next of kin. Through the very key-holes these warning whispers continued to make insinuating war, and curtains downier than starlings' nests failed to keep them out.

"I suppose, if Valerian can not keep me well in England, we must betake ourselves to the Riviera next winter," she said to Mr. Constantine. "But I find England quite as amusing, and to bathe of our generation it seems more natural to live in one's own country 'in spite of the climate.'"

"I do not think the climate of a certain other country are fast bound for will trouble us much. Whether you will find it nourishing or no, my poor Christina, I can not say."

"I am sure I do not ask you to say. You are welcome to think what you please, and to keep your thoughts a secret," retorted Miss Hermitage. "I sincerely hope, Constantine, when I am to old to you are, I shall be less disagreeable."

"Come, cousin, we won't quarrel. Tottering on the verge of the grave as we both are, we ought to love each other like turtle-doves. Still, I make use of the privilege of kinship to urge on you—"

"An odious privilege, too. Ato I to my dotage? Can one I do as I will with my own? I know what you are driving at. What can it concern you how I dispose of my money?"

"Tush, tush, my dear Christina! You can not be angry with your old cousin. I can have none but disinterested motives in persuading you to make your will. It is your duty as a citizen."

"Well, have you made yours?" asked Miss Hermitage, brusquely.

"Upon my honor I have. But as I have nothing to leave, what does it matter?"

"Nothing to leave? What an old spendthrift! And your money has been squandered on no good objects—that I feel certain of," retorted Miss Hermitage.

Mr. Constantine looked more insinuating than ever.

"My dear Christina, you are not a child. You know something of the world and its ways. I may, then, blush for my follies in your presence. But it is not the model husbands and fathers that make the world better, remember. It is the good citizen, the man of public spirit. I have at least been a squanderer in good causes also."

"Well, in my squandering in bad causes?" asked Miss Hermitage. "I employ plenty of people. I encourage trade."

"Women were not taught political economy when you learned Shakspeare and the musical glasses," answered the other, with perfect good nature. "But you have the right to enjoy your money. The only point I feel is a duty, as your nearest relation and senior, to insist upon is this: you must know as well as I do that if you never make a will, poor Valerian would get so much as get a quarter's allowance if it happened to be due."

So saying, Mr. Constantine rose and very significantly with his walking stick traced on the carpet the family escutcheon bearing a Bar Sinister.

Miss Hermitage was not to be moved.

"Then it would fall to Stephana to provide for him. She has plenty of money. She may marry Valerian if she chooses when I am gone."

"Oh! you do think you shall go, as you call it, some time or other?" laughed Mr. Constantine, lightly. "Don't be so superstitious as to suppose that the making of a will would hasten departure. I made mine, the first of many, fifty years ago."

"Much good it would do, it, as you say, you have nothing to leave."

"Well, one always has something. For instance, in my last codicil I bequeathed to you my dress suit, shoe-buckles and all. It will as pleasingly remind you of the heyday of age we are now spending together, these lover like confabulations and almost amorous confidences."

"I am sure it is very handsome of you to leave me your old clothes! Now had you left me the family portraits in your possession I would not say no."

"Not too late" cried Mr Constantine, eagerly. "I will order a fresh codicil to be drawn on this very day—provided that you, by way of return, leave me five thousand a year!"

"You are absurdity itself. Ten years my senior, and asthmatic to boot!"

"Do oblige me, Christina. Supposing it should happen that I live to be a centenarian and you are prematurely cut off, how glad you would feel that you had smoothed my declining years!"

"If you have not enough to live upon, you are most welcome to anything you want. You know that well enough, Constantine. But I resist go my own ways. I can not be interfered with."

"I always said you were an angel. I only want, alas! what you refuse to give me, your confidence, your affection. Well, I am off to Stephana. She never refuses me anything, and I will tell her that it is in her duty to marry Valerian."

"I hope she will tell you that it is your duty to leave other people's marriages alone."

"And wills? Well, God bless you, my dear Christina. We part in peace, I hope?"

"You are not going off on a journey, are you?" asked Miss Hermitage.

"No, indeed," was the reply. "I could but think of yourself. The gruel basin, the hot poultice slight—forgive me, Christina—the slight redness of the nose—all these things awaken anxiety when we are—well, no longer what we used to be."

"Come, Constantine, the luncheon bell! You must really stay we go. Stay, I say, for Stephana's genius does not lie to the direction of eating and drinking."

Raillery and banter will, however, often do what argument fails to accomplish, and Colette's quick mind soon discovered that her friend and patroness was pondering. Something, the little Frenchwoman knew not what, had set her thinking. She entered airily as usual into the day's distractions, with recovered health recovering her spirits. But she had evidently a weight on her mind.

Now there was one person in the wide world from whom Miss Hermitage had no secrets, and that one person was Mademoiselle Colette. They had summered and wintered each other (to use a rustic phrase) for upward of fifty years. They had borne together the thralldom of youth, and in company had welcomed the deliverance that came with age. And, strange to say, the materialism and self-indulgence of the one had never infected the other.

Colette, now an old woman, was all pure, unalloyed musicalness and sweetness, as when, an orphan girl of twenty, she had been received as companion to the miser's daughter. Did the pair love each other? Rather did Miss Hermitage love any one's—for Colette's warm heart embraced all the world.

Who can answer such a question? But if not affection, at least generosity or gratitude made the rich woman act a protector's part to the penniless one. Colette, to use her patroness's words, had everything she wanted. Confidence, like love, is accorded to those who do not go out of their way in search of it, and Colette during fifty years had never asked Miss Hermitage a personal question. She knew well enough that in due time she should learn her friend's most secret thoughts, and so it was now.

"Colly," said Miss Hermitage, one morning, "I am going to send Arthura and Valerian away to-morrow for a week. The servants must go too, except Bates, who is as deaf that she would not hear a cannon-ball going off under her ear. Mr. Brown is coming."

"I am very glad," answered Colette, always on the side of right and kindliness.

"Why you should be glad I can not conceive. What difference can it make to you?"

"I was thinking of Valerian," said the little Frenchwoman, meekly.

"One would suppose, to hear you and Constantine talk of Valerian, that I had never done anything for him. He has as much as he deserves, I am sure."

"So have we all; some of us perhaps more," was the reply.

"You talk like a child, Colette. As if deserving had anything to do with the good or evil fortune that befalls us in this world. Nobody deserves anything. We just take our chance as people do with lottery tickets. Well, Mr. Brown is coming, as I hope you will now be satisfied."

Nothing more was said, but next day by noon Miss Hermitage's house wore a look of funereal gloom. The shutters of the ground-floor were closed, the blinds of the upper chambers were drawn. Not a sign of life was to be seen. Some careless passers-by supposed that Miss Hermitage had been very suddenly stricken down with mortal sickness. Others that she had lost her cousin Mr. Constantine. The world of acquaintance took it for granted that she was, as the phrase goes, "out of town." No one surmised the true state of the case. Closeted with her faithful old friend and legal adviser Brown, Colette stationed outside the door but even the deaf old woman-servant left in charge might peep through the key hole, Miss Hermitage was at length making her will.

CHAPTER X.

Never spring tide gave more seductive hues of sunshine holiday than on that April morning when Arthura and Valerian found themselves on unexpectedly and enchantingly east aloft. How fair and pleasant looked the world! The zephyrs breathed softly from the south, the brilliant metallic sea was changed to gently ruffled azure, the fishing-barks, instead of battling for very life with fury of wind and wave, glided lazily or lay at anchor, as if the secret day would last forever.

And life was theirs for seven whole days. No more amusement to think of and no scheme, no more happy devices necessary daily, hourly, momentarily.

They could both be so dull as they pleased till twelve of the clock that day week. No wonder they breathed, not common air, but intoxicating ether, and hardly touched the ground as they went. Many an quiet any railway station be, perhaps is the most exhilarating place in the universe. The very railway whistle has sweetest music in it, the bustle and turbulence intoxicate the senses. We are going somewhere; we are leaving somebody behind. Let us pardon our ancestors their bloody encounters, their savage pastimes. They had no railway to whirl them in a twinkling from routine and relations.

Arthura, a hacker beside her holding reticule and wraps, looked more like a queen than a young lady living, as the phrase goes, by her wits. A duchess might well have envied that erect carriage, that fine glow of spirit, that faultless set of the head, not to speak of eyes and brow.

Valerian came up, cold as ice, and economic as if he has wore livery.

"There is your ticket," he said. "We must travel by sea-coast, as there is no other train for an hour. I go to the smoking carriage, to will say 'good-by,' and wish you a pleasant journey." Then having seen to the proper arrangement of her bagatelles, he took formal leave. In another minute the train moved off, slowly following the sea-line. The radiant girl looked out of the window, smiling to herself, laughing in herself ha very joy. But for the absurdity of it she must have burst out singing. A week, a long unending week of home, of freedom! And Steppie and Walter and Benjamine? What a surprise in store for them! She saw already Walter's pale cheek crimson with delight at the news. His own Arthure! and for seven round days! Tears of exquisite expectation filled her eyes. She could no longer contain herself. She was hardly crying at last—crying from pure gladness of soul. When the train stopped but a minute, the door of her carriage opened, and Valerian jumped in. Without a word of apology he sat down. The cold ceremoniousness of a quarter of an hour before had vanished. The mask was thrown aside. Her lover stood bending over her, kissing away her tears.

"The joy! the surprise!" was all she could say, whilst she wept on, he smiling reproaches.

"Listen!" he said, flushed, trembling with haste and eagerness. "A wonderful idea has just flashed across my mind. You must not, you must not, say no. In the other end of the train is a protégée of Colette's, a French school-mistress, going back with her little girl to France. Let us go with them. Let us spend our holiday on the other side of the water."

All her doubts, misgivings, and hesitancy to read at a glance. Her pure, candid face opened to him as a book.

"I know this lady, Colette's friend, well. She would take care of you. If the adventure is discovered, no blame could be attached to either of us. But it will not be discovered. I will send her over to secrecy. And you shall have your promised holiday in the summer to spend at home. That I promise—I guarantee."

Still Arthura unnerved.

"Think of me," he urged. "I could but see you at your step-mother's. We have so much to say to each other, and here is an opportunity."

Arthura said never a word.

"Oh, as must go," he cried. "You need just such a distraction. And France! France! To be in France! Think of that!"

But Arthura could not think at all. The sudden sense of freedom, the relief at throwing aside the mask worn so many months, had quite overcome her. She only wanted a quiet place in which to weep happy tears.

"Then I decide for you," he said. "I not only decide, I take all the responsibility. We will go with this lady. You shall say under her roof, and every day we will run about to the country together."

That notion of running about in the country with Valerian made Arthura smile through her tears. She let him do as he would, only begging to be left alone for the present—till they were on the boat, till they were in France, she said.

* Began in Harper's Weekly No. 1373.

"Till we get back again!" smiled Valerian.

But he honored her, getting out as the next station, and Arthere had a priceless hour to herself. No one was by.

She could ease her too happy heart by tears, not the first, certes, of her young life, but the first—perhaps the last—shed out of pure unalloyed joy. Was ever wept tears for being too happy?

Then the train stopped, and there came the excitement of a first little sea voyage. Arthere, placed between her new friends, looked around her with quick, eager eyes.

Nothing she saw now was ever forgotten: the strange sweet aspect of English landscape as it gradually faded from view; the pure waters through which the vessel moved like a living thing that knows its way: most of all the ships coming and going, the nest birds darting hither and thither. All was life and movement on a hint she had imagined to herself must be the solitary, silent ocean. Then as gradually dawned a beautiful old town built high on a green hill—an look of England here: church towers, house-tops, even chimneys, had an outlandish appearance. The place seemed to smile a welcome, and gentle gales breathed from the sea-shore. Nearer and nearer they came till they were close under the bustling harbor and quaint town, both bright as in a picture.

The sailors on the quay shouted, using foreign speech, and military music could be heard from a neighboring square. A little convent bell tinkled sweetly in the suburbs.

At last the keel grazed the sand, and the travellers landed one by one under the waving tricolor.

They had set foot on the soil of happy France, the pleasant, pleasant land—land of liberty, of light-heartedness, and of love!

[to be continued.]

WHAT SOCIAL CLASSES OWE TO EACH OTHER.

By PROFESSOR W. G. SUMNER.

XI.

WHEREFORE WE SHOULD LOVE ONE ANOTHER.

Suppose that a man, going through a wood, should be struck by a falling tree and pinned down beneath it. Suppose that another man coming that way and finding him there should, instead of hastening to give or to bring aid, linger on lecture on the law of gravitation, taking the tree as an illustration. Suppose, again, that a person lecturing on the law of gravitation should state the law of falling bodies, and suppose that an objector should say: 'You state your law as a cold mathematical fact, and you declare that all bodies will fall conformably to it. How heartless!' You do not reflect that it may be a beautiful little child falling from a window.

These two suppositions may be of some use to us as illustrations.

Let us take the second first. It is the objection of the sentimentalist, and ridiculous as the mode of discussion appears when applied to the laws of natural philosophy, the sociologist is constantly met by objections of just that character. Especially when the subject under discussion is charity on any of its public forms, the attempt to bring method and clearness into the discussion is sure to be crossed by suggestions which are as far from the point and as foreign to any really intelligent point of view as the supposed speech to the illustration. In the first place, a child would fall just as a stone would fall. Nature's forces know no pity. Just so in sociology. The forces know no pity. In the second place, if a natural philosopher should discuss all the bodies which may fall, he would go entirely astray, and would certainly do no good. The same is true of the sociologist. He must concentrate, not scatter, and study laws, not all conceivable combinations of forces which may occur in practice. In the third place, nobody ever saw a body fall on the philosophers say it will fall, because they can accomplish nothing unless they study forces separately, and allow for their combined action to all concrete and actual phenomena. The same is true in sociology, with the additional fact that the forces and their combinations in sociology are far the most complex which we have to deal with. In the fourth place, any natural philosopher who should stop, after stating the law of falling bodies, to warn mothers not to let their children fall out of the window, would make himself ridiculous. Just so a sociologist who should attach moral applications and practical maxims to his investigations would entirely miss his proper business. There is the force of gravity as a fact in the world. If we understand this, the necessity of ours to conform to the action of gravity meets us at every step in our private life and personal experience. The fact in sociology is in no wise different.

If, for instance, we take political economy, that science does not teach an individual how to get rich. It is a social science. It treats of the laws of the material welfare of human societies. It is therefore only one science among all the sciences which inform us about the laws and conditions of our life on earth. Education has for its object to give a man knowledge of the conditions and laws of living, so that, in any case in which the individual stands face to face with the necessity of deciding what to do, if he is an educated man, he may know how to make a wise and intelligent decision. If he knows chemistry, physics, geology, and other sciences, he will know what he must encounter of obstacle or help in nature to what he proposes to do. If he knows physiology and hygiene, he will know what effects on health he must expect in one course or another. If he knows political economy, he will know what effect on wealth and on the welfare of one course or another will produce. There is no injunction, or "ought" in political economy at all. It does not assume to tell man what he ought or do any more than chemistry tells us that we ought to mix things, or mathematics that we ought to solve equations. It only gives one element necessary to an intelligent decision, and in every practical and concrete case the responsibility of deciding what to do rests on the man who has to act. The economist, therefore, does not say to any one, You ought never to give money to charity. He contradicts anybody who says, You ought to give money to charity, and, in opposition to any such person, he says, Let me show you what difference it makes to you, to others, or society, whether you give money to charity or not, on that you can make a wise and intelligent decision. Certainly there is no harder thing to do than to employ capital charitably. It would be extreme folly to say that nothing of that sort ought to be done, but I fully believe that to-day the next most pernicious thing to vice is charity in its broad and popular sense.

In the papers of which this is the last I have discussed the public and social relations of classes, and those social topics in which groups of persons are considered as groups or classes without regard to personal merits or demerits. I have relegated all charitable work to the domain of private relations, where personal acquaintance and personal estimates may furnish the proper limitations and guarantees. A man who had no sympathies and no sentiments would be a very poor creature, but the public charities, more especially the legislative charities, nourish no man's sympathies and sentiments. Furthermore, it ought to be distinctly perceived that any charitable and benevolent effect which any man desires to make redounding to his credit can do any good, lies entirely beyond the field of discussion. It would be an impertinent to prevent his effort as it is to force co-operation in an effort on some one who does not want to participate in it. What I choose to do by way of exercising my own sympathies under my own reason and consciences is one thing, what another man forces me to do of a sympathetic character, because his reason and consciences approve of it, is quite another thing.

What, now, is the reason why we should help each other? This carries us back to the other illustration with which we started. We may philosophize as coolly and correctly as we choose about our duties and about the laws of right living, no one of us lives up to what he knows. The man struck by the falling tree has perhaps been careless. We are all careless. Environed as we are by risks and perils, which befall us as misfortunes, no man of us is in a position to say, "I know all the laws, and am sure to obey them all; therefore I shall never need aid and sympathy." At the very best, one of us fails in one way and another in another, if we do not fail altogether. Therefore the man under the tree is the one of us who for the moment is smitten. It may be you to-morrow, and for us to-day. It is the common lenity to the ends of a common peril which gives us a kind of solidarity of interest to rescue the one for whom the chances of life have turned out badly just now. Probably the victim is to blame. He almost always is so. A lecture to that effect on the crisis of his peril would be out of place, because it would not fit the need of the moment, but it would be very much in place at another time when the need was to avert the repetition of such an accident to somebody else. Men, therefore, owe us men, on the chances and perils of this life, aid and sympathy, on account of the common participation in human frailty and folly. This observation, however, puts aid and sympathy on the field of private and personal relations, under the regulation of reason and conscience, and gives no ground for mechanical and nugatory schemes.

We may then distinguish four things:

1. The function of science is to investigate truth. Science is exclusive and impersonal. It investigates the force of gravity, and finds out the laws of that force, and has nothing to do with the weal or woe of [illegible] the application of the law.

2. The [illegible] as to what one ought to do are to be drawn by the [illegible] and conscience of the individual [illegible] is instructed by science. Let him take note of the force of gravity, and see to it that he does not walk off a precipice or get in the way of a falling body.

3. On account of the number and variety of perils of all kinds by which our lives are environed, and on account of ignorance, carelessness, and folly, we all neglect to obey the moral declarations which we have learned, so that, in fact, the wisest and the best of us are foolishly and suffer.

4. The law of sympathy, by which we share each others' burdens, is to do as we would be done by. It is not a scientific principle, and does not admit of such generalization or interpretation that A can tell B what this law enjoins on B to do. Hence the relations of sympathy and sentiment are essentially limited to two persons only, and they can not be made a basis for the relations of groups of persons, as for discussion by any third party.

The current discussions about the claims and rights of social classes on each other are radically erroneous and fallacious. If we refuse to recognize any classes as existing in society when perhaps a claim sought to be set up that the wealthy, educated, and virtuous have acquired special rights and precedence, we certainly can not recognize any classes when it is attempted to establish such distinctions for the sake of imposing burdens and duties on one group for the benefit of others. The men who have not done their duty in this world never can be equal to those who have done their duty more or less well. If words like vice and foolish, thrifty and extravagant, prudent and negligent, have any meaning in language, then it must make some difference how people behave in this world, and the difference will appear in the position they acquire in the body of [illegible] in relation to the chances of life. They may then be classified in reference to those facts. Such classes always will exist, as other social distinctions ran endure. If, then, we look on the origin and definition of these classes, we shall find it impossible to deduce any obligations which one of them bears on the other. The class distinctions simply result from the different degrees of success with which men have availed themselves of the chances which were presented on them. Instead of endeavoring to redistribute the acquisitions which have been made between the existing classes, our aim should be to increase, multiply, and extend the chances. Such is the work of civilization. Every old error or abuse which is removed opens new chances of development to all the new energy of society. Every improvement in education, science, art, or government expands the chances of man on earth. Such expansion is on guarantee of equality. On the contrary, if there be liberty, some will profit by the chances eagerly and some will neglect them altogether. Therefore the greater the chances the more unequal will be the fortune of these two sets of men. So it ought to be, in all justice and right reason. But if we can expand the chances, we can count on a general and steady growth of civilization and advancement of society by and through its best members. In the prosecution of these chances we all owe to each other good will, mutual respect, and mutual guarantees of liberty and security. Beyond this nothing can be affirmed as a duty of one group to another in a free state. The yearning after equality is the offspring of envy and covetousness, and there is no possible plan for satisfying that yearning which can do aught else than rob A to give to B; consequently all such plans nourish some of the meanest vices of human nature, waste capital, and overthrow civilization.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

IT is a somewhat roundabout way comes news of a remarkable discovery said to have been made by an Australian electrician. The London Times says the Rev. Dr Gilbert, of New Zealand, told an audience recently that Dr Gundrah, of Victoria, had constructed an electrical apparatus which produced with wonderful fidelity pictures of objects that were at a distance, somewhat after the manner of the reproduction of sounds by the telephone. According to Mr. Gilbert, a trial of the new instrument has taken place in Melbourne in the presence of forty scientific and public men, and, sitting in a darkened room, they saw projected on a large dish of white burnished metal the wave course at Flemington, with as many moving figures. "Minute details," says the account, "stood out with perfect fidelity to the original, and as they looked at the wonderful picture through binocular glasses it was difficult to imagine that they were not actually on the course itself, and moving among those whose actions they could so completely scan." The new instrument is called the electroscope.

A NEW trade paper is called The Corset. Of course it has announced that it has "come to stay."

THE great increase in the number of apartment-houses in this city has checked the advance in rents, and has caused landlords to take thought as to how they may keep their property profitable as an investment. Many families who live in apartments store their household goods from the 1st of May till the 1st of October, spend the intervening months in the country, and reduce their yearly expenditures by so doing. The landlords are striving to do away with the 1st of May as the day of moving, and to substitute for it the 1st of October—an arrangement that would secure three tenants the year around. At the present rate of building, the prices of apartments of the better class will soon come down to figures at which families of moderate means can afford to retain their apartments throughout the year, and still enjoy the summer months by the sea-side or in the mountains.

MAKING some comparisons between Wall Street and Texas, a paper says that land in the former location sells at the rate of fifteen million dollars an acre, while in the Lone Star State it can be bought for six cents an acre, and that in Texas a steer costs fifteen dollars, while a New-Yorker would gladly pay fifteen dollars to have a Texas steer taken away if it happened to be in his yard. It may be added that a Wall Street "steer" sometimes costs as much on a good-sized patch of land in the same region.

MAY 24 has been fixed upon as the day for opening the East River Bridge. It should be remembered that this is not a date following a postponement. If the disappointments which have attended the work from the beginning not continued, the date of the opening will have to be fixed at least once more. The interesting question of tolls still engages the attention of the trustees.

IT is announced that the museum of the Dead-letter Office in Washington is now open to the public. Persons who know of love-letters which have gone astray bearing their signatures will have to get on foot uneasy till they are assured that the sanctity of such epistles is not laid bare in the museum, which, according to an account, is "very attractive to visitors." The display is mainly of the curious articles which have been committed to the mail-boxes, but which, for one reason or another, could not be delivered to the persons for whom they were intended.

SEVERAL opossums have been captured recently in the streets of Washington, and it is said that the Smithsonian and Agricultural parks "are full of them." It is suggested that 'possum hunts by moonlight may take their place among the fall attractions of the capital.

IT seems that the Orphans' Court is the proper tribunal in Philadelphia before which to carry quadrupeds concerning the rights of dogs. The late Rev. Mr. Conner left a legacy of ten dollars a week for the maintenance of his faithful dog, and designated Mary Tierney as the person who should care for the animal and receive the pay. The executor of the will refuses to make the weekly payments, and Mary Tierney has filed a petition in the Orphans' Court, asking that he be ordered to pay up from the 1st of February.

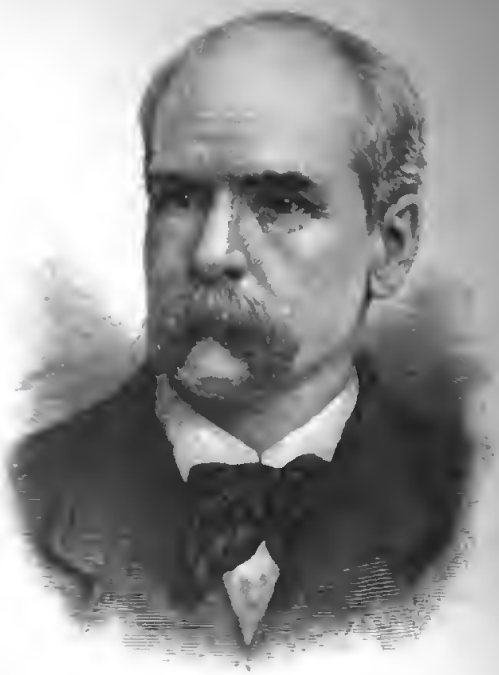
A GRANITE quarrying company of Missouri has employed a considerable force of laborers for five months in drilling a hole into a mountain. Eight thousand pounds of powder will be packed in the hole and exploded. It is hoped that the shock will rend the mountain asunder, loosening sufficient granite to keep the men busy for two years cutting it into paving blocks. An account of the work says it was expected that the blast would be ready to be fired about the 1st of May. Heavy blasts have usually proved disappointing, notably the submarine blast at Hell Gate a few years ago, which, instead of rending Manhattan Island in two or deluging two cities with East River water, went off very tamely, and disappointed the thousands who had secured advantageous positions from which to view the catastrophe.

CLERKS ON THEIR WAY HOME FROM BUSINESS.

OLD STAT PLAINDEALER—WAGES, TWENTY DOLLARS A WEEK.

MODERN EXTRAVAGANCE—WAGES, FIVE DOLLARS A WEEK.

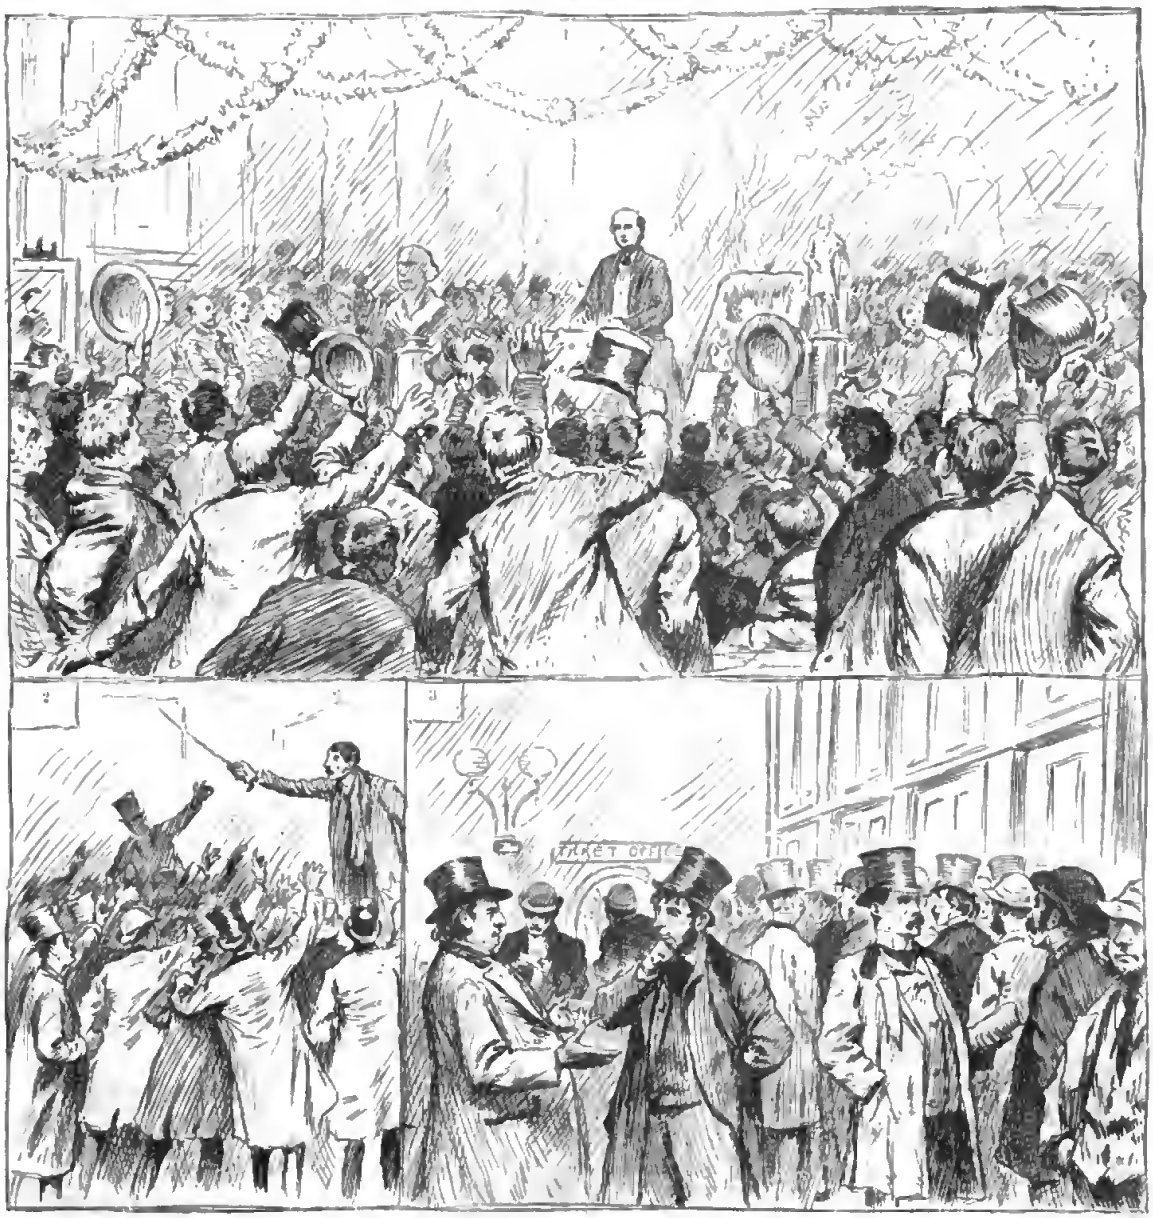
ANDREW MASON, SUPERINTENDENT OF THE UNITED STATES ASSAY OFFICE, NEW YORK.—Photographed by Dana.—[See Page 279.]



THE LATE JAMES PARK, JUN.
Photographed by Dana.—[See Page 278.]

1 and 2. White Deer. 3. A Fresh Specimen. 4. An Owl Screen. 5. Lions Fighting. 6. Tenia.

EXHIBITION OF THE SOCIETY OF AMERICAN TAXIDERMISTS, LYRIC HALL, NEW YORK.—Drawn by Daniel Beard.—[See Page 278.]



1. Reception of Mr Egan. 2. Pennsylvania Delegates in Private Session 3. Delegates presenting Credentials and obtaining Tickets for the Floor.

THE IRISH CONVENTION AT PHILADELPHIA.—Sketches by our Special Artist.

BURYING THE LAND LEAGUE.

In the City of Brotherly Love there assembled last week as delegates from the several States of the Union and representatives of the several patriotic Irish organizations throughout the country a Horticultural Hall full of Irishmen. Their object in meeting was to bury the Land League—"brutally murdered by the coercion of the British government to Ireland"—and to organize in its place another and a more powerful association.

This object was duly accomplished, and with circumstances of moderation and self respect that invest the closing scene of the Land League's existence with a dignity that had not uniformly characterized it when in full health and vigor. For no secret was made of the fact that a considerable section of the Irish Convention which has been performing such momentous functions in the Horticultural Hall of Philadelphia was in favor of retaining the Land League's name as well as its plan of operations, or that another and smaller section was anxious to give to the new association a more violent and "unconstitutional" platform than its predecessor. Fortunately both "factions," as speakers at the Convention called them, gave way at the last, and with the double object of showing that they were Irishmen before they were partisans, and that they were advocates of an policy "likely to embarrass Mr Parnell in his great work," they united with the majority to squash obstruction and promote harmony of opinion and action.

It was hardly, however, with as good a grace as the rest that O'Donovan Rossa yielded to circumstances. He went to the Convention inspired with the belief that he would eventually prove the dictator of the Parliament. But he found the odds in favor of moderate counsels overwhelming, and the general inclination to orderly discussion too unmistakable to permit him to venture on any experiments with combustible topics, or any pyrotechny of inflammable arguments. Indeed, he discovered that it was very possible that he might not be admitted into the Convention at all and to make this impossible came provided with a press pass, and took his seat at the reporters' table. When spoken to, however, he announced with characteristic assurance that he intended to join the Convention as "the delegate of the Supreme Council of the Skirmishing Fund," let all the moderate party say him nay if they liked, and that his "credentials"—consisting of a certificate of a British jail in the shape of a British pardon, sealed with the prodigious seal of the Home Secretary's "merciful department"—were sufficient to insure him a seat in any convention of patriotic Irishmen. But to his surprise he found these credentials altogether inadequate to pass him, notoriously charged with explosives as he was, into the deliberative councils of United Irish-America. So Rossa had to plead justification for admission on the ground that he was the elect of the Order of United Irishmen, and on this plea he succeeded in making good his boast, and entering the Convention as one of the delegates of New York.

That the chief apostle of criminal agitation should thus have had to divest himself of his war paint before being permitted to join the comparatively tranquil assembly of his fellow patriots is a matter for congratulation; but we would remind the leaders of the new movement that the teaching of all history is this, that when any party consists of a moderate and a violent faction, the latter always gains the upper hand eventually. Moderation and enthusiasm do not go together, and as soon as the men of temperate counsels begin to flag in their efforts at control, the extremists gradually oust them from the leadership, and take the helm themselves. And if the day ever comes when the avowed advocates of dynamite and assassination shall obtain the control of the movement for alienating the sentiment of Ireland, on that day the sympathies of the whole American nation will be irrevocably alienated.

The meeting, indeed, was strongly Hibernian—especially under the genial chairmanship of Father Denney, whose abundant mother-wit found a repartee for every offender, and so escape in a joke from every dilemma—for very pronounced throughout the sittings was the Irishman's chivalrous respect to the fair sex. Every entry and exit of Mrs. Parnell was the signal for enthusiastic cheering, every reference to her dead daughter, the late Miss Fanny Parnell, a pretext for expressions of condolence and sympathy, while the lady delegates on the platform were repeatedly welcomed with plaudits. Equally prominent also was the Hibernian instinct for the parade of insignia, and not only the coats of the delegates, but the platform and walls of the hall, abounded in those mysterious legends and devices, always running to gilt harps on green ribbons, so dear to the Irish patriots. Mixed with these, in judicious concession, as it were, to the United States, were various emblems of America and her Constitution, and on the platform a large bust of Washington unfairly divided the honors with a small plaster statuette of Parnell, chiefly remarkable, in an artistic sense, for the amplitude of those nether garments which one memorable Sunday morning in 1880 the free and independent voters of Enniscorthy so nearly pulled off Charles Stewart's person, in their sudden priest-led indignation against "dictators."

But times have changed since then, and the priests who tried four years ago to hold back "the finest pianistry in the world" from joining the no-rent agitation, were conspicuous to Philadelphia by their numbers, as fewer than forty being returned as delegates. But who could have foreseen, standing on that bleak hillside of Balla four years ago, and hearing Parnell and Davitt, and Dillon and Costello, delivering their first speeches on behalf of an evicted widow and her family, with the keen wind sweeping across the dreary bog-land, and the sharp sleet driving in their faces, that the "no-rent agitation" would grow into a Land League, and the Land League into an Irish-American National Convention? Or that an agitation so modestly begun as an Irish farmstead, with a handful of Galway farmers for audience, would have closed its first era in such a convention of American citizens as Philadelphia has just witnessed?

STATISTICS from the Census Department show that New Haven, Conn., is the healthiest seaport town in the world. Its clean streets, ... and beautiful driven, both on the shore and in the country, are ... fully attractive to large numbers of our city people ... that eminently ... with Dr. Holland, who said in an article in Scribner's a year or two ago that the City of Elms was "a charming place," and, he added, "Moseley's New Haven House is a peculiarly excellent place at which to stop."—New York Tribune.

We can add to the above hearty word, that the sanitary condition and the comfort, as well as the table, are not excelled by any hotel in the country. The air of New Haven is delightful for invalids and those seeking rest.—[Adv.]

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE
IN SEASICKNESS.

S. S. PARKER, Wellington, O., says: "While crossing Lake Erie, I gave it to some passengers who were seasick, and it gave immediate relief."—[Adv.]

THE PRESIDENT'S FORGETFULNESS

In not taking with him a supply of Dr. THOMAS'S Venetian Liniment on his Florida fishing trip; it would have relieved him from the torment of mosquitoes, gnats, and ticks, prevented the sun from blistering the skin, made the water pure, and relieved many ailments that flesh is heir to. Fishermen will do well to note that this great remedy can be found at all the druggists.—[Adv.]

BURNETT'S COCOAINE
Softens the hair when harsh and dry.
Soothes the irritated scalp.
Affords the richest lustre.
Prevents the hair from falling off.
Promotes its healthy, vigorous growth.—[Adv.]

ALL persons afflicted with Dyspepsia, Diarrhea, Colic, and all kinds of Indigestions will find immediate relief and sure cure by using ANGOSTURA BITTERS. The only genuine is manufactured by Dr. J. G. B. SIEGERT & SONS.—[Adv.]

THOUSANDS of people testify to the merits of Piso's Cure for Consumption.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1878.

BAKER'S
Breakfast Cocoa.

Warranted absolutely pure Cocoa, from which the excess of Oil has been removed. It has three times the strength of Cocoa mixed with Starch, Arrowroot or Sugar, and is therefore far more economical. It is delicious, nourishing, strengthening, easily digested, and admirably adapted for invalids as well as for persons in health.

Sold by Grocers everywhere.

W. BAKER & CO., Dorchester, Mass.

MINTON'S ART AND ENAMELED TILES.

China Works, Stoke-upon-Trent.
Also, THE CAMPBELL BRICK & TILE CO.'S
Encaustic and Geometrical Floor Tiles, Mosaics, &c.
THOS. ASPINWALL & SON,
75 & 77 West 23d St., New York.
Sole Agents in the United States.

Messrs. JAMES McCREERY & CO.

have transferred from their wholesale warerooms to retail counters their reserve stock of Black and Colored Satin Merveilleux and Levantine.

The qualities formerly sold at $1 75 and $2 50 will be reduced to $1 25 and $1 50 respectively.

Messrs. JAMES McCREERY & CO.,

Broadway, corner 11th St.,

New York City.

"I owe my Restoration to Health and Beauty to the CUTICURA REMEDIES."

Testimonial of a Boston lady.

DISFIGURING Humors, Humiliating Eruptions, Itching Tortures, Scrofula, Salt Rheum, and Infantile Humors cured by the CUTICURA REMEDIES.

CUTICURA RESOLVENT, the new blood purifier, cleanses the blood and perspiration of impurities and poisonous elements, and thus removes the cause.

CUTICURA, the great Skin Cure, instantly allays Itching and Inflammation, clears the Skin and Scalp, heals Ulcers and Sores, and restores the Hair.

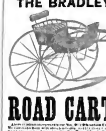
CUTICURA SOAP, an exquisite Skin Beautifier and Toilet Requisite, prepared from CUTICURA, is indispensable in treating Skin Diseases, Baby Humors, Skin Blemishes, Sunburn, and Greasy Skin.

CUTICURA REMEDIES are absolutely pure, and the only infallible Blood Purifiers and Skin Beautifiers.

Sold everywhere. Price, Cuticura, 50 cents; Soap, 25 cents; Resolvent, $1.

POTTER DRUG AND CHEMICAL CO., Boston, Mass.

THE BRADLEY



ROAD CART

Absolute freedom from horse motion ... We ... Single Road Cart is used very ... weighs 100 lbs., and ...

THREE STYLES weighing from 90 to 125 lbs. Prices $55 to $80.

... Send for Illustrated Price List.

BRADLEY & CO. SYRACUSE, N. Y. ESTABLISHED 1832.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

Cloth Lap Robes and Rugs, for Carriages and Buggies. Steamer, Racquet, and Bath Robes; Smoking Jackets, and a fine selection of the latest styles in Furnishing Goods and Neckwear for Gentlemen. Also, Sun and Rain Umbrellas.

Broadway and 19th St.

TIMKEN SPRING VEHICLES!

Easiest riding Vehicle made. ... The Springs lengthen and shorten according to the weight they carry. ... Manufactured and sold by all the leading Carriage Builders and Dealers.

HENRY TIMKEN, Patentee, ST. LOUIS, MO.

ROYAL

BAKING POWDER

Absolutely Pure.

This powder never varies. A marvel of purity, strength, and wholesomeness. More economical than the ordinary kinds, and cannot be sold in competition with the multitude of low-test, short-weight, alum or phosphate powders. Sold only in cans.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., 106 Wall Street, N. Y.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT

OF MEAT. FINEST AND CHEAPEST MEAT FLAVORING STOCK FOR SOUPS, MADE DISHES, AND SAUCES.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT

OF MEAT. An invaluable and palatable tonic in all cases of weak digestion and debility. "Is a success and a boon for which nations should feel grateful."—See "Medical Press," "Lancet," "British Medical Journal," &c.

CAUTION.—Genuine only with the fac-simile of Baron Liebig's Signature in Blue Ink across the Label. This caution is necessary, owing to various cheap and inferior substitutes being in the market.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT

OF MEAT. To be had of all Storekeepers, Grocers, and Chemists. Sole Agents for the United States (wholesale only), C. DAVID & CO., 9 Fenchurch Avenue, London, England.

Sold wholesale in New York by PARK & TILFORD, SMITH & VANDERBEEK, ACKER, MERRALL, & CONDIT, McKESSON & ROBBINS, H. K. & F. B. THURBER & CO., W. H. SCHIEFFELIN & CO.

SUPERIOR FISHING TACKLE.

We offer a fine 3-joint Fly Rod, 25-yard Brass Reel, 100-ft Linen Line, 3 Flies, 3 Hooks to gut, and Leader, complete, by express, for $3 00; by mail, postpaid, $3 50. Sample flies by mail postpaid, 75 cents per dozen, $1 00 ... three-piece Trout Rod, 1 Float, 1 Brass Reel, 100 ft Linen Line, ½ dozen Hooks, 1 Sinker, 1 Gut Leader, all for $1 75.

Just published, the largest and most complete Catalogue of all sporting goods ever issued—on Lawn-Tennis, Base-Ball, Archery, Cricket, Foot-Ball, Fishing, Boating, and Gymnasium and Firemen's Goods, and all the latest novelties. 228 large pages, 2000 illustrations, on fine tinted paper. Price, by mail, 25 cts.

PECK & SNYDER, 126 to 130 Nassau St., N. Y.

AGENTS can now grasp a fortune. Outfit worth $10 free. Address E. G. RIDEOUT & CO., 10 Barclay St., N. Y.

General Purchasing Agents
DONNELL & CO.,
7 WEST 14TH ST., NEW YORK.

BUYERS AND FORWARDERS TO ALL PARTS OF THE COUNTRY OF EVERY DESCRIPTION OF GOODS, IN LARGE OR SMALL QUANTITIES. HOUSE-FURNISHING GOODS, CLOTHING, DRY GOODS, BOOKS, STATIONERY, MUSIC, HATS, SHOES, JEWELRY, DRUGS, GROCERIES, SEEDS, FARMING IMPLEMENTS, &c. NO COMMISSION CHARGED. SEND FOR CIRCULAR.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address H. HALLETT & Co., Portland, Maine.

Established 1818. Beware of Counterfeits.

Copenhagen — Peter F. Heering's — Cherry Cordial

7 Prize Medals. Gold Medal 1878 Paris.

And be especially careful to see that the Imperial Royal ...

For sale by Wine Dealers generally. JOHN DUNCAN'S SONS, Union Square, New York.

The AUTOMATIC POCKET. An attachment to the pocket ... holds the watch secure ... protects the case from ... wearing and soiling. ... Automatic Pocket ... Philadelphia, Pa. ... Agents wanted.

DAKOTA.

Quick, safe, and sure investments for capitalists or residents in Oriska, Barnes County, Dakota. A new town on Northern Pacific Railroad, at crossing of N. W., twenty miles west of Dalrymple Farm. Special opening for Merchants in every line. Mechanics in demand; wages good. Well-settled country, in the famous wheat belt. Correspondence solicited. References: HATCH, HAYS, & CO., New York. First National Bank, Chicago. Address PERKINS, ROBBINS, & CO., Bankers, Oriska, Dakota.

LADIES!

... Hair Solvent ... permanently ... superfluous hair ... Champion's Secret develops the Bust ... Send ... for particulars. ... CHEMICAL ... Philadelphia, Pa.

FREE. NEW ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE OF Scrap Pictures, Visiting and Advertising Cards, Palettes and Printing Presses, including new set of Imported Cards, sent on any address for 6 cts. CLARK CARD CO., Box 22, Brooklyn, N. Y.

WANTED 8 or 10 BOOK AGENTS

... pluck and enterprise ... GENERAL AGENTS to hire and train others to introduce a NEW WORK of extraordinary merit and great salability. Positions are worth $1,200 to $2,000 a year. Address, giving full particulars of experience, age, etc., HUBBARD BROS., 723 Chestnut St., Phila., Pa.

CARLETON'S TREASURY of KNOWLEDGE. The best ... book ever known. The largest discount. Circulars free. Agents address G. W. CARLETON & CO., Publishers, N. Y.

40 Chromo Visiting Cards, no 2 alike, for 10cts., name on, and Illustrated Premium List, 10c. Warranted best sold. Agents wanted. L. JONES & Co., Nassau, N. Y.

SEELEY'S HARD RUBBER PILE PIPE

Applies any ointment directly to parts affected, thereby curing when other remedies fail. Conveniently carried in the vest pocket, ready for use, without pain or inconvenience, affording immediate relief. Sold by all druggists (accompanied with a package of Seeley's Ointment) or sent by mail for $2, which are printed the ... Seeley's Truss Establishments, 1347 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa., or 74 Fleet Street, London, England.

SCRAP PICTURES. 280 Fine Pictures by mail on receipt of 75 cents, stamps. WHITING, 50 Nassau St., N. Y.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine.

"BOKER'S BITTERS." THE OLDest and Best Stomach Bitters known—unequalled for their medicinal properties, and for their fineness as a cordial. To be had in Quarts and Pints. L. FUNKE, Jr., Sole Manufacturer and Proprietor, 78 John St., N. Y. P. O. Box 1029.

All issues of WESTERN BONDS! BOUGHT & SOLD by T. J. CHEW, Jr. Investment Banker, ST. JOSEPH, MO. City of ST. JOSEPH, BUCHANAN CO., Mo., and other DEFAULTED BONDS purchased at Best Rates.

LADIES, ATTENTION! We will send to any one sending name and address and mentioning this paper a beautiful picture post free. BROWN BROS., 1617 Wallace St., Phila. P.O. Box H. R.

$72 A WEEK. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly Outfit free. Address TRUE & Co., Augusta, Maine.

Lady Agents can secure permanent employment and good salary selling Queen City Skirt and Stocking Supporters, etc. Sample outfit Free. Address Queen City Suspender Co., Cincinnati, O.

CARDS. An Elegant New Set of Cards for 3c. stamp. W. H. PRINGLE, Rochester, N. Y.

40 Gold & Silver Chromo Cards, no 2 alike, with name, 10c., postpaid. G. I. REED & Co., Nassau, N. Y.

LUNDBORG'S PERFUMES.
EDENIA AND MARÉCHAL NIEL ROSE.

CASTORIA
for Infants and Children.

Castoria promotes Digestion and overcomes Flatulency, Constipation, Sour Stomach, Diarrhoea, and Feverishness. It insures health and natural sleep, without morphine.

"Castoria is so well adapted to Children that I recommend it as superior to any prescription known to me." H. A. ARCHER, M. D., 82 Portland Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

What gives our Children rosy cheeks,
What cures their fevers, makes them sleep;
'Tis Castoria.

When babies fret and cry by turns,
What cures their colic, kills their worms,
But Castoria.

What quickly cures Constipation,
Sour Stomach, Colds, Indigestion,
But Castoria.

Farewell then to Morphine Syrups,
Castor Oil and Paregoric, and
Hail Castoria!

CENTAUR LINIMENT—an absolute cure for Rheumatism, Sprains, Burns, Galls, &c. The most Powerful and Penetrating Pain-relieving and Healing Remedy known to man.

30 PIECES CHOICE MUSIC FREE TO EVERY READER OF THIS PAPER.

The publishers of KENDALL'S ILLUSTRATED MONTHLY MAGAZINE, an Elegantly Printed and Beautifully Illustrated Periodical, which is highly praised by both press and public, and is replete with literary entertainment for the home circle, having departments to interest and instruct all ages, desiring to add to the already very large circulation, make the following most generous and astounding offer: On receipt of 27 cents (or nine 3-cent postage stamps) to cover cost of postage, packing, and advertising, they agree to send their Magazine for Three Months, and in addition to send THIRTY PIECES of new, choice and popular MUSIC, by the most celebrated American and Foreign composers, all having complete words and music. They are the same pieces that are sold singly at 30 and 40 cents, and would cost at usual music store prices over 1,000 times ... In consideration of our liberality we request persons receiving the music, to show it to friends and to state from whom it was obtained. We feel confident that we shall be well repaid for our generosity by receiving thousands of yearly subscriptions from those who receive the Magazine for three months as above. ADDRESS AT ONCE
(Please return this notice with your order.)

KENDALL & CO., 5 Pemberton Square, Boston, Mass.

THE PREMIUM
to the Wives of Grocers has been pronounced by all who have seen it to be the handsomest and most valuable ever offered by a manufacturer to make the trade familiar with his name. The Case itself is a magnificent one, and the [illegible] of beautiful pattern, and of the finest quality

DONT BE A CLAM

CLAMS ARE NOT A PROPER MODEL FOR A HUMAN BEING TO COPY AFTER they are wedded to their old clam-like notions:—they open their shells to take in their accustomed food, but they shut up very tight when anything new comes along

FOR THEY ARE CLAMS

AND DONT PROPOSE TO ALLOW THINGS TO PENETRATE THEIR SHELLS THAT WERE UNKNOWN TO THEIR GRANDFATHER CLAMS AND TO THEIR GRANDMOTHER CLAMS:—

A Clam is not a good thing for a Housekeeper to copy after:—

A Clam is not a good thing for a Farmer to copy after:—is not a good thing for a Grocer to copy after:—

A WIDE-AWAKE HOUSEKEEPER will TRY new ways that are endorsed by leading newspapers:—

A WIDE-AWAKE FARMER will try a Butter Worker or a Grain Binder:—

A WIDE-AWAKE GROCER will try a new Molasses Gate and a new Coal Oil Can and will buy the kind of goods his customers call for:—

Of course if a woman tries every new thing that she hears of she will often be deceived;—but there is no sensible man or sensible woman who does not know for certain that reliable publishers would not allow such continuous use of their papers for advertising The Frank Siddalls Soap if they had not first satisfied themselves that it was NOT A HUMBUG. Intelligent women are rapidly adopting new methods about their work, and those who have done so are already beginning to look down with pity on persons who are set in their old ways.

TO GROCERS' WIVES
We offer a Special Premium of a beautiful set of Plated Silver Knives and Forks, for simply giving The Frank Siddalls Soap a thorough trial.

SO DONT BE A CLAM

FOR LADIES TO READ

ONLY THINK! ONE SOAP FOR ALL USES!

To the Housekeeper and her Help, to the Boarding-House Mistress and her Lady Boarders, to the Farmer's Wife and her Daughters, for the Toilet and Bath of Every Lady of Refinement, The Frank Siddalls Soap offers great advantages in Economy of Use, in its effect on the skin, and in its freedom from injury to the fabric.

Among the Housekeepers of New England (where thrifty Housekeeping is proverbial) it has gained immense favor, and there is no better evidence of the merits of an article than to be able to say that it meets approval in the Homes of New England.

FOR LAUNDRY AND KITCHEN USE

JUST THINK! No Scalding or Boiling! No Smell on Wash-day! Clothes Clean and Beautifully White, and as Sweet as if never worn! No Rough, Red Hands! Clothes remain White even if put away for years! The Soap Positively Guaranteed not to injure even the Finest Laces!

Where water or fuel is scarce remember that with The Frank Siddalls Soap much less fuel is necessary and a few buckets of water is enough for a large wash.

JUST THINK! Flannels and Blankets as soft as when New! The most delicate Colored Lawns and Prints actually Brightened! A girl of 12 or 13 can easily do a large wash without even being tired! And best of all, the wash done in less than half the usual time!

Use The Frank Siddalls Soap for Washing Dishes;—it is the only Soap that leaves the dish-rag Sweet and White, and the only Soap that can be depended upon to remove the smell of Fish, Onions, etc., from forks and dishes. When you have a dirty dish-rag dont blame your servants; it is not their fault, for you have given them soap made of [illegible], and the result is a foul dish-rag. Use The Frank Siddalls Soap, made of Pure Beef Suet, and you will have a Clean, Sweet-smelling Cloth.

So here is the Housekeeper's Choice:
Common soap and a foul dish-rag—or—The Frank Siddalls Soap and a dish-rag to be proud of.

FOR HOUSE CLEANING

This is where The Frank Siddalls Soap appeals to the real ladylike Housekeeper. Use it for Scrubbing and Cleaning. Use it for Washing Paint, Windows and Mirrors. [illegible] ordinary soaps, as is well known, is not fit for washing glass, while The Frank Siddalls Soap is a most elegant thing for that purpose. Use it for Washing Marble Door Steps, Bureau Tops, Marble Statuary, Mantlepieces, etc.—It is the nicest thing for marble that can be imagined.

For Washing Bed Clothes and Bedding, even of Patients with Contagious and Infectious Diseases, and for washing utensils used in the Sick-room, it can be relied on to cleanse and purify without scalding or boiling a single article.

FOR WASHING BABIES AND BABY CLOTHES

Babies will not suffer with prickly heat [illegible] but The Frank Siddalls Soap is used, its ingredients being so pure and mild.

Dont use Soda to wash nursing bottles or gum tubes—dont even scald them—but wash them only with this Soap, and they will never get sour, but will always be sweet and clean.

FOR THE SCHOOL BOY AND GIRL

It is the best thing for washing Blackboards and school slates, leaving them entirely free from grease and without [illegible].

FOR THE TOILET IT IS SIMPLY PERFECTION

All Perfumes are injurious to the skin. The Frank Siddalls Soap is not perfumed, but has an agreeable odor from its ingredients that is always pleasant [illegible]. It should always be used for washing the hands and face of those troubled with Chapped Skin [illegible] it always leaves the skin soft and smooth.

No tooth-powder or tooth-wash will compare with it. A little on the tooth-brush makes the mouth, teeth and gums perfectly clean. It leaves a pleasant aromatic taste, a sweet breath, and a clean tooth-brush.

It is especially adapted [illegible]

PERSONS WHO BATHE WITH A SPONGE OR WASH-RAG will appreciate The Frank Siddalls Soap. Whenever either a Sponge or Wash-rag has a disagreeable smell it is due entirely to the so-called fine toilet soap that is such a favorite with you. It is the place of soap to keep a sponge or wash-rag sweet and clean, and The Frank Siddalls Soap will do it without any occasion to expose it to the air or sun.

When used for washing the head it is better than Shampooing; plenty of the lather should be left in the hair [illegible]. It entirely does away with the use of Hair Tonic, Bay Rum, Bandoline, Pomade, or any hair dressing. Used this way it removes dandruff, the hair will not collect dust, and there is no [illegible] soiling of the hat—Coat Collars, Hat Linings and Neck-wear will keep clean much longer.

—Try it for washing your Eye-Glasses and Spectacles.—

The Frank Siddalls Soap is superior to Benzine or Ammonia for Cleaning Coat Collars, and for removing Grease Spots, etc., and [illegible] the garment.

FOR MEN TO READ

ONLY THINK! ONE SOAP FOR ALL USES!

The Merchant and his Clerk, the Photographer, the Optician, the Artist, the Printer, the Actor, the Barber of the Turkish Bath, the Barber, the Hotel Keeper, the Stable, the Railroad, the Army and the Navy will all reap great benefit from the remarkable properties of The Frank Siddalls Soap.

FOR SHAVING

Its heavy, lasting lather is so different from that of any Shaving Soap that its superiority is [illegible]; the face never burns or smarts, no matter how dull the razor, how tender the skin, or how closely shaved, and the Sponge and Soap Cup will always be sweet-smelling.

IMPORTANT FOR SHIPBOARD AND ARMY USE.—It washes freely in hard water, and where water is scarce remember that The Frank Siddalls Way of Washing only takes a few buckets of water for a large wash.

FOR HORSES, HARNESS, CARRIAGES, etc.

It is vastly superior to Castile Soap for washing a horse's mane and tail, while for washing Sore Galls, Scratches, etc., it is indispensable. No stable is complete without it. For Harness, it is better than Harness Soap, thoroughly cleansing the leather and rendering it soft and pliable, while for washing cars and car windows, cleaning the running gear and bodies of fine carriages, it is without a rival, by its use paint and varnish will last much longer, and the Windows and Lamps will be as clear as crystal.

The Frank Siddalls Soap is elegant for washing Printing Ink from the hands, and from Printers' Rollers, Type, and Electrotypes, being much better than Benzine, and safer, as shocking accidents by fire often occur from Benzine, and parents whose children use Amateur Printing Presses should remember this.

Type and Rollers washed with The Frank Siddalls Soap are in splendid condition for immediate use, and will take the ink readily.

SPECIAL FOR PHYSICIANS

To the Physician, the Druggist, the Nurse and the Patient [illegible] more and more [illegible] rapidly superseding Imported Castile and [illegible] soaps for use in the Sick Room, the Nursery and Hospital.

—IN CASE OF INGROWING TOE NAILS—

In place of cotton-wool, a little of The Frank Siddalls Soap should be kept pressed between the nail and toe [illegible] its superiority over cotton-wool.

AS AN ANTISEPTIC AND DISINFECTANT

For Washing Old Running Sores, Bed Sores, Cuts, Wounds and Burns, for washing Chafed Places on Infants and Adults, for [illegible] Salt Rheum, Tetter, Ringworm, Itching Piles, [illegible] skin affected with Scaly [illegible], it is a most valuable aid to the Physician [illegible] cannot be accomplished by any other soap.

Letters from well-known Physicians, describing their experience in their practice with The Frank Siddalls Soap, leave no doubt of the truth of these assertions.

Use it for Washing Sores on the Feet caused by [illegible] wearing tight shoes. Always leave plenty of the lather on—dont rinse the lather off.

For washing [illegible] it is better than anything else.

ODD USES, QUAINT USES—SPECIAL USES

Eminent Physicians [illegible] skin diseases [illegible] Tetter, Ringworm, Pimples, etc., etc. [illegible] and cured all such troubles.

Artificial Teeth and Artificial Eyes [illegible] unimpaired when kept washed with The Frank Siddalls Soap.

It Washes Telescope Lenses and Photographers' Plates without a possibility of scratching [illegible] gratifying results in Schools of Design for washing [illegible].

For Washing Pearls, Coral, Diamonds, and other precious stones, Jewelry, Gold and Silver Plate, and for cleaning Watch Crystals, it is considered by Jewelers superior to any powder or other preparation.

Wash your Dog with The Frank Siddalls Soap; leave plenty of the lather in the hair, and you will be [illegible] the Soap will [illegible] clean to harbor fleas.

Use it for taking grease spots out of fine carpets and for cleaning rag carpets; also for cleaning garments of every description. It is better than Benzine or Hartshorn for cleaning clothing, and is guaranteed not to injure the fabric.

Use it for [illegible]—IT KEEPS THE COLORS BRIGHT, and [illegible] they will of course last much longer.

The hands of those [illegible] will not chap from getting [illegible] some mushy soap, toilet soap or any [illegible].

It [illegible], or before selling it.

Milk Pans, Churns and Milk Utensils when washed with The Frank Siddalls Soap will be so clean and sweet as new, and the Milk [illegible] in the same. It also [illegible] the smell from the hands after milking.

HOW A LADY CAN GET THE SOAP TO TRY

of Places where it is Not Sold at the Stores.

Send the retail price 10 cents in money or Postage Stamps, say where you saw the advertisement in "HARPER'S WEEKLY." Only send for One Cake and make these 2 promises:

Promise No. 1—That the Soap shall be used the first wash-day after receiving it and that every bit of the family wash shall be done with it.

Promise No. 2—That the person sending will personally see that the printed directions for using the Soap shall be exactly followed.

By return mail, a regular 10-cent cake of Soap will be sent postage prepaid; it will be packed in a neat iron box to make it carry safely, and 13 cents in Postage Stamps will be put on. All this is done for 10 cents [illegible] to introduce it [illegible].

If your letter gets no attention it will be because you have not made the promises or because you have sent for more than one cake.

Make the promises very plain, or the Soap will Not be sent.

A Cake will be sent Free of Charge to the Wife of a Farmer and the Wife of a Minister if the above TWO promises are made.

No intelligent woman will refuse to try such a clean, sensible invention.

How to Tell a Person of Refinement.

A Person of Refinement will be glad to adopt a new, easy, ladylike way of washing clothes, in place of the old, hard, sloppy way.

How to Tell a Person of Intelligence.

A Person of Intelligence will have no difficulty in understanding and following the very easy and sensible directions.

How to Tell a Person of Honor.

A Person of Honor will [illegible] a thing as to buy the Soap and [illegible] strongly urged.

How to Tell Sensible Persons.

Sensible Persons will not get mad but will feel thankful that their attention has been called to better methods.

And now dont set the old wash-boiler crooked, but next wash-day give one honest trial to Frank Siddalls Way of Washing Clothes.

Only One Cake must be sent for, but after trying it dealers will buy it from their wholesale houses [illegible] or you can order direct from the Factory.

You must NOT send for more than one cake; if a friend wants to try it, she must send in a separate letter.

And Now for the Clean, Neat, Easy, Genteel Ladylike FRANK SIDDALLS WAY OF WASHING CLOTHES.

There is nothing intricate about these directions—any child over 10 years of age—who has common sense—will have no trouble in following them:—

A Wash-boiler [illegible] HEAT THE WASH WATER, and as the wash water must only be lukewarm, a small kettle holds enough for a large wash.

A Wash-boiler will have a deposit formed on it from the atmosphere, in spite of the most careful housekeeper, which injures the delicate ingredients that are in this Soap.

Be sure to heat the water in the tea-kettle

THE FIRST TIME, no matter how odd it seems.

Wash the White Flannels with the other White Pieces.

Be sure to always make the last water soapy; the clothes will NOT smell of the soap, but will be as sweet as if never worn, and stains that have been overlooked in washing will bleach out while drying, and the clothes will iron easier.

Always dissolve a small piece of Soap in the starch; it makes the ironing easier, and the clothes handsomer.

The Frank Siddalls Soap washes freely in hard water without Soda, Lye, or any washing compound; dont use Borax, Ammonia, or any other soap on any of the wash.

FIRST—[illegible] then lay it out on a wash-board and rub the Soap LIGHTLY over it so as not to waste it, being particular not to miss soaping any of the soiled places.

Then ROLL IT IN A TIGHT ROLL, just as a piece is rolled when it is sprinkled for ironing, lay it in the bottom of the tub under the water and go on the same way until all the pieces have the soap rubbed on them and are rolled up.

Then go away for 30 minutes to one hour—by the clock—and let The Frank Siddalls Soap do its work.

NEXT—After soaking the FULL time commence rubbing the clothes LIGHTLY on a wash-board and the dirt will drop out; turn the garments inside out to get at the seams, but DONT use any more Soap, DONT SCALD OR BOIL A SINGLE PIECE, OR THEY WILL TURN YELLOW; and DONT wash through two suds. If the wash-water gets too dirty, dip some out and add a little clean water; if it gets too cold for the hands add some hot water out of the tea-kettle.

If a streak is hard to wash, rub some more Soap on it and throw it back into the suds for a few minutes.

NEXT COMES THE RINSING—which is to be done in lukewarm water, and is for the purpose of getting the dirty suds out, and is to be done as follows: Wash each piece LIGHTLY on a washboard through the rinse-water (without using any more Soap) AND SEE THAT ALL THE DIRTY SUDS ARE GOT OUT. ANY SMART HOUSEKEEPER WILL KNOW JUST HOW TO DO THIS.

NEXT, the blue-water, which can be either lukewarm or cold; Use little or no Bluing, for this Soap takes the place of Bluing. STIR A PIECE OF THE SOAP in the blue-water UNTIL THE WATER GETS DECIDEDLY SOAPY. Put the clothes THROUGH THIS SOAPY BLUE-WATER, wring them, and hang up to dry WITHOUT ANY MORE RINSING and WITHOUT SCALDING or BOILING A SINGLE PIECE.

Afterwards soap the Colored Pieces and Colored Flannels, let them stand 30 minutes to 1 hour, and wash the same way as the white pieces, being sure to make the last rinse-water soapy.

THE MOST DELICATE COLORS WILL NOT FADE WHEN WASHED THIS WAY, BUT WILL BE THE BRIGHTER.

Address all Letters:—OFFICE OF THE FRANK SIDDALLS SOAP 1019 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Digitized by Google

PASSING BEFORE THE CLUB WINDOWS

LOVELOT PERKYNS. "There goes Brooke Fosbrooke—stepper, Stanhope gig, and all! How that chap can always turn out with exactly the right thing at exactly the right time, on eight thou' a year, puzzles me."

PORJOY JENKYNS. "Fellah has a grandmutha'. She tips him heavily. The eight thou' dress, smoke, and club him. Lucky beggar!"

DECKER BROTHERS'
MATCHLESS
PIANOS
33 Union Square, N. Y.

No WASTE. No TROUBLE. No DISAPPOINTMENT.

A GOOD SALAD ASSURED.

The most Delicious and the most Popular Mayonnaise for all kinds of Salads, Raw Tomatoes, Cabbage, Cold Meats, Fish, &c., ever offered for sale.

ALL GROCERS SELL IT.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.
Per Year:

HARPER'S MAGAZINE	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR	4 00
The THREE above publications	10 00
Any TWO above named	7 00
HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE	1 50
HARPER'S MAGAZINE } HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE }	5 00
HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY, One Year (52 Numbers)	10 00

Postage Free to all subscribers in the United States or Canada.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR begin with the first Numbers for January, the Volumes of the YOUNG PEOPLE with the first Number for November, and the Volumes of the MAGAZINE with the Numbers for June and December of each year.

Subscriptions will be entered with the Number of each Periodical current at the time of receipt of order, except in cases where the subscriber otherwise directs.

Specimen copy of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE sent on receipt of a three-cent stamp.

HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY ... publication, containing works of ... Biography, History, Fiction, and Poetry, ... ranging from 10 to 25 cents per number. ... Harper's Franklin Square Library will be ... gratuitously on application to HARPER & BROTHERS.

Remittances should be made by Post-Office Money Order ... to avoid risk of loss. Address

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE, of between three ... on receipt of Nine ...

CONGRESS WATER.

[illegible]

RAPID CURES.

OF Coughs and Colds, Influenza, and Bronchial complaints are effected by Hale's Honey of Horehound and Tar, ... [illegible] ... Ask your druggist for Hale's Honey of Horehound and Tar, and take no substitute.

Pike's Toothache Drops cure in one minute.

Hill's Hair and Whisker Dye, 50c.

FISHERMEN!
TWINE and NETTING
MANUFACTURED BY THE
BALTIMORE TWINE AND NET CO.
WM. J. HOOPER & SON,
No. 6 S. Calvert St., Baltimore, Md.

Send for price list, naming county and state. Please mention this paper.

THE IMPROVED HORSMAN BICYCLE.

[illegible] ... New York Agency for the Columbia Bicycles and headquarters for ... Send 3c. Stamp for ... Catalogue.

E. I. HORSMAN, Manufacturer, 80 & 82 William St., N. Y.

GAMES AND SONGS
OF
AMERICAN CHILDREN.
COLLECTED AND COMPARED
By WILLIAM WELLS NEWELL.
8vo, Cloth, Ornamental Cover, $1 50.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

Print Your Own Cards, &c. Press $3. Larger sizes for circulars, &c., $8 to $75. For pleasure, money making, young or old. Everything easy, printed instructions. Send 2 stamps for Catalogue of Presses, Type, Cards, &c., to the factory. KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

MICROSCOPES, Photographic ... Send for Illustrated Price Catalogue.

HOW to Make $300 ... Profit with 12 Hens. ... Particulars sent free.

LOW, SON, & HAYDON'S
Flower de Luce

The Howard Tooth Brushes
HAVE
SECURELY FASTENED BRISTLES
AND CAN BE FOUND WITH ALL DRUGGISTS.

PINS BEARING THIS TRADE MARK
P&A
ARE SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS
MANUFACTURED BY
THE PLUME & ATWOOD MF'G CO.
WATERBURY, CONN.

SYPHER & CO.
ARE CONSTANTLY RECEIVING FROM EUROPE
Antique Silver, Furniture, Clocks, Bronzes, and Articles of Vertu.
739 & 741 BROADWAY.

BEHNING
PIANOS.
Warerooms, 15 East 14th St., N. Y.

NOTICE TO CLERGYMEN.

"McCLINTOCK & STRONG'S CYCLOPÆDIA OF BIBLICAL, THEOLOGICAL, AND ECCLESIASTICAL LITERATURE" (now complete in ten volumes), is meeting with the heartiest popular endorsement. The N. Y. Tribune says, "It is by far the best work of its kind existing in any language."

This work is sold by SUBSCRIPTION ONLY, and not to the BOOK TRADE.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, Franklin Square, N. Y.

H.W.JOHNS' ASBESTOS
LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING.
Steam Pipe & Boiler Coverings, Steam Packing, Mill Board, Sheathing, Fire Proof Coatings, &c.
Send for Descriptive Price List.
H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO. 87 MAIDEN LANE, N. Y.

EARL & WILSON'S
PATENT "SHORT BAND" COLLARS
AND "BEAD EDGE" CUFFS
ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION

NEW MEXICO.

A rare ... is offered (within the reach of all) to parties wishing to invest in a Company organized for the purchase and ... of mining claims known to be valuable. For particulars ... J. H. LIVINGSTON, Secretary New Mexico Commission and Manufacturers' Agency, Santa Fé, N. M. Reference: First National Bank, Santa Fé, N. M.

$5000 Accident Insurance. $25 Weekly Indemnity. Membership Fee, $5. Annual cost about $11. $10,000 insurance, with $50 Weekly Indemnity, at Corresponding Rates. Write or call for Circular and Application Blank.

EUROPEAN PERMITS WITHOUT EXTRA CHARGE.

CHAS. B. PEET (of Rogers, Peet, & Co.), Pres't.
JAS. R. PITCHER, Sec'y.
320 & 322 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Retiring from Business.
F. KRUTINA
Offers his Large and Elegant Stock of
FURNITURE,
Consisting of Parlor, Bed-room, Dining-room Suits, Chiffonnieres and Fancy Tables, in Mahogany, Walnut, Ebony, Cocobola, &c.,
At a Reduction of 25 to 50 per Cent from Manufacturer's Prices.

942 BROADWAY and
96 & 98 EAST HOUSTON STREET

A NEW VOLUME
OF
ENGLISH MEN OF LETTERS.

FIELDING. By AUSTIN DOBSON. 12mo, Cloth, 75 cents.

ENGLISH MEN OF LETTERS. Edited by JOHN MORLEY. The following volumes are now ready: JOHNSON. By Leslie Stephen.—GIBBON. By J. C. Morison.—SCOTT. By R. H. Hutton.—SHELLEY. By J. A. Symonds.—GOLDSMITH. By William Black.—HUME. By Professor Huxley.—DEFOE. By William Minto.—BURNS. By Principal Shairp.—SPENSER. By Dean Church.—THACKERAY. By Anthony Trollope.—BURKE. By John Morley.—MILTON. By Mark Pattison.—HAWTHORNE. By Henry James, Jr.—SOUTHEY. By Edward Dowden.—BUNYAN. By James Anthony Froude.—CHAUCER. By Adolphus William Ward.—COWPER. By Goldwin Smith.—POPE. By Leslie Stephen.—BYRON. By George Saintsbury.—LOCKE. By Sidney Colvin.—WORDSWORTH. By F. W. H. Myers.—LANDOR. By Thomas Fowler.—BENTLEY. By John Nichol.—DE QUINCEY. By David Masson.—LAMB. By Alfred Ainger.—BENTLEY. By R. C. Jebb.—DICKENS. By Adolphus William Ward.—GRAY. By Edmund W. Gosse.—SWIFT. By Leslie Stephen.—STERNE. By H. D. Traill.—MACAULAY. By James Cotter Morison.—FIELDING. By Austin Dobson. 12mo, Cloth, 75 cents a volume.

A selection of any 7 volumes sent on receipt of $5 00; or, 10 volumes for $10 00.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

Round Writing
BOOK FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION & PENS
Mailed for $1 50 by Stationers, or KEUFFEL & ESSER, New York.

J. W. BOUGHTON, 1118 Market St., Phila. Manuf'r of
WOOD-CARPET
Parquetry or Ornamental Wood-Floors, for ... Private Houses, Hotels ... and Borders for Rugs.

AMERICAN STAR SOFT CAPSULES THE BEST. ... All Druggists.

THE BEST THE DUEBER WATCH CASE

HARPER'S BAZAR
CUT PAPER PATTERNS.

We have transferred our WHOLESALE PATTERN DEPARTMENT to Mr. J. G. CROTTY, No. 108 to 114 Chorry Street, New York, who will conduct it upon his own account and responsibility.

SPECIAL CAUTION.

We are not interested in nor responsible for any contracts made by J. G. CROTTY & CO., either for HARPER'S BAZAR Patterns or for any other business.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

WHITMAN SADDLE COMPANY. ... WHITMAN SADDLE CO., ...

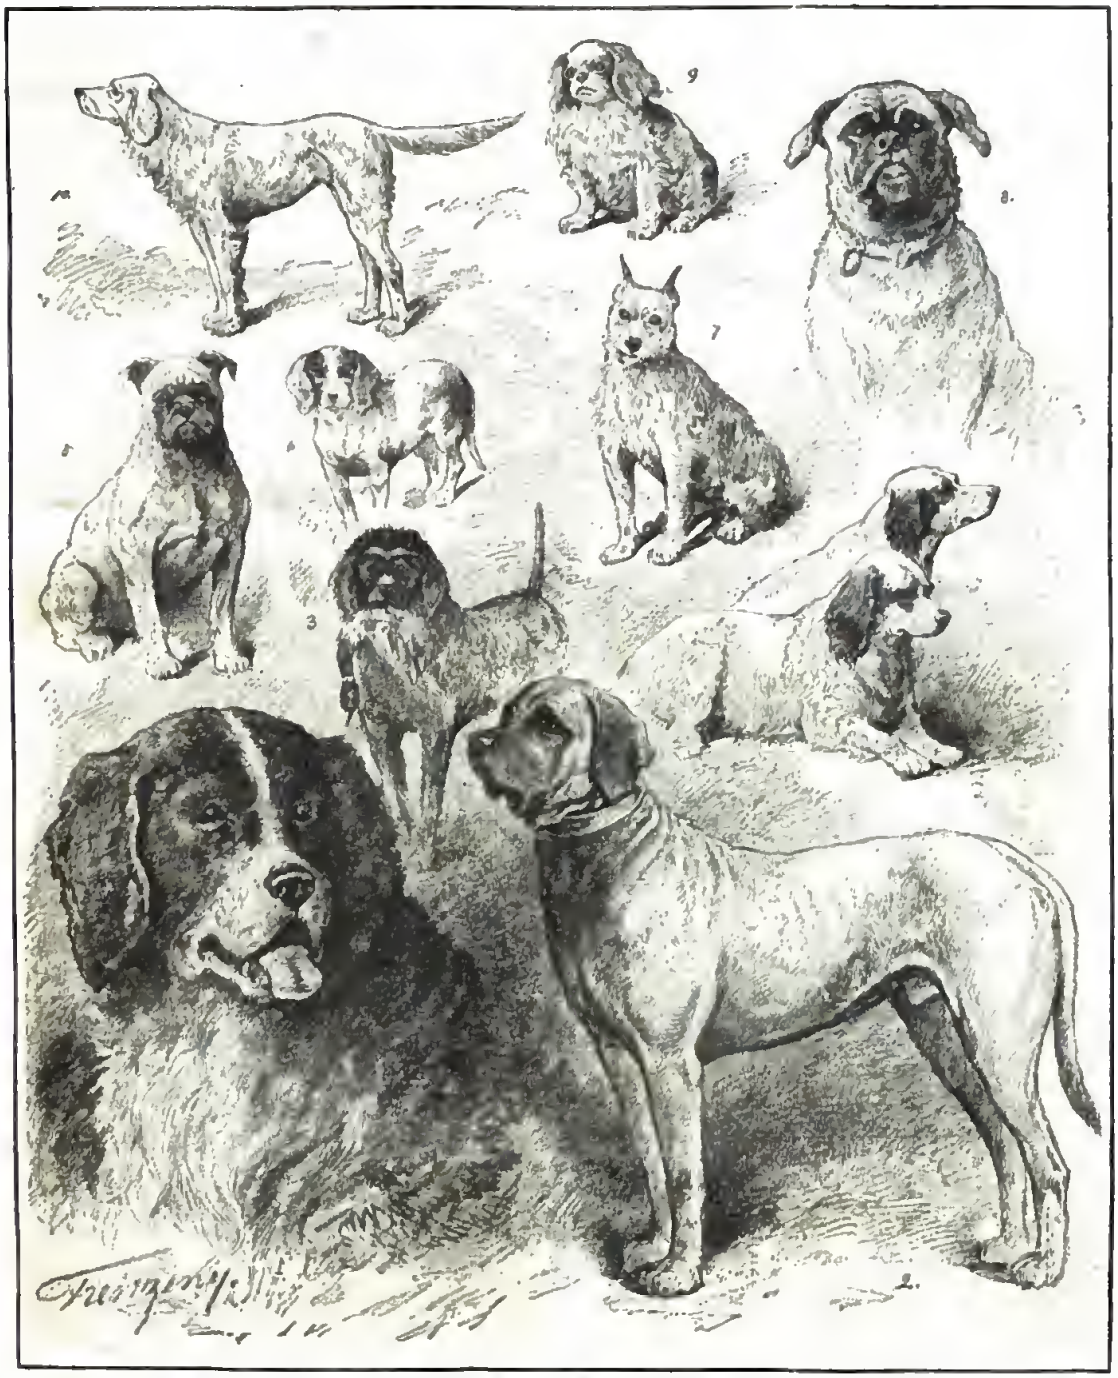
ALLEGHENY COLLEGE LIBRARY.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XXVII.—No. 1377. NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 12, 1883. TEN CENTS A COPY. $4.00 PER YEAR, IN ADVANCE.

Copyright, 1883, by Harper & Brothers.



1. Champion "Bonivard," Rough-coated St. Bernard Dog. 2. "Turk," English Mastiff. 3. "Mike," Irish Water-Spaniel. 4. "Jody" and "Lorne," Clumber Spaniels. 5. "Romulus," Bull-Dog. 6. "Bush," English Beagle. 7. "Garry Owen," Irish Terrier. 8. Champion "George," Pug-Dog. 9. "Beauty," Blenheim Spaniel. 10. "Glenebo," Red Irish Setter.

SEVENTH ANNUAL BENCH SHOW OF THE WESTMINSTER KENNEL CLUB, NEW YORK.—Drawn by F. Fennekby.—[See Page 299.]

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 12, 1883.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT

AN OFFER TO YOUNG AMERICAN ARTISTS.

For the best original drawing to illustrate ALFRED DOMETT'S "Christmas Hymn"—the drawing to be suitable for publication in HARPER'S MAGAZINE, and to be the exclusive work of an American artist not over twenty-five years of age—MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS offer an award of THREE THOUSAND DOLLARS, upon the honorable understanding that the successful competitor shall use the same for the prosecution of art study in one or more of the best American schools, including also a sojourn abroad of at least six months for the study of the old masters. The award will be paid in such installments and at such times as shall best suit the convenience of the recipient for the purposes specified.

The drawings must be received by MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS not later than August 1, 1883, addressed "Art Competition, Harper's Magazine, Franklin Square, New York"; and each must be designated by an assumed name or motto, which should also be given, together with the real name, age, and residence of the artist, in a sealed envelope accompanying the drawings, and not to be opened until the result of the competition shall have been determined. The name of the successful competitor will not be publicly announced until the publication of the drawing.

MR. R. SWAIN GIFFORD, N.A.; MR. F. D. MILLET, A.N.A.; and MR. CHARLES PARSONS, A.N.A., Superintendent of the Art Department, HARPER & BROTHERS, will act as judges of the competition.

It is intended to engrave the successful drawing as one page for HARPER'S MAGAZINE of December, 1883; and should other drawings submitted be found suitable, second, third, and fourth awards will be made, as follows: one page HARPER'S WEEKLY, $200; one page HARPER'S BAZAR, $200; one page HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, $100.

If the judges should decide that no one of the drawings is suitable, MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS reserve the right to extend the limit of time and re-open the competition.

Two Christmas Hymns by ALFRED DOMETT have been published. That published in 1877 is the one for the illustrations of which artists are invited to compete, and a printed copy of it will be sent on application to

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

THE PARTY GAME.

THE result of the election of last autumn, as we said at the time, put both parties upon their good behavior. The Republicans had still a session of Congress before them in which to show their disposition, and in New York, where the majority against the Republican candidates was overwhelming and unprecedented, the Democrats had the Legislature and the greatest possible opportunity. The election had shown extraordinary dissatisfaction and Republican indifference to party success, and no alliance so promising was ever offered to any party as to the Democratic, and not the chance only, but the plainest indication how it was to be improved. This was felt by leading Democrats, and Governor CLEVELAND spoke for them in saying that the great result in 1884 would depend entirely upon the conduct of the two parties in the mean time. It was evident that the one of the two parties which should be unable to improve such an opportunity would convict itself of a want of administrative ability which would be properly fatal.

In the contest of the winter for the favor of the country, carried on by the Republicans in Congress and by the Democrats in the New York Legislature, every honest observer must agree that the Democrats have ignominiously failed. The two important measures in Congress were the reform bill and the revision of the tariff. The Republicans were responsible for legislation, and early in the session they passed a reform bill substantially as it was drafted by the friends of reform. The only vigorous opposition to it came from Democrats. Yet the Democrats had vociferously demanded reform, and appealed to the country as especially reformers. The tariff was revised and the revenue reduced. It was the reduction more than the tariff in which the country was interested, but the Democrats left the impression that they would tolerate a redundant revenue if it were not reduced in their own way. Congress adjourned, and the two results which the election had been universally understood imperatively to demand—administrative reform and reduction of the revenue—had been achieved by the Republicans. It was, indeed, the same Congress which six months before had scornfully flouted reform. But it had not then heard from the country, and the immediate question of the winter was, Which party will most truly apprehend and carry out the wishes of the country?

At length the Democratic trial also has ended. As we write, the New York Legislature is about to adjourn; and to what act of that Legislature, to what tone or spirit or promise in its debates, can any sagacious observer point as proof of its desire or capacity to comprehend or to carry out any great purpose which the election of last autumn showed to be desired by the country, with the exception of the primary regulation bill? For several years the Democratic party has proclaimed its devotion to civil service reform in its platforms. But the chief characteristic of this Democratic Legislature has been a greedy grasping for the spoils of patronage. The charter to secure more responsible government for the city of New York it has smothered. The aqueduct bill it has perverted into a huge job, so that the largest property-holders in the city, without regard to party, have assembled publicly to protest. Upon every great measure in which the principles which the election showed to be favored by the people have been involved the Democratic Legislature has taken the wrong position. It has demonstrated the falsehood of its own platforms, and it has renewed in full vigor the deep and general distrust of the party. Viewing the contest of the winter merely as a game, without reference to sincerity or principle, the Democratic party has been incredibly stupid. Had it cordially supported reform in Congress and in the New York Legislature; had it taken a clear and consistent position as a party upon the revision of the tariff; had it passed the reasonable charter proceeding from Democratic hands, had it prevented jobbery in the aqueduct; had it, in a word, feigned a virtue, if no more, shown itself desirous of the reform and economy upon which the public heart was proved by the election to be fixed—it could have greatly disturbed party relations, and have been justified in high anticipations for 1884. But it has totally and ignominiously lost the game, and it has itself furnished the strongest reasons for its general defeat next year.

THE IRISH CONVENTION.

THE president of the late Land League Convention in Philadelphia spoke of England as "the power which has driven us or from which we have fled into exile." This is an accurate description of the "Irish-Americans," as they prefer to call themselves, who held the "Irish Convention" on the following day. They are Americans only by the legal fact of naturalization. They are here, as Mr MOONEY said, "in exile." They value "our government" only as a force which protects them while they endeavor to turn it against a country which they hate. Their pride and perpetual boast are not that they are Americans, but Irish. Their acknowledged leader is a foreigner. Their closest political alliance is with alien politicians and members of the British Parliament, and they use their political and party relations in this country not for American but for Irish interests. This position is a misfortune for them and for us. No nation is better or stronger from the possession of a large foreign population unassimilated in political sympathy, or language, or faith, or historic tradition, or national spirit and purpose, and which solidarily cultivates any kind of foreign allegiance. It is an imperium in imperio, a nation within a nation, a separate population among the people.

We do not insist, indeed, that Irishmen are bound to stay in Ireland, and suffer or starve there when they can help themselves by going into exile. Nor do we assert that having left their native land they should forget it and their kindred, and abandon it without further thought or care. Local attachments and traditions are familiar to Americans, and nowhere more fondly cherished than in America. We know very well in this country the charm and value of the feeling which binds New England, or "the South," or "the West," to their children everywhere in the Union. It is a generous and an ennobling sentiment. Natives of Ireland, wherever they may have chosen their homes, will naturally follow with interest the fortunes of that country, and seek to affect favorably toward it, as a moral aid, the good opinion and sympathy of the country which they have made their own. But this can not be done by treating the country as a mere convenience, and its citizenship only as a means of more effectively promoting the interests of another country. Those citizens only can affect favorably the feeling of Americans who are thoroughly identified with them. The impression of the late convention in Philadelphia was that of an assembly of foreigners, not of citizens, so that its tone of demand upon the government of the United States seemed singularly impudent. The proceedings were like those of a club of the English or American "colony" in Paris or Berlin or Rome, the enthusiasm of aliens whose pleasure or profit it is to remain for some time in those cities, but who take good care to have it known that their hearts and hopes are elsewhere.

If such a Convention was to be held, its chief aim should have been to conciliate the favor of the country in which it assembled. The one way to do that in this case was to state the actual wrongs of Ireland to-day, and to denounce unequivocally the Dynamite policy as a method of redress. The method chosen was a recital of injustice long since abandoned; bitter denunciation of the most friendly administration to Ireland ever known, which has been earnestly engaged in seeking measures of relief; and not only an omission to denounce the Dynamite system of crime, but this declaration, "There is no form of retaliation to which despair or madness may resort for which English cruelty in Ireland is not directly responsible." If this is not an approval, it is certainly not a condemnation, of the foul murder of CAVENDISH and BURKE and the cowardly crimes of Dynamite conspirators. This kind of evasion, due to the overwhelming American horror and indignation at the Phœnix Park murders and their kindred outrages, does not show courage, but cowardice. If the Convention really thought that English cruelty in Ireland justified the assassination of Lord CAVENDISH, it should have said so frankly. If it thought otherwise, the manly and honorable course was to say so with equal frankness. But its cautiously chosen words, would not deter a single criminal from a single crime. No man can read the resolution which ends with the words that we have quoted without feeling that its spirit, if not its purpose, condones any crime whatever. If the Convention had said that it would give its sympathy to constitutional agitation or to open and honorable war with England, but that it held every Irishman who plotted assassination as an enemy to Ireland, it would have gained a sympathy which it has not gained now.

"Willing to wound and yet afraid to strike,"

MR. BLISS UPON HARMONY.

MR. GEORGE BLISS, who has often pointed out very plainly the absurdity of the present machine organization of the Republican party in New York, and who says that he opposed reorganization two years ago because it would have been a mere change of machine, now proposes a scheme which he thinks will be useful. He states frankly that he does not believe that any re-adjustment made by the present machine would be acceptable to the party, and he thinks that the work must be undertaken by "a few high-minded Republicans from outside the city," and as such he mentions Messrs. J. W. WADSWORTH, FRANK HISCOCK, O. W. CHAPMAN, RICHARD CROWLEY, and HAMILTON FISH, Jun.

MR. BLISS'S plan is very simple. In his judgment the primary election law passed by this Legislature opens the way, and he would have a complete enrollment made every year before the primaries by officers previously elected at the primaries. The applicant should answer certain questions under oath. The list should be publicly exposed, and every enrolled voter should be entitled to vote at the primary. The only troublesome question would be that of Republicanism, but the trouble Mr BLISS thinks would vanish before well-considered questions as to the ticket supported at the last election, etc. Pledges of future action he evidently thinks to be very dangerous weapons, which upon the whole should be let alone. In fact, Mr BLISS would treat the primary meeting like an election for which a careful registry should be provided, and by removing all the objections and pretenses for political inactivity which the present foolish and unfair system furnishes, he would throw upon every individual voter the responsibility of not attending the primary as he now bears that of not voting at an election. The essential points to arrange are the character of the enrolling officers and the evidences of Republicanism. Upon the latter point the suggestion of Mr. REID in his letter to the committee of inquiry is very forcible, that the chief test should be the last Presidential vote.

The letter of Mr BLISS is a good sign. It shows what an active politician thinks may be a simple and satisfactory settlement of the party dissensions. But more and better than that, it is the tribute of a "practical politician" to the law which regulates primaries, which, like most of the measures which practical politicians despise, is really practical and progressive politics. The committee upon "harmony" will undoubtedly consider the suggestions of Mr. BLISS, for it is plainly in some such way, independent of the familiar machine, that "harmony" is to be sought.

THE DISAGREEMENT OF THE DOCTORS.

THE doctors in New York are disagreeing upon a point which it is incredible should occasion any difference whatever among humane and intelligent men. A physician professionally dedicates himself to the cure of disease and the alleviation of suffering. If he comprehends his position as it is understood by reasonable men, he morally engages to do anything to promote those purposes which is not repugnant to good morals or good sense. To quote the ruinous old legend in the rhyme for not liking Dr. Fell as a serious reason for refusing to consult with him professionally, is to plead prejudice as an excuse for inhumanity. The follies of certain medical men here been the butt of some of the choicest satire and ridicule in literature, and the solemn medical prig and pedant is among the most familiar and absurd figures of the comic stage. Certainly the position taken by several New York physicians in the pending controversy recalls the most ruinous touches of MOLIÈRE and LE SAGE.

The code of the Medical Society of New York provides that

"Members of the Medical Society of the State of New York, and of the medical societies in affiliation therewith, may meet in consultation legally qualified practitioners of medicine. Emergencies may occur in which all restrictions should, in the judgment of the practitioner, yield to the demands of humanity."

This is a reasonable and proper provision, if there must be any provision whatever. The better way, we think, would be to leave the matter wholly unrestricted, but as this rule in its last clause virtually leaves the decision to the judgment of the practitioner, it is unobjectionable. But Dr. AUSTIN FLINT, Jun., and his friends wish to prohibit professional consultation with those whom they consider to be irregular or trade-mark practitioners; and as a large and most accomplished and admirable body of physicians call themselves or are called homœopathic physicians, Dr. FLINT and his friends would prohibit consultation with them. Of course we should no more bespeak "regular," or "allopathic," sympathy with homœopathy than the approval of Prelacy for Dissent, or of the Vatican for Canterbury or Geneva. But the question is not one of sympathy with any "school" of medicine, or of approval of any theoretical method of treatment. It is a point of humanity and common-sense. Shall the members of the Medical Society refuse to use any reasonable means to acquaint themselves with a case of sickness which they may be called to treat? If the patient has been under the care of a person who calls himself an astrologer, and who professes to cure by faith or the imposition of hands, shall the members of the Medical Society, for that reason, be obliged to refuse to exercise their discretion?

It is certainly too late in the day to assume that because a practitioner calls himself a homœopath he is therefore an ignorant man, without the experience and training which enable accomplished intelligence to deal with disease. A rule, therefore, which would forbid a physician to avail himself of the valuable aid which such a man could render him in the treatment of a case would be a rule, it seems to us, intolerable to every self-respecting and independent mind. It is not surprising that the proposition to abridge the liberty of association which is now guaranteed should have deeply excited the medical profession. But it is very surprising that the advocates of restriction should have adopted the most disgraceful caucus methods to carry their point, so that Doctors BARKER, AGNEW, ROSSA, and CUSHMAN, all of them justly eminent gentlemen in their profession, were compelled at once to resign. This act, which had no reference to homœopathy, or allopathy, or Thompsonian, or Botanic, or Indian doctors, but only to the conduct of gentlemen, led to a pause in the business, and the whole question goes over to the autumn. By that time we trust that the plain expression of public opinion on all sides will have shown the reactionary body how grave an error they have committed.

THE NIAGARA RESERVATION

THE Niagara bill has been signed by the Governor, and is now a law, and the Commissioners have been nominated and confirmed. The bill provides simply for an enquiry into the probable cost and character of the proposed reservation of the immediate neighborhood of the cataract, to preserve unimpaired and for free public study and enjoyment the grandeur and beauty of the sublime spectacle. To have suffered the practical obliteration of the noblest natural scene upon the continent by disfiguring masses of buildings and thatmestoms of every kind would have been an intolerable disgrace to the Imperial State.

To no one man will the present and proper preservation of the great spectacle be due more than to the president of the Niagara Falls Association, Mr HOWARD POTTER. With the most unostentatious energy, generosity, and intelligence he has spared no effort to secure a result in which all good citizens were interested, which they all approved, but which, except for the special interest and aid which Mr POTTER has given—wholly, of course, upon public grounds—could not have been accomplished. He has had counsel and active associates, and all, without exception, are united by the same high and generous public spirit.

The Governor has named Commissioners whose fitness will immediately commend itself to public approval. That Mr POTTER is not among them is undoubtedly due to the fact that he prefers still to serve as newspaper reader as heretofore. It is certainly a matter of congratulation that so great an enterprise, and so honorable and becoming to the State of New York, should have begun under auspices which prevent any suspicion of jobbery, and there is no reason to doubt that the good sense and energy which have conducted it thus far will attend it to the end.

THE CHIEF EXAMINER

Mr. D. R. EATON has written a letter to the Times repelling criticisms and insinuations in regard to the selection of Mr KEIM as Chief Civil Service Examiner. He states that Mr KEIM was not his first choice, but that he was, upon the whole, the best available choice under the circumstances. He denies that "the CAMERON influence" dictated the selection, and he asserts that Mr KEIM has favored sound principles in a published report and in a consular bill which he drew.

Mr. EATON's personal relation to the reform is beyond question. His knowledge of the subject is very great; his ability in the discussion is established; his fidelity is unimpeachable. All this is not debatable. And Mr KEIM may have expressed sound sentiments in a report and in a bill. But it does not follow that his selection was not a very grave error. For how does it happen that having expressed such sentiments two years ago, and being an active politician familiar in Washington and all political circles, and the editor of a paper during all the agitation of the question, from the appointment of the first Advisory Commission in 1871 down to the passage of the reform bill at the very end of 1882, Mr. KEIM was not only not known as a friend and supporter of reform, but was known as a close political supporter of Mr. CAMERON and of the system which was to be reformed?

In the answer to that question lies the sensitive reason against his selection, and it would have been necessary to the cause for the friends of reform to acquiesce without protest. But we do not wish to prolong the controversy, and while we feel that the appointment must be regarded as extremely unfortunate, and justly provocative of public amazement and incredulity, we certainly do not suppose that reform is abandoned or the Commission treacherous because of a serious mistake. His action and the career of the Chief Examiner will be followed still more attentively, and the Commissioners will doubtless see in the universal criticism which has been made in this instance how strong and general and intelligent are the public interest and expectation in regard to their work.

THE LATE DR WILBUR

DR. H. B. WILBUR, the head of the State Institution for Idiots at Syracuse, who died suddenly last week, was a man who will not be forgotten by those who knew him and his pathetic and beneficent work. From early life his temperament and character called him to the discharge of a duty for which his peculiar fitness was a genius as positive as that of a painter or a musician for his art. Dr WILBUR'S professional accomplishment in his special department was very great. But in that department his personal qualities were as unusual and as indispensable. His infinite patience and tenderness and quickness were not less than his sagacity and intelligence, and his long experience enhanced the practical value of his admirable qualities. Naturally a life passed among innocent sufferers from a calamity which they could not comprehend produced in him a sainted and sympathetic manner which made the essential manliness only the more striking and touching. His work was, like himself, most modest and scientific. But among the citizens of the State whose activities are true and humane public services and whose characters are benedictions to all who are associated with them, none deserves a more lasting and grateful remembrance than the kindly gentleman, accomplished physician, and trusty friend.

THE AQUEDUCT JOB

THE press of the city of New York was virtually unanimous in demanding that the new aqueduct should not be made a job. The Commissioners earnestly urged the same view. The Mayor annotated it by a strong appeal. A large public meeting of the tax-payers dispatched a mighty committee to press upon the Legislature the necessity of defending the work against corruption and reckless extravagance. But the Legislature contemptuously disregarded all remonstrance and appeal, and crowned its long series of offenses against the public welfare by imposing an enormous job upon the tax-payers of New York. The sole hope of bottling the nefarious schemes of mercenary politicians now lies in the Governor's veto. It is to meet precisely such emergencies that the veto power is intrusted to the Chief Magistrate as the final defense of the people. It is to the Governor that the intelligent people of the city now turn for protection.

TWO GOOD BOOKS

THE Harpers have just published two delightful works of literary criticism and history, PERRY'S English Literature in the Eighteenth Century, and SIDGWICK'S History of Latin Literature from Ennius to Boethius. Mr. PERRY is university lecturer upon English Literature at our Cambridge, and his volume is made up of lectures delivered in Cambridge and repeated in Baltimore. Mr SIDGWICK is of "English Oxford," and his work is a complete and comprehensive survey of his subject.

Mr PERRY'S plan permits an easy colloquial treatment which is very charming; and without proposing to himself either a history or cyclopædia of the time that he has chosen to illustrate, he aims to trace the lines of progressive literary development as they are exhibited in the works of the eighteenth century. This scheme involves naturally some critical reconsideration of such authors as mainly serve his purpose, and his evident familiarity with the times and the men and their books makes his volume an exceedingly pleasant picture of them from a fresh point of view. It will remind readers once more of the rich resources of our literature even for those who can not spare time for extensive or profound study.

Mr SIDGWICK'S Latin Literature is a work of thorough scholarship, and, like Mr. PERRY, he treats it as well from the humane and not from the lifeless point that the story of the old literature glows like an old picture over which a freshening sponge has been passed. There is no better introduction to the literary period which it covers, and no more satisfactory account of the authors, whose names at least are familiar. The work popularizes the subject without vulgarizing it, and illustrates a scholarship whose literary touch is not less genial and charming because it is accurate and thorough.

PERSONALS

QUEEN VICTORIA issued an order that no lamb should be eaten this season by the royal household. The price of that meat in Smithfield Market soon fell from twenty-eight cents a pound to eighteen cents a pound.

—The Pall Mall Gazette says: "Mr ALMA TADEMA has not been fortunate in his engravers. The peculiarities of his touch are not to be rendered by any of the modern known methods." There are several engravers in this country to whom Mr ALMA TADEMA'S friends should commend him. There are no peculiarities of his touch which these artists can not render.

—A Vienna correspondent asserts that "the imperfect and little-spread knowledge of the English language is the reason why the Vienna critics are not very eloquent in discussing the merits and faults of Mr EDWIN BOOTH." But our New York critics seem to have experienced no difficulty in handling SALVINI, who spoke in Italian.

—The Athenæum on EMERSON'S poetry: "Although as can not think highly of EMERSON'S verse, it certainly finds favor in his own country."

—We find in the Bay City Tribune the following touching account of the late Professor C— of Michigan U—: "Shortly before his death he called the attendant of his room to a worn and faded shawl spread on his bed, and . . . it wrapped around his body and buried with him. He had . . . it himself when a young man in England, had worn it in . . . journeyings to and fro over the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, when residing in Australia, when he escaped from the Feejee Islanders when they were preparing to kill and roast him, and when he was shipwrecked. It accompanied him when he landed in the United States, and even clad the remains of his dead child when, penniless and disheartened, he first arrived in Adrian. His wish was gratified."

—In the great fire which recently occurred in Paternoster Square, London, Messrs. KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, & Co. lost the whole of their bound stock, a few MSS., some valuable sketches, and various wood blocks. Fortunately a large portion of the MSS. for forth-coming books was already in the printer's hands, and the bound stock was not nearly as extensive as it would have been of a later period of the year.

—In answer to an invitation by a committee appointed to procure competitive models for an equestrian statue of PAUL REVERE, to be erected at Boston, eight artists, whose names were in sealed envelopes, sent in designs. After a careful examination the committee selected three models, awarding the place of honor to one which, on opening the accompanying envelope, proved to be by Mr. JAMES E. KELLY, of New York. Mr. KELLY'S model represents the hero on the Charlestown side of the Charles River, at the moment when he first sees the lights on the tower of the Old North Church. He has caught the horse firmly by the mane with the left hand, the left foot in the stirrup, and with the right hand he grasps the saddle. In the act of vaulting into his seat he turns his head for a last look, and his attitude, as well as that of his horse, is exceedingly dramatic, and far removed from the conventional treatment. Mr KELLY, who is well known as a gifted and original artist for HARPER'S WEEKLY and other illustrated periodicals, and also for his many excellent models and designs, was recently the successful one among forty competitors for the design of a statue commemorative of the battle of Monmouth.

—Photographs of fine likenesses of Wordsworth have been presented by the Wordsworth Society of London to its members. The artists are the painters HENRY INMAN, HAYDON, and MISS GILLIES, and the sculptors FLETCHER and THACYE. INMAN'S portrait was painted for Professor REED, of Philadelphia, and was considered by the poet's wife to be the best ever made of her husband. Mr Inman was one of our earliest and most prominent National Academicians.

—The wife of Minister J. R. LOWELL, according to a letter to the New York Times, has long been an invalid, and, in consequence, has only lately been presented at court. The state of her health making necessary the greatest care, she applied for permission to wear a dress not that different from that which is the rule at the Queen's Drawing Room. The Queen, in extending to Mrs. LOWELL the needed dispensation, sent a message requesting her not to go to the royal reception without the permission of her medical advisers, and adding that if they were not of opinion that she could do so with safety, the Queen would have much pleasure in paying her a visit at the Legation. Mrs LOWELL attended the Drawing-Room, and was very much gratified by the kindness of the English Queen, who is now herself an invalid.

—Three hundred and ten dollars were paid at the auction sale of Mr C. FISKE HARRIS'S library for the MILTON copy of a small volume of MILTON'S poems, "chiefly in the Scottish dialect." Book collectors are pleased with the fact that as the MILTON sale, several years ago, the same volume brought only $165.

—An interesting concert will be given at Chickering Hall on Friday evening, May 11, by the Columbia College Glee Club, in aid of the fund for the expenses of the Columbia crews this coming season. The club is young, but under the careful leadership of Mr A. D. WOODRUFF it has developed rapidly, and in a very gratifying manner. Mr EDGAR D. SCAMAN is the warbler, and Mr. BOOKER ARMSWORTH manages. A varied programme of college glees and warbles has been arranged, and New-Yorkers who like to see Columbia push the blue and white to the front will be doubly repaid for the purchase of tickets. There are one dollar seats, and there are reserved seats.

—A memorial cross of fine white freestone, consisting of a base about seven feet square and two inches thick, a pedestal about four feet and a half high and four feet square, an ornamental chain, the cross proper, and a cap or finial, has been erected at Dolton Abbey, England, by the tenantry of the Duke of Devonshire, in honor of the late Lord FREDERICK CAVENDISH. The inscription on the pedestal was decided upon by the widow of that noble man and his sister, and reads as follows:

"To the beloved memory of
Lord FREDERICK CHARLES CAVENDISH,
Son of WILLIAM, 7th Duke of Devonshire,
And of ELIZABETH CHRISTIANA, his wife,
Born November 30th 1836:
He went out as Chief Secretary to Ireland,
Full of hope for her future,
Full of capacity to render her service,
And was murdered in the Phœnix Park, Dublin,
Within twelve hours of his arrival,
May 6th 1882.
"The Lord grant thee thy heart's desire,
And fulfill all thy mind."

The Times first quoted are the words used by Mr GLADSTONE when announcing to the House of Commons the news of the assassination.

—CHARLOTTE VON KALB, the friend of SCHILLER, HUMBOLDT, FICHTE, and especially of JEAN PAUL RICHTER, appears again in literature by means of a volume of her letters to RICHTER, lately published in Germany. She was a passionate, large-souled, and meteoric creature, who used to say that it took a JEAN PAUL RICHTER to understand her—but though her avowals to that distinguished author were unmistakable, he married CAROLINE MAYER, preferring, as he said, "a gentle maiden who could cook for him, and laugh and cry with him," to one who, like CHARLOTTE, was always ready to "venture flight into the infinite."

—Marshal MCMAHON, at a public reception last month, was described as self-erect, and retaining his fresh complexion, "but age in telling upon him. He was stimulated for a while by the ovations of old friends, and then he folded his arms on his chest and went to sleep."

—Mr PHILIP GILBERT HAMERTON, in his Portfolio, the leading art journal in the English language, writes a very interesting notice at a well-known book: "We have seldom come across a more delightful book in its way than Highways and Byways of New England, by WILLIAM H. GIBSON (HARPER & BROTHERS, New York). As the title indicates, the letterpress is descriptions of rural life and scenery, a love of nature that is Wordsworthian in its reverence, the close and patient observation of an artist, the peculiar humor of a genial American in the study of men and things—these are qualities that give a quite individual freshness and vigor to Mr GIBSON'S account of his wanderings, sketch-book in hand, up hill and down dale. The contents of the sketch-book furnish the illustrations to the book, most of them accurate and [illegible] careful and intricate studies of foreground material, or of [illegible] of plants and flowers, [illegible] with [illegible] landscape objects. The [illegible] with which [illegible] have [illegible] beyond praise. The [illegible] the indistinctness [illegible] touch, the [illegible] light and dainty drawing of [illegible] make these [illegible] beautiful examples of the [illegible] we have. The name [illegible] such title of illustration—a tribute only [illegible] much to due to the interpreter to the de[illegible] gent.

THE NEW BASE-BALL GROUNDS AT CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.—Drawn by W. P. [illegible] from a Sketch by L. Beaumont.—[See Page 299.]

[illegible] ON THE LEVEE AT MOBILE, ALABAMA.—Drawn by T. de Thulstrup from a Sketch by J. O. Davidson.—[See Page 301.]

OLD MINCHEON'S GRANDDAUGHTER.

"Two shall be born the whole wide world apart,
And speak in different tongues, and have no thought
Each of the other's being, and no heed:
And these also unknown ways to unknown lands
Shall cross, meaning wreck, defying death,
And all unconsciously shape every act
And bend each wandering step to this one end:
That one day, out of darkness, they shall meet
And read life's meanings in each other's eyes."

In the twilight of a summer day a young man was walking briskly through a grass-grown side street of a provincial town. As he walked he looked about, and seemed to patronize impartially both the shabby cottages and magnificent elm-trees. He was good-looking, and reputed clever, and had been much petted by his mother and sisters and other women.

With all these excellent reasons for self-esteem, he could not be expected to repress a sense of superiority when he found himself in a town of no importance whatever except as a point of departure for remote Canadian fishing grounds.

He was following a ragged boy laden with a portmanteau, rifle, and fishing-rods. These traps were marked, "Frank Aldridge, New York," and were of that correct and costly kind affected by young and wealthy sportsmen. Mr. Aldridge had not yet indulged in any conversation with his guide, though he was taking notes and meaning to ask questions later. As a clumsy vehicle, for which he knew no name, rolled past him down the street, he exclaimed,

"Hallo! What's that?"

The boy turned and grinned.

"That's Old Mincheon, and his chariot, and his granddaughter."

"Chariot! Good omen for it. Curious. But everything here is curious."

Aldridge relapsed into silence, but his eyes followed the chariot until it disappeared round a corner.

The gentleman irreverently termed "Old Mincheon" was by far the most aristocratic person in the town. He was poor, but in a community where no one is rich, poverty is not a disability. It was commonly said that nothing Old Mincheon had was his own excepting his chariot, his granddaughter, and his family ghost.

The ghost was, except in reputation, strictly private property. No one but Old Mincheon had ever seen it or talked with it, but he was, in popular parlance, "check by jowl with the spectre."

The ghost had exercised a malign influence upon the existence of Old Mincheon's granddaughter. Little Sylvia Mincheon was never quite sure whether her grandfather's familiar or his chariot was most responsible for her sorrows, for it was in driving out in the latter that she had generally received the commands of the former. The two were in her fancy so inseparable that she had lain awake many a night imagining the uncouth vehicle transformed into an uncanny shape, which boldly entered her grandfather's room, and there in the darkness expressed objectionable sentiments and issued disagreeable orders.

Sylvia was the only child of Old Mincheon's only son. This son had been an officer in a regiment of the line. He had served in India, married there, and died. Dying, he had bequeathed to his father a little daughter and a store of Indian loot, a bear in gold and in ivory. So Sylvia, aged three, had come with her English nurse, and her trunks stuffed full of rare silks and muslins and shawls, to grow up in a small provincial town in the exclusive society of an old man and a ghost.

To the credit of her sweet temper and innocent mind be it said,

THE BETROTHAL.

"HERE HE FOUND HIS COMPANION AND MR. MINCHEON."

Digitized by Google

she never questioned the existence of the ghost, or asserted her will in opposition. Unfortunately the ghost had definite opinions on the education of women, and had expressed itself clearly from the beginning.

"Women," it had said, "have no definite tendencies except toward frivolity. The end of their education is to mantify those tendencies, which history teaches us can never be eradicated." The desolate conviction with which the ghost, as reported, uttered this fundamental truth had sunk into Sylvia's soul, and led her to model her character on that of her governess, a bone rigid lines and gloomy deportment presented as nearly as possible the desirable antipodes of frivolity. She faithfully read the books which the ghost selected, wore the clothes it considered most appropriate, and was even willing to marry the man it chose for her husband—a man three times her age, but always referred to by the ghost as "Young Blight."

It was the last day of Sylvia's seventeenth year when the Mincheon turn-out had been dabbed by a flippant spectacle "Carmen"—an important day for the girl in more ways than one. That morning her governess had been dismissed, and had gone to another household, there to continue her mission of checking girlish levity by an edifying exhibition of gloom. That afternoon Sylvia had been informed that the next day, at four o'clock, she would be formally betrothed to Young Blight.

At the appointed hour she put her hand trustfully in Blight's, and repeated after her grandfather "I, Sylvia Mincheon, promise to marry you, Timothy Blight, three months from to-day."

As the words fell from her lips she felt the hold of Blight's sinewy hand tighten. She looked up into his face, and an expression of surprise, quickly followed by fear, filled her eyes. She was experiencing the first emotion of her life—one of dislike for the gaunt figure and yellow bristly face of "Young Blight," accompanied by an impulse to cry out, "No, no!" Restraining this impulse, she jerked her hand from her betrothed, and in spite of a sharp reproof from her grandfather, ran out of the room. She flew straight to the kitchen, the domain of the nurse who had brought her from India, and who had managed to make herself indispensable to the Mincheon establishment.

"Martha, a glass of water, please," she cried, sinking into a chair, and looking at Martha beseechingly.

Martha responded to the expression instantly. She caught the girl in her arms and kissed her, and exclaimed, "It's a cruel shame—a cruel shame, my darlin'."

Sylvia clung to Martha's neck. "Is it, Martha? Are you sure it is a cruel shame?" Then, without waiting for confirmation, she picked up a hat and shawl lying on a chair and ran out into the garden. She felt and saw nothing clearly. A whole world of doubt had suddenly been opened, and the child stood dazed at the threshold. Mechanically she went to the gate, and climbed up to her seat in the chariot in waiting.

Presently Mr. Mincheon and Mr. Blight came down the garden walk together, the older leaning on the arm of the younger. Nature had cast the two men in the same mould—a mould in which the length was in extravagant proportion to the breadth. Blight offered Mincheon the fine flattery of affecting his style. Mr. Mincheon wore tight black trousers, a bottle-green frock-coat ornamented with military braid, a high black stock, and white beaver hat with a peculiarly long and furry nap. Mr. Blight's dress was an incubation, exaggerated even to the nap of his hat, which seemed to Sylvia to flutter in the breeze like the ruffled feathers of the geese scudding at will in the gutters of the town. Mr. Mincheon waved a black-rimmed eyeglass in his right hand; Mr. Blight's left toyed with a gold-rimmed glass. When Mr. Mincheon smiled he showed one row of gauntfully false teeth; when Mr. Blight smiled he unblushingly displayed two.

To-day they were both smiling and multiplying their wrinkles in the expression of pleasure. No reference was made to Sylvia's rather abrupt termination to the ceremony of betrothal. Mr. Mincheon mounted the chariot and took the reins. To Sylvia's relief, Mr. Blight did not offer to shake hands with her. Lifting his hat, he made an angular bow from the waist, and said, "Good-by."

Mr. Mincheon, volubly quoting the ghost, drove rapidly toward the ferry, with the evident intention of proceeding to the opposite side of the river. Sylvia, with her hat pulled over her eyes, gave herself up to contemplating the change which had come over her, and to keeping back the tears dangerously near the surface.

She was wholly unconscious of what was going on about her until the boat touched the further shore, and the advance of the chariot was stopped for a moment by the interlocking of its wheels for a moment by the interlocking of its wheels with that of another vehicle. She looked up with that of another vehicle. She looked up then, and saw two men in a light wagon barking out of their way. One she recognized, but the other was a stranger, of a different class, and, as Sylvia saw at once, of distinguished appearance. This stranger, unconcerned by the difficulties which were testing his companion's skill in managing horses, was leaning forward looking at Sylvia, and as her eyes met his he exclaimed, "Poor little thing!"

Hope leaped up in Sylvia's heart, and colored her face, for she felt instinctively that the sympathetic words specially applied to her. At that moment the backing was successfully accomplished, and the Mincheon progress being no longer impeded, the chariot moved on ahead. Sylvia dared not look back. She hoped the wagon would pass them, and that she would have another look at the stranger who also looked like come by miracle to her assistance. This hope was doomed to disappointment. No wagon passed, and, listening intently for the sound of wheels, she became convinced that they were above on the road. Mr. Mincheon coughed three extra dry coughs to arrest Sylvia's attention, which he felt was not entirely at his disposal.

"For, as the ghost most pertinently observed, Sylvia—" he began.

Sylvia suddenly clasped his arm, and lifted a face to him the like of which for passionate anguish he had never seen in all his cut-and-dried life, and cried,

"Oh, grandpapa! grandpapa! must I marry Mr Blight?"

One instant of awful silence; then Mr Mincheon shook Sylvia from his arm as if her touch was contamination, and carefully dusted his dress with his handkerchief. The reins fell loose over the dash board. Mr Mincheon stuck his eyeglass in his eye, folded his arms, and craned his long neck round above the edge of his stock until he faced Sylvia crouching back in her seat.

"Must you marry Mr Blight?"

His voice expressed about as much comprehension of the meaning of the words as if he was uttering a Chinese salutation, learned by rote, and warranted suitable for all occasions.

"Yes, grandpapa—must I? must I? Is there no any out of it?"

From her vehemence a dim perception of her idea appeared to dawn in Old Mincheon's brain, expressed in a cruel tightening of his close-shaven lips.

"Pray, Sylvia if you do not marry Mr Blight, may I ask whom you will marry?"

This application of the Socratic method stunned Sylvia. She had only thought of getting rid of Mr Blight, and she felt that of marrying another man was a necessary alternative, her case was indeed desperate.

"I don't know—I don't know, I'm sure."

The helplessness of this reply had the effect of exploding Old Mincheon's imposing calmness. He lifted the whip, which had hitherto been a purely ornamental appendage to the chariot, and whirled it in the air. He recklessly lashed the horse, which, unaccustomed to such usage, dashed along the road at a rate threatening destruction.

"And may I ask, Sylvia," he gasped, "the interpretation of the phrase, 'an way out of it'? I have never heard the ghost, a basic English, as you know, is at once spirited and elegant—"

The reference to the ghost roused Sylvia to hysterical interruption.

"I know, grandpapa. But the ghost got me into it—Hot is—I mean— Oh, take care! The road round there is impassable. Don't turn!—don't—"

The warning came too late. Mr Mincheon, excited by this defiant criticism of supernatural authority, applied his whip incorrectly, and the horse took control of affairs. A sudden round a sharp corner, a swaying to and fro on the narrow path between the woods and a steep bank, then Old Mincheon and Sylvia, horse and chariot, were all rolling over down toward a deep, rapid stream.

Sylvia's next sensation was one of faintness and heavy oppression on the eyelids. She was feebly conscious that something unusual had happened. When she opened her eyes and saw the pine trees above her head, and a man unlike her grandfather kneeling beside her, she remembered. She scrambled to her feet and clung for support to a tree. Her hair had fallen, and hung about her torn rose-colored gown. She was the most grotesque and dirty figure imaginable.

"Who are you? And what are you doing? And what does it mean?"

"My name is Frank Aldridge. I am at present only looking at you—a pleasant and harmless occupation. It means that you are going to faint again. Look out!"

He put his arm round her, and held water to her lips.

She averted her head.

"Why did you not let me die? Now—now I must marry Mr Blight."

Here, as Aldridge had foretold, she fainted again. He dashed what water remained in his drinking-cup over her face. This, his only known and available restorative for a fainting woman, failed, and he, scared out of his normal self-confidence, picked her up and ran with her in his arms to his carriage at the turn of the road. Here he found his companion and Mr Mincheon. Mr Mincheon presented a most undignified spectacle. He was bare-headed, covered with dust, and weeping copiously. He held in his arms a piece of what had once been a chariot, but was now a lot of fragments which no skill could ever join together again.

In a few words Aldridge arranged that his companion should mount guard over the old man, who refused to leave his precarious perch on the bank, whilst he drove the young lady to the nearest house.

Aldridge, following his natural bent, coolly took the best of the bargain. In the twenty-four hours which he had spent in the provincial town he had acquired considerable information. When he had judiciously expressed his sympathy for Sylvia as the ferry-boat he was intimately acquainted with her history, from her foreign birth down to the proposed marriage with Mr Blight.

Now he unemotionally enjoyed the situation. He was young enough to find a vivid, romantic interest in the adventure, which was heightened by the girl's evident preference for death to marriage with Mr Blight.

As they drove rapidly from the scene of the accident he bent his head over her pale face, and a faint flush heralding returning consciousness, he whispered,

"It is a cruel shame."

The magic sentence to Sylvia. She half open ed her eyes and said, faintly:

"That is what Martha says. Take me home to Martha."

Before she had revived, Aldridge was not unwilling to prolong the drive.

"Martha is a sensible person. I should be glad to take you to her if you can stand the drive."

"Yes. Take me home. I am continued, I think."

"No matter what you think. Keep perfectly still. I will take you home." Sylvia drew a long breath of satisfaction, and did as directed.

Aldridge knew where the Mincheons lived and how to get there as well as if he had been brought up next door. He had to explain a great deal to inquisitive people on the ferry-boat, and hell of them went back to see Old Mincheon weeping over his chariot.

Arrived at the house, he lifted Sylvia to the ground and carried her to an arbor, where he put Martha running to find out what had happened.

He placed Sylvia in a rustic chair, and said:

"The horse ran away. Mr Mincheon is not hurt, but Miss Mincheon is considerably shaken. Take her into the house, and I will find a doctor."

Martha, very red in the face, and twisting her apron through her fingers, exclaimed, "And the chariot?"

"Confound the chariot! The old rattletrap is smashed into a thousand pieces, neither Sylvia nor Martha could have shown more genuine horror. They stared at him, they locked their arms round each other in mute defense against the impious stranger; they cried, together, "Oh, what will the ghost say?"

As Aldridge afterward said, this exhibition "floored" him. It was absurd enough to think of the old man's hugging a spoke of a wheel, but that was serious in comparison with the hysterical behavior of the women. Sylvia, in a fit of despair such as he had never seen in real life, flung her arms round Martha's neck and buried her face. Martha hesitated perplexingly. Aldridge had a happy thought. He took some coins from his pocket, and Martha, hearing the pleasant, unsentimental chink, looked at him through her tears. An insinuating smile lighted his face, and he held out his hand, in which there was a gleam of silver.

"I say, Martha, you are a sensible woman. Take care of your mistress, and I will look after Mr Mincheon and the trap." Martha's tears and sobs stopped like a reversed engine. "And look here, Martha, it is a cruel shame."

Martha treated him to one keenly intelligent glance, and led Sylvia away. Watching them fairly into the house, Aldridge started off for the doctor. His quest was clouded, and continued so for several hours. Late at night, after Mr Mincheon had been carried home by sheer superiority of physical force, and Aldridge sat smoking a pipe in the starlight, his mind began to flow in a familiar channel, and he saw that his duty to a healthy appetite for general information was to remain on the spot, and prove the depths of provincial eccentricity. He sent a dispatch to his friends stating that he would not join them for several days, reserving his reasons with characteristic indifference for what other people might expect.

The next day was a miserable one for Sylvia Mincheon. She shut in her room until Mr Blight had made a morning call, and she had watched him from her window stalk up the street to his office—his office, where even Sylvia wondered what he did to amuse himself. Her grandfather staid in bed severely, and was heard declaiming fine passages from Burke and Pitt—a sign that he was at sword's point with all the world.

In the afternoon Sylvia plucked up heart to dress herself and go down-stairs. Aldridge called, and Martha ushered him unannounced into the parlor. Sylvia was curled up in a large leather arm-chair, and did not see him till he was beside her. Then she rose, and blushed vividly and bowed coldly. Aldridge had come prepared for all things unusual; so, unabashed by her coldness, which he at once attributed to difficulties, he inquired kindly for her health and that of her grandfather. Sylvia answered him politely, and then, not having asked him to sit down, said,

"I must beg you to excuse me," and moved to the door. It was not for this that Aldridge had postponed his salmon fishing. He acted promptly.

"You are not going to leave me?"

"I must. I have never received any gentleman alone in my life—but Mr Blight. Grandpapa would never forgive me. But he will never forgive me now, anyway."

Tears choked her voice and filled her eyes, and she stood still half a-way to the door. Aldridge deftly turned her own words to his advantage.

"Then you might as well stay with me as more harm can be done. I am not like Mr. Blight; but try me."

He had followed her up, and was looking at her with an expression calculated to win. He was a master of expression. Sylvia rested her hand on the back of a high chair, and smiled through her tears.

"No, you are not at all like Mr Blight. You are much younger, and rather better looking."

So warped was Aldridge by experience with wheedlings that he at once suspected audacious coquetry. But the critical candor of her gaze soon dissipated that idea, and made him a trifle ashamed of himself. So long as he could keep her there he did not care much what she said. He made an extraordinary demand.

"Tell me some more about Mr Blight."

Sylvia continued her comparison. It was very easy to talk to him over the top of the high chair. Her grandfather would never forgive her, anyway, and there was a pleasure in giving voice to her secret sentiments about Mr Blight.

"He is taller than you, but then he is all length, like a poplar-tree, and he quivers, too, in the wind. You don't quiver to the wind, do you?"

"Not an eyelash."

"That's nice." Here Sylvia nodded her head approvingly several times. "Then, you see, being, like grandpapa, an officer in the militia, as always wears undress uniform. I have thought that the long tight coat made him look even a little more like a poplar-tree than nature intended. I don't know how you would look in that uniform, I am sure."

"Oh, like a guy. But, believe me, my looks are not my strong point."

"Perhaps not," she assented, repeating the confidential nod. "You are not as handsome as some of the men who have dined with grandpapa on state occasions."

Aldridge caught at a new subject. "What do you mean by state occasions?"

"When grandpapa dines the Governor and suite. I am to go to the balls and dinners at Government House next winter, after I marry Mr Blight. Oh, how could you?—why did you cut me die?"

She threw back her head and looked at him as she had looked at her grandfather the day before. Her appeal had a different effect. Aldridge leaned over the chair from the other side and answered back from his lowet

"I'm not such a brute as this, you know. I will get you out of it some way."

"Will you? Can you? How?"

Before he could frame a suitable answer to this direct acceptance of a vague assertion, Martha announced, in a loud voice, "Mr Blight."

Sylvia darted to the door, and when Mr Blight entered, Aldridge was negligently leaning on the chair, with his hat in his hand, and the mood no of a visitor about to take his leave.

"This is Mr. Aldridge, Mr Blight," said Sylvia, with visible trepidation—"the gentleman who was so kind to us yesterday."

The men bowed to each other, and Aldridge bowed himself out, leaving Sylvia, in her fright to be left alone with Mr Blight, exclaim, "Good-bye; I hope you will come and see grandpapa soon."

For three days Aldridge tried hard to see Sylvia again, but every device, fair and strategic, failed. On the fourth day he waylaid Martha returning from market. She was bursting with news.

"Miss Sylvia is to be married at once."

"The devil!" said Aldridge. "What do you mean by at once?"

"A week or thereabouts."

"I thought you meant to-day. Several things may happen in a week. What does Miss Sylvia say?"

"Nothing but that it is all your fault. She is very bitter about you. I have never heard her go on so."

"That is a good sign. What is the reason of this sudden decision?"

"The ghost, sir. The ghost has said that the smashing of the chariot foretasted some dreadful harm to the family, and as Miss Sylvia had better be married at once. And I must say that Mr Blight is on the side of the ghost very strong." Aldridge walked in silence beside Martha to the gate. Here there was another transfer of coin from his hand to hers.

"Martha, the ghost must change its mind."

"If that could be!" she said, doubtfully.

"It must be. And I must see your mistress to-day. What time can you manage that?"

Martha looked thoughtful.

"At eight this evening. That old Blight still has gout, and Miss Sylvia will be alone in the arbor. Get her out of it if you can. God bless you!"

A few minutes after eight that evening Aldridge came quietly up the garden path, and turned into the arbor. Sylvia was there, sitting with her hands clasped round her knee, in pathetic and desolate figure. On seeing Aldridge she stood up and poured out a torrent of childish displeasure. He waited till she had exhausted herself; then he took hold of her wrists and held her.

"You do me great injustice. If I had known about Mr Blight I should have sent you spinning into the stream. I should never have been so unkind as to scramble after you and pick you up. You believe me?"

Sylvia trembled. The force of the man overwhelmed her, and besides, he was presenting a new side of the question.

"And since I have known, I have been so anxious to help you. You remember I said I would instead of trusting me, you have shunned me. I believe you hate me. At least I have not deserved that."

The presentation of the argument of injured virtue overcame Sylvia's last scruple.

"No, no!" she cried. "Forgive me, if you can. But I am so miserable, so desperate. Is there no way out of it?"

"Let us sit down here and talk it over," said Aldridge, delighted with his success.

It was the first time in her dreary life that sympathy had ever been offered to her. She was not troubled by any conventional reserve. Here was some one who pitied her and would help her. Some one who, in spite of her bad behavior, would forgive her and listen to her. She laid bare her heart to him.

"I am alone in the world. I have been afraid of grandpapa and my governess, and most of all of the ghost, always. I have never been happy, neither have I been unhappy until the last week. I think I have not understood life, its meanings and possibilities, before, and it is terrible to begin with helpless misery. All my reading with my governess has taught me nothing. I have never thought that I had in me any of the feelings and passions which impelled people to deeds of heroism as to crime. You see, from the first the ghost has planned things for me, and I have had no notion of personal responsibility. Now I am no longer blind. I began to see and to feel when Mr. Blight took my hand and I promised to marry him. I looked at myself that day for the first time, and I felt that I ought to have a voice in the arrangement of my own future. I cried not to grandpapa to help me, and you know how he has answered. Oh, I am such a poor little thing! I are so ignorant on a lady of the world, and of men and women. I could not run away from here; I should not know where to run, or how, or what to do, beyond the garden. No, there is nothing for me but Mr. Blight or the river. I shall choose the river, unless you can help me. If you can, if you will, I will do anything in the world for you."

Sylvia was looking up at him, her wild eyes playing havoc with his susceptibilities. The tones of her pained, high-strung voice vibrated in his heart. The abandon of her plea for protection stirred strong and generous emotion. He was young, he had known only the sunny side of life, and he saw felt himself in the enviable position of a hero of a genuine romance. The first qualification of the hero is to be in love with the heroine. He was in love with her. He had been in love with her from the first, and that was the true reason for lingering in the stupid town.

"I will help you," he exclaimed, "and you must trust me implicitly, and not look at the river."

Sylvia's face expressed her confidence.

"You are not afraid of me?"

"No."

"You put yourself in my hands wholly?"

"Yes."

Sylvia had risen, and was herding out of the arbor. Aldridge felt the necessity of explaining what he meant to do for her, and why he meant to do it, of showing her that he proposed to substitute himself for Mr. Blight. As she was, in hour, unprepared for this simple plan, fresh obstacles might arise if he attempted an explanation in words. Besides, time pressed, and he must woo hastily.

He caught her in his arms and kissed her. For a moment Sylvia clung to him, for a moment she looked at him so shyly and sweetly that nobody could have blamed him for repeating the experiment. But while he thought he would, she drew herself away and fled to the house. With suspicious promptness Martha appeared in the arbor.

Sylvia flung herself on her bed in a flutter of agitation. She was not afraid of her new happiness, she sprang forward to it are of the darkness of solitude and fear. Now she thoroughly understood her heroine and her crossroads. All that could make life beautiful or bitter had come to her—poor little Sylvia Mincheon!

A shrill cry broke the stillness of the night, Sylvia started up and ran to the door. There she stood, listening, wondering, trembling. Another cry, fainter than the first, but full of terror, came up the stairs. With an answering exclamation she ran through the hall, down the broad stairway, to her grandfather's room. Martha was there, with a lighted candle in her hand. Mr. Mincheon sat up in bed, twisting the sheets in his fingers, moaning and shaking extravagantly. Sylvia ran to the bedside.

"What is it, grandpapa? Are you ill? What can we do? Martha, do something quick."

"Bad dreams, darlin', bad dreams. A glass of sherry, my b"

Martha advanced with the wine. Mr. Mincheon's eyes were singularly small and colorless, but on this occasion they distended with indignation.

"Stand back, woman! Bad dreams, indeed?"

He waved Martha off with a majestic motion, and turned his attention to Sylvia. "Sylvia, begone!" He pushed her violently from the bed, and took to groaning and twisting the sheets with renewed vigor.

"The ghost," he murmured—"the ghost," and looked at Sylvia, who had retreated to the window.

Sylvia lived up. These words banished the alarm at her grandfather's condition, and her desire to know the cause.

"Who came for the ghost? I don't. I won't marry Mr Blight. I won't! I won't! You nasty, wicked old thing! I don't care a soap of my life for you. There! there!"

She snapped her fingers in the air, leaving it doubtful whether the apprehension option to the addressed as the ghost or to her grandfather. Mr. Mincheon's faculties were momentarily stunned by this outburst, but recovering himself, he seemed about to spring out of bed and annihilate his impious granddaughter. Martha saved her by pushing her out of the window to the veranda, saying, "Go to bed, darlin' I'll manage him."

Sylvia hastened round to the kitchen, and turning to shut the door, a wonderfully bright light flashed in her eyes, revealing for a second the face and figure of Mr Frank Aldridge. If Sylvia's brain had not already been turned topsy-turvy, she might have connected this apparition with her grandfather's fright. As it was, she simply groped her way back to her room, and hung out of the window, peering after her vanished lover, from whose a myriad of ghosts and grandfathers could are nepo rein her

She fell asleep at last, challenging all her enemies to come on and do their worst.

The next day was far advanced when Martha woke Miss Sylvia, and bade her dress at once and go down to her grandfather, who was expecting her

At this summons Sylvia's recklessness of last night hardened into defiance. As she crossed the hall in the sunlight, Martha, who was not given to analyzing expression, was startled by the fierce determination of her face. Mr Mincheon had risen and made his somewhat elaborate toilet. He sat by the window in an easy-chair, but rigidly erect. Sylvia stood still in the middle of the room. It was her custom to stand in her grandfather's presence until invited to sit down. This morning that courtesy was not accorded.

The old man was in his demeanor, the girl self-possessed. His tone was circular. It left the should have an idea of disputing what he might say, he meant to show her the uselessness of that at once.

"Sylvia, so you are aware, I had last night an unusually exciting interview with the ghost. There was a difference of opinion, and I was slightly disturbed—very slightly. Mr ——, rising in the heat of discussion, alarmed Martha and you. You recall the incident?"

Sylvia at that moment vividly recalled his shrieks and his exhibition of abject fear, but she merely bowed her head. "You, Sylvia, were the subject of discussion. Are you prepared to receive instructions concerning your immediate future?"

A faint color tinged Sylvia's cheeks. She clasped her hands, and spoke not all her defiance. "I will listen to all you have to say, grandpapa, but I won't be tyrannized over by anybody living, much less by a ghost. I won't live in ignorant solitude any longer I won't marry Mr Blight."

"Well done! That's plucky! I like that!"

This voice was are Mr Mincheon's, nor Mr. Blight's. Sylvia turned, and saw Aldridge standing in a corner. Instinctively she took a few steps toward him, stretching out her hands; then abruptly stopped, overcome by a pitiful confusion. Aldridge met her more than half way

"Sylvia, you are are to marry Mr Blight; you are to marry me. If you will, you may. The ghost himself has said it."

Sylvia shrank back from him, a picture of delighted surprise. Aldridge whispered something to her not intended for Mr Mincheon's ears. She ran across the room, and flung herself at her grandfather's feet.

"Forgive me. I will do as you desire. The ghost is right."

Said old Mincheon, grandly: "If you will mention an instance when the ghost has been wrong, you will oblige me. Young man, your manners and credentials being satisfactory, I give this girl into your hands, and from her recent exhibitions, I should say you will have your hands full. Sylvia, leave the room, and don't come near me again until I send for you."

Sylvia slipped out of the window in a twinkling. When Aldridge joined her in the garden, she asked him a grave question "Is there a Mincheon ghost? Has there ever been a Mincheon ghost? Everything is slipping away from me. I can only believe in you Tell me the truth."

Aldridge's eyes sparkled with fun as he answered: "If you cry 'Wolf' long enough, the wolf comes at last, and gobbles you up as a punishment for prevarication. Mr Mincheon feels this morning that he has had a narrow escape from the jaws of the wolf. Mr Blight is the loser thereby, and I are the winner Poor Blight! I wonder how the would have will arrange things?"

Sylvia was not to be baffled in this way. "But you were the wolf. You know you were. And Martha knows it too. I taxed her with the fraud just now, and she could not deny it."

Aldridge laughed outright. "You must learn to accept results, Sylvia, and ask no questions about the means."

Sylvia looked thoughtfully at the ground, then sweetly at her lover. "Since grandpapa has declared me no long and so cleverly, I know what men are, and—you had better look out. My eyes can open even wider."

Long afterward, when Sylvia's eyes had opened very wide, Aldridge remarked to a confidential friend,

"For making a man a contradictory, slightly skeptical, altogether delightful wife, there is nothing like early faith in a family ghost."

ANNIE EDWARDSON MACFARLANE.

CHINESE THEATRES IN SAN FRANCISCO.

A most refreshing sensation awaits the tourist in the Pacific coast at the Chinese theatres in San Francisco. These establishments are two in number, and as the Chinese are numerous there, the houses are crowded every night. The performance begins at seven and lasts till one or two o'clock in the morning, but even a performance of this length is only a section of a play, which goes on night after night for a week or two. The stage is a mere platform, there are no foot lights, the only illuminations being that from two small gaslights. There are no curtains, no scenes, flies or wings, no proscenium, or properties other than a table, two chairs, fans, and weapons. The scene is denoted in the primitive way by displaying a banner on which is written "forest," "room, and so on. This is put in front of the actors, and the imagination of the spectators does the rest. The Joss and household gods are, as in every Chinese dwelling, in the background. The rear wall separates the stage from the actors' dressing room and the kitchen, and a circular window covered with netting enables the manager to watch the performance, and enables the audience to see the manager at supper

Behind the space occupied by the actors is the orchestra—a discord fiddle, a flageolet, a tambourine, a bass drum, banjos, and gongs. The gong player is the director of the music, the one-stringed fiddle is held like a violoncello, and is a most painful instrument. There are frequent lapses into song in a Chinese play, but the airs are wild and facetious, and the orchestral accompaniment quite independent of the singer. There may be worse noises than a Chinese show, but not many The scenes are everything by turns, or rather at once—pieces, acrobats, singers, musicians, there is no such thing as a specialty The costumes are gorgeous. Rich gold embroidery, heavy silks and velvets, costly feathers and jewelry, form an important feature of the display. The plays are mostly historic, and, as already stated, last for days. Chinese acting has an dignity, no repose, no bronzy, and the plays are weak and without attention, while the plots are of almost childish simplicity.

It is not commonly known, however, that there is a national patronage of the drama in China, as in France and Germany, and that actors receive generous salaries, ranging from $1000 to $4000—sums equal to at least three times those amounts here. In China the female roles are still played by boys, and an actor who plays the leading female part will receive about $3500. He certainly earns it, so he has to shuffle about in the ungraceful fashion of Chinese women, talk in falsetto, and sing in high soprano with an effect that most make his throat sore.

Very often the drama is cut into two parts, and a light comedy played between. This is always one of the most realistic character, depicting every-day life among the lower classes. It is reported that the grossest indecencies are represented in some of these plays. The acrobats or tumblers make their entrance en masse at about eleven o'clock, and the whole stage is filled with all the members of the troupe Their feats are wonderful. The great battle scene, an indispensable requisite in a Chinese theatre, then takes place, and a terrific display ensues of hanging, hammering, screaming, twanging, and tooting. The braggart is made up terribly—his face is as a blot on paper, his hair and beard black and shaggy, his eyebrows are at least an inch wide, and a gorgeous robe covers his figure. He growls, stamps, swaggers, and brandishes his arm, till another figure enters, the embodiment of cruelty and cunning. Haughty challenges are given; the leaders proceed to behead their adversaries' troops, the loss of a head being denoted by bending the neck and retiring from the stage. New armies come on as fast as the old ones are decapitated, and all the time the noise is deafening. The usual sing-song and high pitch of the "Canine of the Moon" will certainly learn astonished the Caucasian ear, but the Bungalian is delighted, and the audience very demonstrative in their approval. This does not hinder them from eating mincemeats, smoking, and drinking saki, which waiters carry around among the audience. The audience all wear their hats, so it is regarded as a great breach of etiquette for any one not to do so in public. The price of admission at the San Francisco theatre is fifty cents, but it is needless to say that this is only collected from Americans, the Chinamen most likely paying only ten cents.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

The yachting season promises to be unusually interesting. On this side of the ocean several handsome boats, built both for pleasure and speed, will be in readiness for the opening of the season. Some of the yachts that have made good records in former years—notably the Mischief, Gracie, and Hildegarde—are being put in extra trim in anticipation of a season of lively sport. News comes from English waters that a new sixty-eight-ton cutter named the Marjorie has been built for the gentleman who sent the roving craft Madge to this country, and that the new cutter may be sent to these waters to compete for the America cup It is said that she carries sails larger than were ever before carried by a yacht of her tonnage From the brief description to hand the Marjorie seems to be what American yachtsmen call a racing machine If she is to sail for the America cup, American yachtsmen may reasonably claim that to which to build a similar machine to compete with her There is room for difference of opinion as to whether a yacht of her description may form a challenge to sail for the America's cup If she should appear that she ought to be barred out, for reasons similar to those which would exclude a catamaran, yachtsmen on this side of the ocean will be at a loss to decide whether it is worth their while to build a craft to compete with her for a new trophy

A very uncomfortable feeling of insecurity has been produced in parts of Brooklyn by the operations of a burglar who seems to have negotiated the art of entering houses and carrying off all we are without making the least noise. The police conjecture that he has some way of muffling his feet so as to mask his footsteps noiseless, while superstitious persons are not quite sure that his depredations are accomplished without supernatural aid. He seems to go from house to house by way of the rear yards, and though he has entered scores of dwellings, as one has ever heard him coming, washing, or going.

The following story of the Southern floods is rather late, but perhaps it has been held back in the hope of being able to make it complete: "After the wheat crops up on a Kentucky farm a short storm covered the field with ice. Before this melted a flood swept over, and the ice, rising to the surface of the water, pulled every blade of wheat out of the ground and carried it away." It is to be hoped that the man on whose ploughed ground the ice settled will not fail to report the number of bushels the transplanted wheat yielded to the acre.

The Marquis of Lorne, passing between a double file of Niagara lacrosse players, raised his hat the entire distance. This, somebody explains, was the homage which nobility pays to wealth.

A discussion from the doctrine of the Rev. Mr. Jasper that "de sun do move" has arisen in Richmond, Virginia. "Shuah," he says, "everybody knows de sun doan move. Dat's nonsense. De skies seems around every day."

One of the lawyers in the Star Route trials finished his review of the testimony concerning the Eagle and Bridge City route, known as the "gum boot" mail line, by reading the appended lines, which, he said, were composed by Assistant District-Attorney Moore

"The mail was small—
Scarce any at all;
A letter or two and a paper
Went over this route
In the log of a boat—
The horse on a five-mile caper."

It is told of an American millionaire who bought him a castle on the Rhine that one cold day his daughter found him warming his hands at a fire which he had kindled in a suit of plate armor

"Oh, papa, what have you been doing?" she cried.

"The fuller that patented that stove," replied the lord of the castle, "must have been crazy, but I've made the old thing heat up at last."

Now it is denied that John Brown, the Queen's gillie, kept a diary. Probably he merely began keeping a diary at the beginning of each year, to other mortals do.

It is claimed that a tall tree has been discovered in Victoria, Australia, that far surpasses any of the great trees of California. It is a variety of the eucalyptus tree, and it is claimed that it is 420 feet tall, and measures sixty feet around the trunk at a considerable distance above the roots.

As an instance of the great advance which sometimes takes place in the value of a book in a comparatively short period, it is recalled that the "Album Mosaï" was bought by an Englishman in 1859 for $100, was sold shortly afterward for $350, and is valued now at $10,000.

A short time ago the steam-ship Catalonia brought twelve hundred Irish immigrants to Boston, most of whom were sent at the expense of the British government. They are without money, and a large proportion of them will have to be taken care of for a while at least by the taxpayers Meanwhile, the only people who are forbidden to immigrate to the United States are those who live under a government that has never tried to lessen its pauper population by sending paupers to America, and who have always succeeded in taking care of themselves when they came here It is probable that there will be more paupers among the twelve hundred Irish who were sent over in the Catalonia than there are among all the Chinamen in the United States.

USEFUL AND ORNAMENTAL.

It has been proposed that a Statue of Washington be placed in Battery Park. Perhaps the "L" road might take an interest in it.

THEATRICAL PERFORMANCES IN CHINA-TOWN, SAN FRANCISCO.—Drawn by P. Frenzeny.—[See Page 906.]

SKETCHES AT THE KIRMESS.—Drawn by C. D. Weldon.—[See Page 300.]

"DISARMED!"*

By MISS BETHAM-EDWARDS,

Author of "Kitty," "Exchange no Robbery," "Bonnivard to Eastern France," "Dr. Jacob," "The Story-Teller; or, the Outcasts," etc.

CHAPTER XI.

All as yet had seemed like a dream to Arthura, the sail, the landing, the long, long journey westward, then the arrival at the fair city, enthroned so stately on the Loire. It was morning when the train crawled slowly along the quays bristling with masts, and close under the shadow of the venerable cathedral, into the station. The sun was flashing on town and river, gilding the ancient palaces of merchant princes, burnishing dome and cupola, lending Venetian warmth and sumptuousness to the scene. And over all such a sky! Flawless, dazzling, southern blue. Were there never coy clouds in France? asked the wondering Arthura.

She awoke to the reality of things when she found herself in Madame Henri's little parlor alone with Valerian—hostess and little daughter out marketing, the class-rooms closed on account of Easter holidays, half an hour certainly, perhaps an hour, all their own, before dejeuner.

"At last," he said, and, perhaps pardonably, gathered her for a moment to his lips, his heart, his knee. "At last!"

Not it was for a moment only.

The next Arthura was standing beside his chair, not in the least ready to cry of joy now, but herself every inch, raillery as well as love looking out of her eyes, a thousand things besides sentiment on her lips.

"What will become of us?" she asked, regardfully. "We are ruined. We are undone."

Quite pardonably, it must be admitted, Valerian would fain have had one kiss more, only the third after six months' waiting, he pleaded. But Arthura laughingly changed the subject.

"We are ruined," she repeated, looking artlessly, foolishly blissful over the prospect.

"Yes," he replied, shaking his head with a woe-begone look. "My poor little girl! ruin is just the word. Nothing could have turned out so deplorably for both of us or this business. It is, in fact, suicidal."

"I am as good as married already, for I have a family to support," began Arthura, with apes brimful of hope and joy.

"And I have an prospects. I must stay with my cousin," said Valerian, looking equally radiant.

"I have my dear father's debts to pay." And for a moment Arthura's face clouded over. The next she was sparkling as before.

"I shall perhaps be my own master, and able to marry you, when I am sixty. Will you wait for me so long, my poor Arthura?"

Arthura laughed gayly.

"Shall I have done all that I must do by that time? Thirty years! thirty years! You would be sixty, I fifty-three. It seems a long time, yet with the children to educate and place out, not a day too much. It would be safer to say forty." And again she laughed merrily. "Would you love me for forty years?" she asked, and bending down as she stood behind his chair, he unconscious of the act, she just touched his brown curls with her lips.

"No, I can not promise. You are the clever-er at devices. Find some means of solving the problem."

"Oh, let us not think of the future to-day!" she cried, passionately. "Let us run about the woods and gather wild flowers like children. The problem can wait."

"For forty years? Well, girl me one kiss, and I will promise anything you please."

"Me to marry Stephana, then?" she asked, full of vivaciousness. "For that is what they have got their minds on, my poor boy—I mean Miss Hermitage and Mr Constantine. Stephana is to marry you, and you are to become a grand personage."

"Semense!" he said, sharply and reproachfully. "Who could have put such an idea into your head?"

"Well, Stephana would not have you; that I am sure of," was the saucy reply.

"You do not know that either," Valerian said, distracted by Arthura's spirit and beauty, to almost a love-like frenzy at the notion that she loved him, was to belong to him, yet at the same time a little ruffled at her outspokenness and want of appreciation. And a second time the temptation was too great. She was more than bewitching, but she had hurt his vanity; a second time he took her lover like in his arms as in pat the question. "Tell me, was it but a mock quarrel, like the rest, for Miss Hermitage's diversion, or did you mean it? You once called me dull!"

"What people do in play they are apt to do in earnest. Let me tell you what is on my mind, for once, for all," she said, sitting beside him, at first neither and now merry, in every-day sober-colored mood. "My own Valerian," she began, "you must know how hard it has been to keep up this deception so long. When I first went to Miss Hermitage's I thought nothing could be easier than to pretend to dislike you, losing you all the while. And, besides, it was my bread and the poor children's." She dashed away a tear or two; then went on. "It was my father's honor I said not refuse. But I been felt a dozen times as if I must go and tell Miss Hermitage all."

"You will not—promise me you will not?" asked Valerian, greatly disturbed.

"I have an right to betray you. Be easy," she said, raising her rose-wet face to his, kissing him as if he were a child, a weak thing dependent on her. "But if you will not release me from the bond, let me go." Again she turned to him, this time with passionate pleading—with love unutterable looking out of her pure eyes. "We should be able to see each other now and then. We could write to each other. I am sure as should both be much happier."

"Well," Valerian said, very kindly, even tenderly, "as will turn the matter over in our minds. We will talk about it."

"I can not quarrel with you any more. The pretense of disliking you became unbearable sometimes," Arthura continued. "I really felt as if it must be true, or as if it would come true."

"And so you really meant it when you called me dull?"

"I darn say I did. I felt vicious enough to say anything sometimes."

"It does great credit to us that everybody has been to completely taken in," laughed Valerian.

"No; it is just that I feel ashamed of," Arthura said, rising to her feet, a fine glow of indignation on her cheeks. "There must be nobility enough in Miss Hermitage to pardon us, if we go to her and reveal all."

"Never! never! You little know my cousin. You do not know her at all," cried Valerian. "Such a step would be ruin, sheer ruin for us both, my poor Arthura; and listen, my love, my wife that is to be. There can, of course, be no secrets between us. Sit down for a minute on my knee whilst I tell you something."

For a moment such a look of pain and forlornness came into her lover's face that Arthura could refuse him nothing. There were actually tears of mortification in his eyes.

"Listen, my little girl, my only friend," he whispered, as for a moment they sat thus cheek to cheek and hand in hand. "This poor Valerian you love so dearly has nothing, not even a name, to give you. I must keep down high spirit. I must be Miss Hermitage's bond-servant as long as she lives, since it is she who picked me out of the gutter."

Arthura, all gentleness, listened now, sitting close beside him, looking up at him with mute yet sweetest consolation.

"Is it any wonder that I show what may look like a craven spirit? But for Christina I should have shared the fate of thousands of forlorn wretches born into vagabondage, living witnesses of secret sin." He was absolutely in tears, this ready, volatile, light-hearted Valerian, as, still leaning his cheek to hers, he blurted out the rest. "You, my love, my wife to be, my one close friend, must know all. I am called by the name of my humble, but I am one of them an sufferance only. Is it not monstrous, shameful, that such things should be? But you will love me none the worse?"

For answer, the passionate girl put her arms proudly, protectively, about him. "What am you, what can you ever be to me, but Valerian?" she said. "It need not prevent as from being happy."

"And if we have patience and tact, we may be happy ere we think," Valerian said. "But I must not go against Christina's wishes."

"And if she bids you do it, you will have to marry Stephana?" Arthura said, playfully.

"Leave Stephana alone," he replied, with a touch of irritation. "Stephana is generous enough for that. She bade this be that a little pour-less girl bewitched me past cure long ago." He was recovering his spirits.

"Do you really think we shall be happy some day?" she asked. "Can things come right for as as they do in story-books?"

"It will not be my fault if they go wrong. But you must be guided by me in everything. Promise."

"That is vaguely said. Put in plain words what I am to promise you," said the happy girl, delighted to see her Valerian himself once more.

"Then promise me two things, you will stay with Christina as long as I wish it; and you will never, never breathe a word of our engagement to any living soul."

"We shall see," Arthura answered. "We shall reflect. What if Miss Hermitage should some day grow tired of me? I could not stay then."

"She will never grow tired of you whilst you amuse her, and you can continue to do that."

"Who knows? I amuse Miss Hermitage now without taking any trouble about it. Why is should be so I do not conceive. The boat thing I see makes her smile. She must have lived all her life with people who only said Yes and No. I never say Yes and No, and that amuses her, I suppose."

"You must never begin to say Yes and No, then. Understand, my Arthura, if my cousin chose, she may make your fortune as well as mine. We are both in her hands completely," and Valerian's face assumed its every-day, worldly look. "We must act our respective parts more discreetly, more circumspectly, than ever."

"Let Miss Hermitage make your fortune, and let me run away, then. One will suffice for us both," pleaded Arthura. "Were I no longer present, there need be no acting at all."

Valerian's brow grew dark.

"There is the bell, and I promised to answer it. It is Madeleine and her mother back from market," she cried, jumping from her seat with a sense of relief.

True enough, it was their housewives laden with marketings, flowers for grace, and a brilliant display for delectation. There were strawberries of the four seasons, crimson of crimsons, bananas barred with black and gold like a bumble-bee, the zebra'd banana, as some French writer aptly calls it; asparagus, wands of ivory tipped with pink; the tropical mad-apple, deepest shelly purple; the prickly artichoke, delicate sea green, smooth as if carved out of marble for the crowning of a salmon. And there was butter, yellow as gold from the rich pasturage of Brittany, and ray fish fresh from the Loire; gui-ttes crisp and brown, fried a quarter of an hour ago by light-fingered itinerant pastry-cooks, bread of that glossy romantic brown never tasted out of France—and indeed what was there out for epicures?

The servant had been sent home for her holiday, en hosts and guests set to work—Madame Henri to make the omelette and cook the fish, Valerian to set the butler, which he did to perfection; the two girls to lay the cloth. What a merry breakfast it was! How the wine seemed to sparkle! How the least little thing incited mirth! There was only one drawback. In the midst of a lively conversation Madame Henri suddenly recollected the thousand francs spent on her daughter's English education. "Speak English," she cried, in a shrill voice. "Speak English, I say."

"But, maama, you will not understand."

"What does that matter? Speak English, I repeat."

So the rest of the talk was carried on in English, Madame Henri dumb, but delighted. What was Madeleine thinking of, forsooth? Two English guests, whose talk at meals was worth a dozen lessons at five francs apiece, did not drop from the clouds every day. And opportunities of putting money in our pockets must never be wasted, thought the Frenchwoman.

What would you have? If her heart was in her pocket, how many others are similarly located. Some people's hearts, alas! are in their palates, not a few feminine nose in their looking-glasses, a considerable number are not to be found our where, and few, very few, we may be sure, are in their right place.

Madame Henri was not to be blamed for seizing upon any small worldly advantage that came in her way. Had Shakespeare himself been sitting at her table, she would have foregone the pleasure of listening to him for the sake of her daughter's English. We are what circumstances make us, and people who live by their wits must not be Quixotic, but look to actualities.

CHAPTER XII.

The month of May!—the month of Marie! Valerian and Arthura had touched French soil just as pious maidens were heaping fresh flowers on the altars in honor of the Virgin, and now it was May indeed.

And what a May! June seemed to have come in her sister's place. The air was fragrant with magnolias in full bloom; camellias, red and white, made a blaze of splendor in the public gardens; people amused themselves at their doors all day long.

Almost Southern voluptuousness comes with the summer to the tropical capital of Western France, so proudly confronting river and ocean. The city itself offers many enticements. There are the tropic allees of the common pleasure ground, the stately quays, where wave flags from the wide world, and, high above, terraced walks, whence you may survey the whole scene—city and cathedral, fair open country; and, studded with many an emerald isle, the superb, the swift-flowing, the unbridled Loire, benefactor to-day, devastator to-morrow, majestic, beautiful ever.

But when had town birds music for lovers' ears? Arthura and Valerian were off every morning, like liberated school-children, and anything more was seen of them till the six o'clock dinner. They would take the little steamer and go down the Erdre—the silvery, sleepy Erdre—throbbing sedgy banks, now bright with iris and daffodil, and below green as emerald, and low hills and coppice woods alive with song. Or they would use the little boats plying on the Loire, and alight at the first landing-place that invited, anon to wander amid shaded apple orchards and quiet homesteads, now to climb the steep river-bank, and from some high point watch the ships hastening toward the sea.

Then, again, was the diligence. Without asking their destination, they would take their seats by the drivers, sure to come to some happy place, flowery meadows, little bits of woods still left to the birds and the squirrels, and bending rivers with weirs making tiny cascades.

But what pleased them best was just to take the common, unpoetic city omnibuses, and being drift in the suburbs, and shift for themselves. For that hoary, venerable city, like knotted and gnarled oak lightly covered with virgin ivy of purest green, or some other beautiful parasite, was rich in borrowed youth and rustic grace. No great surprises here, no natural wonders, but Nature in her sweetest, most generous, most captivating mood. Other French cities possess far greater claims to suburban picturesqueness and grandeur, none such winning entourage of quiet caressing beauty. The happy lovers would then quit the diligence where it stopped at the outroi, and plunge, no matter where, so long as it was country, and not town.

And just outside the dusty high-roads, just beyond sound of railway whistle, they would find little Eden-like solitudes of verdure and flowerieness, sun-lit velvety spaces between thicket and thicket, close-shut garths ablaze with flower of apple and plum, a thousand lovely hiding-places for too happy hearts.

The charm of these little gold-green glades was the captivating way in which one led to another. It was like stepping from chamber to chamber in an enchanted palace. Cool, silent, delicious, rich in sunshine and mahogaeous shadow, all were alike. Yet each seemed fairer than the last. These little open spaces, indeed, were but clearings of wheat had once been forest, carelessly left because there was land enough and to spare. As the pair threaded the green ways or scanned themselves, resting on the soft, warm, blossomy moss, farm-yard sounds would reach them from the homesteads nestled near—cackling of hens and quacking of ducks, cheery song of blue-bloused cowherd or contented bleating of goats. No stiles, no gates, no hedge bedges. Lovers keeping holiday may trespass unreproved in France.

Then the wild flowers! Sometimes Arthura would leave Valerian to smoke his cigar, dream his day-dream, or watch the crimson-tufted hoopoe and the yellow oriole—melancholy birds—under the hedge, and alone make noble deep in flowers through the unmown meadow. In most pastures by the river the air was sweet with the rock cistus and the grape hyacinth, while in the open sunny reaches showed the deep purple columbine and the ox-eyed daisy. How warm and lustrous gleamed the grasses in the sun! Nasturtium fairer as half an ethereal as those needlet blossoms all silver or gold. Here and there the sorrel flower glowed coral pink as a child's ear. But the glory of the world just then was the mallow grass awaiting the mower's scythe. Who can describe it? Wave upon wave of feathery gold, the crowning glory of day and subdued splendor of night, sun and moon in one!

The evenings were no less blissful to the lovers, but hardly these own in company of the school mistress and her fifteen-year-old daughter.

They would visit the crowded churches, warm and laden with breaths of flowers, and listen to the music in honor of the Catholics' Mary. It was such music as Arthura had never yet listened to—fool-less, passionate, poetic.

Not only the human voice, but the very music of instruments seemed to throb with love, awe, and pious feeling; whilst throughout the vast aisles, fragrant with fresh flowers, all was rapt silence. No sounds but the melodic strains as they rose and fell, now filling the building, now dying away faint as an echo.

More in keeping with common minds was the military music in the public gardens, and to these they went, alas for the sake of economy and wandering between thickets of camellias and azalea, or beneath the fragrant small leaved magnolia, now in full white and purple bloom. The stirring trumpet, the shrill clarion, the bugle, the drum, the swift gay measures, all seemed to echo love and joy.

Such distractions but lent wings to the unnumbered hours. It seemed only yesterday they had come. To-morrow they must go. Arthura, bravest of the brave, turned pale at the thought which seemed to have burst upon her quite suddenly.

They were loitering in the quiet allees of the garden, already as dear and familiar, when it occurred to her that it must be for the last time.

To-morrow they should be up betimes, the day after to-morrow to more dreams, to more love, an more confidences.

"I must say one thing," she said, passionately earnest and vehement. "I could bear to be separated from you. I should not mind that, for I know you will never, never change, my Valerian. But do not force me any longer to live the life that is a lie. Let me go, or let us tell the truth."

"My dearest child," he replied—it was precisely the reply she dreaded—"here a little more patience. Things will soon be much easier for you. There is your holiday to come. I am going to take my cousin to London, perhaps to Paris."

"She will want me to go too," said Arthura, dismally. Nothing had power to depress her but Valerian's manner of looking at certain times.

"Not how much easier is it to forget what we have on our minds when we are perpetually moving from place to place? You will here to run to trouble yourself with equipments."

Arthura shook her head.

"I promise you one thing," she said, proudly. "I will keep silence as to our engagement. But I do not promise to stay with Miss Hermitage."

"My dear Arthura, we serve people much better by being politic than by all the Quixotes in the world. Our private matters concern not Christina at all. But she is really dependent on your company. It would be the greatest possible affliction to lose you. And if you are necessary to her, she is a thousandfold more necessary to you." He smiled upon her with lover like pride and fondness as he added: "You have an exemplishments, my poor Arthura. You are a paragon, but of what? Not of book-learning certainly, and not in the matter of the arts either. Stay, then, with Christina, who vouches you just to exame you are what nature made you." There was deep, unanswerable worldly wisdom here.

Arthura thought of Stepple and the children, and sorrowfully held her peace.

"How happy we were when I first made your acquaintance at Morgate," she said at last. "Do you remember pulling Benjamin out of the water, and leaving your card next day? Then Benjamine running after you in the street to thank you, and the walks we took together! We shall never have as good a time again. And when now as one day with the good news that your fair relation would take me on trial, I could have kissed the very ground you walked upon. You were the veriest Providence to as."

She was quietly weeping under her veil, but he added, cheerily,

"And now you look upon me almost as to enemy for having fallen in love with you."

"You must understand me," Arthura said, proudly, dashing away her tears. "All the burdens that seemed so heavy before—my father's debts, the children's maintenance—these are nothing compared to the weight on my mind now. We both have everything to Miss Hermitage. It breaks my heart to deceive her."

"Foolish child!" said Valerian, bending low and whispering in her ear. "It is only a sport, a play. In a year or two, when our circumstances have a little mended, we still come to France again, and on a different errand. You know on what! It will be in my cousin's own interest to forgive as then."

With these vague, lover-like assurances he cheered her drooping spirits, and Arthura, being that her words made no impression, changed the subject.

* Begun in Harper's Weekly No. 1376.

It was a new and better experience to her that even here could not make two people understand each other in all things. And what is love worth, indeed, if it fails to unveil heart to heart?

Nevertheless the home journey was made pleasantly, even gayly. Valerian was a perfect lover Arthara could but let herself be made happy, after foolish lover's fashion, and there was no failing of her courage when once more the sun arose on a common day.

(To be continued.)

GOVERNOR TILDEN'S HOUSE.

During the last two years extensive alterations and additions have been going on at Nos. 14 and 15 Gramercy Park, New York city, the residence of ex-Governor Samuel J. Tilden. These improvements are not yet finished, and probably will are be until next spring. Meanwhile the Governor has been occupying his country house, Greystone, in the vicinity of Yonkers, on the North River, though coming down to the city at irregular intervals, for a few hours, to superintend the progress of the work, or to keep appointments with friends.

No. 14 Gramercy Park has acquired a national celebrity by reason of the events that took place there during a memorable Presidential campaign, and the visitor who has not entered it since that time will find few changes, except in the dining-room, which is now entirely transformed. But the Governor has added to it the adjoining house, No. 14 Gramercy Park, has torn down the front walls of both houses, and in their place has put a freely adapted Gothic façade of Belleville and Carlyle stones, adorned with many trophies of the sculptor's art, and provided with two entrances, a general one and a library one. Among these sculptured trophies are medallion heads of Milton, Shakspeare, Dante, Franklin, and Columbus, cut out of Belleville stone, near one of the two double-story bay windows, high-relief heads of the four seasons in the brackets of the principal portico, and a low-relief head of Michael Angelo on the key-stone of the arch of the secondary entrance. These works of art were modelled in thin clay, and are of no ordinary merit.

We enter by the principal entrance, at No. 15 Gramercy Park, and after stepping into the main hall, find everything as formerly, with a single exception—the stained glass of the inner vestibule doors, where Mr John Lafarge has produced some simple, but artful, and very sane results. A large mirror at the left of these doors and a small one at the right make the effect fourfold while looking into them you see four double doors with stained glass decorations. But the black walnut staircase and door trimmings, the white marble floor, say sixteen feet wide and forty-five feet long, and the rear hall, with its butler's pantry and its kitchen stairs, are unchanged. Nor in the drawing-room and the old library, into which the main hall opens by double doors, do we see any alterations. Those apartments have sedulously preserved their identity. The austere simplicity of the drawing-room—austere as modern drawing-rooms go—with its painted walls of a neutral monochrome, its conventionally frescoed ceiling, its large but unobtrusive brass chandelier, its two book-cases filled chiefly with massive volumes like Beydell's Shakspeare Illustrations, the Houghton Gallery, and Les Noces de Raphael, that stand three feet high behind glass doors, its black walnut furniture covered with garnet plush, is unaltered by oil-paintings, so brick-bone, as hutchmacks, although special mention is due to the graceful statue of Flora in white marble, her extended left hand holding a rose-bud, her right hand pressing her breast with a bunch of the same flowers, her attitude as if she had just alighted from above, while a brisk wind is blowing behind her the ends of the gauzy drapery that covers but scarcely conceals her very pretty figure; and also to the marble bust of the Governor himself, which stands opposite, diagonally across the room. As for the old library behind the drawing-room, its black walnut furniture with dark green plush, and in some instances with light green rep, its ochre lamb-cases ten feet high, almost entirely hiding the wall spaces, its large oblong writing table, also of oak, covered with green baize, on which the many ink-squats speak of much usage, and with pamphlets and foolscap MS., are by no means extraordinary. A bust of Cicero on one side of the room looks across the table upon a bust of Molière, and to one of the book-cases appear the Encyclopædia Britannica, the Edinburgh Encyclopædia, full sets of the Bankers' Magazine and of Hunt's Merchants' Magazine, Bohn's Classical Library complete, Scott's novels, poems, etc., in perhaps eighty Blue volumes, Burns, Akenside, Chaucer, Spenser, Milton, Collins, Churchill, Swift, and Thomson side by side, with Bryant, Rogers, Michael Angelo, Tennyson, Shakspeare, Pope, Bacon, and Johnson below. Another book-case is devoted chiefly to history—to Ahnet, Freeman, Palgrave, Hallam, Smollett, Lecky, Hume, Gross, Gibbon, and Hansen; to Froude, Milman, Niebuhr, Rawlinson, Rollin, and Curtius; and still another, to the New York Statutes at Large, and various law books, the Governor's law library proper, one of the largest and best in the country, being in his down-town office. The surroundings of these interesting volumes are the reverse of showy. A frescoed ceiling above, a worn tapestry carpet below, and four walls tinted a pale green.

But this library opens into a thirty thousand-dollar dining-room. And the remarkable thing about the costly apartment is the splendor of its homely dimensions that allures and charms, appealing neither to the sense of wonder nor to the love of noise. The general tone of this very artistic banqueting chamber is that of satin-wood, although the wainscoting to a height of four feet is of black walnut, as are also the two sideboards against the eastern wall, together with the furniture. Above the wainscoting the wall spaces are filled with a series of panels of carved satin-wood placed side by side and extending entirely around the room, each about five feet high by two and a half feet wide, above these panels is a plain belt of satin-wood, from which protrude many gas jets; above the belt a diapered frieze of satin wood, one two feet wide, above the frieze a band of blue tiles, four inches wide, connecting with the satin-wood and blue tiles of the ceiling.

After resting itself on the mellow ivory tone of the satin-wood, the eye is attracted first of all by the wood-carving of the juxtaposed panels, which the architect has treated as good pictures that deserve places on "the line." Pictures indeed they may be called, since their subjects of birds, leaves, and flowers manifest true pictorial feeling, and are treated in all the stages from the grave of outline to the gay of impressionism, yet always presenting some aspect that shows the artist to have been intent in reproducing the processes of Nature rather than her forms. Here, to one panel, appears a serpent coiled about a bird, amidst a thick abundance of leaves, berries, and flowers, while two birds near one corner and three birds near another corner watch the fate of their comrade. Several matters of technique are to be noticed. The first matter is the roughness of the ground on which these animals, leaves, berries, and flowers are cut. Suppose the ground were plain and flat; in that case the animals, leaves, berries, and flowers would seem to be stuck on, whether they really were so or not, and the pictorial effect of the carving as a whole be lost. The second is the gilding of the ground, so as to heighten the effect of the tone of the satin wood. This gilding appears also in the diapered friezes and in the carvings of the ceiling, and its color value is precisely that of a warmer old ivory. The third is the solidity and security of the carvings, owing to the fact that the artist has refrained from under-cutting them. No ordinary heat will crack, warp, or chip these works of art. The fourth is the lowness of the relief, which gives to their appeal a pleasing air of modesty and mystery.

The visitor, indeed, is sure to feel the mural modesty and mystery of this thirty-thousand-dollar dining-room, and when he turns his eye toward the ceiling, which is divided transversely by four beams of satin-wood, and then into octagonal panels of blue enamelled tiles eight inches square framed in satin-wood, the modesty and mystery are found there too. The abundant light from the large mullion-window and the large bay window on the south side causes the surface of the tiles to shimmer and change enchantingly from a blue that is almost sapphire to a blue that is almost gray, and the old ivory tone of the satin-wood is heightened again by the application of gilt to the grounds of the carvings. In a large central panel of satin-wood, from which the chandelier depends directly over the oblong dining-table, the carvings are of fruits, and somewhat bold, since too distant to be closely scanned, but when designing the mural panels it was justly thought by the architect, Mr Calvert Vaux, that birds, leaves, flowers, and a quasi atmosphere would be less tiresome, because more nearly pictorial, than conventional still-life. Seated at the Governor's hospitable board, the guest receives from these naturalistic and picturesque mural carvings a constant invitation; the mystery of their meaning is equalled only by the modesty of their appeal, and not the least of the messages they convey is the impossibility of easily exhausting their significance.

The Governor's new library at No. 14 Gramercy Park connects by sliding doors with the dining-room and with the old library. Its dimensions are unusual, the length being about one hundred and twenty-five feet, and the breadth about twenty feet for two-thirds of the length and for fifty feet for the remaining third. The space which in an ordinary city house is given to the drawing-room, the library, and the dining-room has been reserved for the library, and in the room thus finished, the Governor will receive his friends in one of the largest, most beautiful, and best-equipped private libraries in the United States. All the wood work will be of white oak adorned with exquisite carvings, and from the ceiling, also of white oak, will shine an array of sea-green tiles. Each book-case will be high enough to almost touch the ceiling. The extraordinary size of this room is in keeping with the vast number of law-books destined to be brought into it, and its commanding importance in the general interior scheme of the edifice is believed by the Governor's friends to be not out of sympathy with the fact of his sound training and solid acquisitions as a student of law, political economy, and finance.

On the second floor, above the drawing-room, is the Governor's bedroom, a sumptuously beautiful apartment, its doors, trimmings, mantel, and wainscoting of solid satin-wood, carved and panelled in a rich design to a delicately hued sea-green fabric of chintz like design, and its ceiling paint ed in shou a net-work of light blues. The use of different kinds of satin-wood, both plain and grained, adds variety to the general brilliancy of the effect, and the adornment of the bevelled angle of the door-frames with a line of carving extending up from the floor, over the door, and down to the floor again produces an effect not less novel than pleasing. The bay window of this front room is generously provided with registers for heating; and electric bell knobs are seen in various convenient places, both here and elsewhere. Four or five other bedrooms on the same floor are finished in light hard woods, their walls and ceilings most lavishly and elaborately ornamented with frescoes in warm colors. The Governor's house is at once a palace and a home.

THE DOG SHOW.

Ten thousand dogs assembled in Madison Square Garden comprise the canine aristocracy of the country—the Mayflower dogs, the F.F.V.'s in birth and breeding, dogs with names and pedigrees and blue blood. It would be hard to gather in America a finer collection of dogs of all sorts than the 961 adults and 200 puppies on exhibition in the dog show. "The Seventh Annual Bench Show of the Westminster Kennel Club" is a name entirely too long for busy New Yorkers to twist their tongues over, and the annual exhibition has come by common consent to be known as the Dog Show, or sometimes as the New York Dog Show, to distinguish it from the similar but smaller dog conventions held annually in several Western cities and in Pittsburgh. To be the winner of a prize in the dog show is to settle at once a dog's standing in his own community, and to put him socially head and shoulders above all his companions. A result of the six competitive exhibitions already given in Madison Square Garden is that half the good dogs in the country are said to have taken the first prize in the dog show. Nearly every town and little village has had its crack dog exhibited, and when any one of these has had the good fortune to receive as much as a ribbon or a bronze medal, its owner becomes known locally as the winner of the great prize. There is now here else in this country that a dog's good points are subjected to such formidable competition, nor that victory gives half as much glory.

Most of the incoming trains have brought one or more dogs for the great show in the last few days. Many of the exhibitors have had hundreds and even thousands of miles to come; and these are very often among the best dogs that are brought from such a distance, for owners will not go to the trouble and expense of bringing inferior dogs from beyond the Rocky Mountains. They come early, dogs with a long journey before them, their owners desiring to give them a chance to rest and recover what might be called their animal spirits before exhibiting them. Thus one great dog from the far West has been resting in New York for three weeks, feeling on the best of dog luxuries, picking up the flesh he lost in a railroad trip from Wyoming. Most of the dogs from over the ocean have been here for some time; an exhibitor would put a dog in such a competition immediately after the fatigue and sickness of a sea-voyage—for some dogs do get seasick, and come out of a long ocean trip looking thin and pale. There are dogs here from Canada and Nova Scotia, and from England, Ireland, and Scotland, as well as from most of the States of the Union. The most aristocratic dog, perhaps, is the champion deer hound Merry, from Queen Victoria's kennels. He bears a tag pinning his value at $20,000, and keeps a bright watch over himself to see that none of the Irish setters or terriers put a charge of dynamite on the bench beneath.

There has been little money in former years for calling this exhibition a bench show, for none of the dogs here been shown on benches. This year, however, the managers have made a reason for the name by putting all the mastiffs and other large dogs on exposed benches, where their points can be studied, and their perfections or imperfections exult seen. There are the usual number of kennels, in which are comfortably housed the smaller dogs, many of them spending the four days lying on handsome Turkish rugs, their houses beautifully decorated, and all their surroundings in the highest style of art. They are well cared for, regularly fed, and the petting and fondling the good-natured ones receive are without bounds. The best dog disposition, though, is likely to be scored by the oppressive attentions of a few thousand strangers, and it is a safe rule in visiting the dog show to treat every animal with the respect due to a human being, and not shake hands with him without a proper introduction. Experience has demonstrated that this very large dogs are nearly always good-natured, while little fellows are often sullen and snappy, but there are many notable exceptions to this rule. Take all the dogs as a kind and neighborly: so are the St Bernards; the setters are gentle and affectionate, the greyhounds seem to care very little whether they are noticed or not, and the bull-dogs are, as usual, best let alone.

One of the most entertaining parts of the exhibition is to see the crowds gathered in front of dogs with fabulous sums named as their price. A. H. Moore's Irish setter Berkley, for instance, is labelled $15,000; so is Jean S. McIntosh's Biz, and Mr McIntosh's Lady Clare is valued at $10,000. At the first of the dog shows a fine specimen labelled $50,000 attracted more attention than all the other dogs in the show. The public had not then learned, and indeed it is not yet well understood, that these figures are merely prohibitive prices. No dog is worth anything like so much money. But a rule of the club requires each dog exhibited to have a valuation put upon him at which price he will be sold. Many owners would not part with their pet dogs for any sum, as they secure themselves by putting unsalable prices upon them. Visitors to the show who see a dog labelled $20,000 need not imagine that the dog is worth that much money, the tag is only another way of saying that the dog is are for sale. There is some reason for fast horses going up into three tremendous prices, because they can be made to produce great sums on the turf, but dogs can not, and purchasers who would pay $1000 or even $500 for the finest dogs are extremely rare. The Mr Moores just mentioned exhibits a beautiful setter, Leicester, which is marked at $10,000; the bull-dog Bowser is labelled $5000, Mr Barlow, of New York, values his two Lowsberge Max and Tikie, at $5000 each; the Queen's deer hound is marked $20,000, and the German mastiff Siegfried, said to have been bred by Prince Kasa of Prussia, is labelled "Priceless." These marks merely show that the dogs are are for sale.

The exhibition on the whole this year is better than any of its six predecessors. The stand ard has been materially improved by the increase of entrance fee to $3. This has shut out the many comparatively worthless animals that were to be seen in former exhibitions, and their places have been filled by dogs of standing, as may be seen by the list of names, as well as by the increased number of entries, which have reached nearly 1100 this year, including the puppies, against a total of 1041 last year. One hundred and fifty-eight of these are included among the "large dogs" that are exhibited on open benches. Among the more famous entries are thirteen fine English pointers exhibited, but out for competition, by the Westminster Kennel Club. These include Bang Bang, Sumner, Rectless, and Rose, all well-known animals. Among the champion English setters are Plantagenet and Prince, both owned in this city, and Thunderer, from Philadelphia. Among the pointers are Don, Knickerbocker, Bravo, and Dash. Irish setters are particularly well represented by Berkley, Biz, and Lady Clare. There are a number of very fine mastiffs, among them Colonel Taylor's Garth, an unusual specimen, and Mr. James Barron's Zulu, from Cranford, New Jersey. The Chesapeake Bay dogs, a peculiar breed trained for rabbit hunting, have for the first time a department of their own, in which there are seven entries.

Some of the best dogs in the leading classes are shown in one illustration on the first page. Although many of them look too shaggy and grawful almost to be representations of real dogs, they are all actual portraits, engraved from photographs in the possession of their owners. The exhibition lasts only four days, May 8, 9, 10, and 11, but before it closes its visitors will be numbered by hundreds of thousands, for the love of dogs is all but universal.

THE CHICAGO BASE-BALL GROUNDS.

The grounds of the Chicago Ball Club, in disputably the finest in the world in respect of owning accommodations and conveniences, are located on what is known as the Lake Front property, the title to which is in the city of Chicago. The inclosure begins at Randolph Street on the north, and extends along the east line of Michigan Avenue southward to a point about midway between Washington and Madison streets. On the east are the tracks and switch yards of the Illinois Central Railroad Company, which has for several years past made a standing offer of $300,000 (not one-half its value) for the property, but as the city has been enjoined either from selling the tract or from permitting its use for permanent buildings, the ball club has continued to enjoy the rare privilege of grounds situated within a two minutes' walk of State Street, the chief retail thoroughfare of Chicago. Partly on account of the convenient location of the grounds, but more by reason of the exceptional management of the Chicago ball team, and its success in winning the National League championship for three successive seasons, beginning with 1881, the game of base-ball is extremely popular in Chicago, and the average attendance at League championship games is considerably greater there than in any other city in the United States. During the season of 1882 the attendance at the forty-five League games played in Chicago was upward of 130,000, as an average of 3000 persons to a game. With this fine patronage, made up in good part of the better classes of the community, the Chicago Club is amply able to maintain its costly team of players, and to equip its grounds and fixtures in a manner that by comparison with the usual style of base ball appurtenances might be termed palatial. At an outlay of $10,000 since the close of the playing season of 1882 the Chicago Club, under the direction of President Spalding, has completely remodelled its seating arrangements. Every exposed surface is painted, so as to admit of thorough cleansing from dust, the items of the work amounting to $1000. The grand stand seats 2000 people, and the uncovered seats will accommodate 6000 more, so that with the standing room the total capacity is fully 11,000, and this without invading the playing field. A fence six feet high encircles the field so front of all the seats, which are elevated so as to command the best view of the play. Overlooking the main entrance is a handsomely ornamented pagoda, built for a band stand, and to be occupied by the First Cavalry Band throughout the season. Surmounting the grand stand is a row of eighteen private boxes, really draped with curtains to keep are wind and sun, and furnished with comfortable arm-chairs. By the use of the telephone and gong President Spalding can conduct all the preliminary details of the game without leaving his private box. Besides club officers and players, the services of forty-one persons are required at each game to attend to the grounds and seating arrangements, viz., seven ushers, six policemen, four ticket-sellers, four gate-keepers, three field-men, three cushion-renters, six refreshment boys, and eight musicians. Aside from players' salaries, ground rent, and including advertising, the most per game on the Chicago grounds is $300, add to this the salaries of players, rent of grounds, travelling and hotel expenses, and $10,000 expended this year on improvements, and the total outlay for the season is $40,000, so that the Chicago Club must average $333 for each of the ninety-six League championship games to be played during 1883. But the patronage attracted by the famous champion team both at home and in other cities may be depended upon to make good this large sum, and possibly something besides for stockholders. The fact that on large an outlay can be safely made into an even [illegible] of popularity of the RAIN OR SHINE?

WHILE Mr. REINHART was engaged in gathering material for his illustrations to the article on "English Farmers" in HARPER'S MAGAZINE he made several character sketches on a larger scale, one of which we present on this page. It is a picture of an English farmer anxiously consulting the barometer; and by his attitude and the expression of his face we may conjecture that the instrument is giving an unfavorable report. If he is a reader of the London weather reports he is presumably abusing the "Herald Weather Bureau" for sending another of its "blasted storms" across the Atlantic by cable.

MILITARY DRILL AT MOBILE.

THERE are few social customs in the South that strike the visitor more forcibly or create a deeper interest than that of the strong military spirit apparently pervading all classes. Travel as one may through all sections, from the Border States through and around the coast southerly sea-port cities, it will be found everywhere. Among a people whose instinctive love of music is universally acknowledged the expectation of hearing much melody is not disappointed, for song is heard on every side, and from the plantation negro who joins his fellow work-es afield in plantation melodies, and whose marvellous power of whistling rivals even the sweet brilliant notes of the cardinal-redbird, bobolink, or mocking-bird, to the lovely ballad sung by the cultivated voice of some beautiful city belle, they all seem to have selected those songs through which there runs a tinge of the military.

Take also the Southerner at his rides. Could anything be finer? Meet him alone on a back-country road, or on the broad paved avenues of New Orleans, he is always the accomplished horseman. His attitude may at times appear careless, it is a graceful carelessness; it is never slovenly, but is always military. In Mobile I often found it a pleasant means of rest after a day's work to saunter along those brightly lighted streets listening to the joyous hum of human voices; but more especially delightful did I find the long vistas of Government Street, where the silvery moonlight filtered through the thick leafy arcade of overhanging branches, and lay like streamlets across the roadway. It was here I caught glimpses of that lovely Southern home life of which I had heard so much.

While returning from one of these rambles I met three handsomely uniformed young men about to enter the door of what I knew to be a theatre. Knowing there was to be a drill of some kind that night, I stopped one, and handing him my card, asked if a stranger would be allowed to witness their entertainment. With the utmost cordiality they assented, and informed me that the annual competition for the black plume was to take place.

The scene of the contest was a beautiful one. The large theatre floor had been cleared of seats, and the audience filled the galleries, the stage, and lined the walls four or five deep around the room.

CONSULTING THE BAROMETER.—DRAWN BY C. S. REINHART.

The proceedings opened with an inspection of the troops by the colonel of the regiment, and a preliminary drill gone through with, and during this I had an opportunity to see the excellent state of perfection the company had been brought to. It was "forward," "double-quick," "wheel," "by fours," "charge," "load," "fire," "kneel," then "charge," etc., etc., followed by a succession of rapid manœuvres too numerous to mention, and utterly bewildering to the average observer, but presenting a spectacle of movement, but I have, and precision most splendid.

The event of the evening is the competitive drill. It is "fall in" again, and with several of the most vigilant officers of them set craning on the watch to detect mistakes, the contest begins. The officer challenges them to follow him with a light rattan cane in hand, and with it as unseen watch, he gives his orders in short, sharp tones, very rapidly, so that each can be heard by the men. Presently a man makes a mistake. It is a slight one, the turn of a wrist, the movement of a finger, a motion of the foot, but the audience saw it as soon as the instructor did. A groan to one of them and the luckless youth with flushed face takes a back seat, and the contest continues. Shouts of laughter follow him as he is the first one out. The contest grows keen, and as time goes on the failing ones drop out, numbers of pairs of sheets of laughter from the audience follow.

And now the interest grows keener. So many have dropped out and now the "majority" that the once solid ranks are reduced to two. Tired and distressed they look, but stalwart and defiant still. They appear every inch the soldier—the flower of their company. The drill master pours out his orders quicker and faster, he turns and twists them in every way, but can not break these two young fellows down; his voice rises a trifle and quickens with excitement. The audience lean forward and await with bated breath. They watch keenly every movement, and murmurs of pity and admiration pass among the ladies, while wagers are offered and taken here and there by enthusiastic sons by the men. How long will it last? Apparently those two are perfect; but presently there is a storm of applause, and one stands alone—the victor. The colonel steps forward, presents him with the handsome medal, places the rich black plume in his cap, proclaims him the victor, and he is carried away amid a crowd of rejoicing friends. Presently the band bursts forth in a waltz, and in place of the clash of arms and tramp of charging men, beautiful women change the scene to one of fairyland as they float by in the circling dance.

As one reaches the distant corner, and turns to look up at the brilliantly lighted building bathed in moonlight, one recognizes that some military strain floating through the music, and together with the footfalls of the dancers, now merged by distance into regular beats, it takes but small effort of imagination to change the scene to one of a marching army. So strongly has this spirit of military rivalry taken hold of the people that military competitions are held in various localities. Prizes exceeding $4000 are offered this year at Nashville, $4000 to go to the best-drilled company. The spirit for these competitions is extending, for already I am told that some of our own hardy Northern boys are drilling, and on their way to the scene of martial but peaceful competition.

Any one visiting the levee at Mobile will almost any night witness the scene a sketch of which I send you. Here the companies are drilled in various manœuvres requiring larger space than their armory affords, here also they get accustomed to drilling before a crowd of on-lookers. The moving bodies of men, the flaming torches, far-reaching rays of powerful lamps through which the competition pass, now brilliantly lighted, now in deep or half shadow, the loud commands, clouds of dust, and dark background of shifting crowd, hotte sleeping, and star-lit sky, make it a scene very warlike and picturesque.

J. O. DARGAN.

PHILIP B. THOMPSON, JUN.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY C. M. BELL.

PHILIP B. THOMPSON, JUN.

As a general rule, the man who takes the law into his own hands and kills another for some real or imaginary injury, thus constituting himself judge, jury, and executioner, invokes all the sympathy of the law in his own defense, and claims for himself the means of vindication which he had denied his victim. Mr PHILIP B. THOMPSON, Jun., the Kentucky Congressman, who killed Mr. WALTER H. DAVIS a few days ago, on hear-say report, without giving the latter the chance to say a word for himself, will have the assistance of the oldest lawyers in the country in trying to prove that he was justified in the act. In reality, although Mr THOMPSON has been indicted for murder, it will be the murdered man who will be tried; and even the Kentucky papers, which at first applauded the killing, are beginning to perceive that justice would have been better satisfied had Mr DAVIS been heard before he was summarily slain.

THE KIRMESS.

In the "sixties" of our century New-Yorkers went to see Faust and other operas which involved German customs with no more definite idea of their meaning than was produced by the meagre paint and scenic effect of the Fourteenth Street Opera-house of that date.

There was a scene called the "Kirmess," but we question if any large proportion of the audience understood the term. Kirmess in its real significance means a "fair" for peasants and people, patronized by the "upper ten," regarded as a festival, with traditional forms and usages, and has existed since the classical period of the world. The ancient Greeks held fairs to celebrate a holiday as well as to indulge in the traffic of slaves, and it is supposed that the Romans in their fores had something of a similar character. But in France and Germany the idea of a fair was perfected. As early as the ninth century we hear of fairs under the rule of le bon Roi DAGOBERT, a monarch who justified the feelings of his people by appearing of their desire for public amusements. In Germany at about the same time fairs were popular, and the Kirmess began its sway some centuries ago.

The Kirmess unites the facilities for sales with amusements which, properly speaking, belong to a fair, but its special characteristics are music and dancing, and the annual revival of certain old customs.

For some time past the idea of a Kirmess in New York has been developing, and on the evening of Saturday, April 30, a brilliant entertainment was given at DELMONICO'S. The object was a laudable one, the proceeds being given to the Hospital for Cancer and Skin Diseases. Tickets were sold at ten dollar each, and the attendance was enormous, the only drawback being that the crowd was entirely too great for the rooms. In the attempt to pass from one room to another, about ten o'clock, there was a dead-lock, and a panic might be averted, had not the entire company been lost all preserving order. Three ladies fainted, and one had her arm dislocated.

The ball-room was beautifully decorated with evergreens and roses, and Dutch mottoes printed on orange-colored cloth were hung at intervals among the flowers, producing a fine effect.

The dances, which had been long in preparation by Professor CARL MARWIG, began about nine o'clock, in the ball-room, where a space had been reserved for them. Twenty-two couples took part, and although no names were given, we may mention that the dancers were leading ladies and gentlemen of New York society. The dances were leading ladies and gentlemen of New York society. The opening figure was the "Dutch Quadrille," the [illegible] entering from a side room arm in arm executing certain [illegible] steps with remarkable spirit and grace. The costumes were [illegible] so worn in Holland to-day, and in some instances were [illegible] of old Knickerbocker life in New York, notably in one case where the cap and ornaments had belonged to the wearer's family over two hundred years, the lace was peculiarly fine, and the gold almost Florentine in quality. The second dance introduced the picturesque Tyrolean costume, the costumes of the gentlemen showing great taste and an accurate knowledge of the details of the dress. The dancers entered to a horn accompaniment, and then followed the national Tyrolean dance to the music of the zither. These dances were repeated after eleven o'clock, when the crowd had somewhat diminished. Other attractions were offered in the afternoons, where a floral bazar and gypsy fortune-teller and Dutch "cruller-entrank an waffels" entertained a crowd during the course of the afternoon and evening. Enormous sums were paid for the flowers, two hundred dollars being offered in return for a single rose, and one hundred dollars for a boutonnière.

EXULTATION.

As it is proposed to make the Kermess an annual festival, this occasion has a special significance, and a suggestion for the future is that the juvenile part of the entertainment take place one day in advance of the evening fair. On this occasion the children's ball was given in the afternoon, and though very successful, involved a great deal of care and fatigue for those who had to participate in the later festivities.

HOW CANADA OBTAINED ITS NAME.

The origin of the word Canada is curious enough. The [illegible] lords visited that [illegible] they [illegible] trial searches for gold [illegible] among themselves, "A can nada" (there is nothing there). The Indians, who watched closely, learned the sentence and its meaning. After the departure of the Spaniards the French arrived, and the Indians, who wanted none of their company, and supposed they also were Spaniards came on the same errand, were anxious to inform them that their labor was lost by carrying in that country, and frequently repeated to them the Spanish sentence "A can nada." The French supposed this incessantly recurring sound was the name of the country, and called it Canada.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE

FOR WOMEN AND CHILDREN

Dr. Jos. Rear, New Orleans, La., says "I have frequently found it of excellent service in cases of debility, loss of appetite and in convalescence from exhaustive illness, and particularly of service in treatment of women and children."—[Adv.]

GRAY HAIR

Turned to its Natural Color, Pimples and Blotches eradicated, by using Dr. Tobias's Venetian Liniment. Warranted for 30 years, and perfectly harmless. It also Prevents the Hair from Falling Out. Sold by all the druggists. 50 and 75 cents.—[Adv.]

"Scarf-Pin Decorations" is the title of a neat Illustrated pamphlet, full of valuable hints and suggestions to those about to paint their buildings. Published by H. W. Johns Mfg Co., 87 Maiden Lane, N. Y., and sent free to applicants. The Asbestos Liquid Paints, manufactured by this Co., are reputed to be the best made for structural purposes, and they have been adopted several years for painting Harper & Brothers' building.—[Adv.]

BURNETT'S COCOAINE

Promotes a Vigorous and Healthy Growth of the Hair. It has been used in thousands of cases where the hair was coming out, and has never failed to arrest its decay. Use BURNETT'S FLAVORING EXTRACTS—the best.—[Adv.]

Thousands of people testify to the merits of Piso's Cure for Consumption.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1878.

BAKER'S

CHOCOLATES

Baker's Premium Chocolate, the best preparation of plain chocolate for family use.—Baker's Breakfast Cocoa, from which the excess of oil has been removed and is pronounced unobjectionable by physicians.—Baker's Vanilla Chocolate, an article of unique excellence in a delicious article; highly recommended by tourists.—Baker's German Sweet Chocolate, a most excellent article for children.

Sold by Grocers everywhere.

W. BAKER & CO., Dorchester, Mass.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT

OF MEAT. FINEST AND CHEAPEST MEAT FLAVORING STOCK FOR SOUPS, MADE DISHES, AND SAUCES.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT

OF MEAT. An invaluable and palatable tonic in all cases of weak digestion and debility. "It is a success and a boon for which patients should feel grateful."—See "Medical Press," "Lancet," "British Medical Journal," &c.

CAUTION.—Genuine only with the fac-simile of Baron Liebig's Signature in Blue Ink across the Label. This caution is necessary, owing to various cheap and inferior substitutes being in the market.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT

OF MEAT. To be had of all Storekeepers, Grocers, and Chemists. Sole Agents for the United States (wholesale only), C. DAVID & CO., 9 Pemberton Avenue, London, England.

Sold wholesale in New York by PARK & TILFORD, SMITH & VANDERBEEK, ACKER, MERRALL, & CONDIT, McKESSON & ROBBINS, R. K. & F. H. THURBER & CO., W. H. SCHIEFFELIN & CO.

THE ACME LEVER CUFF BUTTONS

Overcome all trouble with STIFF CUFFS.

Ask your Jeweller for them, and TAKE NO OTHER.

TENNYSON'S

Poetical Works.

The Poetical Works of ALFRED TENNYSON, Poet-Laureate. Complete Edition, with The Idyls of the King arranged in order. With Numerous Illustrations and Three Characteristic Portraits. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50

The print is clear and excellent; thin paper is good; the volume has illustrations from Dore, Millais, and other great artists. Really, the edition is a sort of prodigy in its way.—Independent, N. Y.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

CRAIGTON'S TREASURY OF KNOWLEDGE

The most reliable book ever published. Illustrated circulars free. Agents wanted. Circulars free. Agents address G. R. CARLETON & CO., Publishers, N. Y.

LUNDBORG'S

RHENISH COLOGNE.

50 Lovely Crosses, New and pretty as ever published. Name in, 10c. YANE & CO., New Haven, Conn.

DANGER FROM DRUGS.

The recent startling exposure in regard to a general system of drug-adulterations practised not only by the compounders of patent medicines, but by prescription druggists, has, as might be supposed, caused a wide spread alarm and anxiety among a very large class of persons who are suffering from acute or chronic ailments.

The finest Safety is often plucked from the nettle Danger, and it may be so in this case. Crude drugs, whether pure or adulterated, when taken into the human body, work more or less disorder in its delicate organisms. The general abandonment of these hurtful substances, whether from a rational conviction of their injurious effects, or from fear of getting poisoned through wicked adulterations, will be a great gain for the public.

"But what are we to do?" comes from the sick and suffering on all sides, especially from those afflicted with chronic diseases which are steadily growing worse. "The let-alone system will not cure us. We are sick and without help, must continue to grow worse, and in the end die."

The answer to this half-despairing question, if it were indeed the true one, would be hailed with gladness by thousands and tens of thousands who have lost faith in drugs, and well-nigh in physicians. A new and better treatment of disease—a true and rational treatment—must be one that does not assault, shock, or weaken the depressed, over-sensitive, and exhausted vital organs, but help and encourage them to renewed action. It must infuse life into the nervous centres, restore to all the wonderful and delicate machinery, which has been obstructed by disease, a steadier and more orderly movement, and so slowly but surely set the patient on the road to health.

"Is there such a treatment?" hundreds who read this will eagerly inquire. We answer that there is, so thousands who have used it can and do testify in the most positive manner. A shadow of doubt comes over your face. You know how wickedly the sick are deceived and plundered by those who make gain of their sufferings. If you can fairly examine and weigh evidence carefully, the largest opportunity to decide for yourself as to the value of this treatment will be afforded.

Under this new treatment, which is by inhalation, there is no weakening of the tone of the stomach by drugs, and no violent assaults upon any nerve or fibre in the body, but a gentle and subtly penetrating influence, reaching to the very centre of all the life-forces, and restoring them to healthier action. The natural result is that, when a patient recovers he is in a far better condition to resist the causes which produce disease than the patient who has had the life-forces weakened through drug medication.

As a restorer of vital force, it can be largely shown from the results obtained during the past twelve years, that it is the most efficient agent yet discovered by the medical profession. Its use by overworked business and professional men, and by all who suffer from nervous exhaustion and low vitality, would save many hundreds of lives every year, and give to thousands more the ability to work without the weariness, exhaustion, and peril which now attend their labors.

The treatment to which we refer is that known as the Compound Oxygen Treatment. It is dispensed by Drs. Starkey & Palen, 1109 Girard Street, Philadelphia, who will furnish any persons who write to them with such documentary evidence, and reports of cases and cures, as will enable them to judge for themselves as to its value as a curative agent. As they make no charge for consultation, it will cost nothing to get from them a medical opinion in any special case which may be submitted to them, personally or by letter.

Below are presented a few cases, out of many hundreds which are on record, showing the remarkable action of this treatment, which is always in the line of natural forces, and in harmony with well-known physiological laws. They are taken from the January number of Health and Life, a quarterly record of cases and cures under the New Compound Oxygen Treatment. This journal has been published for over three years, and presents the most wonderful record of cures in chronic and desperate cases that the world has ever seen. Any questions as to the genuineness of these reports will be answered by evidence of so direct and positive a character that even the most sceptical will be convinced.

The first report we offer for consideration is that made by a well-known member of the legal profession in New York City, who, in speaking of his condition in October, 1882, when he began the new treatment, says: "My case seemed quite desperate when I consulted you. Utter nervous prostration and extreme physical debility was my condition. A weak and inactive stomach and imperfect assimilation of food had brought me to this. * * * I could not go to my law office, or give any attention to my business. * * * You told me that I might not be conscious of any benefit from it for a week or two, or even longer. But within two or three days I began to improve, growing stronger day by day, until in the course of a month I had back almost my normal strength and could resume my law practice, or that by guarding against overwork I had myself equal to the ordinary demands of my profession. And still I can do more and more and am continuing to feel better. My stomach works well and feels well. My digestion seems to be easy and natural." Writing again, December 14th, he says: "The general tone of my system has gained immensely even in the short time since I wrote you last. I feel like myself again, and am full of strength and courage for a renewal of the battle of life, which only a few months since seemed to me to be ended."

The next report is that made by a physician in New York State, who, finding his daughter in a rapid decline, and being unable to arrest the disease, tried Compound Oxygen as a last resort. The results are given in the following extract from one of his letters: "Your Home Treatment was duly received, and our daughter immediately commenced its use, stopping all other treatment. The results are marvellous indeed. She says that she feels nearly well, except that she has some cough yet. You will see by reference to my former letter that she had a very bad train of Symptoms. Two physicians whom I called in see her pronounced it a case of Tuberculosis, and gave it as their opinion that she would not recover. She had had a cough for a year; was very hoarse; had severe pain in right side; chill for last two months, with night sweats, emaciation, weakness, loss of appetite, and nervousness; could not sleep at night; pulse a hundred and over at times; respiration about twenty-five to thirty-four. She began to improve in about one week from the time she commenced the Oxygen Treatment, and has continued to improve up to the present time. All the bad symptoms I have enumerated have passed off. She gained six pounds in weight in four weeks."

In the case of a lady residing in Wellsville, Mo., whose friends had, to use her own words, "all given up that I was going with consumption so fast no I could," the following report, after six weeks' use of the Treatment, is given: "I have been using Oxygen for six weeks, and am now able to ride to town, six miles, do my shopping, and back again, get dinner for my family, and work at light home work all the remainder of the day without stopping to rest. Sleep seven or eight hours soundly; no night sweats, no distressing sick headaches as I used to have. My friends had all given up that I was going with consumption as fast as I could, but, instead, I am looking better than for years, and I think it is through God's mercy and his blessing and your Oxygen that has brought me health and happiness."

A carnalgic patient writes: "After suffering from Neuralgia in the face for some weeks, with no relief from medicine, and growing daily weaker, I sent for the Oxygen, which rapidly removed the trouble. In three weeks it was gone, and I am now feeling better than for some time past, and am still gaining."

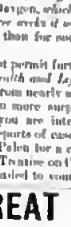
But space will not permit further extracts from this number of Health and Life, which contains favorable reports from nearly a hundred patients, many of them even more surprising than those given above. If you are interested enough to wish to see other reports of cases and cures, write to Drs. Starkey & Palen for a copy of Health and Life, also for their Treatise on Compound Oxygen, and they will be mailed to your address.

THE GREAT SAUCE

OF THE WORLD.

LEA & PERRINS

Imparts the most delicious taste and zest to EXTRACT of a LETTER from a MEDICAL GENTLEMAN at Madras, to his brother at WORCESTER. May, 1851. "Tell LEA & PERRINS that their sauce is highly esteemed in India, and is in my opinion the most palatable, as well as the most wholesome sauce that is made."



SOUPS, GRAVIES, FISH, HOT & COLD MEATS, GAME, &c.

Lea & Perrins

Signature is on every bottle of GENUINE WORCESTERSHIRE SAUCE. Sold and used throughout the world.

JOHN DUNCAN'S SONS, AGENTS FOR THE UNITED STATES, NEW YORK.

Universally prescribed by the Faculty.

TAMAR INDIEN GRILLON

A laxative and refreshing Fruit Lozenge for Constipation, bile, headache, hemorrhoids, general congestions, &c.

Prepared by E. GRILLON, Sole Proprietor, Pharmacien de 1re Classe ex-Interne des Hôpitaux de Paris, 27, rue Rambuteau, Paris.

Sold by all Druggists.

TAMAR, unlike pills and the usual purgatives, is agreeable to take, and never produces irritations.

The AUTOMATIC POCKET Adjusts itself to the pocket, holding the watch in any desired position, and so protects the case from scratching, scratching and wearing. Every genuine Automatic Pocket has the name Automatic Pocket Co. stamped on the back. The only reliable watch-protector. Sent for 50c. by the Automatic Pocket Co., 511 Market St., Philadelphia, Pa. State size of watch. Agents wanted.

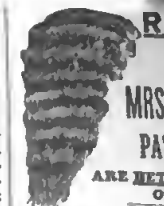
DAKOTA.

Quick, safe, and sure investments for capitalists or residents in Orinks, Barnes County, Dakota. A new town on Northern Pacific Railroad, at crossing of N. W. twenty miles west of Duluth. Splendid opening for Merchants in every line. Mechanics in demand; wages good. Well-settled country, in the immediate vicinity. Correspondence solicited. Reference: Barnes, Rogers, & Company, New York; Bliss & Leavens, Nat. Bank, Chicago. Address PEIRCE, ROBBINS, & CO., Bankers, Orinks, Dakota.

First Prize Medal, Vienna, 1873. C. WEIS, Manufacturer of Merveilleux Goods, Wholesale and Retail. Send for Circular to 200 Bowery. Factories, Vienna and Walther Street, N. Y.

CARDS. An Elegant New Set of Cards for 2c. stamp. W. H. PRINGLE, Rochester, N. Y.

REASONS WHY MRS. THOMPSON'S PATENT WAVES ARE BETTER THAN ALL OTHERS.



1.—The PATENT CRIMPING rollers itself on shape to SUIT the head. 2.—They DO NOT HURT a HAIR, wash well, or get out of curl in the most severe storm or humid weather, and outwear THREE of any other make. 3.—They CANNOT WRINKLE or ADHERE each separate lay together when in use. 4.—They evenly dressed puffs WITH CURL, when they get MUSSED, and can be set in five minutes by any lady without the aid of a mirror. 5.—I GUARANTEE AT LEAST FOUR to be in GREAT DEMAND at retail the country over. 6.—BUY IMPROVED. Every lady can do it young and accurate with a TOOTHLESS WIFE, or MOTHER-IN-LAW. Sometimes they find a happy medium. 7.—Do not be deceived by worthless imitations. 8.—Do not be induced to different styles of THOMPSON WAVES every time you go to the city. 9.—Do not be induced to buy a cheap article, as they are dear at any price.

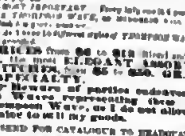
PRICES from $6 to $18. Blond and Gray extra. Also, the most ELEGANT ASSORTMENT of SWITCHES, from $5 to $35. GRAY HAIR A SPECIALTY. Beware of parties endeavoring to sell you Waves representing them to be Mrs. Thompson's Waves, as I do not allow any other Dealer to sell my goods.

SEND FOR CATALOGUE TO HEADQUARTERS OF

MRS. C. THOMPSON,

No. 33 East 14th Street, NEW YORK.

SUPERIOR FISHING TACKLE.



We offer a fine 3-joint Fly Rod, 15-yard Brass Reel, 50-ft. Linen Line 3 Flies, 3 Hooks to gut, and Leader, complete, by express, for $6 00; by mail, postpaid, $6 50. Sample flies by mail, postpaid, 50 cents per dozen, 01 cts. 1 three-piece Trout Rod, 1 Fly Reel, 1 Trout Reel, two 50 Linen Line, 3 dozen Hooks, 6 Sinker, 1 Gut Leader all for $2 75.

Just published, the largest and most complete Catalogue of all sporting goods ever issued—on Lawn Tennis, Base-Ball, Archery, Cricket, Foot-Ball, Fishing, Boating, and Gymnasium and Firemen's Goods, and all the latest novelties. 216 large pages, 2000 illustrations, on fine tinted paper. Price, by mail, 40 cts.

PECK & SNYDER, 126 to 130 Nassau St., N. Y.

"I owe my Restoration to Health and Beauty to the CUTICURA REMEDIES."

Testimonial of a Boston lady.

DISFIGURING Humors, Humiliating Eruptions, Itching Torturing, Scrofula, Salt Rheum, and Infantile Diseases cured by the CUTICURA REMEDIES.

CUTICURA, the great Skin Cure, instantly allays itching and inflammation, clears the Skin and Scalp, heals Ulcers and Sores, and restores the hair.

CUTICURA, a new, but exquisite Skin Beautifier and Toilet Requisite, prepared from CUTICURA, is indispensable in treating Skin Diseases, Baby Blemishes, Skin Blemishes, Sunburn, and Greasy Skin.

CUTICURA Remedies are absolutely pure, and the only infallible Blood Purifiers and Skin Beautifiers ever known. Price, CUTICURA, 50 cents; Soap, 25 cents; Resolvent, $1.

POTTER DRUG AND CHEMICAL CO., Boston, Mass.

THE DINGEE & CONARD CO'S BEST & MOST PERPETUAL EVER-BLOOMING

ROSES

The only establishment growing a SPECIAL BUSINESS of ROSES. 50 LARGE HOUSES for ROSES only. 1,000 acres. Plants suitable for immediate bloom, well packed, safely sent by mail, postpaid. 20 splendid varieties your choice, all labeled for $1; 12 for $2; 19 for $3; 26 for $4; 38 for $5; 7 for $10; 100 for $13. We GIVE a Handsome Pamphlet of directions and many ROSES free with every order. Our NEW GUIDE, a complete Treatise on the Rose, 70 pp. elegantly illustrated, only 10 cents.

THE DINGEE & CONARD CO., Rose Growers, West Grove, Chester Co., Pa.

HARPER'S BAZAR

CUT PAPER PATTERNS.

We have transferred our WHOLESALE PATTERN DEPARTMENT to Mr. J. H. SMITH, No. 146 to 156 Liberty Street, New York, who will conduct it upon his own account and responsibility.

SPECIAL CAUTION.

We are not interested in nor responsible for any circulars made by J. H. SMITH & CO., whether for HARPER'S BAZAR Patterns or for any other business.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

LADIES!

Beaded Pillows, and Hair Pompadour Rolls, for Ornamenting Hair, Dress Trimmings, Fringes, &c. Send for circular, with price list, and sample of Chenille's Improved Beading for Dress Trimmings. The Worth Chenille Co., 64 Nassau St., Philadelphia, Pa.

All issues of WESTERN BONDS! BOUGHT & SOLD by T. J. CHEW, Jr. Investment Banker, ST. JOSEPH, MO. City of ST. JOSEPH, BUCHANAN CO., and other DEFAULTED BONDS purchased in best terms.

Pears, Apples, Grapes, Peaches.

Messrs. Alden & Son, of St. Louis, Manufacturers of the celebrated Alden Fruit Pumper, are issuing beautiful chromos—Pears, Apples, Grapes, and Peaches—some of fashion. They send them by mail free on receipt of ten cents in postage to cover expense of mailing.

RIDLEYS',

Grand, Allen, & Orchard Sts., N. Y.

PARASOLS.

FINE Rich GAME COACHING PARASOLS, $1 37; WORTH $2 50.

FINE ASSORTMENT COACHING AND LACE PARASOLS.

BLACK DRESS SILKS.

22-INCH SATIN BRADAMES, 75c.; WORTH 91.
22-INCH SATIN MERVEILLEUX, $1 00; WORTH $1 25.
50 PIECES IMPORTED GROS GRAIN, 75c.; WORTH $1c.
50 PIECES DOMESTIC GROS GRAIN, 69c.; WORTH $1.
HEAVY GRAIN SATIN FINISHED, $1; WORTH $1 25.
24-INCH GROS GRAIN, $1; WORTH $1 25
20 IN II CACHEMIRE DE LYONS, $1 00; WORTH $1 25.
22-INCH CACHEMIRE ORIENTAL, $1 00; worth $2.
ONE LOT ALL-SILK OTTOMAN EGYPTIAN, $1 25; WORTH $2 00.
SUMMER SILKS—20 PIECES QUEENS; GRAY (ALL SILK); WOULD BE CHEAP AT 50 CENTS } 39c.
STRIPED AND CHECKS, 45c., 50c., 75c., 87c.
BROCADED SATINS, 69c.. WORTH DOUBLE

EDW. RIDLEY & SONS,

309, 311, 313 to 317 Grand St.,
35, 60, 62, 64, 66, 68, and 70 ALLEN ST,
60, 61, and 63 ORCHARD ST.

Messrs. JAMES McCREERY & CO.

have transferred from their wholesale warerooms to retail counters their reserve stock of Black and Colored Satin Merveilleux and Levantine.

The qualities formerly sold at $1 75 and $2 50 will be reduced to $1 25 and $1 50 respectively.

Messrs. JAMES McCREERY & CO.,

Broadway, corner 11th St.,

New York City.

PURE INDIA TEAS.

From the Districts of ASSAM, CHITTAGONG, CACHAR,
KANGRA VALLEY,
DARJEELING,
DEHRA DOON,
And Ceylon,
Absolutely Pure. Superior Flavor.
THE MOST ECONOMICAL TEA.
Requires only half the usual quantity.
SOLD BY ALL GROCERS.
JOHN C. PHILLIPS & CO.,
Agents of the Calcutta Tea Syndicate,
130 Water Street, New York.

STAMP COLLECTORS. Greatest opportunity ever offered of increasing your collection. Largest dealer in collection in America, asking in lots. 5 consecutive postage, unused issue, magnificent parcels, illustrated Albums and foreign entire catalogue. For particulars, PHILATELIST, Herald Office, N. Y.

NOTICE TO CLERGYMEN.

"M'CLINTOCK & STRONG'S CYCLOPÆDIA OF BIBLICAL, THEOLOGICAL, AND ECCLESIASTICAL LITERATURE" (now complete in ten volumes), is meeting with the heartiest popular endorsement. The N. Y. Tribune says, "It is by far the best work of its kind existing in any language."

This work is sold by SUBSCRIPTION ONLY, and not to the BOOK TRADE.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, Franklin Square, N. Y.

BOSS PATENT GOLD WATCH CASES
Runners! Strength! Durability! ELEGANT DESIGNS! GUARANTEED for 20 Years!
$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

PHONOGRAPHY, OR PHONETIC SHORT-HAND. Catalogue of works by Isaac Pitman, with phonetic text and illustrations for beginners, sent on application. Address PHONOGRAPHIC INSTITUTE, Cincinnati, O.

CASTORIA

for Infants and Children.

Castoria promotes Digestion and overcomes Flatulency, Constipation, Sour Stomach, Diarrhœa, and Feverishness. It insures health and natural sleep, without morphine.

"Castoria is so well adapted to Children that I recommend it as superior to any prescription known to me." H. A. ARCHER, M. D., 82 Portland Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

What gives our Children rosy cheeks, What curves their lovely mouths, makes them sleep? Tis Castoria.

When babies fret and cry by turns, What cures their colic, kills their worms, But Castoria.

What quickly cures Constipation, Sour Stomach, Colds, Indigestion, But Castoria.

Farewell then to Morphine Syrups, Castor Oil and Paregoric, and Hail Castoria!

CENTAUR LINIMENT—an absolute cure for Rheumatism, Sprains, Burns, Galls, &c. The most Powerful and Penetrating Pain-relieving and Healing Remedy known to man.

THE BRADLEY

ROAD CART

About 11 selection represents our No. 4 or Phaeton Cart. We do books them with spacious bodies, and the wheels to ranging between our popular sizes (for No. 0, 1, 2 single Pony Carts is read very admirable for Gentlemen Drivers, 3 is good for a road or track wagon for the, and so fundamentally for all purposes. Send for Illustrated Price List.

THREE STYLES weighing from 90 to 150 lbs. Prices from $57 to $90.
Direct Close to the manufacturer, and on the Illustrated Price List.
BRADLEY & CO. SYRACUSE, N. Y. ESTABLISHED 1832.

INTERESTING BOOKS FOR SUMMER READING.

Anna.
A Novel. By CONSTANCE FENIMORE WOOLSON. Illustrated by HARBERT. 16mo, Cloth, $1 25.

Atlantis: the Antediluvian World.
By IGNATIUS DONNELLY. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

A Transplanted Rose.
A Story of New York Society. By Mrs. JOHN SHERWOOD. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

Ben-Hur: A Tale of the Christ.
By LEW WALLACE, U. S. Ambassador to Turkey. 16mo, Cloth, $1 50.

Diddie, Dumps, and Tot;
Or, Plantation Child-Life. By LOUISE CLARKE PYRAELLE. Illustrated. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

Friends Worth Knowing.
By RAMEY IMMEMOLL. Illustrated. Square 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

Nordhoff's California.
California for Health, Pleasure, and Residence. A Book for Travellers and Settlers. New Edition, thoroughly Revised, giving Detailed Accounts of the Culture of the Wine and Raisin Grapes, the Orange, Lemon, Olive, and other Semi-Tropical Fruits; Colony Settlements; Methods of Irrigation, etc. By CHARLES NORDHOFF. With Maps and Numerous Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

Dialect Tales.
By SHERWOOD BONNER. Illustrated. 8vo, Cloth, $1 75.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.
☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

CARDS Send two 3c. stamps for fine new box of 50 "GILT PALETTES." WHITING, 30 Nassau St., N. Y.

30 Fine White Gold-Edge Cards, name on, 10c. Sample Book, 25c. M SHAW & Co., Jersey City, N. J.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address H. HALLETT & Co., Portland, Maine.

"THE MANHATTAN is well got up and tastefully illustrated," says The Illustrated London News.

THE MAY NUMBER OF THE MANHATTAN
CONTAINS:

Frontispiece—The Play Scene in Hamlet. After the famous painting by DANIEL MACLISE, R.A., in the British National Gallery.

A Study of Rosalet. By HENRY C. PEDDER. With Illustrations of eight scenes of the play.

The Lady of the Patio. A Poem. By GEO. PARSONS LATHROP.

Metamorphosis. A Story. By GARRETT P. SERVISS.

Carlsix. By S. G. W. BENJAMIN. With 16 Illustrations.

Where are the Springs of Long Ago? A Poem. By EDITH M. THOMAS.

"Set Not Thy Foot on Graves." A Story. By JULIAN HAWTHORNE.

A Sonnet. By RICHARD HENRY STODDARD.

The Descendants of Louis Philippe. With 12 portraits from photographs.

Margaret and Lucille. A Story. By ROSE DARE PROSPER.

The Modern Novel. A Poem. By EDGAR FAWCETT.

Round the Table. By G. H. SATTERLEE HELL.

A School of Chivalry. By PAUL C. VALENTINE.

The Nellie Bed Man in Brazil. By FRANK D. VALENTINE.

Recent Literature.
Town Talk.

Salmagundi. Odd in the Dale (Gay Humor). How Farragut Faraday went a-Fishing (P. D. S.).

$3.00 a year in advance, postage free; 25 cents a number. Published at TEMPLE COURT, New York.

THE ANTI-STYLOGRAPH

(MARTIN'S PATENT, U.S.A., JAN. 16, 1883.)

A self-feeding reservoir pen, writes continuously with any ink, and by means of a pen with ordinary nib.

SOLD BY ALL STATIONERS.

THOS. DE LA RUE & CO.
MANUFACTURERS & SOLE LICENSEES,
LONDON, PARIS, AND NEW YORK.

WANTED. A practical Book-Agent, to assume the management of the subscription department in a publishing house. Address, stating experience,
P. O. Box 1341, Philadelphia, Pa.

CARDS New Styles. Gilt Beveled Edge and Chromo Visiting Cards (best quality, largest variety and lowest price ever offered), with name, 10c. 3 packs, $1. Sample Book, 25c. Card Engraving, Illuminating, &c. CLINTONVILLE CARD CO., Clintonville, Conn.

40 Chromo Visiting Cards, no 2 alike, for 1883, name on, and Illustrated Premium List, 10c. Warranted best sold. Agents wanted. L. JONES & Co., Nassau, N. Y.

Le Boutillier Bros.

Of 23d Street.

JOHN LE BOUTILLIER (late senior partner of the firm Le Boutillier Bros., of 48 East 14th Street) and CHARLES LE BOUTILLIER have taken the buildings formerly occupied by the Co-operative Dress Association, Nos. 31 & 33 West 23d Street, and Nos. 10 & 12 West 24th Street, where they will conduct the sale of FINE DRY GOODS AT RETAIL.

SEVERAL NEW DEPARTMENTS have been added for Cloaks, Suits, Upholstery, &c.

Careful attention will be given to all Mail Orders.
Address

Le Boutillier Bros.,
Of 23d Street, New York.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

SUMMER UNDERWEAR,

Finest Quality Manufactured.

In Medium and Gauze Silk, Lisle Thread, Balbriggan, Gauze Cashmere and Merino Undervests and Drawers.

HIGH NOVELTIES

In Roman Striped French Lisle Thread Hose and Half Hose; also, Real Balbriggan, in Colors and with Silk Stripes,

FOR LADIES AND GENTLEMEN.

Broadway and 19th St.

DRY GOODS BY MAIL Patronized in any part of the United States or Europe. Price Catalogue sent Free, also when desired samples of Dress Goods, Silks, Woollens, Trimmings, etc. Jordan, Marsh & Co. Boston.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Per Year:

HARPER'S MAGAZINE	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR	4 00
The THREE above publications	10 00
Any TWO above named	7 00
HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE	1 00
HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE	5 00
HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY, One Year (52 Numbers)	10 00

Postage Free to all subscribers in the United States or Canada.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR begin with the first numbers for January, the Volumes of the YOUNG PEOPLE with the first Number for November, and the Volumes of the MAGAZINE with the Numbers for June and December of each year.

Subscriptions will be entered with the Number of each Periodical current at the time of receipt of order, except in cases where the subscriber otherwise directs.

Specimen copy of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE sent on receipt of a three-cent stamp.

Remittances should be made by Post-Office Money Order or Draft, to avoid risk of loss. Address

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE, of between three and four thousand volumes, mailed on receipt of Nine Cents to Postage Stamps.

WANTED 5 or 10 BOOK AGENTS
To Work and Canvass for a NEW WORK of unique and extraordinary merit and universal interest. Some are making $1,200 to $2,000 a year. Full particulars and extraordinary terms to Agents sent free. Address at once, A. D. WORTHINGTON & CO., Hartford, Conn.

AGENTS WE NOW OFFER a Portable Printing Press for $3, worth $10 Type, Address, &c. Catalogue A. G. KELSEY & CO., 13 Barclay St., N. Y.

$72 A WEEK. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly Outfit free. Address TRUE & Co., Augusta, Maine.

HOW FARMER STEBBINS BECAME AN ANTI-MONOPOLIST.

P. S. Farmer Stebbins sued the railroad company, and did not recover enough to pay his doctor's bill.

PUBLIC SPEAKERS

ARE often greatly annoyed, and their best efforts impaired by Hoarseness, caused by protracted or undue exertion of the vocal organs. To such Hale's Honey of Horehound and Tar is recommended as an efficient remedy, quickly soothing irritation of the Throat and allaying an inflamed condition of the larynx, thus not only giving temporary relief but preventing many other serious affections of the Throat and Lungs. Ask your Druggist for Hale's Honey of Horehound and Tar (full name) and take no substitute.

Pike's Toothache Drops Cure in one minute.

Hill's Hair and Whisker Dye, 50c.

Round Writing

BOOK FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION & PENS

Mailed for $1.50 by Stationers, or KEUFFEL & ESSER, New York.

FISHERMEN!

TWINE and NETTING

MANUFACTURED BY THE

BALTIMORE TWINE AND NET CO.

WM. J. HOOPER & SON,

No. 6 S. Calvert St., Baltimore, Md.

Send for price-list, naming county and state. Please mention this paper.

No Waste. No Trouble. No Disappointment.

A GOOD SALAD ASSURED.

The most Delicious and the most Popular Mayonaise for all kinds of Salads, Raw Tomatoes, Cabbage, Cold Meats, Fish, &c., ever offered for sale.

ALL GROCERS SELL IT.

BUSINESS OPPORTUNITY.

[illegible] of New York Cotton Exchange, with established Cotton Business, might accept SILENT or ACTIVE PARTNER. Capital required, $20,000. Address "COTTON," P.O. Box 27, New York.

H. W. JOHNS' ASBESTOS

LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING, Steam Pipe & Boiler Coverings, Steam Packing, Mill Board, Sheathing, Fire Proof Coatings, &c.

H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO. 87 MAIDEN LANE, N. Y.

THE BEST THE DUEBER WATCH CASE

CONGRESS WATER.

[illegible] to all. Cathartic, alterative. A specific for disorders of the stomach, liver, kidneys, eczema, [illegible] all impurities of the blood. Avoid [illegible] waters, native and foreign. Such waters [illegible] Never genuine on draught.

SYPHER & CO.

ARE CONSTANTLY RECEIVING FROM EUROPE

Antique Silver, Furniture, Clocks, Bronzes, and Articles of Vertu.

739 & 741 BROADWAY.

No Man need Lack A HOME.

TO BUILD A HOUSE

of any kind, first decide WHAT to build, then HOW to build, by getting our book, which [illegible] of approved and practical designs [illegible] costing from $500 up to $20,000. Large 4to. 175 illustrations.

"Calculated to save time, labor, and money."—Independent.

"It precisely meets a want which thousands have felt who were proposing to build."—N. Y. Observer.

"After a careful examination, we can recommend it. The most practical book we have ever seen."—Episcopal Methodist.

"A responsible association."—Christian at Work.

"Economical plans. The wonder is that a publication of this kind has not been issued before."—N. Y. Weekly Express.

The [illegible] low-priced architectural book, and most helpful building enterprise ever offered. Price 50 cts., by mail, postpaid. Stamps taken. Money returned if not satisfied.

CO-OPERATIVE BUILDING PLAN ASSOCIATION, 20 Beekman St. (Box 2702), New York.

J. W. BOUGHTON, 1[illegible] Market St., Phila., Manuf'r of

WOOD-CARPET

Parquetry or Ornamental Wood-Floors, for use in Private Houses, Hotels, &c. Also Borders for Rugs. Send stamp for Book of Designs.

CATARRH

To any suffering with Catarrh or Bronchitis who earnestly desire relief, I can furnish a means of Permanent and Positive Cure. A Home Treatment. No charge for consultation by mail. Valuable Treatise Free. Certificates from Doctors, Lawyers, Ministers, Business-men. Address Rev. T. P. CHILDS, Troy, Ohio.

AMERICAN STAR SOFT CAPSULES THE BEST. Also, Star Empty Capsules. All Druggists.

PEARS' SOAP

The famous English Complexion Soap

Established in London 100 years.

A SPECIALTY FOR THE SKIN AND COMPLEXION

As recommended by the greatest English authority on the Skin,

PROFESSOR SIR ERASMUS WILSON, F.R.S.,

President of the Royal College of Surgeons.

15 INTERNATIONAL AWARDS.

GoodComplexion&NiceHands

Nothing adds so much to personal appearance as a bright clear complexion and a soft skin, with these the plainest features become attractive, without them the handsomest are but coldly impressive. Many a complexion is marred by impure alkaline and coloured Toilet Soap.

PEARS' SOAP

Is specially prepared for the delicate skin of ladies and children and others sensitive to the weather, winter or summer. In England it is pre-eminently the complexion Soap, and is recommended by all the best authorities, as, on account of its emollient, non-irritant character, Redness, Roughness and Chapping are prevented, and a clear bright appearance and soft velvety condition imparted and maintained, and a good, healthful and attractive complexion ensured. Its agreeable and lasting perfume, beautiful appearance, and soothing properties, commend it as the greatest luxury of the toilet. Its durability and consequent economy is remarkable.

THE BEST DRUGGISTS SELL IT.

For the hands and complexion I prefer it to any other. Lillie Langtry

MRS. LANGTRY.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY VAN DER WEYDE, LONDON.

MARLIN MAGAZINE RIFLE

45 Govt. and 40-60 Grain Cartridges.

Very STRONG. Perfectly SAFE.

THE BEST RIFLE in the world for Large Game. Shooting more accurate. Model [illegible] Magazine easier. Finish finer, than any other rifle. MARLIN FIRE-ARMS CO. New Haven, Conn.

GOLD PENS.

PENCILS, HOLDERS, CASES, &c.

THE CALLI-GRAPHIC PEN.

A Gold PEN and RUBBER HOLDER, containing ink for several days writing. Can be carried in the pocket. Always ready for use. A luxury for persons who care to preserve their individuality in writing.

MABIE, TODD, & BARD,

Cor. Nassau and Liberty Sts., New York.

Send for Price List.

OUR GOODS ARE SOLD BY FIRST-CLASS DEALERS.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS

SOLD BY ALL DEALERS THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

GOLD MEDAL PARIS EXPOSITION—1878.

THE GREAT BROOKLYN BRIDGE.

WIRE PUZZLE. Sent on receipt of 10c. in stamps. AGENTS WANTED in every town, city, and village. SACKETT & CROMWELL, 16 Nassau St., N. Y.

Print Your Own Cards, &c. Press $3

Large sizes for circulars, &c., $8 to $75. For pleasure, money-making, young or old. Everything easy, printed instructions. Send 2 stamps for Catalogue of Presses, Type, Cards, &c., to the factory. KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

EARL & WILSON'S PATENT "SHORT BAND" COLLARS AND "BEAD EDGE" CUFFS ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION.

BABY CARRIAGE.—The Novelty. Has springs to adjust to weight. L. P. TIBBALS, 820 Broadway, N. Y.

LOW, SON, & HAYDON'S

Flower de Luce

The Howard Tooth Brushes

HAVE

SECURELY FASTENED BRISTLES

AND CAN BE FOUND WITH ALL DRUGGISTS.

PINS BEARING THIS

TRADE MARK P&A ARE SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS

MANUFACTURED BY THE PLUME & ATWOOD MFG CO. WATERBURY, CONN.

HORSMAN'S CELEBRATED

Send Stamp for Catalogue.

E. I. Horsman, [illegible]

LAWN TENNIS.

HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY.

FOR VILLAGE AND TOWN LIBRARIES.

Nearly three hundred numbers [illegible]

Biography, [illegible]

Send for Harper's Franklin [illegible]

LEGHENY COLLEGE LIBRARY

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

Vol. XXVII.—No. 1378.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 19, 1883.

TEN CENTS A COPY.
$4.00 PER YEAR, IN ADVANCE.

Copyright, 1883, by Harper & Brothers.

AN OLD SCHOOL-FELLOW

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 19, 1883.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

AN OFFER TO YOUNG AMERICAN ARTISTS.

For the best original drawing to illustrate ALFRED DOBBIT'S "Christmas Hymn"—the drawing to be available for publication in HARPER'S MAGAZINE, and to be the exclusive work of an American artist not over twenty-five years of age—MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS offer an award of THREE THOUSAND DOLLARS, upon the honorable understanding that the successful competitor shall use the same for the prosecution of art study in one or more of the best American schools, including also a sojourn abroad of at least six months for the study of the old masters. The award will be paid in such installments and at such times as shall best suit the convenience of the recipient for the purposes specified.

The drawings must be received by MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS *not later than August 1, 1883, addressed "Art Competition, Harper's Magazine, Franklin square, New York", and each must be designated by an assumed name or motto, which should also be given, together with the real name, age, and residence of the artist, in a sealed envelope accompanying the drawings, and not to be opened until the result of the competition shall have been determined. The name of the successful competitor will not be publicly announced until the publication of the drawings.*

MR. R. SWAIN GIFFORD, N.A.; MR. F. D. MILLET, A.N.A.; and MR. CHARLES PARSONS, A.N.A., Superintendent of the Art Department, HARPER & BROTHERS, will act as judges of the competition.

It is intended to engrave the successful drawing on one page for HARPER'S MAGAZINE of December, 1883; and should other drawings submitted be deemed suitable, second, third, and fourth awards will be made, as follows: one page HARPER'S WEEKLY, $2000; one page HARPER'S BAZAR, $1000; one page HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, $500.

If the judges should decide that no one of the drawings is suitable, MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS reserve the right to extend the limit of time and re-open the competition.

Two Christmas Hymns by ALFRED DOBBIT have been published. That published in 1857 is the one for the illustration of which artists are invited to compete, and a printed copy of it will be sent on application to

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

THE CIVIL SERVICE RULES.

THE rules of the Civil Service Commission, which, after prolonged explanation and deliberation in the cabinet, have been approved and adopted by the President, mark an important and beneficent step of progress in methods of administration. The event is very significant and encouraging because it is evidence of the disposition and ability of the country to deal wisely with administrative evils and abuses as they arise. It is one of the vindications of a free popular system that it corrects its own excesses. The mischiefs which it is proposed to reform are not necessary parts of our system of parties and governments, as is sometimes asserted; they are excrescences which must be removed before they impair fatally the essential vigor of that system. It is to this perception, plainly expressed at the last election, after public attention had been thoroughly aroused both by discussion and by all the circumstances of the assassination of GARFIELD, that the passage of the reform bill was due. The new rules, therefore, appear under entirely different circumstances from those that attended the rules of 1872. Those were approved and adopted by President GRANT wholly in advance of public opinion, and of course without the public sympathy and support which are indispensable to the success of such a reform. The public was apathetic, Congress was contemptuous, politicians were scornful, and the President soon abandoned the endeavor. But the effort, although fruitless of immediate practical results, was most useful in awakening public attention, in showing the reason and the necessity of reform, in furnishing facts and information of every kind, and in answering the theoretical objections of ignorance and prejudice and demagogic cant; and under the administration of President HAYES the perfect practicability and immense advantage of the reformed system were conclusively demonstrated in the New York Custom-house upon the basis of the rules of 1872.

Under happier auspices the new scheme, which embodies the same fundamental principles, is now introduced. It is drawn with great skill and sagacity, and as a simple and comprehensive working scheme for the whole reform bill. This thoroughness is doubtless due to the presence upon the commission of Mr. EATON, who prepared the original draft of the bill, and who is entirely familiar with its purport and its details. The rules provide for admission to the service and for promotion by open competition and probation, the probation being the test of that practical efficiency which nothing but actual trial can determine. They prescribe also the general subjects of examination and the general method of grading, together with the details of application, records, and general care and conduct of examinations. The selection for appointment is to be made in each case under the rules from among the four highest names in order upon the eligible list, and in presenting the names sex will be disregarded unless the appointing officer shall otherwise determine. The scheme wisely applies at the outset only to the departments at Washington, to twenty-three Post-offices and eleven Custom-houses, and it includes about 10,000 employés. All political and religious discrimination is forbidden, as well as official coercion of political action and political assessments. The whole scheme is admirable, and its scope and effectiveness will be best perceived by those who have devoted most attention to the subject.

The rules, although drawn by the Commission, are the President's rules. They derive all their validity from his approval and adoption. Their publication by him is the announcement to the country that it is in this way that he proposes to enforce the reform bill. The result depends, therefore, upon his good faith. If it is understood in the various offices concerned that the President honestly desires to enforce the reformed method, the examining boards, composed of local officers, will act accordingly. There are undoubtedly important officers in the New York Custom-house, for instance, who are contemptuously hostile to the reformed system. If they consulted only their own feelings they would unquestionably obstruct and discredit it in every way possible. But if they know that the President is really in earnest, and that the Commission holds the details of enforcement under strict scrutiny, they will hardly dare to indulge a hostility which may imperil themselves. The President's position, therefore, is of the highest importance, and it seems to be clear that he desires to give the new system fair play. Although some incidents of his administration have certainly shown indifference to the spirit and principles of the reform bill, it will not be denied that in the exercise of his great power of appointment President ARTHUR has generally seemed to consult the public welfare rather than the mere interests of a party. The proof of this lies in the fact that his administration is regarded as a failure by the Stalwart or spoils Republicans, who complain that he looks more to the public than to party advantage. That in this course he is a wiser politician than those of his associates who deplore it, the event will show. The policy which some of his party counsellors have favored would have destroyed the Republican party. Its continued prosperity depends upon the conviction that there is no need of a change of party control of the government to assure such an administration as the country desires.

TAMMANY IN THE MARKET.

THE plain and decisive message of remonstrance sent by Governor CLEVELAND to the Senate has exasperated Tammany Hall because it tells the simple truth about the league which bears that name. Last year the various wings and "halls" of the Democratic party made a bargain for the election, and in accordance with it Tammany nominated Mr. EDSON for Mayor. He was elected, but, as an intelligent and self-respecting man, he has naturally broken in his scheme of a new city charter, with the knot of mercenary politicians known as Tammany. Mr CLEVELAND was nominated for Governor in a Democratic Convention to which Tammany was admitted. He was elected, but he also, as an honorable citizen, has refused to trade with Tammany, and he is consequently denounced by it. It is obviously impossible for those citizens who have some interest in the public welfare, and who require some decency in politics, to act with Tammany.

Tammany Hall is the name of a large and well-disciplined body of political strikers. They have no other rule of action than "the make." They are composed of the more ignorant camp-followers of the Democratic party, but their business is to trade with any party or political organization, and to secure as much plunder as possible. Their association with any party is proof that the party managers have assented to their terms. Their breach with any party shows only that they have not been paid enough. The importance of such a band of political adventurers and guerrillas arises wholly from their numbers. In a city like New York it is not difficult, by appealing to ties of a common race and a common faith and a common hope of gain, to recruit a large body of ignorant voters who will act as a unit and implicitly obey orders. This body, as was shown in 1879, will be increased by all who have a grievance of any kind to wreak upon the party to which the adventurers are for the time opposed, so that it may readily hold the political balance of power in the State, and give the victory to the party which will offer it the largest share of plunder. Such a body is a most demoralizing element in politics, and a great deal of the disgust and indignation which have weakened the Republican party in New York is due to the bargains made by the Republican machine in the city with Tammany Hall. Tammany Republicans are no better than Tammany Democrats; and the powerful alliance of such traders bearing decent party names is one of the chief perils of the political situation.

It is evident that Tammany is again in the market. It has been unable to control the Governor and the Mayor, and it will make mischief with the Democratic party unless it can be lured to return upon stringent terms adequately secured. Next year brings a general election, in which the vote of New York will be most important, if not decisive. It is not extravagant to say that Tammany Hall can decide how that vote shall be cast. The most sanguine Democrat would not anticipate the success of his party were Tammany Hall in open opposition, as in the State election of 1879. In the present political situation, therefore, while no question of general policy is strong enough in the public mind to reconstruct parties, the election of 1884 is largely at the mercy of this mercenary squad. It is one of the most significant signs of the lull which precedes great political changes.

MR. CONKLING'S VIEW.

MR. CONKLING, in a late speech which has produced a good deal of amusement, predicts the success of the Democratic party next year, and by implication ascribes Republican defeat to Republican repudiation of him and his counsels. "Two years ago," he says, "the Republican party came out with flying colors from the greatest battle it had ever fought; weighed down and struggling against heavy odds, it triumphed, and flew its banner in every State from sea to sea. To-day in almost every State from sea to sea it lies prostrate." He adds in effect that the defeat of his plans at Chicago in 1880 set the country back ten years. Mr CONKLING speaks with the natural asperity of a man who knows that he will figure in our political history solely as the baffled leader of a conspiracy against the sound traditions of the government and the convictions of the country, and as a Senator guilty of an inconceivably childish folly. But that is not a reason that his misrepresentations should not be exposed.

During the second administration of General GRANT the influence of Mr CONKLING and his friends was supreme. The result was so great and general a public alarm and indignation that the Republican party was saved from destruction in the reaction only by a nomination in 1876 which implied Republican determination to pursue a different policy. As it was, the election was decided only by a majority of one vote awarded by the Electoral Commission, Mr. CONKLING as Senator aiding the Democrats by absenting himself from his seat. The Republican administration that followed was so clean, upright, and able that Mr CONKLING'S ostentatiously contemptuous hostility to it was ludicrously futile: and the action of the Chicago Convention of 1880, in which he attempted to drive the party to return to the era which had been condemned, and to return by the overthrow of almost cherished and wise tradition, showed in plainly the total prostration of the régime which Mr. CONKLING represented, and the thorough emancipation of the party from its control, that Republican success was signal and decisive. The result of the election of last autumn, and especially the overwhelming and unprecedented anti-Republican majority in New York was due to the Republican apprehension that the methods and politics associated with Mr. CONKLING were resuming control of the party. It was a warning that Republican cohesion and success were impossible so long as counsels which had discredited and almost ruined the party were tolerated in its control. In a word the decline of Republican ascendency dates from Mr. CONKLING'S supremacy, the party re-invigoration in 1880, to the conviction that that supremacy was wholly overthrown; the party reverse in 1882, to the apprehension that it might be restored. Had Mr CONKLING'S third term conspiracy succeeded in 1880, it would have set the country back much more than ten years, for it would have led to an overwhelming Democratic restoration.

Mr. CONKLING knows instinctively the true source of his humiliation and defeat. It is the general and just conviction that Republican misfortunes are due to degrading and corrupting political methods, of which he is the accepted representative. In his speech, therefore, he could not refrain from a fling at administrative reform. "When these statesmen," he said, "shall turn away from that great cause—the finding out of what boy or what girl shall have a place in the government employ." This is inexpressibly comical as proceeding from a statesman who withdrew from statesmanship altogether and abandoned his country to her fate because he could not control the appointment of the Collector of New York.

CHARITY AND COMMON-SENSE.

THE report presented at the second annual meeting of the Charity Organization Society in New York forcibly illustrated the shrewd remark of the Rev. Dr. H. C. POTTER, that to allow alms-giving to be controlled by sentimental emotion is to promote poverty, suffering, and crime. Dr POTTER told the story of a man who had lived for many years upon alms given to him in consequence of a letter written many years ago by Dr. POTTER'S father, then Bishop of Pennsylvania. "That letter," he said, "proved the ruin of an honest man."

This society, of which we have spoken more than once, is one of the most energetic and efficient agencies of charity in the city, and none deserves more generous support. It makes immediate and thorough inquiry by means of experienced persons, and enables relief to be promptly given, either by relief societies or by individuals, where it is really necessary, while it discovers and exposes the endless tricks of knavery to trade upon the show of suffering and the generous desire to relieve it. With all the unquestionable poverty and even destitution that exist in the city, the extent of cunning fraud under guise of begging is very much greater than is suspected. This imposition is so well known to those who have most carefully investigated the subject that it is not surprising to find that they regard indiscriminate, sentimental, and ignorant almsgiving in the street, as upon mere representation, whatever may be the plea or the apparent necessity, as a grave offence against social order and morality, of which, with all that is now known, no intelligent citizen should be guilty.

Of course he is not to satisfy himself with a mere refusal and the rebuke of a probable imposter. He is to do two things: first to give money, not to the beggar, but to the society to enable it to ascertain whether and how aid should be afforded; and second, to give such aid either personally or through some relief society known to him. When intelligent and public spirited citizens are giving time and thought and money and labor to deal wisely with the great problem of charity, the least that the rest of us can do is to support their good work and heed their wise suggestions.

COLUMBIA COLLEGE AND THE ANNEX

In response to the petition asking that the educational advantages of Columbia College in certain defined ways should be opened to women, the special committee of the trustees selected to consider the subject have prepared a plan which has been submitted to the board for consideration. They decide that as the college is unable to furnish rooms for separate instruction, it is useless to consider how many of the faculty would volunteer to teach or how they should be paid, because the students would be so widely dispersed. They think that at present the education of women should be carried on in schools of their own, and when such schools, of the proper character and grade, have been provided by private liberality in the city, a way will doubtless be found to connect them with the system of the college, and to secure the attendance of the college professors.

In the mean time the committee propose a collegiate course of study, covering four years, to which entrance and other examinations shall be very thorough and strict, to be conducted by officers of the college, by whom also certificates of proficiency and successful completion of the course shall be awarded. The happy execution of the plan would lead, as the committee believe, to the endowment of a department for women, such as is now known as an annex. This is substantially the relation of Girton College to Cambridge University in England.

The practical argument for the separate collegiate instruction of men and women in certain branches in the immense saving of force and material which is gained by avoiding a duplication of buildings and apparatus and time. If, for instance, Æschylus is to be read or a mathematical problem to be demonstrated to forty students, there is obviously enormous waste in requiring that the forty shall be divided into two classes, and the same work done twice and in different places. But this consideration involves, of course, the method which Columbia does not favor, and the present proposition shows a gratifying disposition to respond, so far as consistent with the conservative tradition of the college, to the progressive demand of the time.

WESTWARD HO!

While the series of our centennial celebrations comes to an end for the present at Newburgh on the 18th of October, when, under national and State auspices, the disbanding of the Revolutionary army will be duly commemorated in the oration by Mr. EVARTS and with imposing ceremonies, there will be a tercentenary in New Mexico this summer. The three-hundredth anniversary of the Spanish occupation of Santa Fe, the oldest town in the United States, will begin on the 2d of July and continue for several weeks.

The city now known as Santa Fe was a Pueblo town, the existence of which was first reported by a Spanish explorer in July, 1583, and the neighborhood he asserted to contain forty thousand people. This is a misty story, but it seems to be clear that an Indian town was seen here three hundred years ago which was even then of a certain antiquity. And as it is supposed that the town must have been more than twenty years old, the Spanish settlement upon its site called Santa Fe is doubled with the Indian town, and priority is claimed for it over St. Augustine, which was founded in 1565.

In any case,

"How is old time the land of men hath been and the people of New Mexico have resolved to devote a month to commemorative pageants, feasts, games, and historical addresses, among the three civilizations which still survive side by side—the old Indian, the Spanish, and the modern American. The summer climate of New Mexico is declared to be "glorious." The celebration will fall in the vacation season. It will be singularly novel and fascinating. The railroads will probably give reduced fares. Why should not WORDSWORTH'S question be that of the summer?

"What! are you stepping westward?"

THE FRANKLIN COLLECTION.

It is long since the State Department has received so valuable an addition to that of the manuscripts and documents known as the Franklin Collection. For many years Mr HENRY STEVENS, in London, has been industriously accumulating all the papers of Dr FRANKLIN that he could find, and his success has been extraordinary. Among the documents in the original petition sent by the Continental Congress to the King in 1774. This is of great historical value, and, as a correspondent of the Tribune points out, it completes the series of four documents of the highest importance, the other three being the originals of the Declaration of Independence, the Articles of Confederation, and the Constitution. These are all in the possession of the State Department.

There are also the autograph of works of FRANKLIN, the letter-book and record of the American legation to Paris during the Revolution, and a large and most valuable mass of correspondence. There are 3685 manuscripts in the collection, of which only 684 have been printed. There are also books, and the best collection of the Poor Richard Almanacs.

There has been always a mystery about the FRANKLIN papers, the sensation scandal being that the British Government bribed WILLIAM TEMPLE FRANKLIN to suppress them. The Tribune correspondent reports Mr HENRY STEVENS's views of the whole matter. He does not believe the bribery, but he thinks TEMPLE FRANKLIN to have been a very incompetent editor and owner of such treasures, which, after an imperfect publication, he locked up in a safe, and died without again opening. From whom Mr. STEVENS obtained them he does not say, but promises to tell hereafter. The Tribune's account of the collection is excellent, but it would be interesting to have a complete and detailed memoir of the whole subject.

THE "KEIM INCIDENT"

The withdrawal of Mr. KEIM and the immediate appointment of Mr. CHARLES LYMAN to be Chief Examiner under the Civil Service Commission, is a fortunate solution of the difficulty. Mr. LYMAN is eminently qualified for the position. He has been long in the public service, he is well known as a warm and intelligent friend of the reformed system, and he is practically familiar with its methods. The action of the President in the matter has been most honorable. It is understood that it was he who felt most strongly, and pointed out most plainly the necessity of intrusting the oath at the beginning only to its known friends. The incident is another illustration of his strictest good faith in regard to the reform.

THE STATE CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

The prompt approval of the State reform bill by the Governor, and his nomination of Messrs. ANDREW D. WHITE, ALONZO B. CORNELL, and HENRY A. RICHMOND as Commissioners, showed an earnestness of purpose which is the assurance of cordial Executive co-operation. We feared that the necessary absorption of President WHITE in his duties at Cornell University might compel him to decline the new duties, which at first sound so engrossing. This would be unfortunate because of the singular fitness of Mr WHITE for the position and his great interest in the subject.

Mr. RICHMOND is one of the most honest and most intelligent friends of reform, to which he has given energetic aid in many ways; and while Mr. SCHURZ'S views upon the question are unknown to us, his character and ability are the necessity of efficient service in a position which he would not accept were he unfriendly to the object for which it was created. The bill, mutatis mutandis, is the reform bill which passed Congress, applied especially to the State, with the addition of two sections, containing the substance of a separate bill introduced early in the session by Mr. MILLER, which require of the Commission a general investigation into the civil services of counties and cities of more than fifty thousand inhabitants as regards methods of appointment, removal, terms of service, duties, compensation and number of clerks, with the purpose of ascertaining what reforms may be desirable.

The general bill is permissive, but not mandatory, upon cities of more than fifty thousand inhabitants. In this it begins with limitations like the national bill, which, as we state elsewhere, applies at first to less thousand offices only, and not to the whole service. The bill, however, honestly administered, promises an adequate beginning for practical reform, and the gentlemen who compose the Commission will unquestionably how to be true.

PERSONAL.

Mr EDWARD A. FREEMAN declares that for a long time he has believed that Parliamentary oaths and affirmations should be got rid of altogether. "The promise, whether in the shape of oath or affirmation, made by members on taking their seats, seems to answer no good purpose, while it is always possible that it may be a snare to the conscience. I should extend this remark to all oaths or affirmations taken on admission to office, on the like; that is, to all promises to act in some way not very well defined, for some time no very well defined, for the term of one's life, or so long as one holds a particular office. Oaths or affirmations of this vague kind have nothing in common with the oath or affirmation taken in a court of justice whose same kind of solemnity does seem needful to distinguish the solemn statement of a witness from an idle talk."

—Mr IRVING, the actor and manager, is to produce in the Lyceum Theatre London, all the plays that are to be performed by his company during their approaching visit to this country. These plays are Much Ado About Nothing, The Bells, The Lyons Mail, Hamlet, Charles I., The Merchant of Venice, Louis XI., Eugene Aram, and The Belle's Stratagem.

—In Reno, the well-known resort of gamblers, there has been erected a little English church, which, according to its chaplain, the Rev. Warren Wager, M. A., is meant as a check upon those who wish to be free of all moral restraint." The Bishop of Nevada, on the contrary, expresses the fear that, by making Mammon more attractive, it will increase the prosperity of the gambling hells.

—Canoeists will find Mr. ALDEN'S Cruise of the Canoe Club, published by HARPER & BROTHERS, a complete manual of canoeing. The art of sailing and of paddling canoes on lakes and among rapids, the various methods of rigging canoes, of making canoe tents, and of fitting steering gear—in short, the whole theory and practice of canoeing—are set forth in this little book in the guise of a story. It is true that the story is written for boys, but the great facts of canoeing are now affected by the age of canoeists.

—The Duke of Edinburgh has been the victim of an imposture, to whom he gave several five dollars in charity, but who turned out to be the widow of a warden of a convict prison in Australia instead of the niece of an Australian Governor. She had received also fifty dollars from Mr GLADSTONE. She is now serving a sentence of imprisonment with hard labor for six months.

—Says the Pall Mall Gazette: "Things have indeed reached a pitch when a grave writer in the North American Review can speak of the [illegible] who [illegible] the great trading corporations as 'the dangerous classes,' and action the [illegible] about a social [illegible] We are free, no doubt, from [illegible] in England, for in this country freedom of [illegible] prim and combination has never [illegible] allowed to reach the proportions of an [illegible] But [illegible] we can not afford to [illegible] that the price of respect for [illegible] is [illegible] with regard to them. That was the political maxim most strongly brought home to the individualist philosopher Mr HERBERT SPENCER by his visit to the land of the most unbridled freedom of enterprise, and on the interests of free enterprise itself the truth should never be forgotten."

—Lord LORNE (says the London Daily Telegraph) has done his work well in the Dominion, and there is fair reason to presume that the qualities he has displayed would enable him to rule India with credit to himself and advantage to the empire. Moreover, it would be fortunate in many ways were a daughter of Queen Victoria to visit the East and preside over Government House.

—Mr FROUDE describes Lady ASHBURTON as "a gifted and brilliant woman, who carved nothing for the frivolous occupations of fashion," and who sought out "every man who had raised himself into notice by genuine intellectual worth." CARLYLE spoke of her as "the most queen like woman I had ever known or seen. The honor of her eminent regard had for ten years back been among my proudest and most valued possessions."

—Mr THOMAS S. PERRY'S admirable work, entitled English Literature in the Eighteenth Century, published by HARPER & BROTHERS, has attracted great attention abroad. An eminent German scholar writes regarding it, in a private letter: "I have read the greater part of it, and have derived from the perusal no less instruction than enjoyment. Without flattery I may say that the book, task as design and execution, is worthy of the highest praise, and that the profound scholarship and incisive and sound critical judgment which it displays excite my warm admiration."

—Immortality is assured to JANE WELSH CARLYLE (unless one of her countrymen) as the lovely wife of her husband, but for whom his task could not have been accomplished. But she will live for her own sake as one of the brightest of English letter-writers.

—Who is not a part of Lord BEACONSFIELD'S speciality, asks an acute observer, that the leading features of his character were for ever powerfully impressed on those who studied him from afar off than on his friends—that the near view of him confused the spectator?

—A new word is needed to the name of the murderous users as advocates of dynamite. One journal has coined the term "dynamitards", another speaks of the "dynamiteers."

—The vicar of Selby, England, has written a letter explaining that by the word "betters" the Church Catechism means, and should mean, "those also by birth, office, rank, power, rank, and riches—in every effective form of power—are in a better (that is, a superior) position to use ours," thus adapting the doctrine of the old dogger rel:

"God bless the squire
And all his rich relations,
And teach us poor people
To keep our proper stations."

—In one of HAWTHORNE'S recently published books occurs the sentence: "Bachelorism is one of the quaintest apt to inspire love," which the Spectator takes as a text, and preaches three wide columns on. "Love," it remarks, "is not given for love half as often as it is given for unasked pence and soft couches and sweetly urged claims. Affection tends to be like itself, not upon those from whom we receive gifts, but upon those who receive gifts from us. A very young baby is the most absolutely and frankly selfish of mortals. It insists upon every desire being gratified. And ever the person who suffers the most from these demands, the mother, is the person who loves the most."

—One of the most popular works of the kind ever published is Bishop WARREN'S Excursions in Astronomy (HARPER & BROTHERS), which presents the subject on which it treats in a manner which makes scientific truths clear and interesting even to non-scientific readers. Nearly ten thousand copies of the work have been disposed of within the last three months.

—The traveller in Ceylon notices that almost every native he meets wears one of the beautiful characters of the other natives. Sir EMERY MACLEOD, while journeying there, was told by his native servants that the inhabitants of a certain village, where polyandry was practiced, were unusually long, because they "have always had a number of fathers, and as they inherit all the bad qualities of so many fathers, it is only natural that they should grow from unusual stature." "This new theory of inheritance," says the doctor, "startled me, it has hitherto been lacking in the ninth chapter of my Natural History of Creation, and its originality must make it interesting to every sincere Darwinist."

—Lord WOLSELEY, in reserving the honor of the procuration in a gold casket of an address from the Corporation of the City of London, put in a word in behalf of the non-commissioned officers and privates, "who, as a rule, share many largely in the hard knocks of war than in its enlargement honors."

—Mr JOSEPH PULITZER, formerly of St. Louis, has purchased the New York World, and Mr WILLIAM HENRY HURLBERT, who has been connected with that paper for twenty years, retires from the field of journalism. The new proprietor is a gentleman of large pecuniary experience, and possesses the requisite qualifications for making a bright and enterprising newspaper.

—The Governor of Batbari, in Arcania, is a sort of civilized Turk. He declares that his people are following European methods in their courts of justice, their schools and their protection of civil liberty, and that in one respect they have the advantage over Europeans, for every Turkish peasant, however poor, is the owner of his land so long as he pays the moderate land tax, being not a serf like the Irishman, and, if poor, being as only according to the European standard of comfort.

—"I maintain my opinion," writes a foreign correspondent, "that of all modes of progression—and I have tried many, from an elephant to a Cairn jackass—that of camel-back is the most detestable."

—The London salmon find an advocate in an editor of a newspaper in that city. "It is obvious to all persons having any knowledge of the subject that if the salmon were only to receive their bare 6d. per table, not only would they fail to make any profit, but they could not pay for the li[illegible] of their vehicles. When persons pay a salmon his bare legal fare, they are often riding at his expense, for they are paying him a less amount than he has to pay the owners. A person who hires a salmon and drives a yard or two under two miles, and pays a shilling, is within his legal right, but he is acting neither justly nor generously." Why not change the law, then?

—Pale wives and lasses of Scotland, Ireland, France, Belgium, Germany, and Holland, arrayed in their distinctive costumes, are a principal feature of the great International Fisheries Exhibition opened in London on the 12th inst.

—"In India," writes a lady correspondent, "on all the east [illegible] and have our comfortable chotahazree, or little breakfast, [illegible] o'clock. After that a mother of a family [illegible] time, while the children go out for their [illegible] at nine o'clock. [illegible] kept a well-supplied [illegible] to what I order and write [illegible] next day. The [illegible] for [illegible] bazar [illegible] of each [illegible] [illegible], our [illegible] round [illegible] a thing [illegible] secure."

Digitized by Google

MEADE'S "MISSISSIPPI"

MR. MEADE'S STATUE.

A colossal statue of unveined Carrara marble, [illegible] typify the Mississippi River, is being chiselled [illegible] Lazare G. Meade, Jun., at Florence, on an order from Mr. [illegible] Bispham, of this city, who has expected the work in memory of his father, the late Mr. Jere Bispham for forty years a resident of New York. In treatment, save the Roman Nose, the statue is to be like the Nile group in Rome; and it is to [illegible] that the artist has endeavored to work into the features a [illegible] to the other Bispham without succeeding any [illegible] river-god, his head adorned with a wreath of [illegible] appears in a sitting position leaning against [illegible] beneath him are [illegible] reposing on the [illegible] of Mississippi River [illegible] the cornstalk, the sugar cane, and a negro. The figure [illegible] the pedestal to the feet being, and the height of the [illegible] Mr. Meade proposes to present the work to the city of New York when it will be "a symbol of a great [illegible] which [illegible] the New World has [illegible] to the commerce of the world."

CONSCRIPTION IN PARIS.

[illegible] have just returned from the [illegible] They have had their numbers [illegible] of the many "[illegible]" Hôtel de Ville, [illegible] their tickets their hats, have taken a cab with the [illegible] expressing their joy or grief, as the case [illegible] by making as much noise as possible. [illegible] He and the police tolerate their [illegible] good nature, remarking that they [illegible] as jolly a year [illegible]

The conscript begins his [illegible] service in October or November after the drawing. Under former regulations he was allowed, [illegible] so, to pay a substitute, but under the present system he is compelled to serve; but [illegible] discrimination of the youths of the [illegible] middle classes to the life of the [illegible] that all who can command sufficient influence contrive to be sent to serve their time in the auxiliary services as clerks, commissariat officials, etc. In his recent work on the war between France and Germany Marshal BAZAINE complains bitterly [illegible] decay of military feeling in his own [illegible] which he attributed the disasters of that war. He says:

"The depreciation of the military spirit was due to the fact that the intelligent mass of the nation which formed means of evading the service placed it far below any learned profession, or even any trade. Soldiering was put down as an état de parvenu, and honest bourgeoise have been heard expressing their sympathy with the army by this significant phrase, 'Nous ne pouvons pourtant pas faire soldat un fainéant!' Thus many youths belonging to good bourgeois families were eager to find employment as clerks in the offices of the headquarters staff at Metz, to keep them away from the Rhine and the risks of shot and shell. Among the young men so employed was M. de Mac-Mahon, Duc de Magenta, who on his return to France received the Legion of Honour as a reward for his services. The soldiers used to call these pretended young gentlemen peloton des fainéants. They constantly were mobbed."

The compulsory system of military service works less injury to France in the way of detaining young men from the country than it does in Germany, Frenchmen having an almost unconquerable aversion to leaving their native land, but undoubtedly it induces many to expatriate themselves who would otherwise remain model citizens at home.

CYPRIOTE ANTIQUITIES.

Cyprus has yielded a rich harvest to archæological research of late. The mass of antiquities unearthed by General DI CESNOLA—which England let slip, to the advantage of our New York public—are an earnest of the treasures awaiting further investigation. Of the treasures of [illegible] Cyprus, and within the last year two distinct series of excavations have been carried on by England, producing valuable results. While Mr. GEORGE HARE was busy for the South Kensington Museum, Herr MAX RICHTER was at work privately for Mr. Newton of the British Museum, with great success. Many of the Latter explorer's discoveries are of the highest interest, as may be seen by our engravings of the most important objects unearthed, reproduced from photographs furnished by Herr RICHTER, who also supplies particulars of his labors.

Though as here asserted birth place, primarily devoted to the worship of Venus, the Island in classical times seems to have paid considerable devotion to Artemis, judging from Herr RICHTER'S discoveries at the temple of the moon goddess at Achna, in the district of Famagusta. There he unearthed a vast quarry of busts and figures of Artemis in stone and pottery, curiously illustrating the influence of the different styles of Art, and the gradual development from the early archaic type to the purer forms of Greek culture. This development may be plainly traced in the varied representations of Artemis bordering our page of engravings. Asiatic influence predominates in the earliest works, notably in the rude heads at the foot of the page, which strongly suggest Buddhist deities. A few rare vestiges of Phœnician taste are visible in several of the somewhat mummy-like forms at the side, while the graceful full-length figure of Fig. 1 belongs to the true Greek school. At first this figure was believed to represent Aphrodite Urania, but further research has proved its identity with Artemis, numerous similar heads having been found. Artemis appears also with the lyre, or, as in the headless statue to the left, accompanied by her dog; and many of the larger figures hold ornamented birds or lambs. The singular high head-dress, or "modius," crowning the majority of the busts, comes from Asia Minor, and is borrowed from the goddess Cybele. Besides the representations of Artemis herself, numerous rough idols, painted bright yellow, were found in the temple—evidently relics of the old Beaurocnian festivals in honor of Diana. These festivals took place every five years in the Attic city of Brauron, where girls from five to ten years of age were consecrated to the goddess, and invariably wore saffron-hued garments. Moreover, the children's playthings were dedicated in the sanctuary.

CONSCRIPTION IN PARIS.

1 (and the surrounding busts and figures numbered) The Goddess Artemis. 2 The first House Pleasure-protected in Cyprus. 3 Mosaic Pavement found at Salamis. 4 Exedra or Recreation Hall of a Bath belonging to a Graco-Roman Gymnasium at Salamis. 5 General view of the Bath. 6 Ancient Chapel of St. Barnabas. 7 General view of the Excavations at Salamis. 8 Monastery of St. Barnabas. 9 Perfume Vessels representing Hecate, from the Temple of Artemis at Achna. 10 Curiosities from the Temple of Artemis. a Stone Perfume Vessel, b Archaic Lamp; c Pine-Tree sacred to Attys; d Vessels dedicated to Attys. 11 Bronze Mirror of Minerva with the Gorgon's Head.

THE LATEST EXCAVATIONS IN CYPRUS.

But these relics of Artemisian worship, interesting as they are, are hardly so important in an archæological sense as the curious perfume vessels of Fig. 9, which represent Hecate Triscephon, and are the first of the kind ever found. As goddess of the three kingdoms—earth, sky, and water—Hecate or Proserpine was usually represented, in archaic fashion, with three heads or three figures; but the second vessel of the group, unfortunately imperfect, shows the divinity in her fourfold character, as guardian of the four elements—heaven, earth, air, and water. Even now the Cyprians use similar vessels for charms against the evil eye, which they consider can be averted by Hecate's influence, though the deity herself is no longer carved on the vessel. By calling Hecate Luna, the ancients often confounded her with the true moon goddess Diana, and this belief accounts for the presence of these emblems in the temple of Artemis. The curiosities depicted in Fig. 10, and found on the same spot, are no less precious; and one in particular, the fragment of the sacred pine-tree of Attis, marked t, has also never been found before, although frequently mentioned by classical writers. After Cybele in a rage had turned the Phrygian shepherd into a pine, the tree became the symbol of the unlucky lover, and an emblem of purity, so that young girls were accustomed to bring vessels like those represented at d, and dedicate them at the foot of the holy Attys trees to Artemis's sanctuary. The early form of the lamp b points to the great antiquity of the temple, while another kind of perfume vessel is illustrated at u.

Actæa, however, was not the only site explored, for at Salamis fiery Ricurren was lucky enough to unearth the first large building of the Græco-Roman period known in Cyprus—a bath belonging to a gymnasium, and in excellent preservation. On excavating the remains he further found in the exedra, or recreation hall—shown in Fig 4—the first mosaic picture discovered in the island. This mosaic is believed to represent Orpheus charming the animals with his lute, but the painting somewhat resembles the play of Hamlet with Hamlet left out, remembering that Orpheus himself is missing. However, the animals are tolerably perfect, as may be seen by Fig. 2, a portion of the surrounding pavement being depicted in Fig 3. Apparently the pavement was broken in very early days, and was then covered with a layer of common material. Coins of the Emperors Michael and Alexius were dug up in the bath, besides two Byzantine lead seals, and the beautiful bronze mirror, Fig. 11, bearing in relief Athene with the Gorgon's head, surrounded by her favorite olive garland.

During these last researches Herr Richter said at the old monastery of St. Barnabas, in the plain where the ancient city of Salamis formerly stood. Built in the early Byzantine style, the monastery is full of interest alike from an architectural and historical point of view, for beneath the neighboring chapel of St. Barnabas in a tomb where, according to Church tradition, the body of the Cyprian saint was found after many years. Owing to this discovery the Cyprian Church was granted independence, and to this day the Archbishop of Cyprus signs his name with red ink, and bears an imperial eagle on his seal, and an imperial globe and cross on his crosier.

THE REAL DANGER

The use which has latterly been made of dynamite by European revolutionists has in some cases led to the rash conclusion that the invention of dynamite has brought a new peril upon society. It is not the existence of dynamite which imperils the life of the Czar and throws all England into panic. Powerful explosives here for many years been within the reach of desperate men. The bombs of Orsini, loaded with fulminate of mercury, were as easily made and as dangerous as the nitro-glycerine bombs which slew Alexander II. The danger which threatens European governments to-day lies not in the mere fact that dynamite can be easily made, but in the existence of a class of revolutionists who are ready to use it as an instrument of assassination.

What the revolutionists of the last generation sought has to a large extent been gained. They were, as a class, men of intelligence, culture, and principle. When the King of Naples had banished or imprisoned every educated man in his dominions he felt safe, and Louis Napoleon kept his grasp as France by chilling the intelligence and culture of the country into exile. In Italy the liberals were led by men like Manin, D'Azeglio, and Cavour, and in France Lamartine, Cavaignac, and Ledru-Rollin made the revolution of 1848. The French anarchist element was then small enough to be utterly crushed with the defeat of the June insurrection, and the extreme Italian radicals, led by Mazzini, had little, if any, share in the glorious work of making Italy a nation. Liberty in France and liberty and independence in Italy were won by men who would have shrunk with horror from the proposal to assassinate their opponents. Orsini, who was a typical fanatic, was the one revolutionist of any prominence who approved of assassination as a political weapon, and he found no imitators among liberals of his own generation.

At the present day the aims of the men of 1848 here all been accomplished. Hungary has her free Parliament, Germany is united, France is a republic, and Italy is free and independent. The European revolutionary party is now very different in aim and composition from what it was thirty years ago. It is composed of the ignorant and the reckless, and its purpose is communistic and anarchical. It demands the abolition of law and religion, the substitution of anarchy for order. Assassination is a weapon that one might naturally expect such a party to adopt. Men who proclaim themselves the enemies of God, and who seek to destroy every trace of His government on earth, have no moral standard by which they can condemn assassination. Wretches like Most and Hartmann, and the "Number One" of the Irish conspiracy, are the true leaders of the revolutionary party of to-day. They find dynamite ready to hand, and they use it. Had they lived thirty years ago, they would have used some other explosive with equal alacrity and effect.

So long as the anarchists constitute a class of the community they will find means of blowing up rulers and government officers, no matter what laws may be passed to prevent the sale of dynamite. Society must realize that it is brought face to face in deadly conflict with a class of men of whom the last generation knew nothing. It is in the character of these men, and not in the mere with which they can buy dynamite, that the danger lies, and it is this fact which the English press seems so far to have ignored.

AN AUBURN TRESS.

I FELL half way in love with her at first sight, she was an entirely and refreshingly different from all the other girls I had ever met, and I had met quite a number, having, although sisterless, seven cousins of the fairer sex, each of whom was constantly discovering some "charming" friend or friends to whom "Cousin Tom" really must be introduced. But by only two or three of those charmers had "Cousin Tom" been enslaved, and then his chains were of the lightest, and had broken easily after a very short captivity. And so my five-and-twentieth birthday found me still heart-whole, and being heart-whole, with no despotic sin to dictate for me, wondering where I should spend my summer vacation. It was to be a longer one than usual, for Uncle John, in whose publishing house I was employed, had kindly placed the whole month of August at my disposal, in return, as he was pleased to say, for my close attention to business since the beginning of the year. I didn't want to go to one of the fashionable resorts, for I was out (although my cousins had done all they could toward making me one) a fashionable man. And then, again—which was perhaps a more important reason—I couldn't afford it.

"I wish I knew of some pleasant farm-house," said I to my office chum, Lon Forever, "where there would be no other boarders taken; where the nearest neighbor lived at least a mile away; where there were plenty of old trees about, where a fellow might swing in a hammock from 'morn till dewy eve' if he chose, and read and smoke and dream the time away to his heart's content, and where new, unskimmed milk, fresh eggs, crisp vegetables, ripe fruit, and tender chickens were realities, not myths. But where, oh! where can such Arcadian bliss be found? I've read of it in stories and newspaper advertisements, but I never knew anybody who had met it or anything like it—in their search for summer board and lodging, I mean. Quite the contrary has been my own experience; in fact, disgustingly the contrary."

All the time I had been speaking, Mouse had been listening attentively. Mouse was a twelve-year-old boy belonging to our department, his real name being Roderick, but that had been almost entirely forgotten since Lon and I reclaimed him, and the new title had been conferred upon him on account of his mouselees way of moving around, his small, bright, dark eyes, and his general, as we thought, mousy appearance, and as I finished I turned suddenly upon him and asked

"What are you standing there for, Mouse? Have you nothing to do?"

"Plenty, sir," he answered; "but I was a-thinkin' our folks might take you. They've got a tree lions, and big trees, and new chickens, and eggs, and fruit, and vegetables, and cow's milk, and everything you said you wanted 'cept an accordion, and I guess they could get that."

"An accordion?" repeated I, in great astonishment. "What in the world do you mean?"

"Accordion bliss," whispered Lon, and we both burst out laughing, but Mouse kept his ground, and regarded me gravely until I began talking again.

"Your folks?" said I, and it struck me that I had never thought of the quiet little chap in connection with folks before. "Why, don't your folks live on the city?"

"No, sir. They live at Saturwood. I stay here with Aunt Hannah, 'cause I'm to be a business man. Tim—he's mine—he's to be a farmer. And there isn't any house 'cept the Larrups' shanty for mother's a mile. And I've told 'em how good you are to me, and I'm 'most sure they'd let you come and stay as long as you wanted to. And there's ducks."

"Do you know, Lon, this sounds very promising?" said I.

"May be as deceptive as the advertisements, for all that," said Lon. "Not intentionally so, of course, but Mouse being a boy, and the farmhouse the home of his childhood—"

"Nothing easier than for me to find out all about it," interrupted I. "I'll take a run down there to-morrow" (which happened to be Saturday) "afternoon. And, Mouse, if you like, you may go with me."

"Thank you, sir," said Mouse, his bright eyes sparkling with pleasure; and then he silently disapproved, while Lon and I fell to work as though our very lives depended upon getting a certain amount done in a certain length of time.

The next afternoon found Mouse and myself on board of an express train speeding away to Saturwood. It was after five o'clock when we arrived at the small station, for I had not been able to start so early as I had intended, and nearly six when we came in sight of a large old-fashioned peak-roofed barn, just beyond which stood a low, broad, comfortable-looking farm-house.

"That's our house and our barn; and there's Phil feedin' the chickens," said Mouse, in the sprightliest tones I had ever heard from him; and turning to glance at the youth "Phil" who was feeding the chickens, I saw the prettiest girl I had ever seen, standing in the wide doorway of the barn. On her head she wore a bewitching mob-cap made of dotted cambric, beneath the frill of which an intensely auburn wavy hang fell almost to her auburn eyebrows. Her dress was made of the same material as the cap, the sleeves being rolled up nearly to the shoulders, displaying a pair of beautifully rounded arms, and she held the corners of a large white apron in one hand, while from it she dispensed the supper of the fowls with the other. "By Jove!" thought I, "it was worth the journey from New York to see this lovely, truly rural picture alone." And then I said in an inquiring manner to Mouse, "Phil?"

"Yes, sir. Philippa. She's my only sister."

And Philippa, seeing us at this moment, did not utter a shriek and fly, as many a damsel I wot of would have done, but flung the remainder of the corn from her apron, and came smilingly toward us, walking with an easy grace that told plainly that she had never undergone the martyrdom of tight, high heeled shoes.

"This is Mr Lovejoy, Phil," said Roderick. "Come to me if mother'll take him to board for a month."

"You are very welcome," said she, at the same time offering me a small brown hand to which some of the corn flour still clung, and looking at me with a pair of clear hazel eyes. "Roderick has often told us of your kindness to him."

And no sooner had she ceased speaking than I began to think that I had found the very place of all in which to spend my vacation, and I was sure of it after I had seen her father and mother—he an honest, out-spoken, cheery-faced old fellow, and she an attractive, still young looking woman, with eyes exactly like those she had bestowed upon her daughter—and the neat, prettily furnished room she offered me, facing the grand old wood filled with nut trees that gave the place its name, and looking out at the side on a jolly little brook on whose sparkling waters some brilliantly plumaged ducks were proudly sailing. They wouldn't hear of me returning to the city that night, as I had proposed to do, but insisted upon my remaining until Monday morning.

"It won't inconvenience us in the least," said Mrs. Dayton.

"And by that time you will be better able to tell whether you like the place or not," added her husband.

"Like the place?" I made up my mind about that before I slept that night. It was heavenly, after the dust and noise and crowding and jostling of the city. And as for the eggs and milk, and chicken fried in cream, and light and airy muffins that we had for supper, they were heaven to me. "Phil cooked the chicken and made the muffins," whispered Roderick, who had, as I soon discovered—a fact that moved him greatly in my estimation—a most intense admiration for his sister.

Sunday passed like a delightful dream, and early Monday morning I left, with a promise to return the following Wednesday, that being the day on which no hour of absence was to be given.

"Well, how did you like Saturwood?" asked Lon, as soon as we met.

"It's a very quiet, pretty place," said I.

"And the Mouse's description wasn't as highly colored as the advertisements?" he continued.

"It wasn't highly colored in the least," I replied. "I found them all be promised and"—"much more," I was about to add, but checked myself.

"Then what do you say to speaking a word in my favor when you leave? I might spend one of my holiday weeks there, anyhow. The other I've got to spend with the old folks."

"Oh," said I, emphatically, "Saturwood would never do for you. You'd get the worst kind of blues there in no time. It's so exceedingly—well, dull, you'd call it. You want to be where there's some fun going on. As for me, give me a pipe and a book, and I'm all right, you know."

Wednesday saw me installed on the cozy room, with the wood on one side and the brook on the other, and a week or less from that day saw me as wholly in love with Philippa as ever a sun city youth with brawny country maid. She was such a clear, frank, bright unaffected girl, with no faults that I could see—and I watched her closely—unless a strong tendency to superstition could be called one. That spilled salt must be immediately thrown over the left shoulder of the spiller, lest he or she should quarrel with his or her next neighbor, that on journey or important undertaking should be begun on a Friday, that an umbrella or parasol opened under a roof betokened a great disappointment, that a crow crossing your path boded ill news; that the finding of a four-leaved clover brought good luck, all these, with a hundred other things of like nature, did pretty Philippa believe with the whole of her honest heart. I used to laugh at her at first, but soon learned to humor the harmless weakness, and there spelled ash over my shoulder, went down on hands and knees—being rather nearsighted—to search for four-leaved clovers, carefully avoided passing under a ladder, turned back if I met a crow, and all the rest of it. Well, I fell in love with her; but, much to my chagrin, she didn't fall in love with me. She liked me in a sisterly sort of way—that I could plainly see; but she never thought of me as a lover—they I could also see plainly see. She talked with me—Tim, the embryo farmer, generally accompanying me; listened to my readings from my favorite authors, let me help her feed the chickens; taught me how to make butter and pot-cheese, but not a step further had I got when the last day of August arrived, and my vacation came to an end.

"You will come to see us?" said Mrs. Dayton, when I was taking my leave.

"Yes, indeed, if you would like to have me," I replied.

"Come as often as you can; the oftener, the better we will be pleased."

But Philippa said never a word, though a friendly interest shone in her beautiful hazel eyes. However, remembering the old proverb, "Faint heart never won fair lady," I did not allow her non-invitation to keep me from fulfilling my promise to her mother, and I fulfilled it so well that I went to Saturwood every Saturday afternoon, and remained until Monday, for three months longer. Then, winter setting in in earnest, I was obliged to bid the farm-house good-by, without having received from Philippa the slightest encouragement to tell the story that was always trembling on my lips.

December and part of January passed away, and I had heard nothing from Mouse's auntie since, when, one day, looking up from my desk, I saw him standing beside me.

"I've got a note for you, sir," he said, "from Phil." My heart began to beat wildly. "It came in one she sent me, and she told me to put it into your own hands."

I could scarcely thank the little fellow, I was so surprised, and taking the note from him, I opened it quickly and read as follows:

"DEAR MR. LOVEJOY,—I send you a lock of my hair" (my heart fairly galloped), "and I would be ever so much obliged to you if you would take it to Signor Rialto, and ask him to turn it and tell me fortune from the ashes. I also inclose a card with date of my birth, etc. He said Robin Wells's in that way, and it's come true, and she is to marry the very man he described, on the 1st of March. You are to be asked to the wedding. She is the girl that went blackberrying with us once and you said looked like an Egerian. I wouldn't trouble you, but Roderick is too young to trust with such an errand, and you are the only gentleman friend I have in New York. And the reason I don't send directly to him by mail is that is all he as much more wonderful if he reads anything true from the lock of hair not knowing from whence or from whom it comes.

"Yours truly, PHILIPPA DAYTON."

"P.S.—Be sure to come to the wedding."

"What nonsense!" said I to myself (my heart having gone back to its usual rate), as soon as I had finished reading it, and for an instant I felt like throwing the whole thing out of the window. But only for an instant. Then I opened the inclosed envelope, took out the long shining auburn tress, looked at it with admiring eyes, came near kissing it, folded it up again, and put it carefully away in my vest pocket. And while putting it carefully away in my vest pocket an idea came to me like a flash, which, mystifying myself with the thought that "all's fair in love and war" I began to carry out as soon as Lon came mumbling in from his lunch. "Lon," said I, "do you think yourself capable of writing out a full and true description of the undersigned?"

"What the deuce do you mean?" was his rather irrelevant reply.

"Just what I say," said I. "Above Forbyn, can you, and will you, write out, nothing valuable, nor set down aught in malice, a full and true description of your unworthy friend Tom Lovejoy?"

"Certainly, if you are in earnest, and I begin to see you are. And it isn't to be at all flattered?"

"Not at all. Lean a hair to mercy's side, of course, but do the work so that your conscience can never reproach you for it."

"Well, here goes," and seizing pen and paper, Lon began.

"That won't do," said I, looking over his shoulder.

"What won't do?" asked he.

"Why, 'Tom Lovejoy.' No name must be mentioned. Begin thus: 'He is about five-and-twenty.'"

"All serene," said Lon, taking another sheet of paper, and alternately scribbling and looking at me for about ten minutes, at the end of which time he handed me the description.

"He is five-and-twenty; tall and somewhat slender; with dark blue eyes; black hair, in danger to curl; straight nose, rather large mouth, partly hidden by mustache; chin slightly projecting, make most left eyebrow; small hands, of which he takes the greatest care; bought smile, is fond of pastry, the country, and good things to eat, hasty in temper, but soon over it; hates to work, but too honorable to shirk, kind to animals and children, of retiring disposition, and altogether a very good fellow."

"How will that do?" asked Lon.

"It's a little too—"

"No, it isn't," he interrupted; "not a bit 'too.' And I shan't alter a word of it."

That settled it, for I couldn't alter it without betraying myself, so I had Lon inclose it in the envelope, an oval of which he, under my directions, drew some mysterious hieroglyphics, and sealing it with a large red seal, I despatched it to Philippa with a little note:

"DEAR MISS DAYTON,—I send you the fortune evoked from your auburn tress. I hope it may prove a satisfactory one. I will be at the wedding if possible. With love to your father and mother and Tim,

"I am yours, most faithfully,

"TOM LOVEJOY."

And, true to my word, I assisted at Robin Wells's wedding on the 1st of March. It took place early in the afternoon, and after it was over, Philippa and I walked home together along the banks of the yet scarcely awakened little brook. And as we drew near the farm-house, she suddenly turned to me and said—the wind blowing her fluffy ringlets all about her pretty face, and reddening her cheeks and chin:

"I must thank you for the trouble you took with that lock of hair. I dare say it seemed to you a very foolish thing to do, but he did tell no true about it. I made that I thought—I thought—"

And the passed, and looked shyly at me in a way very unusual to her

"And didn't he tell you true too?" I asked, with great calmness

"Noooo—because—that is, he described a person as my—my—who has for a long time been somebody else's."

"How do you know this?"

"Oh, Roderich said—I mean—" And in her confusion she actually burst out crying, and her tears told me the happiest story I had ever been told in my life.

I clasped her in my arms. "Roderich said what, my darling?" I demanded, as she struggled to free herself.

"That you were engaged to a lovely young girl," she sobbed, "who often came to your office, and that she went to England last summer, and so you came here because you couldn't bear to go to any nicer places without her."

"Philippa, that lovely young girl is my cousin, the youngest daughter of my uncle John, and she went to England on her wedding trip last summer. And there is no lonelier place in all the world than this for me, and if a certain dearest of girls, Philippa Dayton by name, will promise to be my wife, I shall spend all the holidays of my life here."

"Then it's all right," said Philippa, clasping her hands and smiling through her tears. "He described you EXACTLY."

And I never had the heart to undeceive her.

MARGARET ETTINGER.

SOME OLD SCHOOL-BOOKS.

I have been back to my home again,
To the place where I was born
I have heard the wind from the stormy main
Go rustling through the corn:
I have seen the purple hills once more:
I have stood on the rocky coast
Where the waves storm inland to the shore;
But the thing that touched me most

Was a little leather strap that hope
Some school-books, tattered and torn.
I sighed, I smiled, I could have wept,
When I came on them one morn:
For I thought of the merry little lad,
In the mornings sweet and cool,
If weather was good or weather bad,
Going a-hieding off to school.

My fingers undid the strap again,
And I thought how my hand has changed,
And half in boyish, and half in pain,
Backward my memory ranged.
There was the grammar I knew so well—
I didn't remember a rule.
And the old blue speller—I used to spell
Better than any in school.

And the wonderful geography
I've read on the green hill-side,
When I told myself I'd surely see
All lands in the world so wide,
From the Indian Ocean in the far, far West
To the spiritual Cathay
I have seen them all! But Home is best
When the evening shades fall gray.

And there was the old arithmetic,
All tattered and stained with tears.
I and Jessie and little Dick
Were together in by some years
Jamie has gone to the better land,
And I, see, new and aged,
A letter in Dick's hold, ready hand
From some great Western plain.

There wasn't a book, and scarce a page,
That hadn't some memory
Of days that seemed like a golden age,
Of friends I shall no more see
And so I picked up the books again
And hooked the strap once more,
And brought them over the tossing main:
Come, children, and look them o'er

And there they lay on a little stand,
Not far from the Holy Book
And his boys and girls with loving care
O'er grammar and speller look
He said, 'They speak to me, children dear,
Of a past without money,
And the book of Books is promise clear
Of a future full of joy."

"PSCHUTT."

A curious of newly mined and fashionable slang (says the Paris correspondent of London Truth) has come suddenly upon us. That appears to need a "chic," which fitted on much that is Parisian, is in danger of being swept away by the terrible "pschutt." This term is of German origin, and was, the rumor runs, put in circulation by the Princess Lise Troubetzkoy. She had it from Bismarck, who jocularly laid a wager that if she introduced it into le high-life de Paris it would at once be accepted as current lingual coin. He did this on example of the low by of society there. The Princess, on arriving from Berlin, told an infatuated dandy, leaning on old water, and engaged in squandering a large fortune, how she had read in the German papers that he was très pschutt. Next once what the meaning of the term. "Why, a mirror of fashion—nothing more nor less."

So the fine gentleman went round the petits soupers which are open at the end of winter, declaring that such a picture, such a beauty, such an equipage such a toilet, was awfully "pschutt." Fashionable moths and butterflies were only silent what is "pschutt." We associated "chic" with elsewhere and taste. "Pschutt" is a flower of before softened by dissipation. The word already has got to mean that there can be nothing pschuttish without plenty of money, and that nothing is making a guy of one's self at bout d'fort pschutt. To a very "pschutt" to have one's coat of arms embroidered or embroidered on the back of white Swedish gloves.

The dandy who is "pschutt" wears square-toed shoes, very much cut down at the instep, and thin black silk stockings. His street garb is short in the waist and long in the skirts, angles are rounded off the collar. His trousers are tight and short, with large pocket flaps, and his hands are ungloved, but très soignées and glittering with rings. It was fin produced in our time the advent of l'homme-femme. That prophecy is accomplished. It is "pschutt" to wear in the evening a white waistcoat buttoned with a jewel that scarcely with the hole of one's coat of arms. The word "pschutt" breaks out like a zymotic eruption on the Vanity Fair columns of the Boulevard gazettes. Tailors, jewellers, milliners, and fashionable people who live upon the vanity of the wealthy have got it on the tips of their tongues. The characteristics of this new species of the "Dude" are well portrayed by Mr. GRAY-PARSON on page 319.

OUNCES OF PREVENTION.

WELLS AND WELL-WATER.

WELLS are of two kinds—surface wells and Artesian wells—and there is an essential difference between them, as the accompanying diagram, Fig. 1, will show.

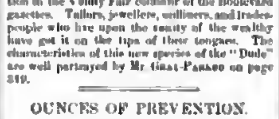

Fig. 1 (FROM HASKINS).

A surface well, however deep, is one which gathers the waters from the soil adjacent to it. An Artesian well is one which pierces through impervious strata into a water bearing rocks below it, and consequently yields a supply of water which has percolated for great distances underground, as from the mountain of distant ranges. The water of Artesian wells is generally abundant and exceedingly pure, at least as regards any surface pollution. Some of the best water in London is supplied by Artesian wells which are sunk through the impervious clay stratum, and gather the pure filtered waters of the chalk stratum below, and which here fallen in rain upon the Malvern chalk hills which surround the London basin.

The rain fall upon pervious strata sinks into the ground; that upon impervious strata passes off into streams and rivers. But when the rain fall, having percolated through a loose formation, as chalk, reaches a deeper layer which is impervious, as clay, then it accumulates in subterranean reservoirs, escaping at the lowest points as distant springs, but only accessible from above by the deep boring of the Artesian well. This is in general the source of the purest water that can be obtained for use.

Surface wells may yield as pure water as the Artesian, but the presumption is to the contrary, for they are exposed to many sources of contamination, which vary with their situation. In the city, surface wells are almost always rendered foul by the percolation of impure matters from the neighboring ground, and even in the country surface wells are fouled in many ways. The most frequent and fatal cause of pollution is the nearness of the well to the cess-pool, especially when the latter is situated upon the higher ground.

But even upon level ground the same contamination may take place. The under-ground currents of water in not the level; they fall, or even rise, according to the strata, more or less permeable, between or through which they flow, and which confine them above and below. A well which is ordinarily pure may be polluted by a rise in the level of the under ground water, as shown in Fig. 2. Here the well, as long as it is supplied from the ordinary water line, remains pure. But rainy weather, which raises the under ground current on the flood-water line, causes it also to the level of the cess-pool, and conveys the infectious matter directly to the well

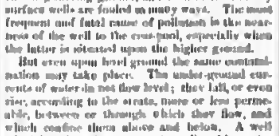

Fig. 2 (FROM GALTON).

Shallow wells are very liable, again, to contamination from impure substances, animal or vegetable, in the adjacent soil, and this danger is increased by the common practice of percolating the water that is spilled at the curb to find its way directly back into the well. The ground should be sloped away from the curb, and paved or puddled so as to drain away any overflowing water to a safe distance. In surface wells got really the drainage of the neighboring soil should be cut off from the well by casing in with cement, as shown in Fig. 3.

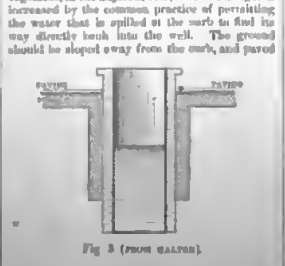

Fig. 3 (FROM GALTON).

"In deep surface wells," says Captain Galton, "differences have been observed in the purity of well water, as the water was taken from the surface by dipping, or pumped from the bottom of the well. In one case, where the depth of water was over fifty feet, the surface water was found to be more contaminated with organic impurities than that from the bottom, as if a layer of lighter water from the surface drainage floated on the spring water below. In another case the solids per gallon amounted to 66.25 grains in the bottom water and to 3 grains only in the surface water." During the Crimean war the Turks, according to the same author, got filtered surface water by this device: "To select a site near their camp where the surface was clean, and dig a hole and place in it a barrel, in the bottom of which holes had been bored, so that water from the deepest part of the hole should alone come into the barrel. If they wanted filtration, they got a smaller barrel, and bored holes in the sides, they then placed the smaller barrel in the larger one, running sand in below and all round, and thus forming an upward filter of sand through which the water passed." No people understood better than the Romans the importance of having sufficient water at hand, whether in city or country, at home or on a military expedition. The supply of ancient Rome was about three hundred gallons per head per day—the most abundant supply on record. The modern Romans have kept up but a part of this supply, yet they are more generously provided with water than any other modern city I know of. Whenever, in old times, a Roman camp was found, there you were sure to find abundant water also. Dr. Corfield notes an example of this in England. "A friend of mine," he says, "took me up to see a Roman camp at the top of a mistletoe hill. It puzzled us to think how the Romans ever got water at the top of that parous hill. We were, however, strolling about, when suddenly I saw half a dozen rushes, and that was quite enough to show that there was water. A pocket of clay was there which prevented the water from going down farther, and no doubt there was a well at that spot to supply the camp."

TITUS MUNSON COAN.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

ACCORDING to accounts, the ragged little out which Sarah Bernhardt wore when her talent was first discovered has a market value of £1,000 in excess of that of the guitar which Rachel used when she sang for bread in the streets of Paris. Lord Ward offered Madame Bernhardt £25,000 francs for the suit, and the Marquis of Hereford offered Rachel two diamonds worth 20,000 francs for the guitar. Madame Bernhardt said she didn't want to sell the dress, and Rachel said, "Not for all the jewels in the crown of Queen Victoria."

A choice patch of desert may become a very valuable piece of land to one if the industry of ostrich raising continues to grow. It is said that loose pebbly sand is necessary to the health of the birds. About a hundred and twenty ostriches are on a farm near Cairo, Egypt, the greater part of which is desert, and are thriving far better than if they were surrounded by the disadvantages of an oasis.

A statistician estimates that at the beginning of the Christian era the mined gold of the world was worth four hundred and twenty-seven million dollars, that it had diminished to the value of fifty seven million at the time America was discovered, and that the value of the gold now in use is six thousand million dollars.

Six Chinese manufacturers of shoes in San Francisco have gone into bankruptcy of late, and three another several others in the same business are known. The prejudice against the hostile is from Cathay is not lessened however, by any evidences that his Americanization is progressing.

A mysterious disease has attacked the fir trees in Maine, and threatens to greatly impair the producing capacity of the spruce gum orchards. It is hoped that the young Indian' tenitaries will survive the blow.

Ah Quack, of San Francisco, is not a medical practitioner, but a dealer in cigars.

The light-house lamps which consume the most oil require each nearly three gallons a night, and the light is equal to that of four hundred candles.

It is now stated that the Rocky motor will be started on the Fourth of July. The Fourth is becoming a much-abused day.

The trestle-work railway bridge in course of construction across Lake Pontchartrain will be twenty-one miles in length. It is claimed that it will be the largest bridge of its kind in the United States. The trestle-work on which the elevated trains in this city run would be a good deal longer than the Louisiana structure if the several divisions were in a continuous line.

Relics of George Washington, bought several years ago by the government, and stored in a dark room in the Patent-office, have been recently placed on exhibition in the Smithsonian institution. They comprise the robe in which Washington was christened, and the easy-chair in which he sat a few minutes before his death.

At a banquet given to him in London to Sir Norris Green, president of the Western Union Telegraph Company, Mr. Jay Gould, the English "telegraph king," told about the close of his recent visit to America. He said that he was travelling one stopped by waving a small white flag, and a telegraphic message was handed to him. It contained the news of the British victory at Tel-el-Kebir. He replied immediately, congratulating Sir Garnet Wolseley, and he was afterward told by the British commandant that he received the answer before sunset of the same day.

An English burglar recently told how he came into possession of the key of a safe which contained a fortune. "Nothing easier," he said. "We knew who carried the key and what it was like; so one and my pals we got into the same carriage with your manager when he's going home by rail. One of us has a bag which he can't open. Has any man got a key? Your manager produces a bunch, and my pal his has was in his palm, and takes a likeness of the key of the safe while seeming to open his bag."

In a block of ice artificially frozen recently in Mobile were a fish weighing twenty pounds, a bottle of dry champagne, and an assortment of choice flowers. The block was to be shipped to a gentleman in this city, who was to "display this specimen of Southern fish and flowers at a magnificent dinner to be given by a social club in New York."

There is a story to the effect that a company of men, all of whom are six feet tall or taller, have founded a town in Montana, called Gantville. Less will be sold to no one under six feet in height. The wives must be at least five feet and eight inches in stature. It is suspected that the aim of the founders is to ultimately monopolize the industry of supplying museums and circus side-shows with giants.

A young man from Ohio recently applied to a Congressman from that State for an appointment in the Railway Mail Service, and the Congressman went to an official of the Post-office Department, who told him that the prospect was not very good, since vacancies do not occur very often, and there were nearly six thousand applications on file from Ohio alone for places in the mail service.

"And what do those positions pay, that they should be in such demand?" the Congressman asked.

"Eight hundred dollars a year to begin with," was the reply.

A Boston paper seems to find pleasure in the statement that it "was very characteristic of the literary coterie in New York that no one could be found at the Nineteenth Century Club, convened to hear Dr Holmes's paper upon 'Emerson as a Poet,' who could confess to having read Emerson enough to talk about him." It is characteristic of persons of literary tastes in New York that they do not volunteer their opinions at length with so slight encouragement as that which suffices to put on tap the literary wisdom of certain Boston coteries.

The people of Vera Cruz have been visited by an epidemic of catarrh, which is attributed by the ignorant to the buildings of railroads heretofore by Yankees. Railroads are educators in a certain sense, and educated persons are subject to hay fever. It is probably hay fever and not catarrh that rids the Mexicans.

A romance of the wilds of Florida is told by a Boston paper. Two years ago, the story has it, a newspaper correspondent attempted to explore the jungle in which is a pit called "De Debil's Tar Kiln," from which sulphurous vapors rose. Everybody in the neighborhood warned him as good as lost, except a pretty Tallahassee girl. When he returned, in a very bad plight, and in danger of losing his life because of his having guided the poisonous gases, the negroes were all afraid of him, for they believed that no one could come back from the place without the permission of "de ole bad man." The Tallahassee girl cared for him till he was able to start for his home in the North, and a few weeks ago he went back to Florida on the errand which properly rounds out the romance.

A Missouri farmer whose house was insured against damage by fire or lightning has sued the insurance company to recover the amount of the policy, his dwelling having been destroyed by a recent cyclone. It is held in his behalf that the destructive force in the cyclone was produced by electricity in the atmosphere. Professor Tice has insisted that electricity is the prime cause of tornadoes, and that the wind is one of the results of that cause. He claimed that some clouds are so heavily charged with electricity that houses are lifted from the ground toward them. The other side is inclined to make merry over the farmer's claim and the theories of his expert witnesses.

A Washington correspondent of the Boston Advertiser endeavors to forecast the beneficial results of the beginning of work by the Civil Service Commission. He writes that there will be the most delicate task that any three men in Washington will have to do. No sooner will they begin operations, he says, than an organized raid will be made upon them. The [illegible] between on both sides," he further [illegible] thoroughly imbued with the idea [illegible] the inherent right of parents [illegible] that [illegible] are not clear to [illegible] for the [illegible]

HENRY M. STANLEY

SAVORGNAN DE BRAZZA.

FIRST CATARACT, [illegible]

FALL OF THE EDWIN ARNOLD RIVER INTO THE CONGO

'LA SAGITTAIRE,' FRENCH GUN-BOAT, WITH DE BRAZZA'S EXPEDITION.

THE WAR ON THE CONGO.—[See Page 315.]

THE SHEPHERD—WIND AND RAIN ON THE SUSSEX DOWNS, ENGLAND.—[See Page 314.]

THE SUSSEX SHEPHERD.

On page 318 we present another of Mr Rainart's admirable sketches in Sussex, England, the picture of a shepherd leading his flock homeward over the Downs through a storm of wind and rain. "The lot of the shepherd," says the writer of the article on "English Farmers," in Harper's Magazine for last April, "is more severe than that of other laborers, inasmuch as he is out every day in the year, Sundays included. When the winds blow on the Downs, the shepherd makes a screen of his coat by hanging it on furze bushes or on the sheep wattles. This is his shelter for the day when the southwest rain-storms come up from the Channel. It is not very lonesome on the Downs, because the shepherds can see each other (unless a fog comes up), and often can talk to each other. On a nice day in winter it is pretty lively on the Downs. That being the hunting season, there are hundreds of people about there then, and 'lots of lookin' on horseback.'"

"DISARMED!"*

By MISS BETHAM-EDWARDS,

Author of "Kitty," "Exchange no Robbery," "Holidays in Eastern France," "Dr. Jacob," "The Sisterhood," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XIII.

But can the sun ever be said to shine on a common day? Just as the heavens are thronged with dark stars, globe upon globe, that wander unperceived amid their shining compeers, so human events are in part hidden from observation. We see and take account of what is conspicuous and self-evident, little do we dream of all that is going on around us, under our very eyes even, perhaps far more momentous to ourselves personally, but unrecognized and unrecorded for the time being as if they were not.

No sooner were the shutters opened and the blinds raised in Miss Hermitage's house than all was bustle and commotion. A thousand things had to be done, a dozen plans matured. May to be spent in Paris, June in London, the hot months on the banks of the Thames or in the Highlands, then back again by November to the kindly south coast.

"But mind, Valerian, not to the same house," Miss Hermitage said. "A house, like a husband, should always be taken on trial. It is wonderful how perfect houses and people seem when they do not belong to us, when we can get rid of them at a moment's notice. The very notion of not being able to get rid of a thing makes it odious. So no houses except on short leases."

Arthura found it easy to be light-hearted amid the distractions of a general packing up. But what if she could have heard a certain conversation going on just then between her lover and Mr Constantine? The old man had called to take leave of his cousin, and catching Valerian by the button, carried him off to his lodgings.

"Give me five minutes, or a quarter of an hour at most, my dear Valerian," he said, comfortably settling down for a leisurely talk. "You are rich in fame, a millionaire, indeed, but I am a pauper, my few wretched coins, counted not every day, but daily."

"An hour if you please, sir," Valerian said, to his airiest, pleasantest manner. Blest as he was all day, he always found time to be pleasant.

"You are a very agreeable person; you ought to succeed, as the phrase goes," began Mr Constantine, perusing the other's physiognomy with uncommon attention.

"But now tell me, my good Valerian—I am interested in you, as I am bound to be, of course—tell me your own notion of success. What do you mean to do with yourself? What have you thought of as a career? For of course you must not spend the best part of your life in simply making yourself agreeable."

Valerian laughed his little hard, worldly laugh. "I ought to plume myself by being able to do that," he said, sarcastically. "It is at least a livelihood."

"You have caught the family trick of jesting with serious things, I see. But listen to me. If, as I take it, you have good parts, and if, as I am willing to believe, you have feelings to match, then, my dear Valerian, you need not rest satisfied with being a finished nobody."

Valerian laughed once more.

"It is not every nobody who can be finished, so I pay you a compliment after all. But now just think how much better you might do. As far as possibilities go, you are the luckiest person in the world."

"Possibilities can hardly be regarded as a career rather," Valerian made light and jesting answer.

"Ah! you are far from divining my purport. What, then, is not within your reach if Stephana consents to marry you? All things are possible where a generous woman is concerned."

Valerian sat still, flushed, dazed, unable to open his lips.

"We are alone. I am an old man, and her kinsman as well as yours. I may speak openly to you," continued Mr Constantine. "And I tell you I dare aver that Stephana would marry you, out of pure generosity, maybe, but of a kind not to be spurned."

Valerian remained dumb.

"The fact is, my dear Valerian, Stephana is noble to a degree that may be called Quixotic. The very reason that might prevent another woman from giving you her hand would induce Stephana to proffer hers. You must understand me."

Still Valerian's pale lips found no words.

"Stephana would of her own accord and in her own person atone to you for the wrong done you by one also of our kith and kin. But before going any further let me remind you of an important point. This sweet, lovely Stephana has a proprietary which may have escaped your cognizance. She is always on the lookout for people's 'souls.' If you have not a soul, I fear she will have nothing to say to you."

"What is a soul?" asked Valerian, half in jest, half serious.

"You may well ask what," said the old man. "But Stephana knows. Stephana is not to be deceived. Now I am quite sure she is prepared to marry you. But I am equally sure of another thing: you must satisfy her exactions on moral and spiritual points. I am in earnest, Valerian. This noble creature has nothing in common with certain others of our name, but name. The world for her is no mere fair, no carnival-show got up for oriental gratification, but a serious place—a place in which our business is to do, and not bask vacantly on. As the steward of Stephana's fortunes, your work would lie in wholly new lines."

"Pardon me, I ask with all respect," Valerian said, still unmanned, and even agitated, "but will you tell me if Stephana has authorized you to speak to me on this subject?"

"She has," replied Mr Constantine. "One word more, however, about this soul business of the soul. It is the most weighty, after all, for everything hangs on it. Stephana's fortune and future are wedded to the public good. Would you be ready to aid and uphold her? to sympathize with her philanthropic schemes, and not to rail at them? You must know, my good Valerian, that doing good, as the phrase goes, is a serious matter nowadays. The Holy Elizabeths and Vincent de Pauls are out of date, not half-rich as the easiest they were, absolute as the speech they used. What alone can help the world now is a magnanimous public spirit, a new and more righteous law, and baskets of broken bread for the poor and spiritual for the old."

He looked inquiringly at his companion, and added, laughing gaily: "You know something of my career—no irreproachable one in the matter of domestic relations, an exemplary one in matters of finance. But mark me, Valerian, from first to last I have steadfastly kept my post in the vanguard of progressive opinion, and Liberalism, like charity, covereth a multitude of sins. I was a specialist at your age, a wild fellow too, but I have helped to amend more than one bad law, to frame more than one just one. The world owes more to me than sinner, than to many a congregation of saints."

"That may well be, sir," Valerian said, laughing.

"Heathen, my dear Valerian. Let not the belief in what I call exquisite halfpenny morality be your stumbling block. Mind, I am not jeering at the bread-and butter virtues. A man is bound to possess them just as he is bound to have his linen washed and his beard trimmed, he is a reputable without. But never think that you will save your soul (another phrase for fulfilling your duty) by being what is called an indulgent husband, a kind father, and so forth. Fellow! The epitaphs make me sick, for, I ask you now, be it any credit to a man to be kind to his own wife, good to his own children? Were he otherwise he must stand lower than the brutes; but even what eulogies even phrase on the tomb of him who has befriended the abandoned wife and the orphan, who has fathered the orphan, adopted the friendless?"

"The fact is," Valerian made answer, "so little virtue has hitherto shone in the world that we have had to make the most of it."

"Apelles said. Now note for a moment the abjectness of human ideals, when we gleefully whip we are pleased to call maternal devotion. Why, the she-animals will give up their lives for their young. Is a woman to be praised for what is no virtue among the brutes? And this same beautiful instinctual devotion, forsooth! Do you suppose there was none of it among the fair haired Southerners who, with babes at their swan breasts, could see black sucklings dashed born away from their mothers? Were the Roman matrons devoid of maternal devotion, think you, while they could amuse themselves with torturing their slaves? The fact is, we are still in an age of rudimentary virtue. The higher is yet to be acquired, and then on epitaph will have some meaning."

Again his eyes wandered to Valerian.

"I really do not know if I am merely hearkened to out of pure amiability and politeness, or if you are of the way of thinking."

"To tell you the plain truth," Valerian answered, promptly, "I have been so much occupied in assuring Christina that I have had no time to think of other things."

"Poor Christina! Who will assure her in another world, I wonder? But the inclination, my dear fellow—what about the inclination?"

"I will not play the hypocrite, sir. I have administered the funds intrusted to me by my cousin for charitable purposes to the best of my abilities, and there the matter has ended. It is little of heart or conscience that I have put into the business."

"That is candidly spoken. But now, supposing Stephana marries you, are you prepared to put heart and conscience, not into giving away moneys—charity, so called—but into the larger, wider interests of life? Between ourselves, Stephana has set her mind on seeing you in Parliament."

Valerian started and again flushed.

"You may well be surprised. But is is not impossible. If I live it is not impossible, that is to say. You know that I was many years in Parliament myself. Had I had a son, a nephew, a grandson, a great-nephew, handy last year on the occasion of the election, the thing would have been accomplished. Such an opportunity may occur again."

"You are very kind," Valerian said, utterly discomfited and embarrassed.

"There you are, swearing by the twopenny-halfpenny virtues, the bread-and-butter moralities, again. Do not think to morality of Stephana and myself as to suppose that we should put a weighty responsibility upon your shoulders out of mere kindness, a wish to be agreeable. No, Valerian, I speak once for all plainly to you. Take in my meaning. We want an exponent, a mouthpiece. We want no heir of one convictions. For if I can not leave you an obolus (I shall have just one left to pay the dark ferryman's fare), I can at least bequeath you something not to be bought with money. You would come before the world as the inheritor of my political and social opinions."

"I am most deeply beholden to you—to Stephana no less," began Valerian, faltering ly. "But—"

"But you are taken by surprise. You want to be left to yourself awhile. We quite understand that," replied Mr Constantine, kindly. "Nor can Stephana be pressed either. She begged me to add that. You must say nothing to her till she herself opens the subject."

Valerian breathed more freely.

"Should I write to her?" he asked.

"By no means. I was only to clear the way, as it were, for future negotiations," said Mr Constantine. "Say nothing, do nothing, till she first gives a sign."

"And when will that be, sir?" asked Valerian, still pale and anxious.

"Perhaps to-morrow, perhaps a year hence. Who can answer for a woman?" laughed Mr Constantine.

"We are not likely to meet just yet," Valerian said, with sudden alacrity. "I am to carry off our cousin to Paris to-morrow."

"To Paris! And what on earth has Christina to do in Paris? Buy new ball dresses and new bonnets to carry with her to Persephone's king dom? Has she thought of the small amount of luggage permitted us on that journey? But never mind. Give her my love, Valerian—my last love. She has just sent me a dozen of Madeira."

"And what are you going to do, sir?"

"What should an old bear-man do but sit in the sun, and get a neighbor to listen to his ballylings? Send her, my dear fellow. Bring Christina and her new bonnets safe back from Paris."

What could Valerian do but feel ready to curse alike his good and evil fortune? The real, indeed, seemed more bearable than the good put them. To endure poverty, insignificance, fear, ignominy, by Arthura's side would be easy, but to give up Arthura's love for the cold splendor of so phana's friendship was impossible. He would write to her at once, thank her for his magnanimity, and reveal the truth.

There was nothing else, indeed, to do. Stephana should receive a letter explaining everything that very day. Having come to a conclusion without immediately acting upon it, Valerian's mind, as often happens, now went through a series of reflections that would indeed him on one of a directly opposite nature.

To write to Stephana was the only straightforward, manly, inevitable course. So said Valerian at the outset, yet, because he did not forthwith sit down to do it, one sophister after another made itself heard on the other side. He must write warily. Stephana must not know of the trap into which Christina had fallen. Such a discovery would prove fatal to Arthura's prospects as well as his own. Some other postponement also must be put forward. But what plea? A host of concealed romance, a cogent hide-bound of the reality? No; suspicion would naturally fall on Arthura, and by little and little the whole truth would come out. To wait, to temporize, to trust to happy chance, seemed at first the easiest and soon the only expedient, even practicable, course.

And, after all, there was no question of love on Stephana's side. That he knew right well. Stephana's nature was high-minded, large hearted generosity—nothing more. What she might hardly be instructed with his story she would very likely feel a sense of relief, and perform herself quite ready to do all for Arthura's lover that she had proposed to do for a husband. And finally, reasoned Valerian nothing was to be gained and all hazarded by precipitation. He had fallen into the common mistake of measuring others by his own standard, failing to take into account that he had here to do, not with the world, but with a noble woman. How should he know that truth was to Stephana as the very air she breathed, the mere suspicion of falsehood or make-believe being poison to her?

Gradually, therefore, he decided to put away present perplexities with the comfortable thought of compromise. He should ask Stephana over to his cause by tact and persuasion, and thus obtain at last all the advantages she had pre-ferred, without asserting Arthura. He should become Arthura's husband and Stephana's heir.

Needful it seem me-been open him to unbosom himself to Arthura. Why disturb her mind and make her unhappy by the thought that she was standing between him and his fortunes? Time enough to tell the flatt ring tale when she should be his wife, and could listen plaintully and proudly. And there was another re-assuring thought: Stephana might very likely change her mind altogether. Valerian finally ended his cogitation by willing one thing and wishing another. Arthura must, should be his wife. None the less Stephana should give him a brilliant position in the world.

CHAPTER XV.

Long time indeed had the lovers for confidential talk either in Paris or London. Just as the choicest cates are to be had for money, so what is called agreeable society becomes a matter of the purse. We are perhaps the very best company in the world, but the wise and the witty, our conquerors, are bribed by the rich invitor, and we sit down to our Barmecide's feast alone. Alexander visited the son of Sisope in his tub, it is true, but then the fame of Diogenes was greater than that of Alexander. Few of us now would clean off the cynic's portion of beans once in our lives if we were sure to be talked of ever after. For the most part the Diogeneses are forgotten, and well for those who have not that the world never find is out! Were the man of most liberal parts and spirit appreciated to the mob, he would be more pestered than a Prime Minister.

Miss Hermitage's comfortable hotel on the Champs Elysées was filled from morning till night with well-dressed, gay, and pleasant visitants. Everybody was seeing everything, and of course had something to say. It were hard indeed had they not, considering that amusement was the business of life. For what Mrs Hermitage was doing in deliberately and with such desperate resolve the rest were doing in a matter of course. Why moralize? Is not half the world occupied in amusing the other half? Is it not in the natural order of things that we should lazily enjoy whilst others toil and moil? If a cought not to be so, then why is it so? Let the moralist answer.

"I do think Paris quite perfection," Mrs Hermitage said. "No dingy little streets, no rags and poverty in every corner. All spick and span, brand new, and handsome. And what a comfort that the one-beggar-looking people keep out of sight!"

Heeem was she not following the example of her neighbors also? Let the stark face of misery hide itself, let want not make moan in our hearing, do we not all say? What have we to do with pain and sorrow not our own? Away with them! Let us turn the corner and look in another direction. Yet methinks we can not always shut out these unsightly phantoms that cross us in the common paths. Who has not seen, without being able to forget, some tear-stained, anguish-stricken face in the crowd, some sad spectre, hardly man or woman any longer for the wastings of some hunger or disease? Woe-less not encountered in some time or other a pair of human eyes from which looked out an awful, an untraitable despair? We pride ellsons and pass by, but the look haunts us for days, and oft not vanish altogether. Did some regret of pay meet these unhappy ones are it was too late, or did the gulf of misery swallow them up? We shall never know.

"Mind, Valerian," Miss Hermitage would often say to her steward, "no niggardliness to the poor. There are more sham beggars than true ones, I have no doubt. That is not your concern. In relieving all I relieve my conscience."

This easy-going philanthropy, as she called it, settled unconsciously self-questionings, but whilst Valerian was hidden to lavish more in the suffering and the needy, he was also cunning to keep the out of her sight.

"It is all very well for you people to sympathize with one another," she said. "They are nothing else but good excuse to give. Why should I allow my feelings to be harrowed of when I can give a guinea instead? It is much more to the purpose than floods of tears, I am sure."

What, therefore, with bringing light-hearted, prosperous guests to Miss Hermitage's threshold and keeping the dismal away, Valerian and Arthura had not a fraction of time left for lamentation. Even our most trust-worthy friends, those who are as the apple of our eye, will sometimes fall ill, grow hot-spirited, marry, or die—all social sins of the first magnitude in Miss Hermitage's eyes. People must be ailing at times, certainly; must have troubles, must part off, must make an end. But they were bound to perform these duties amusingly, or at least agreeably, and with due regard to the feelings of others.

"Poor dear Constantia," she said, regretfully, on the eve of quitting Paris. "I am sorry, after all, that we did not bring him. He would have greatly enjoyed himself. But as no one can tell what may happen, and as the best intentions in the world be might have died in the house. No. We must all think of ourselves in this world. Life is too short to think of other people."

If the many whirl of Paris and London were acceptable, on less to the cool retreat on the banks of the Thames whither Miss Hermitage resorted for rustic pleasures.

"A pleasing land of drowsy head" it was, from which Valerian was bound to keep away to-business. Miss Hermitage had a passion for animals, but it lasted the same with them as with human beings. The plan, perairie dog must not be ostracized. The cat less given to purring than it ought had on place on her window-sill. Even the cocks and hens must be knowing, and the pig must have equal. She had rather a fancy for plain homely farm-yard creatures, there reminded her of her childhood. But good parts she would have at any price in both man and beast; and as wit and spirit may be hired, if not bought, what could Valerian do but go to the proper market? Nevertheless, he must be accredited with the investments of Schehermazie or Haroun-al-Raschid's court jester. He pondered, indeed, was much like them, and it is wonderful to reflect how most people's wits would be sharpened under the same circumstances. Dunch by the award or belaboring with a bag of stones unless you begin to be entertaining the very minute!

Is there a dolt who would not straightway sparkle like rare Ben Jonson himself under the threat? And perhaps some of us would run the risk of the penalty for the sake of being thus translated. To wake up and find one's self fortunes were a faint emotion compared with that of waking up and finding one's self a sage after having been a dunderhead for years.

* Begun in Harper's Weekly No. 1373.

It is easy to be light-hearted in summer time; even an unquiet conscience may be lulled to sleep by rose-laden breezes and the soft stirring of green leaves above our bare heads, and Arthura caught the spirit of her patroness's Castle of Indolence. Valerian managed things so beautifully that there was no need to quarrel with him any more. Miss Hermitage had entertainment enough without. And as long as they were not forced to quarrel, Arthura could do without love-making. Valerian dared not be more than courteous, he even feigned little flirtations with one or two of the pretty girls who looked as if they had walked out of Watteau's picture so to Miss Hermitage's lawn. But once perhaps in a week the lovers would find time for a word.

"I have got a fortnight's holiday for you; you are to go home next week," said Valerian one day when the pair were absolutely alone, Miss Hermitage and Colette dreaming, as was their wont after lunch, the servants scanning them selves with hay-making in sight of the house, hardly a creature within.

Arthura's eyes brimmed over with tears of joy. A whole fortnight, and so soon! It seemed too good to be true.

"If you take your step-mother and the children to Margate, may I run down to see you?" asked the ruinous lover.

Beauty is doubly beautiful in summer-time, when dress is worn for grace, and not for a defiance against the cold.

Arthura was no she, artless loveliness, looking its best in innocent white muslin and blue saint ribbon. She must be sumptuous even in summer-time, and her fine eyes and rich complexion were never seen to better advantage than now. The color and texture of her dress, wine-red, soft, with creamy ground, had metamorphosed her into a gorgeous flower. If the girl's eyes became moist with joy, Valerian's beamed with lover-like pride and admiration.

"You beautiful thing!" he said, standing back to gaze on the picture. "You animated Giuliola! Where do you get these astounding dresses from? Yesterday your gown was the color of a penny, to-day silky white dashed with purple!"

"It pleases Mon Hermitage to see me fine as a peacock," Arthura answered, carelessly. "And I have a passion for gorgeous colors myself. They put me in spirits, like military music."

"Well, you shall never be out of spirits," laughed Valerian. "There are plenty of beautiful gowns now to be had for money. Although," he added, quite intoxicated by the dazzling apparition before him, "you would look pure as well in a brown holland pinafore over bombazine, which is what you will have to wear when we are married."

"Dear Valerian," she said, her sportive mood vanished, all the pure, fond, girlish devotion of her heart for once on her lips and in her eyes, "do you love me? Will you love me always?"

The woman's question answered in the man's way. "Always? As if it could be otherwise than always!" and he raised a fold of the superb gown to his lips and kissed it passionately. Arthura, holding him off at arms' length by the hands, looked into his eyes as if to read his very soul.

"Are you ever constant?" she asked, half in sport, half in earnest.

"Wait and see, Santa Theresina," was the confident answer.

It was a rare moment for both. They seemed once more in France, free to love, free to dream blissful dreams, to be happy. There was such a rapturousness in the air, rose-scented air stirring common velvety petals upon the lovers as they stood by the open window, such a burden of love in the songs of the little hay birds, such deep unspoken contentment in the hum of the bees and murmur of insects.

And the voiceless flower world? Was there no joy, no sympathy there as one glowing rose-leaf after another nestled to Arthura's bosom, like little Loves seeking a home? It seemed as if it might be so to the lovers, neither were now more foolish in their bliss than any other pair.

Anyhow an hour of love with all its fair promises was vouchsafed to this sweet trusting Arthura. Had ever any woman more?

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THE WAR ON THE CONGO.

Two of a trade, saith the proverb, can never agree. When the two are explorers, and explorers of the same region, discord is inevitable. The mere social and literary out of exploring a country is that you may thereafter tell my stories about it which never to you so interesting and plausible without being challenged. "He that is first in his own cause seemeth just, but his neighbor cometh and searcheth him." And so when Mr STANLEY and M. DE BRAZZA gave dinners last year for the purpose of disparaging each other's exploits in exploration, it did not seem that there was much more to stake than their professional jealousies and vanities.

M. DE BRAZZA, according to the account of Mr STANLEY, which seems to have been borne out by the facts, is a lively commercial traveller, of Portuguese or some other variety of "Dago" extraction, who devoted himself to discovering—under the auspices of a Belgian company, which in turn was under some sort of half-avowed French protectorate—countries which Mr. STANLEY had already thoroughly discovered, and through which Mr STANLEY's backers were constructing practicable roads and waterways. More than that, M DE BRAZZA returned, bringing what he declared to be commercial concessions of an exclusive kind from potentates of all shades from amber to umber, who had already given the like concessions to Mr. STANLEY, and who, still according to Mr. STANLEY, would have refused to receive M DE BRAZZA at all, even if they had refrained from eating him, but for the admiration and respect for the white man in general wrought in their dusky bosoms by the talk and conversation of the American explorer.

There were here, evidently enough, all the materials of a personal quarrel which would have melodied even Sir Lucius O'Trigger, and it can not be said that the opportunities afforded Mr STANLEY and M DE BRAZZA for reciprocal defamation were not eagerly embraced when they returned from the scene of their labors to the scene of their triumphs. But it is not seen that there is something much more serious in the aspect of affairs on the Congo than a personal quarrel of explorers. Since the beginning explorations have been prosecuted and colonies established with one view—that of the extension of trade. The merchant, indeed, is often himself the explorer. The Arab traders were the pioneers of African exploration. And when the explorer is an adventurer or a missionary, the trader follows closely in his wake. The struggle for the west coast of Africa is simply a struggle for the West African market. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the busiest time in colonization which the world has ever seen, following as it did the addition of a new world to the world then extant, the motives of acquisition were strictly commercial. And the object of the fateful voyage of COLUMBUS himself was what would now be called the cheapening of freights in the Indian trade. The race then ensued between England, Holland, France, and Spain no doubt did more to diffuse civilization than any other series of events that ever happened. But there is now very marked difference between the extension of trade in the seventeenth century and the extension of trade in the nineteenth. It was to bring "polonies" to England and spices to Holland and gold and silver to Spain that the old voyages were undertaken. These things were "bought," when the natives were not despoiled of them, for mere gewgaws and trinkets which did not represent a hundredth part of the labor the products of which were exchanged for them. In our time the main impulse to commercial rivalry is the necessity, growing yearly more imperative, of finding new markets for European products which the improvement of the means and processes of manufacture keeps always at the perilous edge of "overproduction." This necessity is the key to the foreign policy of all European nations, and especially of Great Britain. Of course the "waives" of Africa or of any other continent can only pay with what they have, but it remains true that while the object of extending commerce was to bid against and obtain superfluities, it is now for trade that is thrifty necessary, and this fact makes outward rivalry, even if it is more peaceful, keener than it used to be, and more in the nature of a "struggle" for life.

The West African trade is therefore an object of great and growing importance. It will be seen by one of the sketch maps that the actual communications of Europe with the west coast are as read on by three lines of steamers, two English and one Portuguese. The direct fleetsh trade with the Portuguese possessions amounted in 1881 to £229,157 exports and £136,937 imports, the former chiefly coal, cotton goods, and arms and ammunition, the latter chiefly caoutchouc, coffee, and ivory. The British steamers, however, of which there are about thirty engaged in the West African trade, derive much of their profits from doing a coasting business along the African continent, touching as they do at thirty or forty places. There are really no European possessions near the mouth of the Congo except those of Portugal, and the trade of other nations is hampered by very oppressive tariff restrictions. Portugal, however, is scarcely enterprising or powerful enough to assert against England her claims to the trade of the interior, which is in the way to be opened along the route made practicable by STANLEY.

On what the French "claims" are founded, except on the weakness of Portugal, it is difficult to make out; but strength has never, since the famous case of Wolf v. Lamb, lacked "claims" upon desirable objects possessed by weakness. DE BRAZZA's rediscoveries of STANLEY'S discoveries can scarcely be pleaded, nor even the "concessions" which DE BRAZZA pretends to have from native chiefs who had already given to STANLEY whatever they had to "concede." That is to say, these things can scarcely be pleaded against England. Against Portugal, and still more against the native kings themselves, any pretext will do that is hatched by form enough. In this latter essential, however, M DE BRAZZA, who is for all practical purposes the French government, appears to be weak also. Porto Negro, where M. DE BRAZZA landed in April, is still clear of the Portuguese possessions, and therefore in immediate danger of a quarrel between his expedition and the Portuguese authorities. But M DE BRAZZA has "annexed," in the name of France, African territory having a coast-line of three hundred miles, and to make good his claim to it he has ten companies of French troops, one from Algeria and one from Senegal, and both therefore acclimatized. Meanwhile Mr. STANLEY has been for three or four months on the Congo, superintending his works, and without doubt "organizing African public opinion" against DE BRAZZA's expedition. The organization of African opinion seems to be the issue of arms and ammunition. The London press, while disclaiming for England any intention of taking part in a war, hints that British sympathy with the oppressed—that notable quality so touchingly exemplified in Ireland, Afghanistan, Zululand, and the Transvaal—will not permit the oppressed to lose any chances for lack of "Winchester rifles." The St James's Gazette throws out this intimation in one column, while in the next it gives an interesting account of "British Trade with West Africa." Altogether, what with STANLEY, Winchester rifles, British sympathy with the oppressed, and "British trade with West Africa," it does seem that in undertaking to subdue a territory of three hundred miles frontage, by an unknown depth, to the obedience of the French republic, with a force of three hundred men, M DE BRAZZA has undertaken one of the maddest projects ever conceived.

ENGLISH GOSSIP

[From Our Own Correspondent.]

A Case of Stammering.—Something extraordinary.—An Objection to Signing Things.—A New Use for Photography.—Giving it out.—The entrapped Cupids.

Of all the queer forms of the stamming, I have never known the equal of that adopted by a lady (presumably a married one) to the neighborhood of Canterbury. It is her fancy to obtain admission as various workhouses upon the plea of being in an interesting condition, and the case an urgent one. Nurses sit up with her all night, doctors hold themselves in readiness, and she receives every attention. In the morning she is discovered to have nothing the matter with her, and with many apologies for her mistake she trots away, to carry out the same performance elsewhere. It is only under such exceptional circumstances, as she is probably well aware, that she can be sure of getting so much attention. The pauper who congratulated himself upon "riding in his carriage at last" had to die first before the compliment could be paid him; but this lady has found out for herself a much better way.

An industrial has been taken up for damaging the private dwelling-house of the Criminal Investigation Department of the Police—a "high-handed outrage in Utica" indeed. Of course he was thought to be insane, but the doctor who examined him could only discover that "he had been in a state of pauperism for some time, and was probably laboring under delusion." But, to judge by the conduct of the lady above mentioned, you may be in a state of pauperism, yet only be the slave of delusions to other people. Indeed, if science had not thus pronounced it, I should have doubted that being ever as poor for ever as long was identical with luxury. Some of the aforesaid folks I know have never (by their own account) had a shilling to spend except the one with which their parents "cut them off" in their will. I wonder, by-the-bye, whether that proverbial shilling is ever really received, and if so, in the legacy duty first deducted?

A poor woman of Wolverhampton has been consulting a southsayer as to the redressing of certain wrongs. The person applied to at once informed her—but did he need to be a conjurer to do it—that the individual she most disliked in the world was her mother-in-law. "Negatis tamen were then uttered ante" over a pack of cards, by which it was agreed that this domestic enemy should be "paralyzed." There is a vulgar phrase, expressing at once greed and enmity, "I would punch his head for twopence," but for "paralyzing" the charge was naturally higher: the soothsayer demanded two and sixpence for it. The woman herself, too, had to provide the ingredients for the "charm"; one of them, "some of her husband's hair," could probably be easily enough secured—she had only to get up a quarrel and "go for" a handful of it; but the other, "dragon's blood," seems, in the absence of dragons, to have presented a difficulty. In the end the whole scheme broke down, and the soothsayer, unable to "paralyze" the arm of the law, has fallen into the hands of the police. But what a state of intelligence and education that luckless betrays as regards Walterhampton!

It is well known that some people have an insuperable objection to signing their wills. So long as that necessary is postponed they imagine their Fate will never be so immoderate as to hurry them from that state of uniseness with pecuniary affairs "unsettled." There are even a few persons—who have had, perhaps, some unfortunate experience of lawyers—who can never be got to sign anything. A lady of this sort is now, with her daughter, at Liverpool workhouse. She has a thousand pounds in Chancery, and ready money in the Preston Bank, but can't get any of it out, because she knows better, she says, than to put her name to anything. "Rue Haste" may be "half-sister to Delay," but, on the other hand, prudence of this kind may almost be said to verge on obstinacy. I especially pity the daughter, who but for the extreme caution of this old lady's character might be "moving in the best circles" of Liverpool, or, at all events, of Birkenhead. I wonder what the real paupers think of her?

There is a famous story told of a gentleman who, while his photograph was being taken, made such horrible faces as to suggest convulsions. "If I take you like that, sir," said the artist, "no human being will recognize you." "That is exactly what I want," replied the customer. "I desire to send a portrait of that very hind to Jemima Anne. As I am I can never escape her, but as the victim of a railway accident which has distorted every feature, it is possible that she will break off the engagement." A young man at Hammersmith has been applying the anecdote to his own purposes—he too had suffered (in imagination) from a similar catastrophe—but used it, not to break off with his fiancée, but to get money out of her. She found him on his sofa, with bandaged arms and legs, an individual was with him who had come on behalf of the railway company to arrange the compensation for damages, and who agreed to give him £5 next week. "In the mean time, my darling," on used the victim, "perhaps you will lend me your money" (she was a home-maid, and had £40 in the savings'-bank) "till Saturday, that I may complete the purchase of the little home that is awaiting us." Under these false pretenses she did so. The next day she met him in the street, perfectly well, and instead of congratulating him on his miraculous recovery, she, very properly, gave him into custody.

Some people have no sense of the proprieties. A man died in the London Hospital a short time since, and his wife declined to furnish the funds for his interment. On hearing, however, that his sister had done so, she was exceedingly annoyed, and sent "with a few friends" to the funeral, with the intention of "having it out with her." Nor did she falter in her purpose. Taking advantage of the leisure afforded by the reading of the burial service in the chapel, she pulled her sister in-law's bonnet off, and following up her advantage when they got without-doors, knocked her down once or twice upon the grave. "The interment, however," says the report, "was subsequently carried out without interruption." One is glad to hear of that, of course; but if in the cemetery in question—that of the Tower Hamlets—such scenes are not unusual, it must certainly add a terror to the melancholy position of chief mourner in that locality.

The story of "the scrapped corsets," who had vowed himself to a life of celibacy until of the young lady who persuaded him to kiss her, and got an instantaneous photograph taken of the incident, is not a very new one. If that, however, were sufficient reason for hooping it out of the newspapers, what should we have left to read? My objection to its pertinent circulation is founded on much more solid grounds. There was not the least reason why the young lady should have made those eccentric arrangements under her own roof for the execution of the dozen impressions (cabinet size) which she offered at £20 apiece to the young divine. They might have been executed anywhere. A photograph of the corsets and one of herself would have been all that was necessary. As in the compendium of the celebrated article on Chinese Metaphysics, the artist would have only had to "combine his information." Does any one suppose that to the well known "instantaneous photograph" of the stout and the rabbit those animals were actually taken in pursuit and flight?

H. KEMBLE, of London.

CINNAMON CULTURE IN CEYLON

CINNAMON, which we value as highly at the present time as an important spice, claims an antiquity accorded perhaps to but few other products of the same class, for cinnamon was in very early days used, as it is now, as a flavoring agent. In the Roman writings, as well as in several other books of the Bible, cinnamon is frequently mentioned, often in conjunction with cassia and later on, in the writings of THEOPHRASTUS, HERODOTUS, DIOSCORIDES, PLINY, and others, references to this spice occur. From what has been said by early writers, there can be no doubt but that cinnamon was held in high repute, and was counted amongst the most costly of aromatic substances.

Regarding the countries producing cinnamon in the early ages, we find on record that it was ever obtained from Ceylon, the country where it is now most extensively cultivated. Sir EMERSON TENNENT says, "In the pages of no author, European or Asiatic, from the earliest ages to the close of the nineteenth century, is there the remotest allusion to cinnamon as an indigenous production, or even on an article of commerce, in Ceylon."

When and how cinnamon was first collected in that island appears to be entirely unknown, though it is supposed the Chinese were intimately concerned in its discovery. The earliest records of cinnamon as a Ceylon product date from the thirteenth century. Colonel YULE, the learned author of the Book of Sir Marco Polo, attributes the first mention of cinnamon in Ceylon to an Arab, KAZWINI by name, about A.D. 1275, and next by JOHN OF MONTECORVINO, a missionary friar, who visited India about 1292 or 1293. In a letter contained in the Medicean Library in Florence this missionary describes the cinnamon-tree as of "medium bulk, and in trunk, bark, and foliage like a laurel, and that great store of its bark is carried forth from the island, which is near by Malabar."

"In 1886," says the learned author of the Pharmacographia, "cinnamon is cut from trees growing wild in the forests in the interior of Ceylon, the bark being exacted as tribute from the Singhalese kings by the Portuguese. A peculiar caste called Chalias, who are said to have emigrated from India to Ceylon in the thirteenth century, and whom after-times became cinnamon peelers, delivered the bark to the Portuguese. The cruel oppression of these Chalias was not mitigated by the Dutch, who from the year 1656 were virtually masters of the whole sea-board, and conceded the cinnamon trade to their East India Company as a profitable monopoly, which the company exercised with the greatest severity.

"About 1770 DE KNOX conceived the happy idea, in opposition to the universal prejudice in favor of wild-growing cinnamon, of attempting the cultivation of the tree. This project was carried out under Governors FALCK and VAN DE GRAFF with extraordinary success, so that the Dutch were able, independently of the kingdom of Kandy, to furnish about 400,000 pounds of cinnamon annually, thereby supplying the entire European demand; in fact, they completely ruled the trade, and would even burn the cinnamon in Holland lest its unusual abundance should reduce the price."

So determined were the Dutch to retain the monopoly in the produce of cinnamon that the plants were limited to a certain number, and all above that number destroyed, besides which large quantities of cinnamon, after having been prepared for market, were frequently thrown into the sea or burned. It is recorded that on the 10th of June, 1760, an enormous quantity of cinnamon was wantonly destroyed near the Admiralty at Amsterdam. It was "raised to eight millions of livres, and an equal quantity was burned on the ensuing day. The ale was perfumed with this incense, the essential oils, freed from their confinement, distilled over, flowing in one spicy stream which flowed at the feet of the spectator, but no person was suffered to collect any of this, nor on pain of heavy punishment to rescue the smallest quantity of the spice from the wasting element."

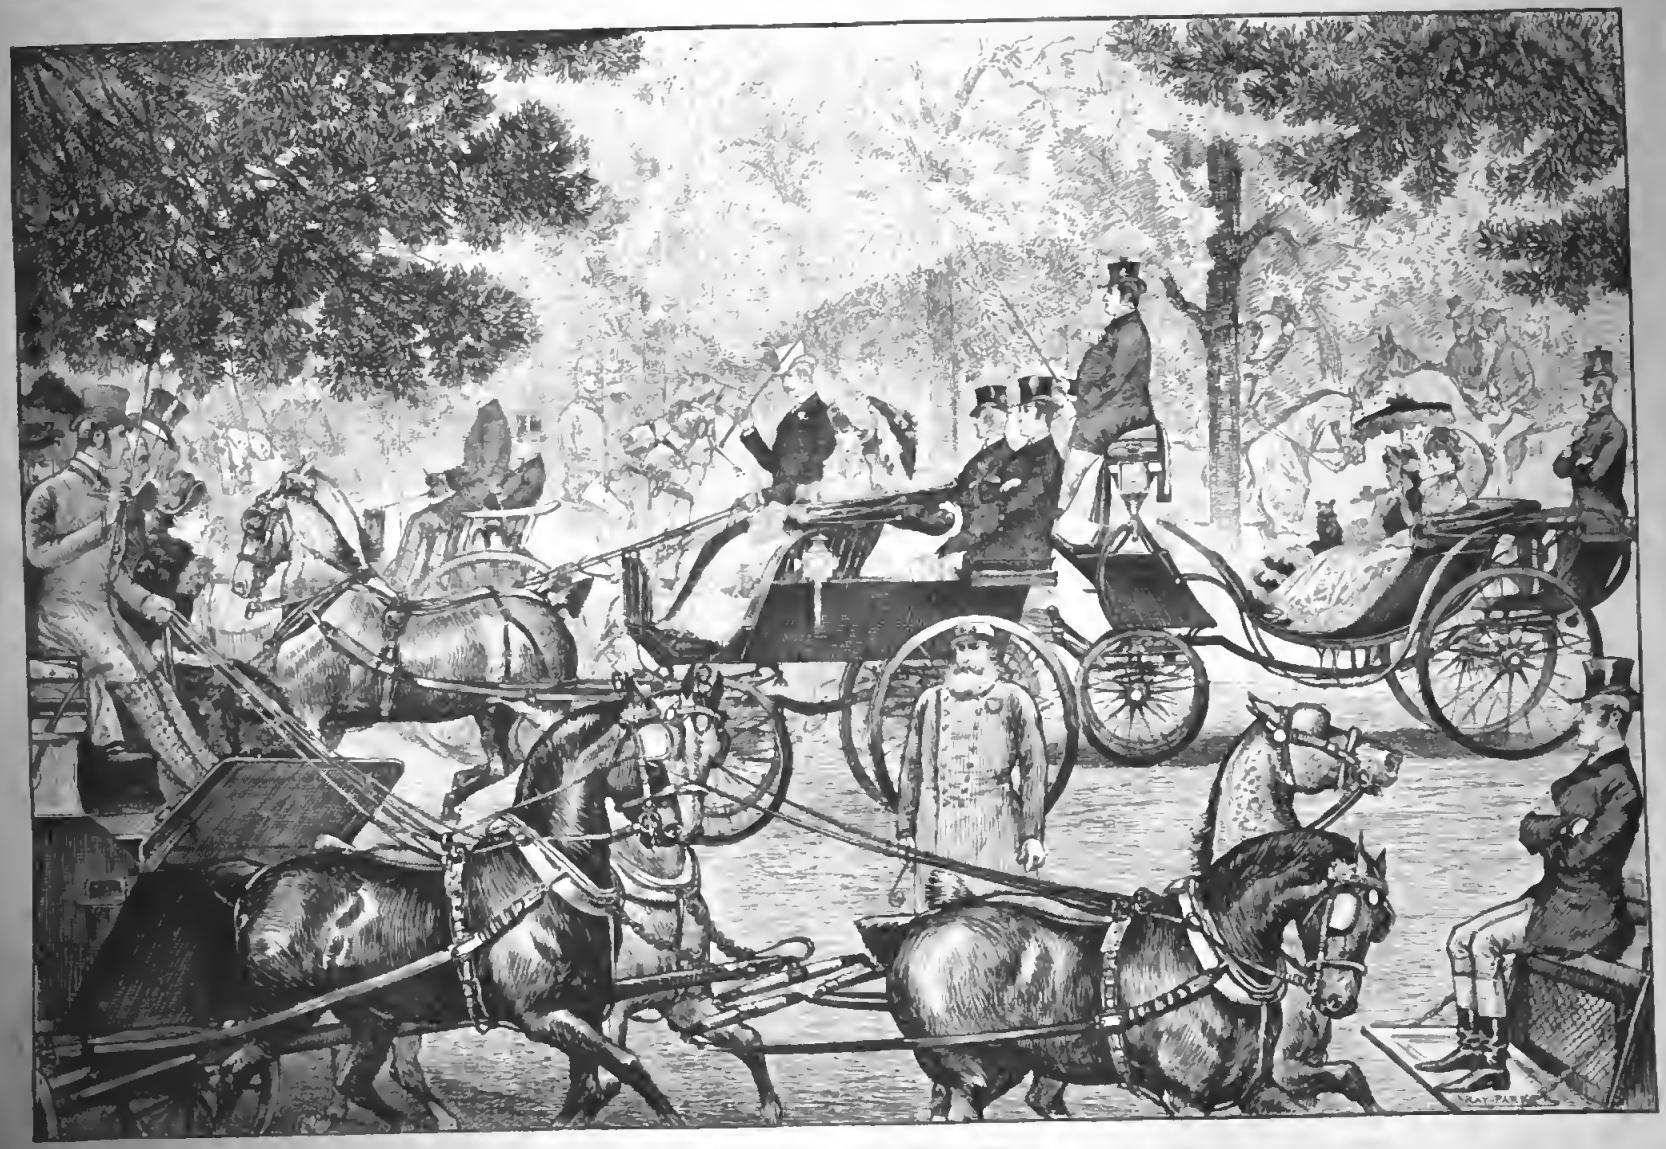
When Ceylon came into the hands of the English in 1796 the trade became a monopoly of the English East India [illegible] and it was not till 1833 that the monopoly was finally abolished, the cinnamon trade passed into the hands of merchants.

The cinnamon tree is very variable in form and size, is known to botanists as cinnamomum. It is very generally distributed in the forests to an elevation of from three to seven thousand feet, and from a pardonable curiosity, or desire to see the living large bar leaves. The barks, however, of all the forms are very similar in appearance, and have the same characteristic odor, so that it is sometimes impossible to distinguish the best trees from appearance alone. It is not uncommon, indeed, for the cinnamon peelers when collecting bark from uncultivated plants to taste a small portion before commencing operations, and to pass over some trees as unfit for their purpose.

The cinnamon plants are pruned to prevent their becoming trees, so that several shoots spring up, four or five of which are allowed to grow for a year or two. At this period the grayish green bark begins to change color, and to assume a brownish tint. When they arrive at the proper state of maturity, at which time they are usually from six to ten feet high, and from half an inch to two inches thick, they are cut down with a long curved knife known as a cutty, as shown in Fig. 1. The [illegible] then stripped off, and longitudinal [illegible] bark slightly trimmed off, the trimmings being sold as cinnamon chips. The bark is next cut through at distances of about a foot, and cut down also longitudinally. It is then easily removed by inserting a peculiar knife, called a [illegible] between the bark and the wood. After removal the [illegible] are carefully put one into another and tied together in [illegible]. In this state they are left for twenty-four [illegible] hours of fermentation taking place which helps the [illegible] of bark. To effect this each piece of the bark [illegible] separately on a stick of wood convex on one side (Fig. [illegible]), scraping with a knife the outer and middle layers [illegible] the expiration of a few [illegible] the [illegible] quills the longer, and the bark curling round [illegible] generally about forty inches long.

[illegible] in the shade to dry, and then placed [illegible] ing in the sun as shown in Fig. 4, [illegible] made into bundles, each weighing about [illegible]



THE DRIVE—CENTRAL PARK—FOUR O'CLOCK

AMONG THE MONGOLS.

THE Mongol of to-day is to many respects a separate man, timid, yet given to long, lonely journeys over pathless deserts; habitually abstemious, yet a demidrunk; a controversialist, yet superstitious; a thief by instinct, yet law-abiding; rough, brutal, and cruel—using torture, for example, to extort evidence—yet in one respect gentler than any European. Nothing can induce him to hurt an animal, however low in the scale of creation. "Nowhere," says a recent traveller, "will you find less cruelty than in Mongolia. Not only do their cattle and flocks receive expressions of sympathy in suffering, and such alleviation of pain as their nature knows how to give, but even the meanest creatures (insects and reptiles included) are treated with consideration. Crows perch themselves on the top of loaded camels, and deliberately steal before the very eyes of the vociferating owners, hawks swoop down in the market-place at Urga, and snatch eatables from the hands of the owners, who simply accuse the thief of patriotism, and pass on. My half-breed camel-driver was nearly driven to distraction one evening by a cloud of mosquitoes which kept hovering over and alighting on his shining pate. During the night there came a touch of frost, and when we rose in the morning not an insect was on the wing. Looking at them as they clung benumbed to the sides of the tent, he remarked, 'The mosquitoes are frozen;' and then added, in a tone of sincere sympathy, the Mongol phrase expressive of pity, 'Hourkie! hourkie!' There was no sarcasm or hypocrisy about it." This tenderness is the more strange because the Mongols in their few cities or stumbling camps let beggars die of cold and exposure, though they never display the complete callousness of Chinese. The Chinese government in Lama Miao, the great entrepôt, punishes highway robbery with violence by a sentence of death from starvation; and our traveller saw this sentence carried out, the man being placed in a cage in the street, with his head outside, so that he might see the eating-shops, and die slowly of hunger and thirst. He was four days dying there in public. The Chinese citizens found this interesting, and strolled up every evening, laughing and jeering, to see the unhappy wretch suffer.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE.

TONIC FOR OVERWORKED MEN.

DR. J. C. WILSON, Philadelphia, Pa., says: "I have used it as a general tonic, and in particular in the debility and dyspepsia of overworked men, with satisfactory results."—[Adv.]

FROM DR. SWEET, THE FAMOUS AND WORLD-RENOWNED BONESETTER.

DR. THOMAS.—Dear Sir: I have used your valuable Vegetine Liniment in my practice as Bonesetter for the past five years, and consider it the best article I ever tried for battling broken bones, bone bruises, sprains, &c. I have no hesitation in recommending it to the public as the best article to all pain flesh is heir to.

Yours truly, JAMES SWEET, North Kingston, R. I.

Vegetine is for sale by druggists at $1 and 50 cents. Depot, 40 Murray Street, New York.—[Adv.]

The best regulator of the digestive organs and the best appetizer known is ANGOSTURA BITTERS. Try it, but beware of imitations. Get from your grocer it, but beware of imitations. Get from your grocer or druggist the genuine article, manufactured by Dr. J. G. B. Siegert & Sons.—[Adv.]

DANDRUFF

Is removed by the use of Cocoaine, and it stimulates and promotes the growth of the hair. Burnett's Flavoring Extracts are the best.—[Adv.]

HARRISON RAZOR.—Its standard reliab. Of all the choice combinations Medford Square is the best.—[Adv.]

THOUSANDS of people testify to the merits of PISO'S CURE for CONSUMPTION.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

ROYAL

BAKING POWDER

Absolutely Pure.

This powder never varies. A marvel of purity, strength, and wholesomeness. More economical than the ordinary kinds, and cannot be sold in competition with the multitude of low-test, short-weight, alum or phosphate powders. Sold only in cans.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., 106 Wall Street, N. Y.

CARLETON'S TREASURY OF KNOWLEDGE

The most valuable atlas ever known. The largest pictorial. Circulars free. Agents, address G. W. CARLETON & CO., Publishers, N. Y.

LUNDBORG'S PERFUMES.

EDENIA AND MARECHAL NIEL ROSE.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1878.

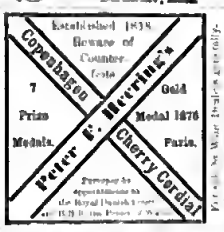
BAKER'S

CHOCOLATES

Baker's Premium Chocolate, the best preparation of pure chocolate for family use. Baker's Breakfast Cocoa, from which the excess of oil has been removed, easily digested and extensively adopted for invalids.—Baker's Vanilla Chocolate, and Cake as mixed for confectionery is a delicious article; highly recommended by boards.—Baker's Broma, for invalids as a diet for children.—German Sweet Chocolate, a most excellent article for families.

Sold by grocers everywhere.

W. BAKER & CO., Dorchester, Mass.



SUPERIOR FISHING TACKLE.

We offer a fine 9-joint Fly Rod, 15-yard Brass Reel, 9-oz. Lines, 3 Flies, 3 Hooks to gut and Leader, complete, by express, for $6.00; by mail, postpaid, $6.50. Simple flies by mail postpaid, six variety, per dozen, 45 cts. Three-piece Trout Rod, 1 Float, 1 Brass Reel, 100 yd. Linen Lines, 3 dozen Hooks, 1 Sinker, 1 Gut Leader, all for $2.25.

Just published, the largest and most complete Catalogue of all sporting goods ever issued.—as Lawn Tennis, Base-Ball, Archery, Cricket, Foot-ball, Bowling, Rifle, and Gymnasium Implements and Uniforms complete, and the latest novelties. 328 large pages, 200 illustrations, on fine tinted paper. Price, by mail, 25 cts.

PECK & SNYDER, 126 to 130 Nassau St., N. Y.

"BOKER'S BITTERS." THE OLD Tom and Jerry Bitters known to connoisseurs of cocktails. Ask your druggist for their famous 40 and 41 Bitters. The best Punch and Pisco. J. P. BOKER, Jr., & Co., Manufacturing Agents, 78 John St., N. Y. P.O. Box 2426.

Lady Agents: [illegible] City Suspender Co.

HARPER'S BAZAR CUT PAPER PATTERNS.

We have transferred our WHOLESALE PATTERN DEPARTMENT to Mr. J. G. CROTTY, No. 1 to 1st Cherry Street, New York, who will conduct it upon his own account and responsibility.

SPECIAL CAUTION.

We are not interested in or responsible for any contracts made by J. G. CROTTY & CO., whether for HARPER'S BAZAR Patterns or for any other business.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

"I owe my Restoration to Health and Beauty to the CUTICURA REMEDIES."

Testimonial of a Boston lady.

DISFIGURING Humors, Hereditary, Blood, Scalp, and Skin Diseases, with loss of hair, from infancy to old age, are positively cured by the CUTICURA REMEDIES.

CUTICURA, the great Skin Cure, instantly relieves Itching and Inflammation, clears the Skin and Scalp, heals Ulcers and Sores, and restores the Hair.

CUTICURA SOAP, an exquisite Skin Beautifier, and Perfect Hygienic purifier of world-wide celebrity, is indispensable in treating Skin Diseases, Blood Humors, Skin Blemishes, Scalding, and the use of Skin.

CUTICURA RESOLVENT, the new Blood Purifier, and the only infallible Blood Purifier and Skin Beautifier, is prepared expressly for those requiring the best blood medicine ever produced. Price, CUTICURA, 50 cents; Soap, 35 cents; Resolvent, $1.

Sold everywhere. Potter Drug and Chemical Co., Boston, Mass.

TIMKEN SPRING VEHICLES!

Finest riding [illegible] Vehicles made. [illegible] Send for Illustrated Catalogue. The Timken Vehicles according to their merits they carry [illegible]

HENRY TIMKEN, Patentee, ST. LOUIS, MO.

Lowest prices. Address H. P. ABBOTT BUGGY CO.

MOSAICS OF BIBLE HISTORY.

The Bible Record, with Illustrative Poems and Prose Selections from Standard Literature. By MARCUS WILSON and ROBERT PEARSONS WILSON. In Two Volumes. 12mo, Cloth, $3.00.

The historical connection of the successive books of the old and New Test. ments is put into view, the circumstances under which they were written are described, and the leading characteristics distinctively designated in the spirit of the prevailing authority and with a fullness commensurate with the limits of our own volumes. The prominent feature of the work is the introduction of numerous well-selected extracts from eminent authors, especially the poets who have penned immortal verse upon the great themes which distinguish the Jewish and Christian religions.—N. Y. Times.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

MAGIC LANTERNS WITH VIEWS $5

MAGIC LANTERNS & SLIDES Wanted. [illegible]

THE BRADLEY

ROAD CART

[illegible] THREE STYLES [illegible]

BRADLEY & CO. SYRACUSE, N.Y.

SPANISH VISTAS.

BY

GEORGE PARSONS LATHROP

ILLUSTRATED BY C. S. REINHART.

Square 8vo, Ornamental Cloth, $2 00.

Spain offers itself to the general observer and to the tourist as a field scarcely more explored than it was forty or fifty years ago. . . . The pictures which I have given I have endeavored to make true and faithful, and, if I have succeeded, they will present to the eventual commercial man of Spain. What has been true the subject of the text has certainly been eminent in the drawings by Mr. Reinhart. Made after sketches from life, of or frequently not more than half-page on centre, there are few touch, their scenery are seized their technical merit, give them the best of recommendations.—From the Preface by the Author

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

TAMAR INDIEN GRILLON

Universally prescribed by the Faculty

A laxative and refreshing Fruit Lozenge for Constipation, Sick Headache, Biliousness, Colds, Sore Throat, Coughs, &c. Prepared by E. GRILLON, Sole Proprietor.

Pharmacien de 1re Classe de la Faculté de Paris, 27, rue Rambuteau, Paris.

Sold by all Druggists

TAMAR, melts in the mouth like a delicious fruit, an agreeable to take, and never produces [illegible]

WAR VOLUMES OF HARPER'S WEEKLY,

Now entirely out of print and the plates destroyed.

We would call the attention of those who have not the files of Harper's Weekly during the War to

Harper's Pictorial History of the Rebellion,

Same size pages as the Weekly, containing two of the Illustrations that appeared in Harper's Weekly during the War.

2 vols. Price, delivered, free of express charges: Cloth, $14; Half Turkey Morocco $20.

SOLD BY SUBSCRIPTION ONLY.

McDONNELL BROS.,

113 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

THE AUTOMATIC POCKET [illegible] The Automatic Pocket Co., 41 Maiden Lane, New York.

All Issues of U.S. BONDS! BOUGHT & SOLD BY T. J. CHEW, Jr. ST. JOSEPH, Mo. Investment Bankers. City of ST. JOSEPH, REFUNDING CO., [illegible] and other DEFAULTED BONDS purchased at Best Rates.

Pears, Apples, Grapes, Peaches, Roses, Lilies & Sea of St. Louis. Manufacturers of the celebrated Alden Fruit Towels, are issuing five chromos—Pears, Apples, Grapes, and Peaches—size of pictures 8 inches. They send them by mail free on receipt of ten cents to prepay the actual expense of sending.

CARDS Send two 3c stamps for the new set of 20 "GILT PALETTES." WHITING, 30 Nassau St., N. Y.

CASTORIA

for Infants and Children.

Castoria promotes Digestion and overcomes Flatulency, Constipation, Sour Stomach, Diarrhœa, and Feverishness. It destroys Worms and allays Feverishness. It destroys Worms and natural sleep, without morphine.

"Castoria is so well adapted to Children that I recommend it as superior to any prescription known to me." H. A. ARCHER, M. D., 111 Portland Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

What gives our Children rosy cheeks, What cures their fevers, makes them sleep; 'Tis Castoria.

When babies fret and cry for hours, What cures their colic, killeth worms, Castoria.

What quickly cures Constipation, Sour Stomach, Colds, Indigestion, Castoria.

Farewell then to Morphine Syrups, Castor Oil and Paregoric, and Castoria!

CENTAUR LINIMENT—an absolute cure for Rheumatism, Sprains, Burns, Galls, &c. The most Powerful and Penetrating Pain-relieving and Healing Remedy known to man.

PAVARA PILLS.

These pills do not purge, but their moist nature to perform its functions in a perfectly natural manner, whether pain, nausea, or any [illegible] Purely vegetable, perfect in operation, [illegible] and the only SPECIFIC FOR CONSTIPATION. Recommended by Physicians. Sold by Druggists, or sent by mail for 50 cents.

Wholesale Agents, [illegible] and all commissions [illegible] to the T. B. Laboratory, C.N. CRITTENTON, 115 Fulton St., N. Y. Send for circular. P.O. Box 991, New York City.

NEW STORE.

Le Boutillier Bros.,
Of 23d Street.

BLACK SILKS.

The best and most reliable in the market, at $1 00, $1 25, $1 50, and $2 00.

BLACK SATIN RHADAMES—the best value ever offered. Present prices, 85c. to $1 50; former prices, $1 50 to $2 50.

COLORED SILK AND COLORED SATIN RHADAMES at $1 00, $1 25, and $1 50. These are [illegible] regular prices.

SUMMER SILKS in large variety at greatly reduced figures.

FINE ALL-WOOL double-width Dress Goods at specially low prices.

Prompt and careful attention to all Mail Orders. SAMPLES SENT.

IT WILL PAY YOU TO SHOP BY MAIL.

Please note the address.

Le Boutillier Bros.,
Of 23d Street.

31 & 33 West 23d Street,
NEW YORK.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

Summer Importation of Solid Colored Lisle Thread Hosiery, in the new shades, harmonizing with dress fabrics. Opera Silk, Lisle, and Real Balbriggan Hosiery (Black and Colored).

Broadway and 19th St.

The Best Work of its Class,

SAYS THE N. Y. TRIBUNE,

Is McCLINTOCK & STRONG'S CYCLOPÆDIA OF BIBLICAL, THEOLOGICAL, AND ECCLESIASTICAL LITERATURE.

This great work is complete in Ten Volumes, with 2500 Illustrations, numerous maps, and 30,000 subjects.

NOTICES

From the Rev. Noah Porter, D.D., President of Yale College.

I am very favorably impressed with the thoroughness of the work.

From the Rev. Bishop J. F. Hurst.

It embodies the best that Germany has produced, while its range of topics is far more comprehensive than in Herzog or any book of the encyclopædic class.

The most important and compact library of reference in the English language for the Biblical student.—Jewish Messenger, N. Y.

No religious library can pretend to being complete without this noble and great work.—Boston Advertiser.

There is probably not in the English language a cyclopædia of religious literature which can compare with this in breadth, scope, and thoroughness of execution.—Evangelist, N. Y.

The most valuable single work accessible to the Bible student.—Examiner and Chronicle, N. Y.

SOLD BY SUBSCRIPTION ONLY.

Parties wishing to examine the above work, with a view to purchasing, can have an agent call on them by addressing

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK CITY.

LADIES!

[illegible]

---

40 Chromo Visiting Cards, no 2 alike, for 1883, name on, and Illustrated Premium List, 10c. Warranted best sold. Agents wanted. L. Jones & Co., Nassau, N. Y.

$72 A WEEK. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly Outfit free. Address True & Co., Augusta, Maine.

STREET. EVENING.

"PSCHUTT" MEN—PARISIAN DUDES.—[See Page 311.]

HEAVY REDUCTIONS

In Rich Colored

GROS GRAIN SILKS.

Messrs. JAMES McCREERY & CO.

Are now offering several cases of Rich Colored Gros Grain Silks, newest Spring Colors, 20 and 22 inches wide, at $1 25 and $1 50 a yard.

Corresponding qualities to the above cannot be purchased less than $1 75 and $2 per yard.

JAMES McCREERY & CO.,

Broadway, corner 11th St.

Haydn's Dictionary of Dates

And Universal Information relating to all Ages and Nations. Seventeenth Edition, containing the History of the World to the Autumn of 1881. By BENJAMIN VINCENT. Revised for American Readers. Large 8vo, 810 pages, Cloth, $6 00.

"The Literary World," of Boston, says:

"In any inferior form Haydn's 'Dictionary of Dates' would be a very valuable book of reference; but in its seventeenth edition, and as revised by Mr. George Cary Eggleston for American readers, it is simply indispensable. It makes a closely printed 8vo of nearly 800 pages, and is a cyclopædia of information hardly accessible anywhere else. World histories, facts, and statistics are given in compact form, with particular attention to chronological details, and an immense amount of information is collected on a great variety of topics for which one would not know where to turn. Assassinations, Balloons, Clubs, Duels, Earthquakes, Fires, Massacres, Trials, are instances of what we mean. The work has been brought down to 1881, and is a marvel of comprehension and condensation."

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of the price.

WANTED. A practical Book-Agent to assume the management of the sales [illegible] department in a publishing house. Address, stating experience, P.O. Box 2241, Philadelphia, Pa.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT. FINEST AND CHEAPEST MEAT FLAVORING STOCK FOR SOUPS, MADE DISHES, AND SAUCES.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT. An invaluable and palatable tonic in all cases of weak digestion and debility. "Is a success and a boon for which nations should feel grateful."—See "Medical Press," "Lancet," "British Medical Journal," &c.

CAUTION.—Genuine only with the fac-simile of Baron Liebig's signature in Blue Ink across the Label. This caution is necessary, owing to various cheap and inferior substitutes being in the market.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT. To be had of all Storekeepers, Grocers, and Chemists. Sole Agents for the United States (wholesale only), C. DAVID & CO., 9 Fenchurch Avenue, London, England.

Sold wholesale in New York by PARK & TILFORD, SMITH & VANDERBEEK, ACKER, MERRALL, & CONDIT, McKESSON & ROBBINS, H. K. & F. B. THURBER & CO., W. H. SCHIEFFELIN & CO.

DAKOTA.

Quick, safe, and sure investments for capitalists or residents in Oriska, Barnes County, Dakota. A new town on Northern Pacific Railroad, at crossing of N. W., [illegible] miles west of Dalrymple Farm. Splendid opening for Merchants in every line. Mechanics in demand; wages good. Well settled country in the the famous wheat belt. Correspondence solicited. References: Bacon, Kean, & Company, New York. [illegible] & [illegible] Nat. Bank, Chicago. Address PERKINS, ROBBINS, & CO., Bankers, Oriska, Dakota.

HARPER'S GUIDE TO EUROPE AND THE EAST.

Harper's Hand-Book for Travellers in Europe and the East: being a Guide through Great Britain and Ireland, France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Italy, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, Greece, Switzerland, Tyrol, Spain, Russia, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, United States, and Canada. By W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE. With Maps and Plans of Cities. In Three Volumes. Twenty-second Year. 12mo, Leather, Pocket-Book Form, $3 00 per vol. The volumes sold separately.

VOL. I.—Great Britain, Ireland, France, Belgium, Holland.

VOL. II.—Germany, Austria, Italy, Sicily and Malta, Egypt, the Desert, Syria and Palestine, Turkey, Greece.

VOL. III.—Switzerland, Tyrol, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Russia, Spain, United States, and Canada.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of the price.

WANTED 8 or 10 BOOK AGENTS [illegible] GENERAL AGENTS to hire and train others [illegible] NEW WORK of extraordinary merit and great salability. Positions are worth $1,200 to $2,000 a year. Address, with full particulars of experience, age, etc., HUBBARD BROS., 723 Chestnut St., Phila. Pa.

FREE NEW ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE OF Scrap Pictures, Visiting and Advertising Cards, Palettes and Printing Presses, including new set of Imported Cards, sent to any address for 3 cts. CLARK CARD CO., Box 26, Brooklyn, N. Y.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address H. HALLETT & Co., Portland, Maine.

40 New (1883) Chromo Cards, no 2 alike, with name, 10c., postpaid. Geo. I. Reed & Co., Nassau, N. Y.

THE NEW NOVELS

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

A Sea Queen. By W. Clark Russell. 16mo, Half Bound, $1 00; 4to, Paper, 20 cents.

The Ladies Lindores. By Mrs. Oliphant. 20 cents.

Like Ships Upon the Sea. By Frances Eleanor Trollope. 20 cents.

No New Thing. By W. E. Norris. 25 cents.

Mary Barton. A Tale of Manchester Life. By Mrs. Gaskell. 20 cents.

Stray Pearls. Memoirs of Margaret de Ribaumont, Viscountess of Bellaise. By Charlotte M. Yonge. 20 cents.

The Story of Melicent. By Fayr Madoc. 20 cents.

The Hands of Justice. By F. W. Robinson. 20 cents.

[illegible], and other Stories. By Henry James, Jr. 20 cents.

The Wreck of the "Grosvenor." By W. Clark Russell. [illegible]

Who is Sylvia? By A. Price. 20 cents.

Shandon Bells. By William Black. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25; Paper, 20 cents.

Unspotted from the World. By Mrs. G. W. Godfrey. 20 cents.

Bid Me Discourse. By Mary Cecil Hay. 10 cents.

It was a Lover and his Lass. By Mrs. Oliphant. 20 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Nine Cents in stamps.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

Buffalo Lithia Water,

A powerful solvent of Stone in the Bladder. Invaluable in Bright's Disease of the Kidneys; specific in Gout and Rheumatism; highly efficacious in Acid Dyspepsia, &c. Endorsed by Dr. J. Marion Sims, Dr. Wm. A. Hammond (late Surgeon-General U. S. Army), and other eminent medical men. Water, in cases of one dozen half-gallon bottles, $5 00 per case at the Springs. Springs pamphlet sent to any address.

W. H. SCHIEFFELIN & CO., CASWELL, HAZARD & CO., Agents, New York City.

THOS. F. GOODE, Proprietor, Buffalo Lithia Springs, Virginia.

ILLUSTRATED FURNITURE CATALOGUE.

THE ROBERT MITCHELL FURNITURE CO., CINCINNATI, OHIO.

Have the largest Furniture Establishment in the world. They manufacture their goods and retail at factory prices. It will repay you to send for one of their mammoth Art Furniture Catalogues, which represents about 3000 articles of fine, medium, and low-priced furniture. It will be mailed to any address outside of this city on receipt of 25 cents in stamps or money.

SEELEY'S HARD RUBBER PILE PIPE

[illegible] Seeley's Truss Establishments, 1347 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa., or 74 Fleet Street, London, England.

AGENTS can now grasp a fortune. Outfit worth $10 free. Address E. G. RIDEOUT & CO., 10 Barclay St., N. Y.

IT PAYS to sell our Hand Rubber Stamps. Samples free. FOLJAMBE & Co., Cleveland, O.

CARDS. An Elegant New Set of Cards for 3c. stamp. W. H. PRINGLE, Rochester, N. Y.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Per Year:

HARPER'S MAGAZINE	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR	4 00
The THREE above publications	10 00
Any TWO above named	7 00
HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE	1 50
HARPER'S MAGAZINE } HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE }	5 00
HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY, One Year (52 Numbers)	10 00

Postage Free to all subscribers in the United States or Canada.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR begin with the first numbers for January, the Volumes of the YOUNG PEOPLE with the first Number for November, and the Volumes of the MAGAZINE with the Numbers for June and December of each year.

Subscriptions will be entered with the Number of each Periodical current at the time of receipt of order, except in cases where the subscriber otherwise directs.

Specimen copy of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE sent on receipt of a three-cent stamp.

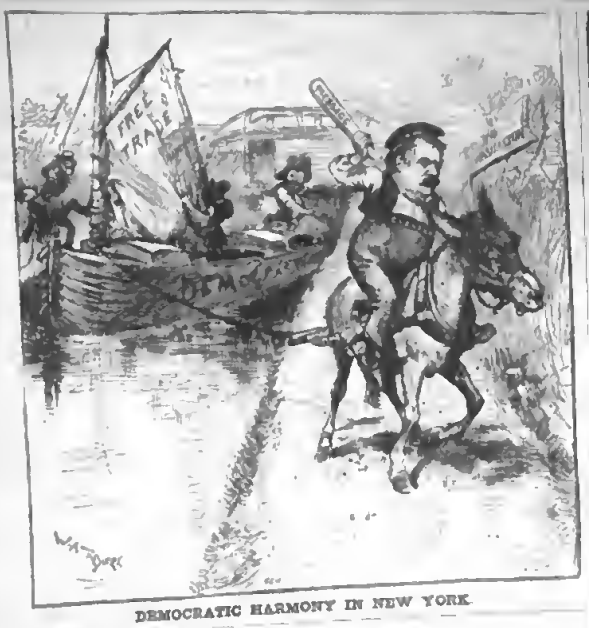
HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY: a weekly publication, containing works of Travel, Biography, History, Fiction, and Poetry, at prices ranging from 10 to 25 cents per number. Full list of Harper's Franklin Square Library will be furnished gratuitously on application to HARPER & BROTHERS.

Remittances should be made by Post-Office Money Order or Draft, to avoid risk of loss. Address

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE, of between three and four thousand volumes, mailed on receipt of Nine Cents in Postage Stamps.

Digitized by Google



DEMOCRATIC HARMONY IN NEW YORK.

REPORT OF THE EMINENT CHEMIST, DR. H. A. MOTT, ON POROUS PLASTERS.

No. 61 Broadway, Room 56, New York, May 7, 1883.

The Porous Plaster Company

GENTLEMEN,—I have the honor to submit the following report, as a result of my investigation of the comparative merit of the Allcock's Porous Plaster, and a plaster which has recently been advertised as superior to Allcock's. It is true that this advertised plaster contains ingredients foreign to the Allcock's Porous Plaster, as substitutes for the essential constituents which experience has shown to be necessary for a perfect plaster.

Whatever may be the merit of the ingredients used in this advertised Plaster, it is certain they are not properly proportioned, as the acids and thus producing blisters and too much irritation.

I have had occasion to use the Allcock's Porous Plaster and the advertised plaster referred to, and it is my opinion that the Allcock's Porous Plaster is far superior in its action to the latter, and from a chemical and physical standpoint all that could be desired. Respectfully,

HENRY A. MOTT, JR., Ph.D., F.C.S., &c.,
Professor of Chemistry in the New York Medical College and Hospital for Women; Member of the American, Berlin, and Paris Chemical Societies; Fellow of the Chemical Society of London; Member of the Society of Public Analysts, &c., &c.

DECKER BROTHERS'
MATCHLESS
PIANOS
33 Union Square, N. Y.

COUGHS, &c.

Piso's Cure for Consumption.

DURKEE'S SALAD DRESSING

A GOOD SALAD ASSURED.

ALL DRUGGISTS SELL IT.

MARLIN MAGAZINE RIFLE

45 Govt and 40-60 Grain Cartridges

THE BEST RIFLE

MARLIN FIRE-ARMS CO. New Haven, Conn.

A. W. BOUGHTON, 110 Market St., Phila., Manufacturer of
WOOD-CARPET
Parquetry or Ornamental Wood-Floors,

THE IMPROVED HORSMAN BICYCLE.

H. W. JOHNS'
ASBESTOS
LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING,
H. W. JOHNS MFG CO., 87 MAIDEN LANE, N. Y.

THE BEST THE QUEBER WATCH CASE

CONGRESS WATER.

1ST STANDS AT THE HEAD.
THE STAR THAT LEADS THEM ALL
THE LIGHT RUNNING
DOMESTIC SEWING MACHINE

ALL IN SEARCH OF HEALTH SHOULD WEAR
DR. SCOTT'S ELECTROPATHIC BELTS.
To Promote the Circulation, to Stimulate the Organic Action, to Renew Vital Energy and Assist Digestion.

Universally approved by the Leading Physicians as the Best, Safest, and Most Effectual Remedy for Spinal Complaints, Incipient Consumption, Diarrhœa, Piles, Tumors, Asthma, Bronchitis, Epilepsy, Lumbago, Debility, Dropsy, Paralysis, Loss of Voice, Hysteria, Cutaneous Diseases, Nervousness, Indigestion, Pain in the Side, &c.] and has cured some of the most obstinate and distressing cases, after all other remedies (so-called) have failed.

FIT ANY WAIST

ELECTRIC ADJUSTABLE BELT

Price $3 00 Price $5 00

ITS EXTRAORDINARY CURES ARE TRULY MARVELLOUS

There is no shock whatever, but a most agreeable feeling imparted in wearing them; they are to be worn day or night. They are lined with red flannel, and entirely durable.

Pimples, &c.
Dr. Scott,—I have spent several hundred dollars in the City of Peoria, doctoring for kidney, liver and nervous diseases, during twelve years, but have received no permanent benefit. I have since worn one of Dr. Scott's Electric Belts, and am entirely cured. I have also found great relief from general debility in wearing the Hole Brush.

Mr. MORGAN FRANKLIN, the venerable President of the great New York Life Insurance Company, will vouch for our financial responsibility. The Bank of the Metropolis, New York, will vouch for our financial responsibility. The price will be returned in every case where the goods are not as represented.

AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE. GEO. A. SCOTT, 842 Broadway, N.Y.

Dr. Scott's Electric Corsets. New prices, $1.00, $1.50, $2.00, $2.50.
Dr. Scott's Electric Brushes. New prices, $1 00, $1 50, $2 00, $2 50, $3 00.

SYPHER & CO.
ARE CONSTANTLY RECEIVING RICH BOHEMIAN
Antique Silver, Furniture, Clocks, Bronzes, and Articles of Verta.
739 & 741 BROADWAY.

Round Writing
BOOK FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION & PENS
Sold for $1.50 by Stationers, or
KEUFFEL & ESSER, New York.

Print Your Own Cards, &c. Press $3.
KIDDER & CO., Bridges, Conn.

Retiring from Business.
F. KRUTINA
Offers his Large and Elegant Stock of
FURNITURE,
Consisting of Parlor, Bed-room, Dining-room Suits, Chiffoniereres and Fancy Tables, in Mahogany, Walnut, Ebony, Cocobola, &c.,
At a Reduction of 25 to 50 per Cent. from Manufacturer's Prices.
842 BROADWAY and 96 & 98 EAST HOUSTON STREET.

EARL & WILSON'S
PATENT "SHORT BAND" COLLARS AND "BEAD EDGE" CUFFS
ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION.

SPECTACLES
Dr. Beaton's Celery and Chamomile Pills cure promptly headache of every nature, &c., druggists.

FISHERMEN!
TWINE and NETTING
MANUFACTURED BY THE
BALTIMORE TWINE AND NET CO.
WM. J. HOOPER & SON,
No. 6 S. Calvert St., Baltimore, Md.
Send for price-list, naming county and state. Please mention this paper.

LOW, SON, & HAYDON'S
Flower de Luce
The Howard Tooth Brushes
HAVE
SECURELY FASTENED BRISTLES
AND CAN BE FOUND WITH ALL DEALERS.
PINS BEARING THIS TRADE MARK P&A
ARE SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS
MANUFACTURED BY
THE PLUME & ATWOOD MFG CO.
WATERBURY, CONN.

WHITMAN SADDLE CO.

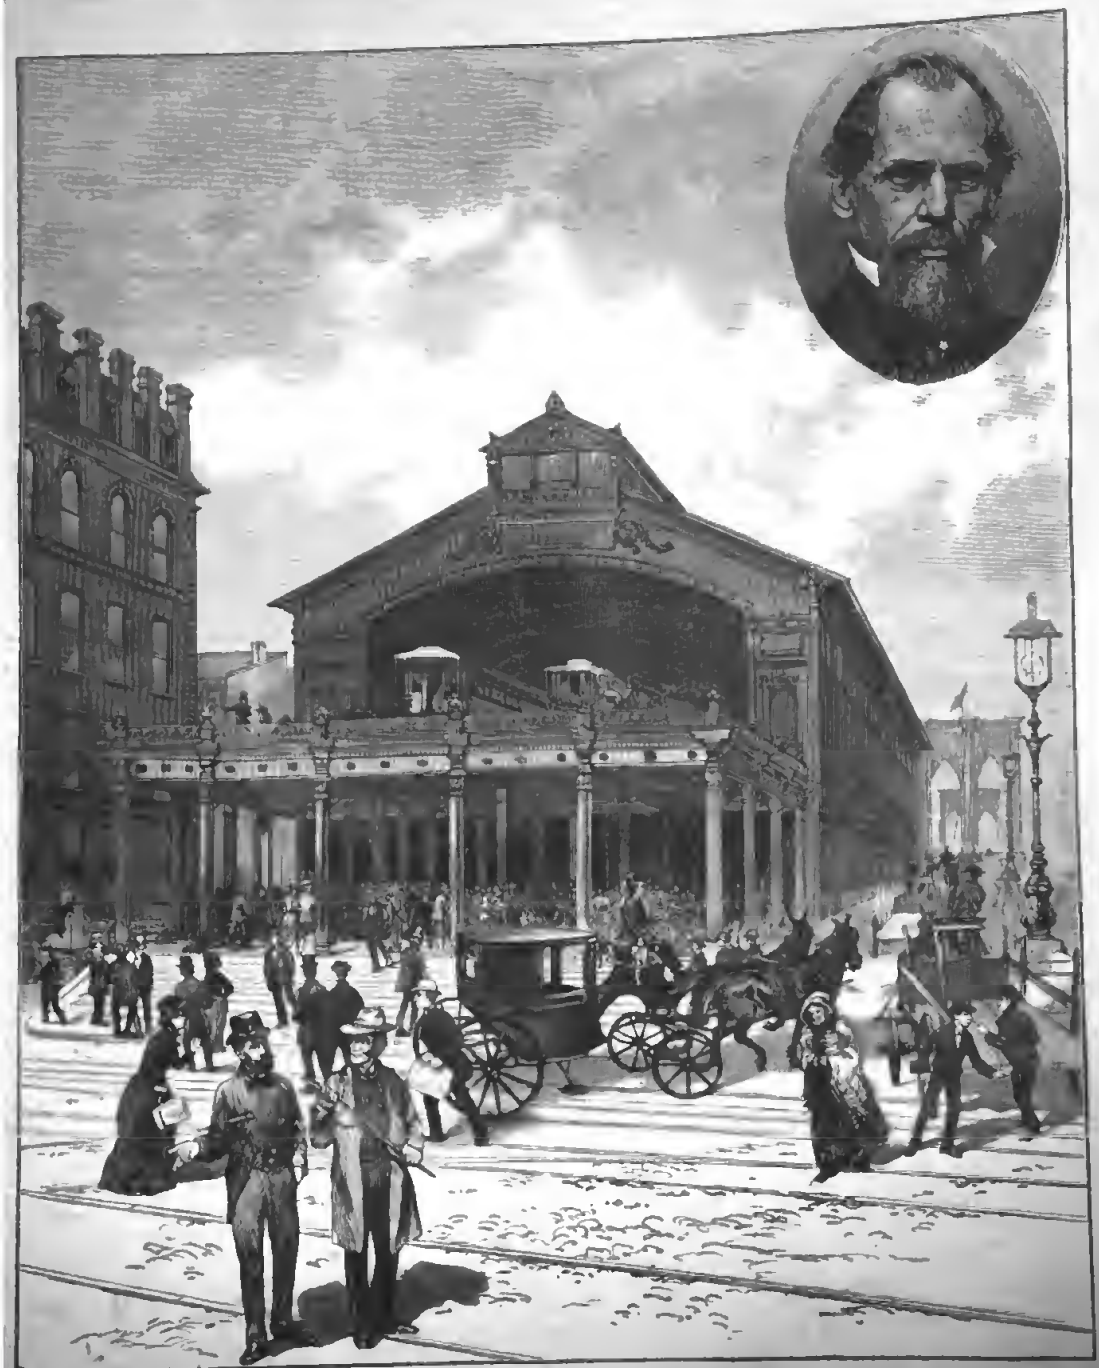
COLLEGE LIBRARY

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

Vol. XXVII.—No. 1379. NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 26, 1883. TEN CENTS A COPY. WITH A SUPPLEMENT.

Copyright, 1883, by Harper & Brothers.



THE NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN SUSPENSION-BRIDGE.—NEW YORK ENTRANCE.—From Photograph by Gutekunst.—[See Page 336.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 26, 1883.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

AN OFFER TO YOUNG AMERICAN ARTISTS.

For the best original drawings to illustrate ALFRED DOBEY'S "Christmas Hymn"—the drawings to be suitable for publication in HARPER'S MAGAZINE, and to be the exclusive work of an American artist not over twenty-five years of age—MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS offer an award of THREE THOUSAND DOLLARS, upon the honorable understanding that the successful competitor shall use the same for the prosecution of art study in one or more of the best American schools, including also a sojourn abroad of at least six months for the study of the old masters. The award will be paid in such installments and at such times as shall best suit the convenience of the recipient for the purposes specified.

The drawings must be received by MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS not later than August 1, 1883, addressed "Art Competition, Harper's Magazine, Franklin Square, New York"; and each must be designated by an assumed name or motto, which should also be given, together with the real name, age, and residence of the artist, in a sealed envelope accompanying the drawings, and not to be opened until the result of the competition shall have been determined. The name of the successful competitor will not be publicly announced until the publication of the drawing.

MR. R. SWAIN GIFFORD, N.A.; MR. F. D. MILLET, A.N.A.; and MR. CHARLES PARSONS, A.N.A., Superintendent of the Art Department, HARPER & BROTHERS, will act as judges of the competition.

It is intended to engrave the successful drawing as our page for HARPER'S MAGAZINE of December, 1883; and should other drawings submitted be found suitable, second, third, and fourth awards will be made, as follows: our page HARPER'S WEEKLY, $200; one page HARPER'S BAZAR, $200; one page HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, $100.

If the judges should decide that no one of the drawings is suitable, MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS reserve the right to extend the limit of time and re-open the competition.

Two Christmas Hymns by ALFRED DOBEY have been published. That published in 1877 is the one for the illustration of which artists are invited to compete, and a printed copy of it will be sent on application to

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

☞ A Supplement, presenting a DOUBLE-PAGE VIEW of the NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN SUSPENSION-BRIDGE, is issued gratuitously with this number of HARPER'S WEEKLY.

PROSPECTS.

THE campaign for the Presidential nomination has begun upon the Democratic side with great ardor. There are most suggestive assurances of the extraordinary vigor of Mr. HENDRICKS's health, and it is telegraphed that he has been recently able to stand upon his feet for two hours. Perhaps, however, that merely normal posture will be in vain, and that nothing less than ability to stand upon his head for five minutes will answer. Mr. MCDONALD, also of Indiana, whose "claims" are wholly unknown to the public, is declared to be "running" for the nomination. Then the Rev. Mr. TALMAGE announced that Mr. TILDEN was a candidate, upon which the New York Sun remarks, "To put it quite plainly, Mr. TALMAGE lies," and the Sun quotes Mr. TILDEN'S letter and telegram declining to compete for the nomination in 1880 as conclusive evidence of his absolute retirement in 1884. Governor CLEVELAND, of New York, has been thought to be a new man of great promise for the contest, but many of the Democratic papers in the State unequivocally assert that he has insulted his party and needlessly quarrelled with Tammany. Pending all these palpitations, Mr. JOHN KELLY goes to Massachusetts and sees Governor BUTLER, and his visit is believed to be of immense significance.

Other names are mentioned—General HANCOCK, Mr. PENDLETON, Mr. BAYARD—but with a perfunctory air, as if they were cited rather to cast a glamour of dignity and respectability over the party than seriously to urge them as candidates. Upon the Republican side, however, there is very little speculation about candidates. Mr. CONKLING has announced that the Republicans will be defeated, and there is no doubt that he would be glad to see a defeat, which his would ascribe to his own indifference, as he and his friends amusingly assumed GARFIELD'S election to be due to their zeal. General GRANT will hardly be a candidate. The candidacy of Mr. BLAINE is very doubtful. General LOGAN probably has hopes, and other Senators are doubtless pondering the subject. But the significant part of the situation is that there is no serious discussion of principles or politics. No question has taken such hold of the public mind as to promise the appearance of a new party. The serious difference upon the tariff in the Democratic ranks will not dissolve the party—it will only exclude the issue from the contest in 1884—while both parties compete for the credit of administrative reform.

To-day, therefore, and in the absence of any question strong enough to break the parties, the prospect is that the result in 1884 will depend largely upon the personality of the candidates and upon party tradition. The general issue that the Democratic party, as the national "outs," will reform Republican ill-doing, might serve in England, but it is powerless here, where the two parties are both in and out at the same time. The spirit and disposition and action of the Democratic party are not matters of conjecture. It is in power in many States, and the country can see there precisely what kind of reform and economy and good government are to be expected if it should control the national government. The theory that if one party does not suit the other will serve, fails altogether when both parties are actively governing and under review at the same time. Assuming Republican shortcomings to any reasonable degree, what is to be gained by transforming the late Democratic New York Legislature at Albany into the national Congress at Washington? This is the consideration which will govern the great multitude of voters in 1884. Both parties will hold their general strength. The result will depend upon the number of voters who, between two parties of what seem to them negative claims, think that the time has come to try the chance of change. But if the country should be busy and tranquil when the election comes, if enterprise be active, labor well paid, and prosperity universal, change for the mere chance of change is unlikely to be desired.

CORNELL UNIVERSITY.

THE vehement attack which was recently made upon Cornell University greatly surprised many of its friends. They had supposed it to be advancing, not "deteriorating," and those who know the active, progressive, and essentially modern spirit of its president will not willingly believe that mischiefs so serious can have occurred without his observation, still less with his acquiescence or connivance. Yet the charges, as they were summarized in the reports, did not spare even him, and if they represented any general conviction among the alumni, it was certainly necessary for the president to lose no time in responding to the accusation. This he did at once in a careful statement, the tone of which showed a deep sense of injustice, but which meets the charges fairly and candidly. Impressions or opinions which are not susceptible of precise definition, and which count for much in an arraignment of the kind, of course can not be answered, but they can be shown to be unfounded in the specific allegations which are urged. Surely if any one has a right to speak for Cornell University it is President WHITE. Such an institution was the dream of his youth. He was Mr CORNELL'S most intimate counsellor and invaluable friend. He has devoted a large part of his active life, his trained abilities, his special knowledge, his wide acquaintance with men, his long experience in teaching, his enthusiasm and faith, his private resources, to establishing and developing the university. It is hard for him not to resent warmly an imputation that he has neglected and injured it.

The charges are brought by a trustee in a meeting of alumni and others. The president says that at the last Commencement, when he had opportunity to make the charges and to invoke the action of the board to obtain redress, if redress were needful, without provoking a public scandal, the trustee was silent. Within six weeks there would be the annual Commencement meeting, when he could take the same course. But he would not wait. He appeals to the public before saying a word to the board. He arraigns the trustees as careless and incompetent. The president cites the enormous gifts to the university for buildings, apparatus, books, support of professors, etc., amounting to more than two millions and a half of dollars, and nearly every dollar was given by trustees or the families of trustees. Their time, their thoughts, their fortunes, have been freely bestowed. They have differed and debated among themselves. But president and trustees are harmonious, bound together by mutual respect if not by personal attachment, and they are steadily working together.

As to the professors, who, it is charged, are paid penurious salaries, the president says that some receive $3000, and the great body receive $2750. It is not a large salary, but, however inadequate, it is, he says, equal to $3500 at Yale, which is the regular salary there. The resident faculty is steadily improving, "and was never so good as now." When a vacancy occurs the university is untrammelled by sectarian views, and selects the best man, of whatever denomination, who can be found in this country. Not one professor has left, as is stated, because of the low salary. In the two cases most frequently mentioned, an assistant professor of mathematics left to take a full professorship at Harvard, and a professor of Latin at Cornell went to take the professorship of Latin at Yale. Both returned to their alma mater, and Cornell was justly proud, for it was a tribute to the excellence of her choice and the standing of her professors. Such transfers are common, and the vacant places have been most satisfactorily filled. If there have been noted special lecturers in former years, they have been succeeded by most accomplished men. If the number of students did somewhat decline when the standard of scholarship was raised, the recovery has begun, and upon the higher plane. There is no "deterioration" in the students, and no discord in the faculty, or between them and the president; and as for the executive committee, which is obviously a necessary body, the alumni are more largely represented upon it than any other part of the constituent body. We can give but an impression of the detailed and careful reply of the president. But every alumnus and friend of Cornell, who will readily own that in management, like that of every such institution, should be sharply scrutinized, will certainly do its officers the justice of hearing before they condemn.

MAHONE.

WHEN Mr. MAHONE became prominent in Virginia politics it was as the leader of a movement to break up the Bourbon Democratic ascendency which postponed the payment of the State debt, and which refused justice to the colored voters. The movement favored also a scheme of "re-adjustment" of the debt which was obviously but a form of repudiation. But there were many honest Republicans who thought that this part of the programme, while it could not be approved, need not prevent sympathy with the general purpose of securing justice and ending a dull political despotism. Upon a review of the situation it was apparently decided in Washington that the MAHONE movement should be sustained by the Administration, without approval of repudiation. The power of the national patronage seems to have been intrusted to Mr. MAHONE, and inevitably the Administration and the party have been held responsible for his conduct.

The result is not encouraging. That the condition of the colored citizen has been seriously improved does not appear. The State has certainly not become Republican. Its creditors are not more satisfied. The only gain has been secured by Mr MAHONE, who has become a Senator, and who has relentlessly used for his own ends used the power committed to him. Mr. DEZENDORF, a late member of Congress, has written to the President a letter calling his attention to gross violations of law by Mr MAHONE. His accusation is in substance that Mr MAHONE resorts to bribery and corruption, selling places for services, assessing office-holders in despite of law, and detailing them for personal and political objects. Mr DEZENDORF charges specific abuses in the Navy-yard, monstrous and causeless removals, scandals of all kinds, and demoralization of the colored voters. He writes also to Mr. EATON, of the Civil Service Commission, to Secretaries FOLGER and CHANDLER, and to Postmaster-General GRESHAM, pointing out the abuses and the violations of law of which Mr MAHONE is guilty. His statements are too explicit to be disregarded, and in the present temper of the public mind it would be extremely unwise to resort to the simple answer, "Pooh, pooh, to you!"

The law provides that if any Senator of the United States is concerned directly or indirectly in soliciting or levying political assessments he shall be liable to trial for misdemeanor, and to fine and imprisonment. Let Mr. DEZENDORF see that the proper officers enforce the law. He may be sure that public opinion would sustain him in such action if based upon adequate evidence. It must be clear to the Administration also that support of Mr MAHONE and his practices must be a very great injury to the Republican party. In the accumulation of dishonest and doubtful details of administration which can not be explained away that endangers parties. The BELKNAP scandal, the Whiskey Ring revelations, had explainers and defenders, but the country naturally accepts such things as too significant signs. The passage of the law regulating the civil service, the appointment of the Commission, the excellent rules, honest examinations, will not avail the Republican party if it is seen that the spirit of the law is evaded, that gross violations of its letter are tolerated, and that its observance is reluctant and perfunctory. The President has shown the best disposition in all that he has done in connection with the Commission and the rules. But his disposition and purpose regarding the whole service can be seen only by his attitude toward such abuses as Mr DEZENDORF reports.

IRISHMEN AND AMERICAN SYMPATHY.

THE Evening Post misapprehends our remarks upon the late Irish Convention. The fact of the large Irish immigration to this country doubtless shows great suffering at home, and is due to the old English oppression which we have often described. Upon that point we should not differ. But the view is unquestionably sound that if a great multitude of Irishmen or of any other foreign people come to this country, for whatever reason, and having obtained citizenship here, remain even more alien in heart and sympathy than the colonies of American idlers in London and Paris to the countries in which they stay, if they use their American political power chiefly to promote the interest of another country, and if they encourage, even if they do not directly promote, the commission of revolting crimes to avenge their own wrongs or those of their ancestors in their native land, they do not take a course which will secure American sympathy. That is what we said, and we still think it to be a saying justified by reason and experience.

Irish hate of England, which produces this action, and which the Post apparently supposes us to overlook, is the one conspicuous fact in the Irish situation. That hate is not surprising. However unjustified by the recent conduct of England, it is a national tradition which is now unchangeable, and whether it should not be accepted as a fact requiring and justifying the separation of the countries as a fair question. But that does not affect the truth that the attempt to use American citizenship to gratify Irish hate is not the way to command American favor. It is, on the contrary, the way to repel it. If Irishmen or their friends believe that the course which the Irish have pursued in this country has excited American sympathy for Ireland, they are profoundly mistaken. It has prevented a clear knowledge of the facts or careful inquiry into the situation, by arousing feelings of hostility, which are incompatible with fair inquiry. Certainly an open declaration of delight in the Phœnix Park murders and of approval of Dynamite methods would not have been even politic, and a shuffling, evasive, indirect approval is only a little less impolitic.

"Preaching" is not the method by which one people hating another is apt to settle its differences. American sympathy, as we said, would attend any statement of Irish wrongs to-day, however strongly drawn, and any declaration of a policy of absolute independence or of local government, provided such objects were to be sought by honorable methods. But it is undeniable that respect for the essential honesty of such declarations would be enhanced if those who professed so absorbing a regard for Ireland refrained from obtaining citizenship in another country. For citizenship involves moral obligations which are inconsistent with primary and supreme devotion to the interests of another land.

THE LONGFELLOW MEMORIAL.

There are, and there always will be, constant appeals to the public generosity for worthy objects. Many of these—probably most of them—will be of what is called a sentimental kind, as, for instance, all memorials and monuments of historic events and of famous men, but they are not for that reason less meritorious. The proposed memorial to Longfellow is of this kind.

The association adopted the plan of the Cobden Memorial Association, in England, of receiving only a small sum from each contributor to insure a national movement. But the important fact was overlooked that the Cobden Association was the centre of a large system of clubs. Through them it reached at once thousands of persons, and the sum was raised at once. There are, however, no Longfellow clubs, and to leave to voluntary individual action the trouble of sending a dollar was a mistake. The association have therefore decided to supplement this plan by inviting larger subscriptions, and Mr. Osgood, the authorized agent, announces that $21,000 of the $50,000 desired are now substantially provided. The memorial proposed consists of a plot of ground in front of the poet's house, which his children have given for the purpose, which is to be simply laid out as a public resort, and upon which a statue as other fitting monument will be erected.

If the tribute be national, it is because Longfellow was the beloved household singer of the whole country, more universally known than any of our poets, and enjoying by the character of his poetry a peculiar personal relation to all his readers. It is for this reason that the association appeals with confidence to all his countrymen who have been cheered, consoled, and strengthened by his song. Checks should be made payable to the Longfellow Memorial Association, and may be sent to Mr Edward S. Osgood, at the office of John Wiley & Sons, 15 Astor Place, New York.

FAMILIAR TACTICS.

In the desperate effort to discredit the law providing for reforming the abuses of official patronage it was asserted that Mr. Charles Lyman, the Examiner-in-chief, had been disgracefully dismissed from the volunteer army twenty years ago. Mr. Lyman at once stated the facts, which summarily disposed of one of the meanest of calumnies. Secretary Stanton dismissed Lieutenant Lyman for a wholly unintentional and honorable error, which was also unapartant. The order of dismissal was subsequently revoked, and Mr. Lyman was honorably discharged for honorable and meritorious service.

This attack is no illustration of the kind of hostility to which the vigorous enforcement of the new law will be exposed. The cliques of professional politicians which would retain for their own henchmen and parasites the chance of entrance into the public service bitterly hate a system which throws it open to all the people, and gives the honest and intelligent young man without the backing of a boss the chance which the heelers and rounders now monopolize.

A GROSS OUTRAGE.

The daily papers have most properly called attention to the outrageous wrong done to Richard Lewis, an Englishman, who recently arrived at this port, and was arrested upon shipboard for forgery by authority of a cable message from the chief constable of Manchester, in England. After an imprisonment of eight days he was released, upon receipt of a message from the English authorities that he was not the man whose extradition was desired.

The incident is most disgraceful to all concerned, and for as gross an outrage as this somebody should be held personally liable to the most exemplary damages. No man should be arrested without some prima facie evidence of guilt, and such summary seizure and imprisonment should certainly not be tolerated.

"SPANISH VISTAS."

Whoever glances only at the profuse and beautiful illustrations of Mr. Lathrop's book, which are drawn by Mr. Reinhart, will catch at once glimpses of the picturesque, romantic, indolent, squalid, brilliant, melodious, half Orientally barbaric life and scene which we call Spain. And as the reader then begins to follow the text he will find that he has the singular good fortune of wandering in that land with two artists, one of the pen and the other of the pencil, who allow nothing characteristic or interesting to escape their quick eyes and alert minds.

The essential picturesqueness of the work begins with the first pages, upon which the impression of the actual scene as a familiar theatrical spectacle happily takes the reader into the vein of the book. This impression is natural to every imaginative American upon his first contact with Southern Europe. It is spectacle and poem and romance, and he gets from it a pleasure which is inconceivable to the native. Mr. Lathrop is no sensitive an observer, his mind is as shrewd and intelligent, and his literary hand as responsive, that it would not be easy to mention a book upon Spain which is more truly pictorial. It is the high praise of his book that the reader turns the last page with the sense of "having been there."

The touches of Mr. Reinhart are very felicitous; and the admirable printing of his designs, reproducing both the force and the delicacy of the drawing, places the book among the finest of illustrated works, and in the best sense. There is a tinkle of guitars and mule bells and casement chorus, a feeling of rich and beautiful architecture, of cloth and decay, of a stagnant but interesting and half-fourning civilization all through the book, which makes it, as Charles Lamb would have said, a bit of "very Spain."

TAMMANY AND THE PUBLIC HEALTH.

If there is a man in the city peculiarly fitted by training, experience, character, and ability for the presidency of the Board of Health, it is Professor Charles F. Chandler. It was but natural, therefore, that his nomination should be rejected by the Board of Aldermen, and that the rejection should be accomplished by the Tammany Democrat-Republican conspiracy. This conspiracy of traders of both political parties aims at the prevention of good government by filling all important offices by mercenary dicker, and resolute opposition to it is the most pressing political duty of all good citizens.

Three thousand of such citizens petitioned the Board of Aldermen to reconsider the rejection. But the Board returned the petition to the Mayor, stating that they had no use for it. Of course they had not, for it did not propose to pay them anything for doing their duty.

Until a new nomination is made Professor Chandler will hold over. The Mayor has it in his power, therefore, to retain him either by declining to make any other nomination, or by nominating men of similar character and qualification, and therefore distasteful to the Tammany Ring. We observe that the "County Democracy" are ready to break with Tammany. But they knew its character when they made a bargain with it last autumn as well as they do now.

PARNELL AND DAVITT UPON THE PHŒNIX PARK MURDERS.

Now that Brady and Curley have been hung for the murder of Lord Frederick Cavendish and of Mr Burke, and that a priest in the country has declared that the mother of Brady is a heroine "whose name will live with that of the mother of the Maccabees and the Gracchi," it is well to remember that the real Irish leaders at this crisis, by far the most powerful Irish leader since O'Connell, said of the crime for which Brady and Curley have suffered:

Immediately after the murder, which seemed at once to blight the reviving hopes of Ireland, Mr Parnell and Mr Davitt and Mr Dillon issued an address to the Irish people, in which they said:

"We feel that no act has been perpetrated in our country during the exciting struggles for social and political rights of the past fifty years that has so stained the name of hospitable Ireland as this cowardly and unprovoked assassination of a friendly stranger, and that until the murderers of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr Burke are brought to justice that stain will sully our country's name."

The Irish in America might well have remembered these words when they assembled to sustain the policy of Mr Davitt, and to declare their fidelity to Mr Parnell. Those leaders did not pander to that spirit, necessarily fatal to Irish hopes, which, because Ireland has greatly suffered, deems to condemn Irish crime; and nothing in their careers is more honorable or has won for them truer respect than their frank and unequivocal expressions of abhorrence of the assassination.

PERSONAL.

The conductors of the Fourth Avenue line of street cars receive instructions from the superintendent of the road to "work off" as many "coppers" and "nickels" as they can when giving change to the passengers. It is a solemn part of their duty to "turn in" as few "coppers" and "nickels" as possible, the railroad company not liking to be burdened with any coin more troublesome than silver or gold.

—As a song and chorus for Decoration-day Messrs. W. A. Pond & Co have published "Our Army of the Dead," from Will Carleton's Farm Ballads, with music by A. Gleason.

—We take pleasure in announcing that Mrs. Fairchild of Carver, of this city, has endowed free scholarships in the New York College of Music, No. 163 East Seventieth Street, for two young ladies who have good voices, but are without the means necessary to cultivate them. Mr Alexander E. Sprague is chairman of the Board of Supervisors of the institution, and Mr Louis Alexander is Director.

—The Rev Dr Curran, formerly pastor of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, New York city, made a speech recently in London in favor of disestablishing the English Church. He referred to the example of this country as showing that disestablishment is not injurious to a Church. "In the Territory of Utah, however," he said, "there is still a quasi-established Church; [illegible] wives, and sends its greeting across the water to its sister establishment in England." The reverend doctor's modest little joke was received with "laughter."

—Says Mr George Augustus Sala: "Successful novelists seem to be almost as popular as jockeys nowadays. It was not always so. I remember at a Greenwich dinner in 1861, when the Cornhill Magazine was in the spring of its triumphant success, Mr Thackeray said that were he to die just then the Times might bestow on him, say, twenty five lines of obituary notice. But had he been a Thackeray among us nowadays, the leading journal might be expected to honor his memory at his decease with an article of at least two columns and a half."

—"What do the impressionists endeavor to put on their canvases? Their principle," says a late writer, "is that what the eye perceives is simply a colored surface, and this colored surface is what the painter should try to get upon his canvas as roughly and absolutely as possible. It does not relate the advanced impressionist to tell him that figures painted by persons who are neither draughtsmen nor anatomists are apt to be either shapeless monsters or flabby, rickety creatures like hapless sardines. This disdain for accurate delineation is coupled with odd eccentricity as to color, and a course method of painting, very different from the tender suggestiveness of Corot, or the broad, bright effects of Constable."

—The fortnight's performances at the Memorial Theatre in Stratford-on-Avon in honor of Shakespeare's birthday closed on the 28th of April, and each one of them was a success. The series began with The Merchant of Venice, and was continued on the 23d of April, Shakespeare's birthday, with King Lear, the house being crowded in every part by an enthusiastic audience. The other Shakspearean plays were Macbeth and the first part of King Henry the Fourth, and the rest of the programme was filled by Richelieu, the Lady of Lyons, and the Honeymoon. On Sunday, the 22d of April, the Rev Frank Sarll preached in the parish church, in a large audience, on the genius of Shakespeare.

—The enterprising librarian of the Bodleian Library, Oxford, has informed the readers at that institution that if they will tell him what special subject they are studying he will let them know without delay whenever any work bearing on that subject has been added to the library.

—Professor Max Müller writes to the editor of the Calcutta Liberal that there must be a Sanskrit translation of "God save the Queen." For if those who know Sanskrit, and who are still the guides of the people, are to sing from their very hearts "God save the Queen," in their vernacular can they sing it, save "in their second, their beautiful, and their easily intelligible Sanskrit"?

—Responding to the toast, "The Liberalism of the Future," Mr. John Morley said a few days ago that during the last ten years a new sentiment and a new opinion had been surging into the House of Commons, namely, that the noble, the professional, and the official classes should no longer have an exclusive voice. He believed that, as a result, public affairs would be better conducted, because they would feel the influence of those who were closer to the vital facts of social life.

—A French critic observes that "Madame De Staël's power was enthusiasm, George Sand's was passion, George Eliot's was sympathy"; but each statement is only fragmentary, and any one of the three proper names could with perfect propriety be used in the nominative clause of either of the sentences.

—If George Eliot's personal appearance her latest biographer writes: "Her long, pale face, with its strongly marked features, was less rugged in the mature prime of life than as youth, the inner meanings of her nature having worked themselves more and more to the surface, the mouth, with its benignant suavity of expression, especially softening the too prominent under lip and massive jaw. Her abundant hair, untinged with gray, whose smooth bands made a kind of frame to the face, was covered by a lace or muslin cap, with lappets of rich paint or Valenciennes hoe fastened under the chin. Her gray-blue eyes, under noticeable eyelashes, expressed the same acute sensitiveness as her long, thin, beautifully shaped hands. She had a pleasant laugh and smile, her voice being low, distinct, and intensely sympathetic in quality; it was contralto in singing, but she seldom sang or played before more than one or two friends. Though her conversation was perfectly easy, such as nature was as finished, as perfectly formed, as the style of her published works." This last sentence must doubtless be taken with allowance. A woman whose casual talk was in the style of the Impressions of Theophrastus Such would have been an unspeakable bore.

—It now appears, from the memoir of a Frenchwoman, Madame Jewer, since another was from childhood a friend of Napoleon Bonaparte's mother, that even when a boy the great soldier was quick to manifest resentment toward girls who displeased him, just as he later years in let the blows of his anger fall upon his wife, upon Madame De Staël, upon Madame Récamier, and history does not know upon how many other women.

—"The two greatest masters of English eloquence" are, according to the London News, Mr Gladstone and Mr Bright. "Mr Gladstone continues to be as ready, vigorous, full of resources, and eloquent as ever. Nor in Mr Bright's case does it seem that age has brought any decay in his faculty of eloquence. Orator as he is, in some qualities the greatest English orator of his day, he never appears to have had any joy in speaking, or even any inclination or impulse to speak, except when it was actually necessary that he should plead a cause. The country is proud of the two men, and proud especially of the work which they have done together."

—In his address as presiding officer of the recent meeting of the Royal Literary Fund—an English charity for the benefit of disabled authors—Lord Wolseley told his hearers that many years ago, after the war in China, he had published a book himself. "I believe," he added, "that I am not overstating the case in saying that the book was by general and universal consent pronounced to be the dullest book of the season, and when subsequently I had an interview with the publisher I found that the financial result of the undertaking was no less a failure. Under these circumstances I can not but feel that there is perhaps a certain appropriateness in my being here to-night."

—Mr E. Burne-Jones has sent to the Grosvenor Gallery Exhibition an oil-painting entitled "Fortune," which represents the goddess standing by the side of a large wheel of golden bronze. "She wears an air of indifference which approaches weariness, and she keeps the wheel in slow and regular motion by the light yet steady pressure of her left hand, while her right hand holds a mass of drapery, which, descending from her shoulders, is set at her waist, and flows voluminously to her feet. The pantomime figure is finely proportioned, her beauty is sculpturesque, and her face has the calmness of Michael Angelo's "Night," says the critic of the Athenæum. But how does he know that she keeps the wheel in "slow and regular motion"?

—A well-known English literary lady writes from pleasantly of R. A. Ansell's picture in the present Exhibition of the Institute of Painters in Water-Colors, London. "That charming and popular artist, E. A. Abbey, a new member of the Institute, makes, we believe, his first appearance as a colorist to the London public in these galleries. His picture, 'The Widower,' is full of sentiment, tender color, and [illegible] drawing. A man, [illegible] bowed with [illegible] stands in a quaint, homely room, while a girl brushes his coat. [illegible] two figures is seated a dejected-looking little boy. The widower's enormous white hat is almost covered with black crape. As one stands gazing, the story of the picture tells itself with a tender pathos that seems to be as much a gift of the young painter as his faculty for interpreting humor and the beauty of out door life. He has also two figures full of grace and freshness in a pleasant drawing by Alfred Parsons beside the silver Thames."

Apropos of Mr Ansell's success in the Institute we may mention that the London Pictorial World has purchased a new water-color picture of his, entitled "Responsibility," which will be engraved for the summer number of that paper.

MR. CHARLES LYMAN, CHIEF EXAMINER CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.
Photographed by C. M. Bell.—[See Page 323.]

THE HON. WILLIAM S. WOODS, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE, INDIANA.
Photographed by Bowsr.

THE HON. WILLIAM S. WOODS.

This well-known jurist also has been appointed United States District Judge in Indiana to fill the vacancy caused by the appointment of Judge Harrison to be Postmaster-General, and has left for Tennessee. He was educated at Wabash College, Indiana, and immediately after graduation began the study of law. He being admitted to the bar he settled at [illegible] and soon established a high reputation, and was recognized as one of the leaders of the bar in that State. He was elected [illegible] Judge, and served with such ability and success that three years ago he was made one of the justices of the Supreme Court, of which he was the Justice at the time of his recent appointment.

Judge Woods is about forty-five years of age. He is a man of high character, [illegible] a judge have always commanded [illegible] and ability.

GENERAL GRANT'S MOTHER.

Mrs. Jesse R. Grant, the mother of General Grant, was in her residence in Jersey City on the [illegible] at the advanced age of [illegible] years. She was born in Montgomery County, Pennsylvania, and was married to Jesse R. Grant in Ohio. She survived her husband [illegible] years, and died [illegible] the house of her son-in-law, [illegible] the funeral services were conducted by [illegible] of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Mrs. Grant was of Scotch origin, a woman of uniform gentleness and amiability, and yet of firm character. After her husband's death in 1854 she resided with her son-in-law, Mr. Ann S. Counts, in Flemington, New Jersey, until his death in 1872, when she removed with her widowed daughter to Jersey City. Her death calls to mind a letter which her son wrote to her forty-four years ago, when he was a West Point cadet, expressing a hope that his boyish wishes would be wonderfully fulfilled. "Your kind words of admonition," he wrote, "are ever present with me. How well do they strengthen me in every good word and work! Should I become a soldier for my country, I look forward with hope to have you spared to share with me in any advancement I may gain, and I trust my future conduct will prove me worthy of the patriotic instruction you and father have given me."

THE LATE AMASA STONE.—Photographed by J. F. Ryder.—[See Page 321.]

THE LATE MRS. JESSE R. GRANT.—Photographed by J. Lowe.

lish system teaches only the elements of knowledge, the higher branches of instruction have not yet been thrown open to all; but the remarkable change that has passed over the country in the course of ten years, and which has driven nearly all its children into the schools, is singularly instructive. It shows how readily a little energy may educate a nation. Several of our large and prosperous States are or a condition resembling that of England twelve years ago. Georgia, Texas, Mississippi, and nearly the whole section south of the Ohio are shown by the recent census to require a stringent educational law. There are few school-houses, and little progress. They want something of the energy shown by the educators of Europe. A few years of resolute labor would make Georgia as intelligent as England, and sweep the fertile fields of Texas with an educated population.

France, we are told by M Monod, has been equally fortunate during the past year The educational work accomplished there is said to be "magnificent." M Ferry, the head of the department, has given himself to the great labor of reforming the system of public instruction. The whole Republican party, animated by a noble zeal for education, has sustained him. "Republicans have felt," says M Monod, "that it is by education that they can best make the whole of France Republican." A compulsory education law has been passed that has brought nearly the whole school population into the schools Money is spent liberally by the government on school-houses and apparatus. The salaries of the teachers are advancing Religious instruction is given out of the schools. M. Ferry has even given a new impulse to secondary education; and France may yet lead all the European nations in its system of public instruction. It may be the first to create a governing class of highly-cultivated men and women, the first to discover the singular power of an educated community But as yet the French schools aim chiefly at elementary teaching The nation must first be rescued from barbarous ignorance. Its young men and women may next be led on to the highest branches of knowledge, and noble thoughts and generous purposes become the ruling traits of the new generations. Thus the educational year of those two ancient nations has been a prosperous one. They have laid the foundations for a period of mental advance. They have resolutely assailed the sources of ignorance. They have met an opposition from the conservative ranks apparently overwhelming. In France, the ultramontane clergy and its followers, in England, the autocrat Tories and Churchmen, have incessantly assailed the public schools. "They are godless," they exclaim, "immoral, republican." But an unprecedented majority of the people of both countries have pronounced in favor of education On that point there is no longer any doubt. The people everywhere are on the side of knowledge It is the encouraging trait of modern politics The lesson is one that we may well study Our own educational career is not as prosperous as it should be We have yet millions to educate Three millions of our children have no school to go to. We have to provide first for this pressing evil. But still more must we at last provide the highest education for all our people, must cultivate a governing class full of generous thoughts and honest impulses, an intelligent community, a people equal and united. EUGENE LAWRENCE.

ONE OF THE JOYS OF LIVING.

One of the joys of living, one of the gladdest things,
It is to see the sun come out and flood the earth with gold,
After the weary raining the spring so often brings,
With skies of gray, and meadows dank, and dreary days and cold;

For then the showery crocus its pretty buds unfolds,
And shows its bloom in purple dyed and gayest yellow too,
And with a fragrant welcome the hyacinth beholds
Beside it shyly blossoming the scilla brightly blue.

Then smile the sweet-breathed jonquil and jaunty daffodil,
And waves the crown-imperial its leaves of glossy green,
As pushing upward, upward, it never stops until
It wears the richest diadem to garlior ever seen

Then soft the grasses whisper, "Soon, children, you may grow,"
And from the boughs of maple-trees burst tender sprays of red,
And down the hills the rippling rills with pleasant murmurs flow,
And life springs up anew where has was left the winter's dead.

Ay! after the weary raining that spring so often brings,
With skies of gray, and meadows dank, and dreary days and cold,
'Tis one of the joys of living, one of the gladdest things,
To see the sun come out again and flood the earth with gold.

MARGARET EYTINGE.

SPARROWS IN SPRING.

Jousted from the sparrows, spring has returned. They have already commenced their annual house-hunting among the little tenements placed for their convenience in the trees of the public squares and avenues, and have and there a more resolute couple than the rest have actually begun to furnish house Birds may be seen hopping about with little feathers in their beaks, and long threads may be noticed struggling out of the doors of the houses. They sit, too, on the platforms with a possessive air that is quite unmistakable. "This house is let," they seem to say.

It is a proud fact that I am somewhat of an authority on the sparrow. I have studied it in four continents, and am therefore justified in arrogance on this momentous topic. Have I not seen the little rascal following British armies in Asia and Africa, taking possession of villages and towns before even the commander-in-chief had formally declared them occupied? In the Afghan war they presumptuously accompanied, even sometimes outflying, the British commissariat wagons, and on the historic levels of Candahar they perched on the general's flag staff within five minutes of his erection. In the Zulu campaign they preceded the Gatling from troop to camp, asserting the rights of conquerors before even Gatlings and bayonets dared to do so, and shaming the timidity of Lord Chelmsford's advance In America, from the Eastern States they are advancing to the Pacific, and from the Western to the Atlantic. But as yet they have only got a part of the war—the Eastern birds as fat as Canada, and the Western as far as Truckee But eventually, of course, they will meet, these two advancing streams of emigrants—somewhere probably about Cheyenne—and all thus possess themselves of the whole continent.

As in Australia or in America, too much has been made of the small impostor He has been imported in a paroxysm of this World enthusiasm as a grub-eater, and what has the villain "sparrow" done for you after all? He has driven all your own pretty American caterpillar-eating birds away, and has done nothing in return except loaf about your stables and exploit the roadways. You have put little houses up for him in all your trees. Yet he has done absolutely nothing toward eating your caterpillars. Walk down Washington Square in July, and not if I are not right. The sidewalk is horrible with squashed worms of a hairy kind Look at the trees now in spring, and see the cocoons of your future tormentors hanging down from the boughs Why does not that sparrow eat them? Why? Because he is too well fed already

I have little patience with the stamp. Others have spoken rapturously of him, I can not.

In fairy-tale how does the sparrow stand? He gave sound advice to his sons of an exasperating fatherly kind What then? Did his sons come to a good end? He harbored a most diabolical hatred against a certain vester, which ended in the ruin of the man and of his whole household.

In Holy Writ he is, apparently, a bird of some importance, for he is repeatedly mentioned. But, alas! these are only "accidents of translation"; for "the sparrow" means only something that is as nearly as possible valueless. All the sacredity, therefore, that has gathered round this particular bird is misplaced, for, after all, the word means nothing more than the most worthless thing that could be thought of "Are not six sparrows sold for a farthing?" In Rabbinical tradition the name stands as a synonym for "listlessness." But he has commended himself to public esteem by his familiarity, and also by a certain preposseessing in his favor on account of vague theories as to his "domesticity." Sparrows are certainly of a confirmed kind. Some, indeed, are unorious even to Mohammedanism:

"The sparrow, meanest of the feathered race,
Has al companions birds in every place;
With whom he pecks the grain that suits him best,
Picks here and there, and late returns to rest;
And whom it chances the falcon makes to prey,
The hedger with his bell-armed arrow slay,
For no search has the gay survivor given;
Now love he seeks, a new delight receives."

But into the great duty of nest-building they plunge with a zest which is wonderful to not, and such is their enthusiasm in research and collection that if they see a chance of taking the fur off a cat's back they would make an attempt to get it. A flock of wood rolling idly over and over along the pathway will fetch down a sparrow from his perch, where no tattered remnants would fail to tempt him, and over a fluffy feather dual builders will fight with the utmost energy. Horse-hair, flaxlin wool, or rags excite the little couples to very daring enterprises, and a ragged dust man or loitered lay will nerve them to feats of high emprise that their hearts at any other time than spring would quail from.

"The sparrows peep, and quit the sheltering eaves
To seize the fair occasion; well they spy
The scattered grain, and, tbievishly resolved
To escape the inquisting timbine, often scared,
As oft return—a pert, voracious kind."

But they have a great end in view: nothing else, in short, than filling up a certain water pipe with rubbish, so that eventually there may be a sufficiently solid surface for the hen-bird to lay her speckled eggs upon. It does not matter to the attorbird pair that the pape is open at the other end, and that a careful house-maid accepts up daily all the fragments of cloth and straw and string which they have been laboriously dropping down into the invisible tube. Perhaps, though, they do know it, and only pretend to be ignorant of the fact, as that they may have the excuse to go on building and courting.

"Spotless hypocrite, bird obscene,
Begone; with flagging wings sit down
On some old penthouse near the town,
The brewer's stables, pork thy grain,
And with a sparrow pebbled rain,
And bear thy dirty offspring small
From hottles on a suburb wall."

At any rate, it is beyond doubt that if the sparrow's domestic arrangements are finished early, and his fatefly hatched and reared before those of his neighbors, the self-deeping bird thinks nothing—a mere trifle at most—of beginning it all over again, just to keep his friends in countenance, or to serve. A succession of nests and nestlings will thus make the small bird happy from spring to autumn; and observing how hearty that happiness is, no one can grudge the sparrow his excuse of family responsibilities. Yet, however late it may protract the conclusion of its home arrangements, the sparrow does not begin them until it is sure that spring has come

PAUL SOUTHSON.

THE LATE AMASA STONE.

On page 324 we give the portrait of the late AMASA STONE, of Cleveland, Ohio, who took his own life, on a temporary aberration of mind, on the 11th inst. Ill health, combined with large pecuniary losses, had greatly depressed his spirits of late, and he had suffered much from insomnia. Mr STONE, besides being a prominent railroad contractor, was largely interested in business enterprises. He was a gentleman of high and honorable character, a also benefactor of the poor, and greatly esteemed by all who knew him.

It is estimated that Mr STONE has left a fortune of about $12,000,000, and that his recent losses have not affected his property to any noticeable extent. Mr STONE leaves a widow and two daughters, one of them the wife of Colonel JOHN HAY.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

THE Governor of Martinique invited the wives of the prominent negroes of the island to his last official ball, and has announced that he will hereafter make no social distinction between the colored and the white people. During the later years of French rule in Hayti colored men and women were usually present at the official receptions, but in the other French West Indian colonies they have always been practically banished from the presence of the local Governors. Governor Aldegre's reasons for extending the hospitalities of his mansion to the colored people are not made known. Perhaps he is actuated solely by the absence of reasons why they should be excluded. In Hayti the negroes have the upper hand socially and politically, and those who are partly of white blood are in extreme disfavor just now, the revolutionist party being composed almost wholly of mulattoes.

An English paper says that the wife of a barber was found recently hanging by the neck from the branch of a tree near her residence, and although the facts brought forward at the inquest pointed clearly to self-destruction, the jury expressed the opinion that her death resulted from inflammation of the bowels and rheumatism in the knees This verdict does not compare favorably with that made by a Western jury in our own land—"Blode up by a biler"—which, although smiting in literary finish, had the merits of brevity, directness, and harmony with the facts.

It is said that the first use of postage stamps in the United States was in 1845, when Postmaster K A Mitchell, of New Haven, procured printed stamps, which he used for two years, until the first postage stamps were issued by the government. His idea was borrowed from England, where stamps had been in use for some time.

Disappointment is expressed in England because the famous Scotland Yard detectives have been outdone by the Birmingham police in the matter of dynamite discoveries. The Irish informers have, however, been more serviceable than even the Birmingham detectives.

An Eastern rajah has ordered to be built for him a musical contrivance which will be even better suited to the requirements of Oriental magnificence than the easy-playing barrel-organ would be. It is nothing less than a musical couch, that will begin to make music when he reclines upon it. The mind-rack is to be of rose-wood, heavily plated with embossed and engraved silver, and the mattress is to be covered with embroidered blue damask. His Highness left to the maker of this unique piece of furniture the selection of the airs which are to soothe him to sleep They are to be taken from the works of Gounod.

The recent burning of the little village of Valtheim, in Switzerland, was an event of considerable moment to one of the great industries of the earth. The matchmakers' files produced in Valtheim are or celebrated in their way as the cutlery of Sheffield. The workshops were not burned, but until new dwellings are provided for the men the work can not be resumed.

Some one who is adept for facts and figures has computed that if Madame Patti returns to the United States next season and sings for five thousand dollars a night, she will receive when singing in Lucca four dollars and forty-four cents for each breath while on the stage, four dollars and sixteen cents for each word, and one dollar and twenty-five cents for each note. He estimates that the opera requires her to be on the stage sixty two minutes, and that she will draw eighteen breaths a minute, and claims to have ascertained that she will have to sing twelve hundred words and twenty-eight hundred notes.

"Summer-resort English" is a term applied in Boston to the language or which the current descriptions of sea-side and mountain hotels are written.

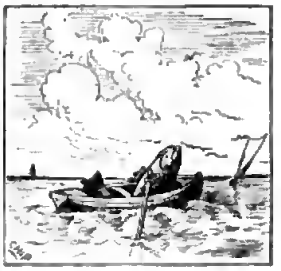
Soap-bubble parties are a new "social craze" in the West. The lady blowing the biggest bubble wins a prize. The exercise is beneficial to the lungs, though it is not to be compared with that of acting or chief bugler at a cadet school for deaf mutes.

The season opens well in respect to making quick passages across the Atlantic. A few days ago the famous Alsatia finished a westward passage in better time than she or any other vessel had ever made before. More recently the ocean steamship Normandie, which was expected to be a fast boat, fully justified expectations by finishing a voyage from Havre in, it is believed, the quickest time of which there is any record. Previously to setting out the made a trial trip of nine hundred miles, in the course of which she attained a speed of seventeen and one-fourth knots an hour.

The name of the post-office of Nope, in Dukes County, Massachusetts, was not regarded by those receiving their mail there or sufficiently pleasing to the ear; so they had it changed to Squibnocket, and are happy.

A student from the Indian Territory is in the graduating class at Roanoke College, and is to deliver his Commencement oration in the Choctaw tongue. Even the faculty won't know when to applaud.

In the first trial of her sailing qualities with another craft the handsome schooner yacht Greyling met with a mishap which will be regarded as an unlucky omen by superstitious sailors, and as merely all others are superstitious, the mishap may prove to be a serious obstacle to the performance of the good work that was expected of her The "course" in which she was caught and capsized the other day in the lower bay was an ordinary squall, however, since the Montauk escaped a similar mishap by having all sheets go by the run, and the Gracie had even a narrower escape. It was believed that the Greyling would come to the front as one of the best schooner yachts of her size afloat. Her failure to do or does not necessarily follow from her unfortunate experience at the outset of her career.



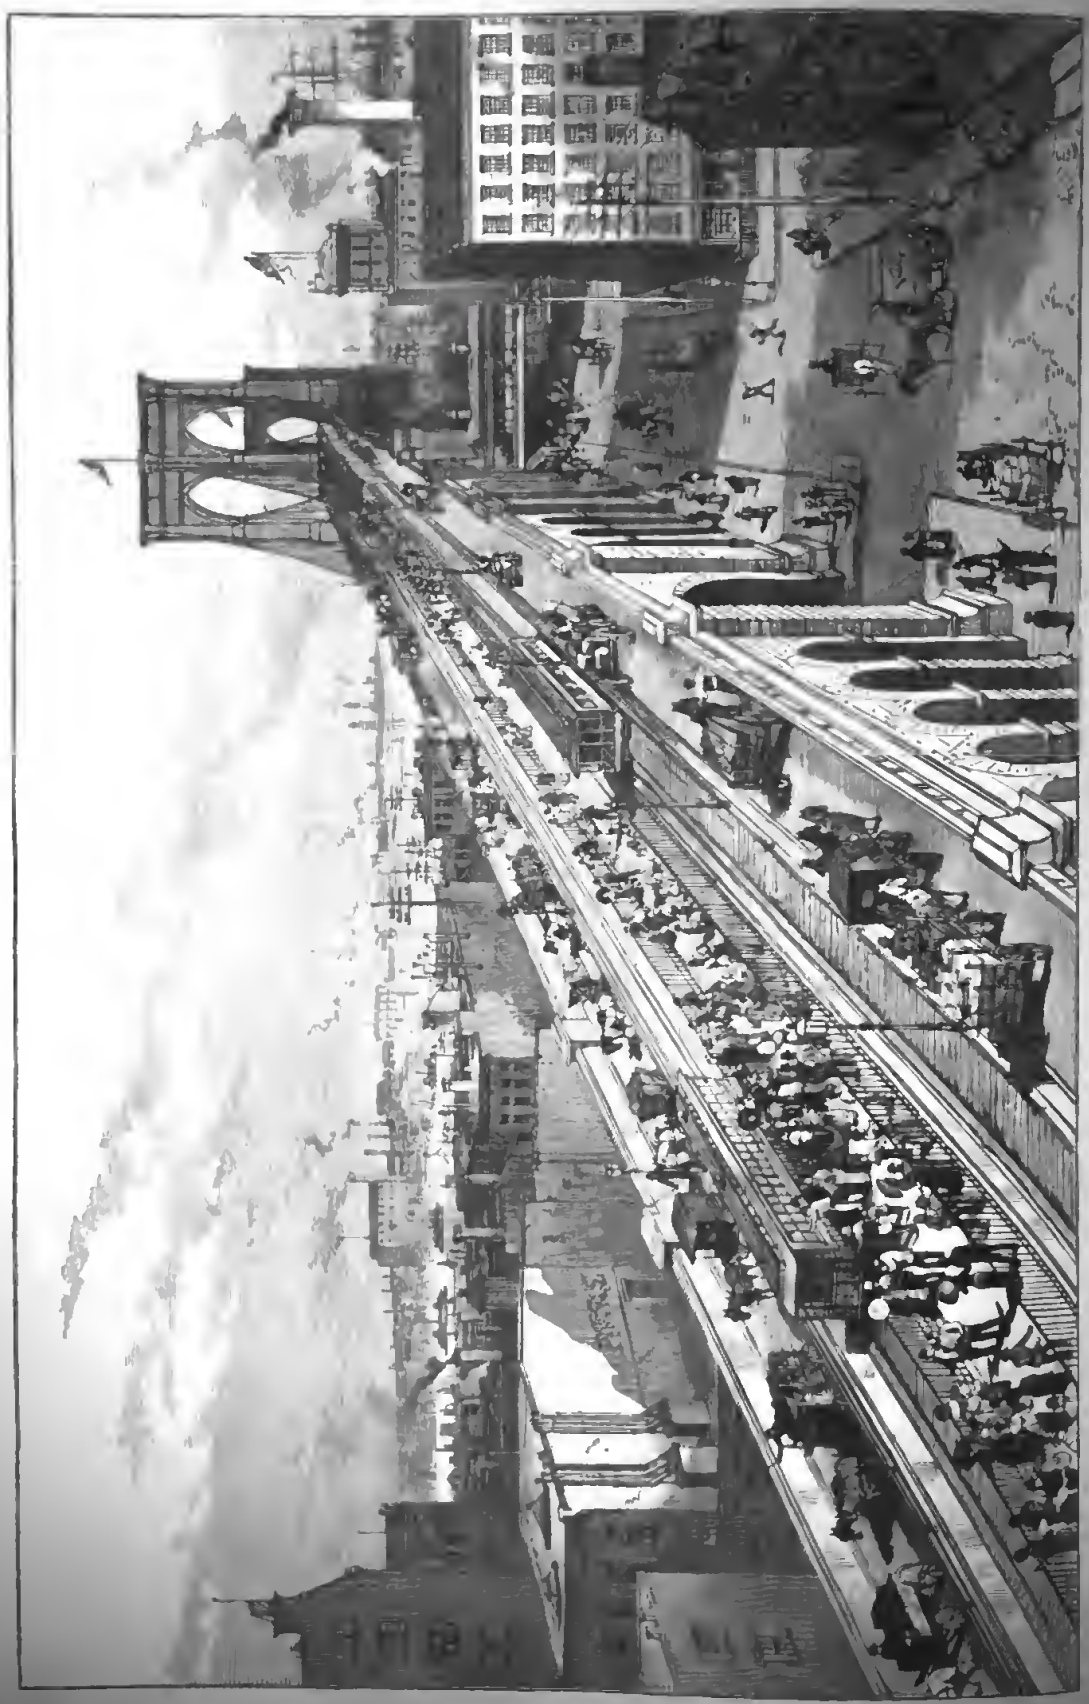
SHAD-ROW.

The new rule in respect to yachts from other waters—that they must come on their own bottoms—may obviate the arising of perplexing questions as to the privileges of English racing machines in competitions for prizes on this side of the ocean. It is not regarded as probable that the new cutter Marjorie will come to this country under sail, since she is not designed for that sort of service, and if she comes on the deck of a steamer she will need rather more room than can be conveniently found for her, besides being debarred from all contests except those in which the rule may be waived by our presumably generous yachtsmen.

A curious siphon is used in Dubuque, Iowa, for carrying sand from the river-bed to the low lots near the bank which are to be filled in. The siphon carries one-third water and one-third sand, and is pronounced a very successful device.

The Hartford Times draws a harrowing picture of a scene on the sidewalk in front of some dry-goods stores in that city on a recent Saturday afternoon. Here is is nothing Eight baby carriages drawn up in line, and no mothers or nurses near them. One of the babies screaming in the gutter almost under the feet of a horse, which was sniffing at it. Another buried beneath a great black dog that was devouring its cracker crumbs. Another, almost in apoplexy, trying to recover its best bauble, and the five others nearly frightened to death by the attentions of passing strangers. The mothers were in the stores shopping, of course.

In a recent letter to a distinguished Parsee in India, Sir George Birdwood expresses the opinion that the repulsion between the English and natives in that country is the result chiefly of the caste system of the Hindoos. He recalls the fact that when a native was made a judge in Calcutta not long ago, and was invited by the native pleaders to a dinner in honor of the event, he was not permitted to sit in the same room with his hosts, because he was of a lower division of the Brahminical caste than they, and although a judge of the Calcutta High Court, he had to sit outside with Brahmins of a lower order The fact that when a Hindoo has shaken hands with a European he must immediately wash the hand if its assumed pollution is mentioned as another reason for the lack of cordiality, and the natives' amusable treatment of a suitor is set forth or still another obstacle in the way of good-fellowship. Sir George says in the course of his letter that the repulsion is but for a time, while the attraction between the two races is forever, and adds: "We belong to the same stock, and in returning to India, after long wanderings from our common home in Central Asia, we but return to a country peopled by race of our own Aryan blood But meanwhile we have developed in a distant island of the Atlantic a highly specialized race and culture, and you, Hindoos and Hindooized Parsees and Mussulmans, an independently formed and strongly marked a race and culture of your own; while the isolation in which the race of Brahminical Hindoos has been produced in India has not been due to the Himalayas, as some argue, but has been artificially created by the Code of Manu. There is the rub."



THE NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN SUSPENSION BRIDGE—THE APPROACH OF THE NEW YORK SIDE. [See Page 331.]

THE NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN SUSPENSION-BRIDGE, FROM THE BROOKLYN SIDE.

BY CHARLES GRAHAM FROM ORIGINAL SKETCHES AND FROM PHOTOGRAPHS BY GUSELMAN.—[SEE PAGE 326.]

every word, every syllable, a sentence to his hopes! But bear to the end he must.

"You may not perhaps realize," resumed Stephana, "why the fact of Valerian becoming my lover and Christina's should transform him into a power for good or evil. Think of the moral lever that a vast fortune must ever be, and never as much so as in these days. I can not put this tremendous engine into his hands and abandon him (to mine be twofold my own creation. First, I set him among the lords of the earth; next, to give him a lordly soul. The bits of my worldly splendor must also be the inheritor of my aspirations."

"Thus Valerian will never be," retorted the listener, bitterly.

"You hear yet more to hear; I shall convince you before I have done," Stephana said, using a deeper persuasiveness and a more insinuating force. "For what are these subtle powers with which my friends accredit me? The plain meaning of such words is that I can in a very unusual degree fascinate people, bend them to a purpose in direct opposition to their own, but never to personal ends, mine. No element of my own individuality can enter into these influences. Swayed by a secret force stronger than my feeling, whether of love or joy, pity or sorrow, I move blindly, and am indeed blind as to the portion in store for myself. I can work on evil, only good, to any human being. Over my own destiny I have no power."

"But think for a moment, my own friend, this Valerian—"

"I know what you would say," interrupted Stephana, eagerly. "It is an earthen vessel. No flame of the spirit burns divinely through. I feel, I acknowledge it. Yet I must go on; if my own peace is to be sacrificed, I must show. And remember," she cried, a fine blush overspreading her pale features, and a tremor of refined-in enthusiasm swaying her voice, "with it not be a matchless piece of retribution, a superb ending to a sordid family story? The accumulated hoardings of generations, the spoils of wrestling upon wrestling, earned to noble uses in the hands of the meanest, the family honor vindicated by the diamond? Yes," she added, for a moment letting her hand rest on his, letting him feel the tears he could not see, "you who see my friend indeed, to whom I can thus unveil my inmost thoughts, you can not, you dare not, bid me draw back. The inner voice, the unspoken mandate, who may disobey?"

CHAPTER XVIII.

After that confidence the friends still saw each other almost daily, for what so often brings like to like or common service for the higher good? London was now empty, as the phrase goes. August had come, and a sulphurous pall wrapped palace and Mansard, garden and river. Not a zephyr breathed freshly from any quarter of heaven, not a flower he blow but drooped under a pallid sun. Summer was there, but summer without sweetness, an overbearing spare, on garden fragrance, on dewy shadows. Instead, language and basements, pleasure and disease, where joy and deliciousness should be.

Joy and deliciousness were showered down abundantly on the fair face of the earth just then, but not on the one of four millions. Excessive heat and drought had induced one of those epidemics which occur from time to time as if to shake the comfortable faith in human sufficiency. Skill and science seemed not at naught, and the dreaded disease that at first was "as a cloud no bigger than a man's hand" assumed by degrees stupendous and awful proportions, till it brooded, a doom and a portent, over the whole world of London. Now as first sight it would seem madness for two people to stay on calmly in a panic-stricken, pestilent place, when they might have broken themselves any moment to Edens of freshness and repose. Men and women must die. What business had they with these obscure victims of a scourge that had mercy in it, since it decimated the helpless, the starving, and the needy? But Stephana and her friend thought otherwise; and whilst frightened parents were hurrying away their children, after the manner of hens at the appearance of a hawk, whilst idlers and pleasure-seekers were trying to drive away ennui in more attractive resorts, and the more sensitive were shutting their eyes as best they could to the disagreeableness of the world generally, Stephana and her friend stood on.

They were, indeed, indispensable to each other; and had not the very opportunity come for which Markham craved? Here, almost all, was a crisis when the power he possessed and on which he prided himself could be put to really sublime uses. For the conscientious physician and the priest, do what they will, can not always infuse that courage into human hearts which is the best guarantee against impending evil. Soldiers tell us that the ball finds not the craven on the battle-field, and certain it is that the stout-hearted will often walk unscathed through deadliest infection.

Whilst Stephana, then, had hired a noble old suburban mansion, embowered in greenery, and turned it into a convalescent home for the sick, the blind story-teller was doing his best to keep up the spirits of those who were well. What may not a word do? and the stimulus of his melodic and bright calm eloquence came as a substitute for bracing sea-breezes, farse yard sights and sounds, and all the beauty and freshness of the world that is not London. The sea, the moor, the country, were but names to most of his hearers, but all could laugh and weep at the stories he told them, now bringing fairy land before the little Smithfield children, now lifting the faint in spirit by some moving episode, now holding bereaved ones spell-bound by weird, romantic improvisation. Narrative, parable, allegory, dialogue, one and all he used by turns, with themes as various, and words ever new. Yet wherein lay the glamour? Was it the glow of feeling, the rapture of fancy, that enthralled his listeners, to the mere mechanical part of the performance—exquisite training of voice, choice phraseology, intimable elocution? All yet none of these. The poor, pinched, toiling souls who listened to him were enchanted simply because it was the first time they had heard a story in their lives. The veil was lifted from the ideal world. A blind man had revealed to them the existence of things unseen, the duality of human life!

"Ah," he said, one evening, when alone with Stephana, after an unusually hard day, "we shall never live such hours as these any more. I am yours and you are mine by virtue of the mortal woes that have brought us together, but when the sun shines out from the clouds you will disappear, perhaps never to cross my path again."

"Have no fear on that score," Stephana said, with gentle consolation in her voice. "You are bound to cross my path whenever I have need of you. My bond will never be broken."

He shook his head. "You can not, like the loving god, be immortal one day and summon clay the next. This marriage must drag you down, whether you will or no."

"Why should we talk of it?" cried Stephana, impatiently. "Why some men and women perpetually have love and marriage on their lips, as if the supreme end and purpose of existence were to love, to marry, and to die? You, at least, stand on higher ground, and take in wider horizons."

"Pardon me—a thousand times I ask your pardon," he said. "I will never, never breathe the subject again, if you promise me one little thing."

"A promise? What human being ever kept a promise? And why give it only to break?"

"No, you would not break it. Listen, then, my own friend, and accord the request or no. That is as you please. The name of Valerian in connection with yours shall never pass my lips again. Well, it is a small thing I ask. If—if"—he hesitated, painfully, and at last stammered out the words—"if your magnanimous project, from any unforeseen cause, is never carried out, should you reject Valerian, should you feel the need of a trusty friend—as a friend only I venture to petition—summon me to your side by a wish."

"Why by anything so unsubstantial?" smiled Stephana. "Is there not paper and ink, a letter-carrier to boot? I will write to you with my proper hands."

"No, these are common means, and oft-times treacherous too! You could hardly write the thought of your mind, and it is the secret wish of your inmost heart I would hear. No more one line."

"And how could I be sure that it would reach you?" asked Stephana, still inclined to raillery. "The winds of heaven might blow it as another direction. Forgive me, dear friend! I am on and as heart that I must be merry. These harrowing scenes I go through day after day, the ache of misery ever before me? Oh! ask me nothing to-day; only be kind to me, only help me with silent comfort. I must marry Valerian, but it is you I would fain have with me always."

Was not such a confession enough to satisfy any lover? Markham flushed from cheek to brow, but said no word more. The deep, unspoken sadness of Stephana's soul had penetrated his own. He felt at last lifted, and for a brief moment, to those serene spheres in which she lived and moved and had her being. He also must brace himself up to an act of supreme renunciation. For him also the best part of life was to give, asking no reward.

Stephana needed kindness indeed, and calloused-ness on her friend's part also, for she was weary in brain and body. A strange sight was that devoted pair, she on knees not tender, he helpless, yet so strong, to day after day set out on their errand of mercy. Stephana would inspect one fever-stricken court after another, to see that there was no orphan unhoused, or dead awaiting its last resting place, or sick to be carried away. And whilst she made her rounds the blind man would find an audience, half a dozen children it might be, or two or three aged-bearded mothers with babes at their breast, or old men past work, past thieving, past beggary even: on matter whom, every one was so ready to listen as he to speak. These hollow-eyed, sallow-faced people had no religion. What religion could take hold of natures starved, deadened, materialized by misery? But if they knew nothing of Christ and redemption, they could understand the gospel of magnanimous human kindness. They were aware of that shining thing we call goodness, and it warmed them and almost gladdened them, if, indeed, misery can be ever glad.

Nor did Markham's serviceableness end here. In Stephana's mansion, filled now from cellar to attic with guests of the humbler sort, he found plenty of occupation. The poor valetudinarians lounging under the trees, or looking out for the first time in their lives on green lawns set with standard roses, sadly needed amusement, and there was the blind story-teller with his well-stored memory ever ready. Story after story they now heard for the first time. Robinson Crusoe and Gulliver, the Pilgrim's Progress and Boccaccio, were laid under contribution, to say nothing of Prince Camaralzaman and his sixty brothers, Penelope's web, and last but first, the champion of the windmills and knight of Dulcinea del Toboso. Wonderful to think how dull the world can be that possesses all these! So August and September passed, and with October ended their ordeal. Stephana and her companion came through it unscathed, as often will it happen that more valiancy keepeth alive. They had been as soldiers on a battle-field in the thick of the fight, but a thousand bullets had passed them by.

"This is to be no long parting?" Markham asked, after a long confabulation on the eve of separation.

"True friends are never parted," Stephana answered, reproachfully. "We shall often hear from each other; we shall hear each other as mind."

She smiled, adding, with a mixture of playfulness and solemnity: "I have not forgotten your request. Whenever I need you there shall be neither sign nor letter. You will heed obsequious to my will."

"Can I do otherwise?" he said, raising her hand to his lips. "And as soon as I have fulfilled the mission you have just intrusted to me, I may surely seek you unasked and unbidden?"

"Most surely," Stephana made reply. "I shall look for you with impatience. The matter confided to you is one I have most at heart."

"After Valerian."

"After Christina and Valerian. I go to them now on a double quest, a twofold behest. How strange is life!"

"Strange and sad, yet sweet," he said. "At least it would be no were there no Valerian."

"Think no more of him, my friend. Be happy. Be my best helper."

Thus they parted, not lovers, certes, but how much more than friends!

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THE RACE MEETING AT ROCKAWAY.

There was an auspicious inauguration of the season for out door sports in and about the city on Saturday, May 12. Athletic games, contests of speed by bicyclists, rowing races, contests of skill at lawn tennis, base-ball, and lacrosse, rifle-shooting at Creedmoor, and trotting at the various tracks or "on the road," were among the outdoor recreations that the great world of society patronized, participated in, and enjoyed. But to that world accustomed for months past to find its entertainment in palatial residences on Murray Hill, at Delmonico's, or at the Academy of Music, and which will soon seek Newport, Saratoga, the White Mountains, or the Adirondacks, the chief event was the opening of the racing season by the Rockaway Hunt Club at its preserves at Hempstead, Far Rockaway. Nearly a thousand people were in the party from this city when it witnessed the races, in which, with one exception, their acquaintances of social circles were the riders. The day was auspicious, the locality picturesque. Meadows, hills, and the trees, not dense enough to be called forests even by the possessor of a vivid imagination, were resplendent in their spring dress of green. The blue sky gave a quiet background. There was sufficient color in the lovely country scene, with its picturesque farm houses and its grazing cattle, surprised in their afternoon ennui by the sudden invasion from the city. The color was supplied by groups of ladies elaborately dressed in costumes in which the art of the modiste vainly tried to rival the bounties of nature's endowment, in the gaudily painted four-in-hand coaches, and in the riders wearing collectively all the colors that made Joseph's coat famous in the days when the world was young.

It was an common race meeting that at Rockaway. There were many present who are frequently seen at the great racing events at Saratoga, Jerome Park, or Monmouth Beach. But this meeting had more of the character of a racing day at Newport. There were a few falls, but neither horses nor riders were injured, though the riding was more daring—reckless, perhaps—than that of professional jockeys. There was no track save that laid out by nature and the country highway builder. Rail fences served in part as hurdles. The course was over meadows and up and down gently sloping hills, and on a bottom that needed both nerve and skill to successfully guide a horse over it. The races with their falls, the refusal of several horses to leap the hurdles, the keen determination shown by each rider to win, and the sharp breaks at the finish made them both exciting and interesting. The strong-limbed polo ponies, the ungainly farmers' punts, and the graceful, high spirited hunters seemed to enjoy the sport as thoroughly as did their en apeutier satin waisted, shirt-sleeved and horse-spun-trowsered, and pink-coated riders. The latter, resplendent in their pink coats, high hats, white knee-breeches, and buff-topped patent-leathers, were favorites with the ladies. The cast-while much-admired gentlemen riders, spurred on by the smiles of fair women, rode on well as to prove that "blood will tell" in riding across country as it has in riding to battle. This despite the fact that Mr. Edward James Spencer couldn't make Tommy Tucker leap his kurdle. This incident, however, was fun for outsiders, though awkward for Mr. Spencer, and furnished as much amusement as any incident, unless it was that of the farmers' race, where Puck threw the plebeian rider, veritably "landing him a winner," as sporting men delight in commonly saying a jockey does his horse. The winners of the races in which gentlemen riders participated were: hunters' half-mile flat race, Gordon Wood's Mercury; polo ponies' race, Stanley Mortimer's Incognita; the pink-coat race, Gordon Wood's Bombaso; the half-bred qualified hunters' race, Gordon Wood's Fleurette; the qualified hunters' race, Stanley Hewlett's Robson's Choice.

Field-sports as fairly inaugurated will occupy attention until cold weather sets in. The gymnasium and riding-schools, the racquet-courts and fencing-rooms, have closed their doors, and their habitués have deserted them for the green fields, the shady drives, and the more or less placid waters, for exercise and recreation. The field-sports of to-day are under the management of gentlemen. The characteristics ominously identified with sports have been relegated to the field of brutality occupied by prize-fighters, dog fighters, and chicken fighters. It is no longer a reason for exclusion from society of even the gambler that a lady is an attendant upon or a patroness of the sports of the field. She may even participate in some. This fact has done much—very much—to elevate the character of all outdoor amusements. The athletic clubs, with their membership including many of the best of our young men, have done more, for the example set here has been followed throughout the country. A proficiency in field-sports is considered a credit to a young man. That such a state of affairs has come to exist that people of the gentler classes have made these recreations their own in a measure, is fortunate indeed for coming generations. A bit more of the Hercules than the Adonis in young men, of the Diana than the Venus in young women, wedding the best elements of the two in each case, every social economist will acknowledge to be desirable.

Attention to athletic sports but almost become a portion of the necessary training of every college or seminary student. Walking clubs, canoe clubs, bicycle, boating, lawn tennis, archery, hunting, fishing, and gun clubs, and sportsmen's associations, the latter frequently owning large preserves for hunting or fishing, or both, count their active members in the best society of all the several centres of the country. Ladies are often members of such of these as make sports in which they can participate a specialty. Where such is not the case the ladies have their own equestrian, pedestrian, lawn tennis, archery, boating, and croquet clubs. The laurels upon health from late hours and loss of rest resultant upon attention to society's demands not offset in a great measure by these health-restoring recreations. Better far than any medicine are they when not indulged to to excess. Better fitted for life's duties and society's exactions she who finds pleasure in such recreation returns to her home than she who memorizes the year away the summer days in an ultra-fashionable summer resort. That mandate of society which permits a woman to wear and use a wide-necked, broad brimmed walking hat, and permits her to take needed exercise, is one that will long be remembered with gratitude by such as have found participation in out-of-door recreations to be a cure for insomnia, a relief from ennui.

C. T. Brooks.

KELLY'S "PAUL REVERE."

Lord Rosebery, while passing a season here some years ago, was very partial to his horse and Central Park. On more than one occasion, while rounding a point of his in the bridle-path at full run, an observer came one, only partially concealed in the thin semi, shrubbery, catching on or our horses with eager interest. Finding him there one day as I rode alone, I took the liberty to demand what he was about. I found him to be a shy and modest young artist, who was trying to model a horse in motion—a new proposition entirely in his department of art. But I am sure every one who has seen his statuette of Sheridan's ride will say confidently that the bold undertaking proved successful as it was original. This young man, hiding there in the shrubbery all summer by the bridle-path in order to correctly catch the motion of a horse in full gallop, has now done a new piece of work. And it is one in every sense—new in conception, new in art.

Observe the complete story here in the first place. Revere has just landed. The cable is tightened about the post. We know that the hastily abandoned boat swings in the river at the fees of the eager and impetuous Paul, a foot to the stirrup, his lifted face is thrown back over his shoulder, wild with excitement and the work before him. He sees the light: His soul is in his eyes, his gathered brows, his patriotic and fervid face. The one foot is lifted, and yet the other, so full of force and spring, scarcely is on the earth. Then he clutches the mane—the mane, mind you, not the rein, as a slow and school-taught rider would, but his hand is drowned in the flowing mane; he is literally a part of the horse. The heat and the excitement of the time have fused them together, as a Comanche is made a part of his horse in battle, as every real, natural rider is in any time of tremendous trial.

And consider this horse: his nostrils too are extended and in the air; his very foot not in the air with the intensity of the action that is in him; his heart is so much in the work before him that you can see every muscle waiting the will of the master. And this giving of some honor and action to this noblest animal appeals strongly to me, and makes me full of gratitude toward the man who has done this, for if not quite born on the back of a horse, I was certainly reared there, and I know how entirely true he is, how worthy. But the sculptor has either despised the horse thus far, or despaired of giving him real action. We all praise the colossal bronze which supports Marcus Aurelius on the Capitoline, and the guide-books gravely tell us to observe the delicate tracing of the veins on the horse's nose. But the horse, and all other horses, are to that, from this one ancient and ugly figure at Rome down to Kelly's statuette of Sheridan's ride, are very wooden things.

The poet, however, has been more just to the horse. Lord Byron has done more than all sculptors of the Old World to describe him well in these eight words:

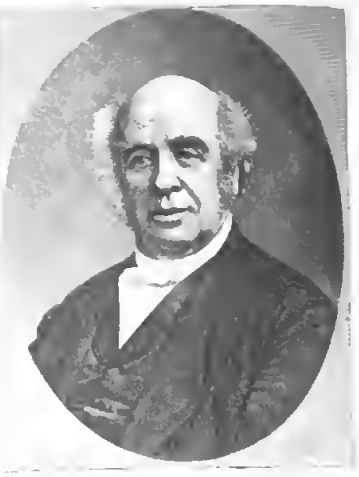
"The speed of thought was in his limbs."

But it is in the Book of Job where you find justice done most entirely to this best and noblest friend of man. And looking at this Paul Revere ideal, I can easily imagine that Kelly had these lines in his heart as he shaped and fashioned his clay, for the rear of war was in the air and in the ears of rider and horse: "He saith among the trumpets, Ha, ha! and he smelleth the battle afar off, the thunder of the captains, and the shouting."

Joaquin Miller.

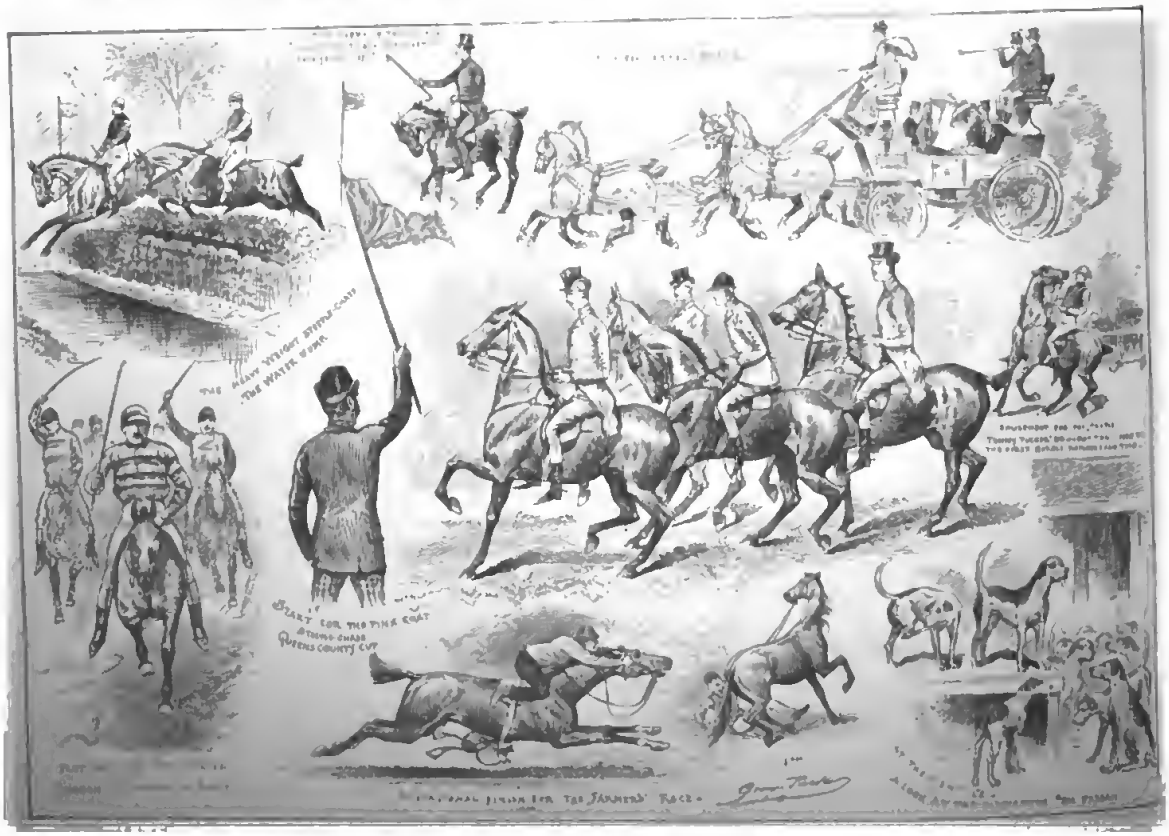
New York, May, 1888.

DESIGN FOR A STATUE OF PAUL REVERE.—By James E. Kelly.—[See Page 331.]



THE LATE BISHOP PECK.

The Rev. Jesse T. Peck, D.D., LL.D., one of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, whose death occurred at Syracuse, New York, on May 17, was one of a famous ministerial family. His brother, the Rev. Dr. George Peck, who deceased, was one of the leaders of the Methodist host in the storm period extending from 1844 to 1854, other brothers also were Methodist ministers. Dr. Peck was born in Middlefield, Otsego County, New York, April 4, 1811. His paternal and his maternal grandfathers were both Revolutionary soldiers. His education was received at Cazenovia Seminary, where his brother, the Rev. Almon Peck, was principal. In 1832 he joined the Oneida Conference, and served as pastor till 1837, when he was appointed professor of Genesee or Wesleyan Seminary; in 1841 he became principal of the Troy Conference Seminary, at Poultney, Vermont. In 1844 the General Conference was held which brought the slavery controversy to a crisis, and was followed by the division of the Methodist Episcopal Church into a Northern and a Southern body. During the debates on this Conference Dr. Jesse Peck distinguished himself by a speech of unusual brilliance and power, which brought him to the front rank of Methodist ministers. From 1848 to 1852 he was President of Dickinson College. In 1851 he was made Secretary and editor of the Tract Society, to fill the unexpired term of the Rev. Abel Stevens, then in Europe. In 1856 he returned to the pastorate, and was stationed in New York city, and San Francisco, Sacramento, and Santa Cruz, California. Upon his return to the Eastern States Dr. Peck was stationed at Peekskill, Albany, and Syracuse. In the last city he became one of the founders of the Syracuse University. In 1872 he was elected Bishop.



THE RACE MEETING AT ROCKAWAY, LONG ISLAND.—Drawn by C. Gray Parker.—[See Page 331.]

1. Securing a "Take." 2. Getting within Range. 3. O mirabile visu! 4. The coup de grâce. 5. Position requiring a Sneeze. 6. Homeward bound.

SUNFISH-SHOOTING.

SUNFISH-SHOOTING OFF THE WEST COAST OF IRELAND.

The sunfish is, as regards its general appearance, truly a "creation" in the fish tribe. One of its most frequent haunts is off the wild and rocky coasts of the west of Ireland. Its length varies from five to nearly seven feet from the nose to the tail, if indeed such an apology for a caudal appendage may be called a tail. It is from three to four and a half feet in depth, from seven to nine feet in girth, and its extreme thickness varies from one and a half to two feet. When full grown these fish attain to an enormous weight, specimens having been killed which were estimated to weigh over a ton. The sunfish make their appearance on the west coast of Ireland as soon as the warm weather begins. They are gregarious for the greater part of the season, moving about in "schools" in numbers varying from five to ten; but as the autumn draws on they are more frequently to be met with singly.

On a warm day, when the sea is calm these fish may be observed lazily gliding through the water, with their great dorsal fins projecting from the surface. Or they may as frequently be seen basking on the surface with sea gulls perching on their backs, and picking at the parasites which they find upon the huge monsters.

When struck with a bullet just at the butt of the dorsal fin the movements of this great fish are truly wonderful. At one moment he will turn round and round, churning the water into masses of foam. Bullet after bullet is then fired into the fish, the chain being easily obtained, since the fish usually remains at the surface if the first shot between the fin and backbone has been successful.

In the case before us the fish, after receiving the fifth shot, disappeared bodily, leaving a large space of water white with foam and flecked with blood. Yet only for a minute. Not many yards in front of the boat our piscine friend, O mirabile visu! suddenly burst up from the water and rose four or five feet into the air, and then striking the water with its expansive side caused a tremendous report.

After receiving eight shots the fish finally succumbed, and while one of the boat's crew held up the defunct brute with a gaff, an other fastened a rope to one of its fins, and then the prize was towed to shore. Yet the fish is comparatively valueless, for, notwithstanding its great size, very little oil is obtained from its liver, the average quantity being about four gallons. As a sport it takes a prominent place among its natures, and, moreover, little skill is required, for if one can prove his ability to hit a fair-sized hay-rick at the distance of ten yards, he may make pretty certain of hitting the ugly monkish, if he be not overcome by excitement.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE
IN LIVER AND KIDNEY TROUBLES.

Dr. O. G. Cilley, Boston, says: "I have used it with the most remarkable success in dyspepsia and derangement of the liver and kidneys."—[Adv.]

GREAT HORSE MEDICINE.

No horse need die of colic if Dr. Tobias's Venetian Liniment is on hand when first taken. A single dose revives an overheated horse, and puts new life into him. It quickly cures Galls, Sprains, Old Sores, Scratches, Sore Throats, etc. The Derby Condition Powders are used by the best horsemen in the country. They are no cheap articles, but the best ingredients that can be purchased, and perfectly innocent; 25 cents per box.

They cure Distemper, Loss of Appetite, Worms, Bots, Coughs, Hide-Bound, give a Fine Coat, and Cleanse the Urine; 25 cents per box. The Family Liniment is 25 and 50 cents per bottle, the Horse 50 cents. Sold by the druggists and saddlers. Depot, 42 Murray St.

One thousand certificates from prominent horsemen can be seen at the depot.—[Adv.]

BURNETT'S COCOAINE,

The Best and Cheapest Hair Dressing. It kills dandruff, allays irritation, and promotes a vigorous growth of the Hair. Burnett's Flavoring Extracts are invariably acknowledged the purest and best.—[Adv.]

Sweet Breath.—Offensive Breath made sweet as a rose. Purifies the stomach. Try Dr. Jas. X. Knight's Stomach Powder. By mail—Price 50 cents; large size $1. Address P.O. Box 1845, N. Y. City.—[Adv.]

Thousands of people testify to the merits of Piso's Cure for Consumption.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1878.

BAKER'S CHOCOLATES

Baker's Premium Chocolate, the best preparation of plain chocolate for family use.—Baker's Breakfast Cocoa, from which the excess of oil has been removed; easily digested and admirably adapted for invalids.—Baker's Vanilla Chocolate, as a drink or eaten as confectionery is a delicious article; highly recommended by tourists.—Baker's Broma, invaluable as a diet for children.—German Sweet Chocolate, a most excellent article for families.

Sold by Grocers everywhere.

W. BAKER & CO.,
Dorchester, Mass.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. FINEST AND CHEAPEST MEAT FLAVORING STOCK FOR SOUPS, MADE DISHES, AND SAUCES.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. An invaluable and palatable tonic in all cases of weak digestion and debility. "Is a success and a boon for which nations should feel grateful."—See "Medical Press," "Lancet," "British Medical Journal," &c.
CAUTION.—Genuine only with the fac-simile of Baron Liebig's Signature in Blue Ink across the Label. This caution is necessary, owing to various cheap and inferior substitutes being in the market.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. To be had of all Storekeepers, Grocers, and Chemists. Sole Agents for the United States (wholesale only), C. DAVID & CO., 9 Fenchurch Avenue, London, England.

Sold wholesale in New York by PARK & TILFORD, SMITH & VANDERBEEK, ACKER, MERRALL, & CONDIT, McKESSON & ROBBINS, H. K. & F. B. THURBER & CO., W. H. SCHIEFFELIN & CO.

SUPERIOR FISHING TACKLE.

We offer a fine 3-joint Fly Rod, 15-yard Brass Reel, 100-ft. Linen Line, 3 Flies, 3 Hooks to gut, and Leader, complete, by express, for $3 00; by mail, postpaid, $3 50. Sample flies by mail postpaid, 10c. each; per dozen, $1 00. 1 three-piece Trout Rod, 1 Float, 1 Brass Reel, 100 ft. Linen Line, ½ dozen Hooks, 1 Sinker, 1 Gut Leader, all for $2 75.

Just published, the largest and most complete Catalogue of all sporting goods ever issued—as Lawn-Tennis, Base-Ball, Archery, Cricket, Foot-Ball, Fishing, Boating, and Gymnasium and Fireman's Goods, and all the latest novelties. 325 large pages, 2000 illustrations, on fine tinted paper. Price, by mail, 25 cts.

PECK & SNYDER, 126 to 130 Nassau St., N. Y.

THE ACME LEVER CUFF BUTTONS

Overcome all trouble with

STIFF CUFFS.

Ask your Jeweller for them, and

TAKE NO OTHER.

DAKOTA.

Quick, safe, and sure investments for capitalists as residents in Oriska, Barnes County, Dakota. A new town on Northern Pacific Railroad, at crossing of N. W., twenty miles west of Dalrymple Farm. Splendid opening for Merchants in every line. Mechanics in demand; wages good. Well-settled country, in the the famous wheat belt. Correspondence solicited. References: Bates, Reed, & Cooley, New York. Reid & Leather Nat. Bank, Chicago. Address PERKINS, ROBBINS, & CO., Bankers, Oriska, Dakota.

BEFORE YOU BUY A BICYCLE
Of any kind, send stamp to GUMP BROS., Dayton, Ohio, for large Illustrated Price List of new and Second-Hand Machines.

LUNDBORG'S
RHENISH COLOGNE.

THE GREAT SAUCE OF THE WORLD.

LEA & PERRINS'

Imparts the most delicious taste and zest to

EXTRACT of a LETTER from a MEDICAL GENTLEMAN at Madras, to his brother at WORCESTER, May, 1851.
"Tell LEA & PERRINS that their sauce is highly esteemed in India, and is in my opinion, the most palatable, as well as the most wholesome sauce that is made."

SOUPS,
GRAVIES,
FISH,
HOT & COLD MEATS,
GAME, &c.

Lea & Perrins

Signature is on every bottle of GENUINE
WORCESTERSHIRE SAUCE.
Sold and used throughout the world.

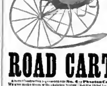
JOHN DUNCAN'S SONS,
AGENTS FOR THE UNITED STATES,
NEW YORK.

Universally prescribed by the Faculty.

TAMAR INDIEN GRILLON

A laxative and refreshing Fruit Lozenge for Constipation, bile, headache, hemorrhoids, cerebral congestion, &c. Prepared by E. GRILLON, Sole Proprietor, Pharmacien de 1re Classe de la Faculté de Paris, 27, rue Rambuteau, Paris. Sold by all Druggists. TAMAR, unlike pills and the usual purgatives, is agreeable to take, and never produces irritation.

THE BRADLEY



ROAD CART

A large illustration is presented of our No. 4 or Phaeton Cart. We also make them with skeleton bodies ... for jogging horses or breaking colts. Our No. 2, or Single Park Cart is used very extensively by Gentlemen Drivers to speed-up on the road or track, weighs 100 lbs., and so handsomely finished ...

THREE STYLES weighing from 80 to 160 lbs. Prices from $35 to $60.
Send for Illustrated Price List.

BRADLEY & CO. SYRACUSE, N. Y. ESTABLISHED 1832.

THE ANTI-STYLOGRAPH
(MEARSON'S PATENT, U.S.A., JAN. 10, 1882.)

A self-feeding reservoir pen, writes continuously with any ink and by means of a pen with ordinary nib.

PENS TO REFILL, (Fine, Medium, or Broad Pointed), 60c. PER BOX.

MAY BE CARRIED IN THE POCKET WITHOUT LEAKING AND IS READY FOR IMMEDIATE USE

THE ORDINARY CHARACTERISTICS OF THE HANDWRITING ARE ENTIRELY PRESERVED

$1.00 POCKET SIZE REQUIRES NO ADJUSTMENT

$1.50 DESK SIZE PEN RENEWABLE AT PLEASURE

FITTED WITH A NON-CORRODIBLE PEN.
Same in construction and not liable to get out of order.

POCKET SIZE $2.50 PALLADIUM PEN DESK SIZE $3.00
Flexible as Steel, durable as Gold

SOLD BY ALL STATIONERS.

THOS. DE LA RUE & CO.
MANUFACTURERS & SOLE LICENSEES,
LONDON, PARIS, AND NEW YORK.

IMPROVED METALLIC WEATHER COTTAGE.

The appearance of the little man foretells storms. The little woman predicts fair weather. They never make mistakes. A correct thermometer attached. Sent postpaid for $1 20. Address

E. GOLDBACHER,
Optician, 98 Fulton Street, N.Y.

WANTED. A practical Book Agent to assume the management of the subscription department in a publishing house. Address stating experience,
P.O. Box 2241, Philadelphia, Pa.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address H. Hallett & Co., Portland, Maine.

30 Fine White Gold-Edge Cards, name on, 10c. Sample Book, 25c. M. Shaw & Co., Jersey City, N. J.

NEW STORE.

Le Boutillier Bros.,
Of 23d Street.

BLACK SILKS.

The best and most reliable in the market, at $1 00, $1 25, $1 50, and $2 00.

BLACK SATIN RHADAMES—the best value ever offered. Present prices, 85c. to $1 25; former prices, $1 50 to $2 50.

COLORED SILK AND COLORED SATIN RHADAMES at $1 00, $1 25, and $1 50. These are 25 per cent. under regular prices.

SUMMER SILKS in large variety at greatly reduced figures.

PINK ALL-WOOL double-width Dress Goods at specially low prices.

250 Pieces SCOTCH GINGHAMS, 20c. per yard.

300 Pieces FINEST SCOTCH GINGHAMS, 32 inches wide, at 25c. per yard. The lowest prices these goods have ever been sold for are 50c. and 35c.

Prompt and careful attention to all Mail Orders. SAMPLES SENT.

IT WILL PAY YOU TO SHOP BY MAIL.

Please note the address:

LE BOUTILLIER BROS.,
Of 23d Street.
31 & 33 West 23d Street, New York.

Messrs. JAMES McCREERY & CO.

Have now open their season's stock of plain and fancy

BLACK GRENADINES,

In Velvet, Ecosse, Armure, and Hernani.

The plain Grenadines, in all-silk and silk-and-wool, are warranted not to slip or change color.

JAMES McCREERY & CO.,
Broadway, corner 11th St.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

HOSIERY.

The latest novelty, "Gussetted Feet," Plain and Ribbed Balbriggan and Cotton Hose, for Ladies and Children. Also, a complete stock of the best quality manufactured in "Gauze Silk," Merino, and Cashmere Undershirts and Drawers, for Ladies, Gentlemen, and Children.

Broadway and 19th St.

DRY GOODS BY MAIL Delivered in any part of the United States at Boston Prices. ... Send Postal for samples of these goods. Silks, Woolens, from the largest and finest stock in the country. Write! Jordan, Marsh & Co. Boston, Mass.

AGENTS WANTED FOR THE COUNTRY WHO can make from $5 to $20 a day. Send for circular and terms. WM. HESS, Artist, 107 Walker St., N. Y.

CARDS New Styles: Gold Beveled Edge and Chromo Visiting Cards finest quality, largest variety and lowest prices. 50 chromos with name 10c., a present with each order. Clinton Bros & Co., Clintonville, Conn.

IT PAYS to sell our Hand Rubber Stamps. Samples free. Foljambe & Co., Cleveland, O.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

REASONS WHY MRS. THOMPSON'S PATENT WAVES ARE BETTER THAN ALL OTHERS.

1.—The PATENT SPRING conforms itself in shape to EVERY head.
2.—They DO NOT HAVE A FALSE, wiggy look, as all others have.
3.—They ... true or break apart ... IDEAS of any thing made.
4.—They CANNOT WRINKLE or SHRINK with dampness, so keep their shape for years.
5.—They do not fade so quickly, for they don't require dressing so often as others.
6.—They are only dressed with a WAVE COMB, when they get STRAIGHT, and are by ... to order for a good and lasting dressing.
7.—I GUARANTEE EVERY ONE to be CURLY HAIR, or refund the money if not.
8.—MOST IMPORTANT: Every lady can look young and attractive with a THOMPSON WAVE, as they do ... than they look ten years younger.
9.—As I have 150 different styles of THOMPSON WAVES, every lady can be provided.

PRICES from $6 to $12 (Blond and Gray extra). Also, the most ELEGANT ASSORTMENT of SWITCHES, from $5 to $50. GRAY HAIR A SPECIALTY.

☞ Beware of parties endeavoring to sell you Waves representing them to be the Thompson Wave, as I do not allow any other Dealer to sell my goods.

SEND FOR CATALOGUE TO HEADQUARTERS TO

MRS. C. THOMPSON,
No. 32 East 14th Street, NEW YORK.

"I owe my Restoration to Health and Beauty to the CUTICURA REMEDIES."

Testimonial of a Boston lady.

DISFIGURING Humors, Humiliating Eruptions, Itching Tortures, Scrofula, Salt Rheum, and Infantile Humors cured by the Cuticura Remedies.

Cuticura Resolvent, the new blood purifier, cleanses the blood and perspiration of impurities and poisonous elements, and thus removes the cause.

Cuticura, the great Skin Cure, instantly allays Itching and Inflammation, clears the Skin and Scalp, heals Ulcers and Sores, and restores the Hair.

Cuticura Soap, an exquisite Skin Beautifier and Toilet Requisite, prepared from Cuticura, is indispensable in treating Skin Diseases, Baby Humors, Skin Blemishes, Sunburn, and Greasy Skin.

Cuticura Remedies are absolutely pure, and the only infallible Blood Purifiers and Skin Beautifiers.

Sold everywhere. Price, Cuticura, 50 cents; Soap, 25 cents; Resolvent, $1.

Potter Drug and Chemical Co., Boston, Mass.

THE DINGEE & CONARD CO'S
BEAUTIFUL EVER-BLOOMING

ROSES

The only establishment making a SPECIAL BUSINESS of ROSES. 60 LARGE HOUSES for ROSES alone. Strong Pot Plants suitable for immediate bloom delivered safely, postpaid, to any post-office. 5 splendid varieties, your choice, all labeled, for $1; 12 for $2; 19 for $3; 26 for $4; 35 for $5; 75 for $10; 100 for $13. We GIVE a Handsome Present of choice and valuable ROSES free with every order. Our NEW GUIDE, a complete Treatise on the Rose, 70 pp., elegantly illustrated—free to all.

THE DINGEE & CONARD CO.
Rose Growers, West Grove, Chester Co., Pa.

Buffalo Lithia Water,

A powerful solvent of Stone in the Bladder. Invaluable in Bright's Disease of the Kidneys; specific in Gout and Rheumatism; highly efficacious in Acid Dyspepsia, &c. Endorsed by Dr. J. Marion Sims, Dr. Wm. A. Hammond (late Surgeon-General U. S. Army), and other eminent medical men. Water, in cases of one dozen half-gallon bottles, $5 00 per case at the Springs. Spring pamphlet sent to any address.

W. H. SCHIEFFELIN & CO., } Agents,
CASWELL, HAZARD, & CO., } New York City.

THOS. F. GOODE, Proprietor,
Buffalo Lithia Springs, Virginia.

TAKE THE VERY BEST

EUROPE EDUCATIONAL EXCURSIONS

1883, Combining Unequalled Advantages.
Send for Descriptive Circular, Free.
E. TOURJEE, Franklin Square, Boston.

WANTED 8 or 10 successful BOOK AGENTS of pluck and enterprise to operate as GENERAL AGENTS to hire and train others to introduce a NEW WORK of extraordinary merit and great salability. Positions are worth $1,200 to $2,000 a year. Address, giving full particulars of experience, &c., HUBBARD BROS. 723 Chestnut St., Phila. Pa.

CARDS Send two 3c. stamps for fine new set of six "GILT PALETTES." WHITING, 50 Nassau St., N. Y.

$72 A WEEK. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly Outfit free. Address True & Co., Augusta, Maine.

BOSS' PATENT GOLD WATCH CASES
Economy! Strength! Durability! ELEGANT DESIGNS! GUARANTEED for 20 Years!

40 Chromo Visiting Cards, no 2 alike, for 1883, name on, and Illustrated Premium List, 10c. Warranted best sold. Agents wanted. L. Jones & Co., Nassau, N. Y.

THE BOOK DREAM

CARDS. An Elegant New Set of Cards for 3c. stamp. W. H. PRINGLE, Rochester, N. Y.

AGENTS can now grasp a fortune. Outfit worth $10 free. Address E. G. RIDEOUT & Co., 10 Barclay St., N. Y.

50 Large Chromos, New and pretty as ever published. Name on, 10c. VANN & CO., New Haven, Conn.

THE PREMIUM
to the Wives of Grocers has been pronounced by all who have seen it to be the handsomest and most valuable ever offered by a manufacturer to make the trade familiar with his name.
The Case itself is a magnificent one,
and the Silver Ware elegant,
of beautiful pattern, and of the finest quality

DONT BE A CLAM

CLAMS ARE NOT A PROPER MOOSE FOR A HUMAN BEING TO COPY AFTER they are wedded to their old slam-like notions;—they open their shells to take in their accustomed food, but they shut up very tight when anything new comes along

FOR THEY ARE CLAMS

AND DONT PROPOSE TO ALLOW THINGS TO PENETRATE THEIR SHELLS THAT WERE UNKNOWN TO THEIR GRANDFATHER CLAMS AND TO THEIR GRANDMOTHER CLAMS;—

A Clam is not a good thing for a Housekeeper to copy after;—
A Clam is not a good thing for a Farmer to copy after;—Is not a good thing for a Grocer to copy after;—
A WIDE-AWAKE HOUSEKEEPER will TRY new ways that are endorsed by leading newspapers—
A WIDE-AWAKE FARMER will try a Butter Worker or a Grain Winder;—
A WIDE-AWAKE GROCER will try a new Molasses Gate and a new Coal Oil Can and will buy the kind of goods his customers call for;—
Intelligent women are rapidly adopting new methods about their work, and those who have done so are already beginning to look down with pity on persons who are set in their old ways!

TO GROCERS' WIVES
We offer a Special Premium of a beautiful set of Plated
Silver Knives and Forks, for simply giving
The Frank Siddalls Soap
a thorough trial.

SO DONT BE A CLAM

FOR LADIES TO READ

ONLY THINK! ONE SOAP FOR ALL USES!

To the Housekeeper and her Help, to the Boarding-House Mistress and her Lady Boarders, to the Farmer's Wife and her Daughters, for the Toilet and Bath of Every Lady of Refinement, The Frank Siddalls Soap offers great advantages in Economy at Use, in its effect on the skin, and in its freedom from injury to the fabric.

Among the Housekeepers of New England (whose thrifty Housekeeping is proverbial) it has gained immense favor, and there is no better evidence of the merits of an article than to be able to say that it means approval to the Housewives of New England.

FOR LAUNDRY AND KITCHEN USE

JUST THINK! No Scalding or Boiling! No Smell on Wash-day!
Clothes Clean and Beautifully White, and as Sweet as if never worn!
No Rough, Red Hands! Clothes remain White even if put away for years!
The Soap Positively Guaranteed not to injure even The Finest Laces!

Whoever washes or has it washed should remember that with The Frank Siddalls Soap much less fuel is necessary and a few buckets of water is enough for a large wash.

JUST THINK! Flannels and Blankets as soft as when New!
The most delicate Colored Laces and Prints actually Brightened!
A girl of 12 or 13 can easily do a large wash without even being tired!
And best of all, the wash done in less than half the usual time!

Use The Frank Siddalls Soap for Washing Dishes!—It is the only Soap that leaves the dish rag Sweet and White, and the only Soap that can be depended upon to remove the smell of Fish, Onions, etc., from forks and dishes. When you have a dirty dish-rag don't blame your servants; it is not their fault; for you have given them soap made of Rancid Grease, and the result is a foul dish rag. Use The Frank Siddalls Soap, made of Pure Beef suet, and you will have a Clean, Sweet-smelling Cloth.

So here is the Housekeeper's Choice:
Common soap and a foul dish-rag;—or—The Frank Siddalls Soap and a dish-rag to be proud of.

FOR HOUSE CLEANING

This is where The Frank Siddalls Soap appeals to the real ladylike Housekeeper too (for Scrubbing and Cleaning. Use it for Washing Paints, Windows and Mirrors, Wine-glasses, Coolers, and all Glass Vessels; ordinary soap, as is well known, is not fit for washing glass, while The Frank Siddalls Soap is a most elegant thing for this purpose. Use it for Washing Marble Door Steps, Bottom Steps, Marble Stairway, Mantelpieces, etc.;—It is the nicest thing for marble that can be imagined.

For Washing Bed Clothes and Bedding, even of Patients with Contagious and Infectious Diseases, and for washing Utensils used in the Sick-room, it may be relied on to cleanse and purify without scalding or boiling, using it as directed.

FOR WASHING BABIES AND BABY CLOTHES

Babies will not suffer with prickly heat or be troubled with sores of any kind when nothing but The Frank Siddalls Soap is used, its ingredients being as pure and solid.

Dont use Soda to wash nursing bottles or gum tubes—dont even scald them—but wash them only with this Soap, and they will never get sour, but will always be sweet and clean.

FOR THE SCHOOL BOY AND GIRL

It is the best thing for washing Blackboards and school slates, leaving them entirely free from grease, and without causing a scratch; the Soap does not have to be rinsed off.

FOR MEN TO READ

ONLY THINK! ONE SOAP FOR ALL USES!

The Merchant and his Clerk, the Photographer, the Optician, the Artist, the Printer, the Actor, the Banker at the Turkish Bath, the Barber, the Hotel Keeper, the Stable, the Railroad, the Army and the Navy, will all reap great benefit from the remarkable properties of The Frank Siddalls Soap.

FOR SHAVING

Its heavy, lasting lather is no different from that of any Shaving Soap that its superiority is almost incredible. Its fare never burns or smarts, no matter how dull the razor, how tender the skin, or how stiuply shaved, and the Sponge and Soap Cup will always be sweet-smelling.

IMPORTANT TO ALL MERCHANTS AND ARMY USE.—It washes freely in hard water, and where water is scarce, remember that The Frank Siddalls Way of Washing only takes a few buckets of water for a large wash.

FOR HORSES, HARNESS, CARRIAGES, etc.

It is vastly superior to Castile Soap for washing a horse's mane and tail, while for washing sores, galls, scratches, etc., it is indispensable. No stable is complete without it. For Harness, it is better than Saddle Soap, thoroughly cleansing the leather and rendering it soft and pliable while for washing cars and car windows, cleaning the running-gear and bodies of fine carriages, it is without a rival; by its use paint and varnish will last much longer, and the Windows and Lamps will be as clear as crystal.

For Frank Siddalls Soap is elegant for washing Printing Ink from the hands, and from Printers' Rollers, Type, and Electrotypes, being much better than Benzine, and safer, as shocking accidents by fire often occur from Benzine, and parents whose children use Amateur Printing Presses should remember this.

Type and Rollers washed with The Frank Siddalls Soap are in splendid condition for immediate use, and will take the ink readily.

SPECIAL FOR PHYSICIANS

To the Physician, the Druggist, the Nurse, and the Patient. Its importance is becoming more and more widely known and appreciated, and it is rapidly superseding imported Castile and similar soaps for use in the Sick Room, the Nursery and Hospital.

IN CASE OF INGROWING TOE-NAILS

In place of cotton-wool, a little of The Frank Siddalls Soap should be kept pressed between the nail and tender flesh—one trial will prove its superiority over cotton-wool.

AS AN ANTISEPTIC AND DISINFECTANT

For Washing Old Running Sores, Bed Sores, Cuts, Wounds and Burns; for washing Chafed Places on Infants and Adults; for use by persons suffering with Salt-Rheum, Tetter, Ringworm, Itching Piles, Eruptions on the Face, and for children afflicted with Scaly Incrustations, it is without any of the injurious effects often experienced when other soap is used, while for washing the invalid it is a most valuable aid to the Physician, by the thoroughness with which it removes the exhalations from the skin that would otherwise counteract the action of his medicines by closing up the pores, and which cannot be accomplished by any other soap.

Letters from well-known Physicians, describing their experiences in their practice with The Frank Siddalls Soap, leave no doubt of the truth of these assertions.

Use it for Washing Sores on the Feet, caused by walking or wearing tight shoes.
Always leave plenty of the lather on—dont rinse the lather off.

For washing Graduate Measures and Mortars it is better than anything else.

FOR THE TOILET IT IS SIMPLY PERFECTION

All Perfumes are injurious to the Skin! The Frank Siddalls Soap is not perfumed, but has an agreeable odor from its ingredients, that is always pleasant, even to an invalid; it never leaves an odor on the Skin; the lather never has any of the repulsive glue that other soaps produce. It should always be used for washing the hands and face of those troubled with Chapped Skin—a child will not dread having its face washed when The Frank Siddalls Soap is used, as it does not sting the eyes in smart with the troubled intense smarting that even imported Castile Soap often causes. It always leaves the skin Soft and Smooth.

No tooth-powder or tooth-wash will compare with it.
A little on the tooth-brush makes the mouth, teeth and gums perfectly clean.
It leaves a pleasant aromatic taste, a sweet breath, and a clean tooth-brush.

It is especially adapted for toilet use with the hard water of the West and the Lake-water.

PERFUMES WHO DESPISE A MUSTY SPONGE OR WASH-BAG with appreciate The Frank Siddalls Soap. Wherever a sponge or wash-bag is used, a disagreeable smell, it is due entirely to the so-called fine toilet soap that is such a favorite with you, it is the place of soap to keep a sponge or wash-rag sweet and clean, and The Frank Siddalls Soap will do it without any extension to expose it to the air or sun.

When used for washing one head it is better than Shampooing, plenty of the rich white lather should be left to the hair (not washed out), it entirely does away with the use of Hair Tonic, Bay Rum, Dandoline, Pomade, or any hair dressing. Used this way it removes dandruff, the hair will not mildew dust, and there will be no dry flaking of the scalp.—Coat Collars, Hat Linings and Neck-bands will keep clean much longer.

Try it for washing your Eye-Glasses and Spectacles.—

The Frank Siddalls Soap is superior to Benzine or Ammonia for Cleaning Coat Collars, and for removing Grease Spots etc., and is guaranteed not to injure the garment.

ODD USES—QUAINT USES—SPECIAL USES

Eminent Physicians claim that skin illnesses, such as Tetter, Ringworm, Pimples, etc., are caused by Soap made from rotted grease; use The Frank Siddalls Soap and avoid all such troubles.

Artificial Tears and Artificial Eyes will retain their original brilliancy unimpaired when kept washed with The Frank Siddalls Soap.

If Washes Telescope Lenses and Photographers' Plates without a possibility of scratching them, while it being used as in the most gratifying results in Schools of Design for washing the Expensive Brushes used by the students.

For Washing Pearls, Coral, Bracelets, and other precious stones, Jewelry, Gold and Silver Plate, and for cleaning Watch Crystals, it is considered by Jewelers superior to any powder or other preparation.

Wash your Dog with The Frank Siddalls Soap; lather plenty of the lather in its hair, and you will be surprised at the improvement; a dog washed with this Soap will be less close to harbor fleas

Use it for taking grease spots out of fine carpets and for cleaning rag carpets, also for cleaning garments of every description. It is better than Benzine or Hartshorn for cleaning clothing, and is guaranteed not to injure the fabric.

Use it for wiping off oil cloths, linoleum, &c.—IT KEEPS THE COLORS BRIGHT.
And as it does away with all scrubbing brushes, they will of course last much longer.

The hands of those at farm work, after The Frank Siddalls Soap is used, will not chap from hoeing corn, driving teams, and other out-door employment, but of course home-made soap, boiled soap or any other kind MUST NOT BE USED (unless on Castile Soap).

It is invaluable to farmers for washing wool before carding it, or before selling it

Milk Pans, Churns and Milk Utensils when washed with The Frank Siddalls Soap will be as clean and sweet as new, and the NUT requires scalding or putting in the sun.

It also THOROUGHLY removes the smell from the hands after milking.

HOW A LADY CAN GET THE SOAP TO TRY
at Places where it is Not Sold at 100 Stores.

Send the retail price 10 cents in money or Postage Stamps.
Say she saw the advertisement in "Harper's WEEKLY."
Only send for One Cake, and make these 3 promises:

Promise No. 1—That the Soap shall be used the first wash-day a fine receiving it and used every bit of the family wash shall be done with it

Promise No. 2—That the person sending will personally see that the printed directions for using the Soap shall be exactly followed.

By return mail, a regular 10 cent cake of Soap will be sent, postage prepaid. It will be packed in a neat iron box to make it carry safely, and 10 cents in Postage Stamps will be put on. All this is done for 10 cents because it is believed to be a cheaper way to introduce it than to send interest to sell it to the store.

If your letter gets no attention, it will be because you have not made the promises, or because you have sent for more than one cake.

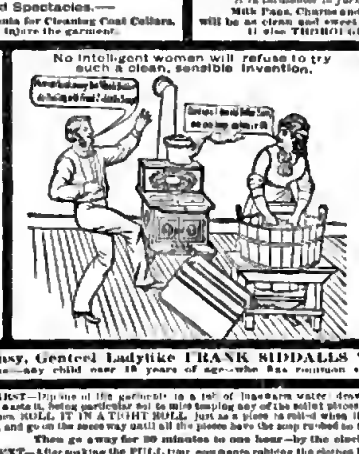
Make the promises very plain, or the Soap will NOT be sent

A Cake will be sent Free of Charge to the Wife of a Grocer and the Wife of a Minister if these TWO promises are made.



How to Tell a Person of Refinement.
A Person of Refinement will be glad to adopt a neat, easy, clean way of washing clothes, in place of the old, hard, sloppy way

How to Tell a Person of Intelligence.
A Person of Intelligence will have no difficulty in understanding and following the very easy and sensible directions

How to Tell a Person of Honor.
A Person of Honor will scorn to do or mean a thing so to buy the Soap and not follow the directions so strongly urged.

How to Tell Sensible Persons.
Sensible Persons will not get mad, but will feel thankful that their attention has been directed to better methods.

And now dont get the old wash-boiler warmed, but next wash-day give one honest trial to Frank Siddalls Way of Washing Clothes.

Only One Cake must be sent for,
but after trying it, dealers will buy it from their wholesale houses to accommodate you,
or you can order direct from the Factory

You must NOT send for more than one cake:
If a Friend wants to try it, she must send in a separate letter.

And Now for the Clean, Neat, Easy, Genteel Ladylike FRANK SIDDALLS WAY OF WASHING CLOTHES.
There is nothing intricate about these directions—any child over 10 years of age—who has common sense—will have no trouble in following them:—

A Wash-boiler MUST NOT be used BUT JUST TO HEAT THE WASH WATER, and as the wash water must only be lukewarm, a small kettle holds enough for a large wash

A Wash-boiler will have a deposit formed on it from the atmosphere, in spite of the most careful housekeeper, which impairs the delicate ingredients that are in this Soap

Be sure to have the water in the tea-kettle

THE FIRST TIME, or rather hot cold it seems:

Wash the White Flannels with the other White Pieces.

Be sure to not wring quite the last water nungry; the clothes will NOT smell of the soap, but will be as sweet as if never worn, and stains that have been overlooked in washing will bleach out while drying, and the clothes will iron easier.

Always dissolve a small piece of Soap in the starch; it makes the ironing easier, and the clothes handsomer.

The Frank Siddalls Soap washes freely in hard water without Soda, Lye, or any washing compound. Sour and Borax, Ammonia, or any other soap no way of the wash

FIRST—Dissolve in the garkettle or a tub of lukewarm water; draw it out on a wash board and rub the Soap LIGHTLY over it so as not to make it foam, being particular not to miss soaping any of the toilet pieces.

Then BOIL IT IN A TIGHT BOIL just as a piece is rolled up when it is sprinkled for ironing, lay it in the bottom of the tub under the water, and go on the same way until all the pieces have the soap rubbed on them and are rolled up.

Then go away for 30 minutes to one hour—by the clock—and let The Frank Siddalls Soap do its work.

NEXT—After soaking the FULL time, commence rubbing the clothes LIGHTLY on a wash-board and the soap will drop off; turn the garments inside out to get at the seams, but DONT use any more Soap. DONT SCALD OR BOIL A SINGLE PIECE, OR THEY WILL TURN YELLOW, and LIGHT will through two coats. If the wash water gets too dirty, dip some out and add a little clean water; it is good for the hands and save hot water out of the tea-kettle.

If a streak is hard to wash, rub some more Soap on it and throw it back into the suds for a few minutes.

NEXT COMES THE RINSING—which is to be done in lukewarm water, and is run the reverse of putting the dirty suds out, and is to be done as follows: Wash each piece LIGHTLY on a wash-board through the rinse-water (without being any more Soap) AND SEE THAT ALL THE DIRTY SUDS ARE GOT OUT. Any scaly appearance will show you how to do this

NEXT, the blue-water, which can be either lukewarm or cold: Use little or no Bluing, for the Soap takes the place of Bluing. STIR A PIECE OF THE SOAP in the blue-water UNTIL THE WATER GETS DECIDEDLY SOAPY. Put the clothes THROUGH THIS SOAPY BLUE WATER, wring them, and hang up to dry WITHOUT ANY MORE RINSING and WITHOUT BOILING or BOILING A SINGLE PIECE.

Afterwards soap the Colored Pieces and Colored Flannels, let them stand 30 minutes to 1 hour, and wash the same way as the white pieces, being sure to make the last rinse water soapy.

THE MOST DELICATE COLORS WILL NOT FADE WHEN WASHED THIS WAY, BUT WILL BE THE BRIGHTEST.

Address all Letters:—OFFICE OF THE FRANK SIDDALLS SOAP 1019 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

A DREAM MATERIALIZED.

HALE'S HONEY.

ONE of the best and most reliable remedies for Throat and Lung affections is found in the celebrated and well-known remedy, Hale's Honey of Horehound and Tar. This especially the case in families where there young children, as a dose administered upon the first symptoms of a cough will not only stop it, but relief to the little sufferer, but, by causing free expectoration, prevents the formation of tubo membrane, which is at once the terror physicians and the despair of parents. Therefore, should always be kept in the house, as it may sometimes save the life of little ones when no physician is within call. Ask your Druggist for Hale's Honey of Horehound and Tar (full name), and take no substitute.

Pike's Toothache Drops Cure in one minute

Pike's Hair and Whisker Dye, 50c.

FISHERMEN!

TWINE and NETTING

MANUFACTURED BY THE

BALTIMORE TWINE AND NET CO.

WM. J. HOOPER & SON,

No. 6 S. Calvert St., Baltimore, Md.

☞ Send for price-list, naming county and state Please mention this paper.

LOW, SON, & HAYDON'S

Flower de Luce

The Howard Tooth Brushes

HAVE

SECURELY FASTENED BRISTLES

AND CAN BE FOUND WITH ALL DRUGGISTS.

GOODS BEARING THIS

TRADE MARK.

P&A

ARE SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS

MANUFACTURED BY

THE PLUME & ATWOOD M'F'G CO.

WATERBURY, CONN.

THE BEST THE DUEBER WATCH CASE

CONGRESS WATER.

SYPHER & CO.

ARE CONSTANTLY RECEIVING FROM EUROPE

Antique Silver, Furniture, Clocks, Bronzes, and Articles of Vertu.

739 & 741 BROADWAY.

GENTLEMEN'S

BOSTON GARTER.

An exceedingly useful invention, at least which no gentleman's dress is complete, especially during the warmer months, when thin shoes are worn, and which it is impossible to use a common suit and not appear in the stocking fit smoothly about the ankle and the whole of the drawers kept confined at the knee, all of which the Boston Garter accomplishes.

Four Sizes in all the leading Gents' Furnishing Houses, of Sample will be sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of price.

Cotton, 25 cents per pair; Silk, 75 cents per pair.

Mention this paper. Address

GEORGE FROST & CO.,

287 Devonshire Street, Boston.

ROEBLING'S

WIRE ROPE

The John A. Roebling Son's Co.,

117 & 119 Liberty Street.

WORKS, TRENTON, N. J.

Print Your Own Cards, &c. Press $5

Type, Cards, &c. Catalogue for 2 stamps.

KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

IT STANDS AT THE HEAD!

THE STAR THAT LEADS THEM ALL.

UNEXCELLED FOR SIMPLICITY

THE LIGHT RUNNING

DOMESTIC SEWING MACHINE

"Dr. Bonsack's Cigars and Chamomile Pills compound my headache."—Rev. C. T. Holmes, Leslie, O.

LOWELL

The word LOWELL in gold in CAPITAL letters in the back of Lowell, Wilson and Ealy Brussels at every repeat of the pattern.

George C. Richardson & Co., Agents, 178 Devonshire St., Boston, and 115 Worth St., New York.

FOR NEARLY HALF A CENTURY LOWELL CARPETS HAVE BEEN ACKNOWLEDGED TO BE THE BEST

The goods has never been honored, and the company unhesitatingly challenge comparison with the production of any manufacturer in the world.

Sold by all

FIRST CLASS DEALERS.

CARPETS

NEW PRICES! $1, $1.50, $2, $2.50, $3.

Owing to the unprecedented success attending the sale and use of our renowned

PURE BRISTLES.

FLESH BRUSH $3.00

The Flesh Brush cures Rheumatism, and nearly all pains and aches. Dr. Scott's Electropathic Adjustable Belt, price $2.00.

Dr. Scott's Electric Brushes

At $3, and in response to a very general inquiry for cheaper goods possessing the same therapeutic quality, we have placed on the market a full line of these beautiful and invaluable specialties, retailing at $1 00, $1 50, $2 00, $2 50, and $3 00.

Each Hair Brush has the same elegant and peculiar to our well-known $5 00 one, and contains the same electro-magnetic power the difference being only in the size. Each is handsomely boxed, accompanied by a silver-plated compass, by which its power can always be tested.

In the above cut the top Brush represents the $3 00 one, and next to the bottom is the $2 50 one, with the other sizes between. The $3 00 one is about 8½ inches long. These new popular prices enable all to purchase these wonderful Brushes with a certain understanding that by using Dr. Scott's Electric, you will compete in value with any ordinary Brushes on the market. We make only one-price Flesh Brushes.

THEY WILL POSITIVELY

CURE Nervous Headache in 5 minutes! Sciatica Headache in 5 minutes! Neuralgia in 5 minutes!! Failing Hair and Baldness! Dandruff and Diseases of the Scalp!

Promptly Arrest Premature Grayness!! Make the Hair Grow Long and Glossy! Immediately Soothe the Weary Brain!

From the Venerable President of the New York Life Ins. Co.

I suffered severe burning for years from headache; your brush relieves them at once. I heartily recommend it. MORTON PRINCE.

From the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Wife suffered for years from headache; your brush cures them at once; it has also cured severe pain; I use it to remove dandruff; it works like a charm. My wife was getting bald; it stopped the falling hair and made a new growth

GEN. THOMASSON, Little Rock, Ark.

From the Mayor of Saratoga.

It always cures my headaches within a few minutes. A beautiful Hair Brush, well worth the price aside from its curative qualities. JAS. B. CHARLES.

Every mail brings similar letters from all parts of the country.

SENT, POSTPAID, ON TRIAL.

We will send either kind, postpaid, on receipt of the price, with 25c. added for packing and registering. The price will be refunded if not just as represented. Remit by draft, P O money order, or currency, payable to Geo. A Scott, 841 Broadway, New York; or ask your druggist for them. These are not cheap Electric Brushes this paper. Dr. Scott's Electric Corsets are prices, $1 00, $1 50, $2 00, and $2 50, on above terms. Agents Wanted.

Ontario!

THE MODEL SETTLEMENT

OF

Southern California

FOR

HEALTH, CLIMATE, AND CHOICE FRUITS.

For particulars pamphlet and map—address

CHAFFEY BROS.,

ONTARIO CAL.

CATARRH

To any one suffering with Catarrh or Brain Ills who earnestly desire relief, I can furnish a means of Permanent and Positive Cure. A Home Treatment. No charge for consultation by mail. Valuable Treatise Free. Certificates from Doctors, Lawyers, Ministers, Business Men, &c. Rev. T. P. CHILDS, Troy, Ohio.

GOLD PENS.

PENCILS, HOLDERS, CASES, &c.

THE CALLI-GRAPHIC PEN.

A GOLD PEN and RUBBER HOLDER, containing ink for several days writing. Can be carried in the pocket. Always ready for use. A luxury for persons who care to preserve their individuality in writing.

MARIE, TODD, & HARD,

Cor. Nassau and Liberty Sts., New York.

Send for Price-List.

OUR GOODS are Sold by FIRST-CLASS DEALERS.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S

STEEL PENS

Sold By ALL DEALERS Throughout The WORLD

GOLD MEDAL PARIS EXPOSITION—1878

AMERICAN STAR SOFT CAPSULES THE BEST.

Also, Star Empty Capsules. All Druggists.

Round Writing

BOOK FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION & PENS

Mailed for $1.10 by Mallonee, or

ROUND PEN & PENCIL, New York.

DURKEE'S SALAD DRESSING

A GOOD SALAD ASSURED.

The most Delicious and the most Popular Mayonnaise Ice all kinds of Salads, Raw Tomatoes, Cabbage, Cold Meats, Fish, &c., are enhanced by its use.

ALL GROCERS SELL IT.

MARLIN MAGAZINE RIFLE

45 Govt. and 40-60 Grain Cartridges.

Very STRONG, Powerful, SAFE.

THE BEST RifLE in the world for Large Game. Shooting more powerful Model is now beautiful, Manufacture easier. Finish finer, than of any other rifle. MARLIN FIRE-ARMS CO. New Haven, Conn.

HORSMAN'S CELEBRATED

Send Stamp for Catalogue.

E. I. Horsman,

80 & 82 William Street, New York.

LAWN TENNIS.

EARL & WILSONS PATENT "SHORT SAND" COLLAR AND "BEAD EDGE" CUFF ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral is a sure, prompt, and efficient remedy.

ALLEGHENY COLLEGE LIBRARY.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XXVII.—No. 1380

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 2, 1883.

TEN CENTS A COPY. $4.00 PER YEAR. IN ADVANCE.

Copyright, 1883, by Harper & Brothers.

DECORATION DAY.—From a Sketch by J. F. Eaton.—[See Page 342.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 2, 1883

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

AN OFFER TO YOUNG AMERICAN ARTISTS.

For the best original drawing to illustrate ALFRED DOWETT'S "Christmas Hymn"—the drawing to be suitable for publication in HARPER'S MAGAZINE, and to be the exclusive work of an American artist not over twenty-five years of age—MESSRS HARPER & BROTHERS offer as award of THREE THOUSAND DOLLARS, upon the honorable understanding that the successful competitor shall use the same for the prosecution of art study in one or more of the best American schools, including also a sojourn abroad of at least six months for the study of the old masters. The award will be paid in such installments and at such times as shall best suit the convenience of the recipient for the purposes specified

The drawings must be received by MESSRS HARPER & BROTHERS not later than August 1, 1883, addressed "Art Competition, Harper's Magazine, Franklin Square, New York", and each must be designated by an assumed name or motto, which should also be given, together with the real name, age, and residence of the artist, in a sealed envelope accompanying the drawings, and not to be opened until the result of the competitions shall have been determined. The name of the successful competitor will not be publicly announced until the publication of the drawings.

MR. R. SWAIN GIFFORD, N.A., MR. F. D. MILLET, A.N.A.; and MR. CHARLES CALVERT, A.N.A., superintendent of the Art Department, Harper & Brothers, will act as judges of the competition.

It is intended to engrave the successful drawing on one page for HARPER'S MAGAZINE of December, 1883, and should other drawings submitted be found suitable, second, third, and fourth awards will be made, as follows: one page HARPER'S WEEKLY, one page HARPER'S BAZAR, $2000, one page HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, $1000.

If the judges should decide that no one of the drawings is suitable, MESSRS HARPER & BROTHERS reserve the right to extend the limit of time and re-open the competition.

Two Christmas Hymns by ALFRED DOWETT have been published. That published in 1857 is the one for the illustration of which artists are invited to compete, and a printed copy of it will be sent on application to

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

NEW ILLUSTRATED SERIAL.

The next number of HARPER'S WEEKLY will present the opening chapters of a new and beautifully illustrated Serial Story, entitled

"THIRLBY HALL,"

by W. E. NORRIS, author of "Matrimony," "Mademoiselle de Mersac," "No New Thing," "Heaps of Money," etc

THE FIRST GUN.

THE action of the late Democratic Convention in Kentucky is very significant. It is "the first gun" of the campaign of 1884, and it foretells undoubtedly the general character of the contest. Kentucky is the State of Senator BECK, of Representative CARLISLE, and of Editor WATTERSON. Mr BECK is the free-trade leader in the Senate, Mr CARLISLE the free-trade candidate for Speaker of the House, and Mr. WATTERSON the conductor of the most uncompromising free-trade Democratic journal in the country. All of them are accepted leaders of the Democratic party, and in the Convention Mr WATTERSON made an appeal for a positive free-trade declaration in the platform, and he understands as well as any man the value of the first gun. But all was in vain. The Convention refused to make the declaration, and contented itself with the usual platform platitudes, which are intended to mean anything or nothing. The conclusion is that the distinguished gentlemen whom we have mentioned do not even represent the Democratic position of their own State upon the question, and that free trade will not be a practical issue in the campaign. This view is confirmed by the action of the Republican Convention, which made a similar non-committal platform. The action of the Kentucky Conventions confirms what we have already said, that it is not easy to adjust old parties to new issues.

The meaning of the phrase that parties grow and are not made is simply this, that men will adhere to their old parties, from habit and pride and tradition and association, until a new question appears which interests them so strongly as to make them willing to break all old party ties. That such ties have been much relaxed for some years is well known, and the extraordinary election of last year showed how ready the public mind was for the formation of a new party, if there were any question which was generally felt to be of transcendent importance. The fact that no new organization has grown upon the free trade question is conclusive proof that that question has not yet advanced so far as to be of primary importance in the public mind. It shows that free-traders in the two parties still prefer to remain with their old parties rather than to combine in a new party. The action of Congress demonstrated that it was administrative reform rather than revenue reform which was believed to be imperatively demanded. The free trade view, indeed, had very few cordial supporters in either House, and the conduct of the discussion in the party press since Congress adjourned has revealed no positive disposition to deal radically with the subject.

It is fair, therefore, to assume that the National Conventions will treat the question as vaguely as the Kentucky Conventions have treated it. In that case the Democratic party will decide to contest the election, not upon any policy or principle, but simply upon its general character. The voter, whatever view he may hold of revenue reform, of civil service reform, of a financial policy, of a foreign policy, or of any other subject, will be called upon simply to say with which party, upon the whole, he would prefer to trust the control of the government until some real question reconstructs parties. It is hardly possible that in such a situation the country would prefer the Democratic party, and resort to change for the mere sake of change. The Kentucky Democratic action is the announcement that Democratic reliance is to be placed upon the general cry of Republican corruption and extravagance. But when it comes to a mere comparative claim of this kind, it is in most child-like and bland assumption that the country supposes the Democratic party, which is on constant exhibition in the State and city of New York, for example, to be less corrupt and extravagant than the Republican. If the election of 1884 is to be a simple contest of party character, tradition, association, and achievement, as the signs of the times now indicate, Democratic anticipation can hardly be very ungume. But it is not the kind of canvass which is good for the country.

THE IRISH QUESTION.

THE Irish question, like that of slavery in this country thirty years ago, will challenge attention until it is settled, and it is evident that there can be no proper settlement which is not radical. It is one of the most difficult problems ever offered to statesmanship, and the difficulty is incalculably increased by the conduct of those who speak and act for Ireland. Indeed, the character of Irish agitation is one of the most striking and painful illustrations of the consequences of the long English misrule, as the evil nature of slavery can be seen in the condition of emancipated slaves. To measure the Irish situation it is only necessary to consider the remedy which is proposed by the most intelligent Irishmen. That remedy is, in a word, home rule. By this is meant, as such Irishmen constantly explain, the application to Ireland of the divided State and national system of the United States. Ireland is to remain a part of the British Empire, as New York is a part of the Union. But an Irish Parliament is to legislate for local Irish affairs, like the Legislature of New York for the State.

Thus being the proposition, let any man read the little work just issued in the "Franklin Square Library," An Outline of Irish History from the Earliest Times to the Present Day. It is written by JUSTIN H. MCCARTHY, a man, we believe, of the historian of Our Own Times, who has inherited his father's moderate and generous spirit, and who has written of a burning subject in a very temperate tone. He is an Irishman, and he tells the story of Ireland from the legendary epoch to the Phœnix Park murders, and although most briefly and concisely told, the tale is neither dry nor bare. The book depicts the Ireland to which home rule in the American sense is to be applied. It is a country which has been always torn with alien or domestic war. Its land has been incessantly confiscated. The country has been the victim of the most inhuman legislation and of the most cruel violence. Naturally enough its population is squalid, ignorant, degraded, without the habit or the tradition or the conception of the methods of free popular government, and its most vigorous and intelligent part is exiled in foreign lands, not contemplating return.

Now what does any reasonable Irishman suppose would be the result if the British government should declare that it would accord any measure of relief that Irishmen could agree to demand? The American States that shook off British rule were self-governing, separate British colonies of intelligent, industrious, and thrifty Englishmen and their descendants. But if the British Parliament should say to Ireland to-morrow, "Organize yourself into an independent state of the empire, with a legislature for local affairs," has any Irishman any conceivable idea of what should or could be done? How many of the Irish party in Parliament, how many of the "patriots" that swagger in foreign lands, would hasten to return to their native land, or, if they did so, would bring anything but anarchy and chaos with them? How many of the best of the Irish citizens who still remain at home would not fly their country when it was delivered to itself? The conclusion is not that nothing should be done, not that home rule in some form is not desirable, not that British oppression has not been unspeakable, but simply that in the actual situation of Ireland relief must come with the co-operation of England, and that the incessant blatant denunciation of England, and the encouragement of infamous crimes against innocent persons, and the assassination of friendly Englishmen are as deadly wrongs to Ireland as CROMWELL'S bloody hand or the ruthless penal laws. Mr. MCCARTHY says that it is useless to ask the Irish leaders for a plan of home rule so long as home rule itself is scouted as impossible. But a plain and feasible scheme of home rule offered by Irish leaders would be in itself the most powerful argument for it, and would at once win for the Irish agitation a general approval in every civilized country, while extenuation of horrible crime and incitement to further crime merely excite universal distrust and abhorrence. Let Mr PARNELL suggest such a scheme. To treat a Liberal English Ministry of to-day, which has proved by its acts its desire to remedy the Irish situation, as if it were the government of HENRY VII., or WILLIAM III., or CHARLES II., is a folly so egregious that it greatly enhances the enormous difficulty of the situation.

DECORATION-DAY.

THE reception of the Fifth Regiment of Northern Virginia in the Confederate army by the Twenty-eighth New York Volunteer Infantry in the Union army, at Niagara Falls on the 23d of May was on near Decoration day as to be properly associated with it, and to illustrate the kindly spirit in which that day will be observed. It has been evident from the first celebration of Decoration day that it would become at last a day of united remembrance, commemorating the Union and not the war. It was at once obvious that there was no lingering vindictiveness of feeling, and that in the hearty acceptance on all sides of the decision for which the appeal to arms was made it was not the cause, but the valor and devotion of the soldiers upon the side that did not succeed, which would be hereafter recognized.

The especial event of the military gathering at Niagara Falls was the restoration by the Virginia regiment to the New York regiment of its battle-flag, which was captured at Cedar Mountain. This is said to be an unprecedented event, but, however that may be, it is a most characteristic and suggestive incident. It is a triumph of generous patriotism and manliness, and all that was said upon the occasion was frank and hearty, revealing the union of hearts as well as of hands, which is now the strength and glory of the republic. In the national cemetery at Arlington, near Washington, we see also that the graves of the Confederates are to be decorated, and Judge FIELD'S tender and beautiful song of "The Blue and the Gray" has come to express a universal national sentiment.

There are no signs of decline of interest in the day, and the spirit of mutual good will which is now displayed removes the only objection that could ever be urged to such a commemoration—that it tended to foster sectional feeling, and to prolong the bitterness that always follows civil war. The tone of the celebration has been without exception humane and patriotic, and no more generous and friendly words to former opponents were ever spoken than have been heard from all sides on Decoration-day. But the incident at Niagara Falls, the return of the battle-flag by its captors, is the most beautiful and significant yet associated with the day, and it puts to utter shame the expectation that the lost cause would become a sacred tradition and cult, like the hope of a STUART restoration with the old English Jacobites.

THE BRIDGE.

THE last number of the WEEKLY was a Bridge number, and with the article in the May number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE it may well be kept as a pictorial memento of the great event which has just been celebrated. A festival so unique New York has seldom seen, and it was observed with fitting republican state and simplicity. It is impossible not to contrast the scene and the occasion with the contemporaneous magnificent imperial pageant at Moscow. Both were ceremonies, and of a singularly impressive kind. But one signalizes the act by which an autocrat assumes the insignia of hereditary absolute power over ninety millions of human beings, while the other commemorates the closer and peaceful union of two vast municipal communities in the presence of a citizen freely elected to be the Chief Magistrate of the nation to which they belong, and who in two years will relinquish the constitutional power that he holds to the hands that will have been freely chosen to receive it.

But, without such accidental contrasts, the completion and opening to traffic of a great bridge is an exceedingly interesting event, because of the historic association with bridges and of their imaginative suggestiveness. This topic was well touched by Rev. Mr. CHADWICK in Brooklyn in a discourse preached upon the Sunday before the opening. The bridges of Rome and Florence, of Parma and London, the bridge that HORATIUS held, the Milvian bridge of CONSTANTINE, the bridge of Lodi, the Jewellers' bridge, are among the innumerable bridges of fame, as if fate chose them for romantic and memorable exploits. The symbolism of bridges does not less arrest the poet. The bridge of Mirza, in ADDISON'S vision, the bridge on which the singer stood at midnight in LONGFELLOW'S poem, are familiar illustrations. In itself a structure so airy and graceful, like the Trinità over the Arno, or massive and lofty, like our High Bridge and the far stretching lines of the aqueduct upon the Roman Campagna, a bridge is the most pleasing and fruitful of texts, as it in among the most picturesque of objects.

It was becoming that the opening of the bridge to the public should be celebrated with all possible and proper circumstance, and the celebration was admirably designed. In the procession that attended the President and the Governors and the distinguished personages of all kinds, as they passed, amid the roar of cannon and with pealing music, over the magnificent pathway hung in air, henceforth the main artery of the intercourse of two of the great cities of the world, perhaps some musing and honored guest looked down upon the river massed with boats and at the teeming and rejoicing population upon the shores, and recalled the foggy summer morning one hundred and seven years ago, when WASHINGTON stealthily withdrew his handful of troops over the river from the little village of Brooklyn to the little town of New York; or still farther backward, in the misty morning of humorous legend, did he behold, first civilized mariners of those now crowded waters below him, Oloffe the Dreamer with Ten Breeches and their doughty comrades pushing along toward Hell Gate? It was a proud and memorable spectacle that was seen on the bridge and from the bridge on Thursday, the 24th of May, 1883, but strangely different scenes will greet the eye of many a future loiterer across the bridge as he surveys all that it commands, and recalls the swift and marvellous history of the scene.

"SEZ GENERAL B., SEZ HE."

GENERAL BUTLER'S recent interview may be regarded as his Presidential platform, and it shows how much bolder and more sagacious he is than any of the Democratic aspirants who have yet spoken. His position upon the two questions of reform is characteristic. He would have the tariff tax limited in amount to a sum necessary and adequate for revenue, and this tax he would so adjust as to protect American labor and encourage American enterprise. The General, in fact, must have seen the little joker on the race-course. He would have a tariff for revenue which should also protect. But this plan diverges from the strict "revenue only" principle of so levying the tariff tax that the whole proceeds will be paid into the Treasury, a result which is to be accomplished by disregarding protection altogether. The General's plan is adroit and ingenious: now you see it, now you don't. But he wisely avoids illustrations and details; and since he poses as a protectionist he could be hardly accepted as a free-trader, and upon a mere difference of the method of protection his party could make no real fight.

But upon the other reform, that of the civil service, his words are unequivocal:

"I contend that the use of Federal patronage [and presumptively State patronage] to reward personal friends or party favorites and punish personal or political enemies in payment for rendering partisan or personal service, or in punishment for failure or refusal to render such service, is one of the most debauching influences of the period. It robs the people of that efficient and honest service which is their due because they pay for it, corrupts politics and statesmanship alike in all their spheres of action, from the ward room of the caucus to the chamber of the Senate and the Council room of the cabinet. It is a standing menace to the personal independence of the hundred thousand citizens in Federal employ, and unless speedily stopped will undermine our institutions, and sap the very foundations of popular government . . .

"Fitness, not favor, should be the passport to the public service. There should be no removals of public employés during their term of service except for cause, and no assessments on their salaries, paid to them by the whole people, should be levied for the perpetuation of the party in power. What we need and must have is a system of civil service consistent and harmonious with the nature of American government, established and protected by law, that, like governmental itself, it may be the agent of law and not of men, to the end that it may be kept free of all corrupting dependence upon political favor and patronage. Personally I favor the principles of the PENDLETON bill in regard to appointments in the civil service, and the WILLIS bill in regard to assessments of Federal office-holders."

It is a day of good omen when one of the shrewdest and boldest politicians in the United States, who is popularly supposed to be wholly unincumbered with political principle, believes that it will help him to a Presidential nomination to declare himself unreservedly a civil service reformer. How warmly his party supports the same principles may be seen in the Democratic reconstruction of the municipal service in Boston. But however impossible it may be to hear without a smile these perfectly correct sentiments proceeding from General BUTLER, the significance of his declaration is unmistakable.

REPUBLICAN REORGANIZATION IN NEW YORK.

THE sub-committee to report a plan of Republican reorganization in the city has submitted a scheme based upon that of Mr. GEORGE BLISS which we have already mentioned. It provides for an annual enrollment of Republicans, and that only such enrolled persons shall vote at the Republican primaries. The enrollment is to be made by five enrolling officers in each district, to be selected by the Committee of Eighteen, which has the whole matter in charge. Two of the officers are to be adherents of the present organization, or Stalwarts; two not adherents, or Half Breeds, and one a non-resident of the district. The conditions of enrollment are, support of the Republican ticket at the last Presidential election, or, if not then of voting age intention to do so hereafter and a pledge not to take part in the caucuses or primaries of any other party during the year. The lists are to be open to inspection and challenge, and when completed the enrolled Republicans in every district are to elect, under the general superintendence of the Committee of Eighteen, a Republican County Committee, to be re-elected every year, and to supersede the present Central Committee. The existing Republican associations upon the final completion of the enrollment are to be abolished, and are recommended to continue as Republican clubs.

This is an excellent plan, because it gives all Republicans an equal chance, and deprives them of the right of complaining that they are not allowed a voice in the preliminary deliberations and action of the party. The provision that we regret is the oath not to take part in the caucuses and primaries of any other party during the year. The reason alleged for requiring this pledge is not adequate, because the pledge would not exclude a Democratic repeater, who would take his chance of being discovered, while it will certainly exclude many good Republicans, who, without any intention or disposition to change their party association within the year, will yet not pledge themselves not to change. Nothing seems to be gained by the pledge, and something important may be lost. It furnishes an excuse for refusal to enroll which should not have been furnished.

The objection of the machine men to the proposed plan is that it provides no penalty for men who become members of the party organization and then refuse to support its candidates. But, not to say that if a man enrolls himself as a Republican it is because he intends to support the candidates, unless they are personally objectionable, or are nominated by objectionable methods, what penalty can be inflicted except to drop the offender's name from the list? But this is precisely the thing which is to be reformed, namely, requiring a pledge to support regular nominations. As it is upon that rock that the party has locally split, it is rather absurd to propose to reunite it upon that foundation. The new plan, with the exception that we have mentioned, is good, but it must be carried out in its new spirit. The Committee of Eighteen was appointed by Mr. O'BRIEN. It is satisfactory to the Stalwarts, and it has the entire initiative. But if it appoints the enrolling officers fairly, each side will be adequately represented, and the familiar reasons for complaint will be in great part removed.

MR JAY AND THE STATE REFORM COMMISSION.

THE appointment of Mr. JOHN JAY in place of President WHITE upon the Civil Service Commission of New York is an earnest of the good faith of Governor CLEVELAND, and is most satisfactory to the friends of reform. Mr. JAY'S personal character and ability, his public experience, and his hearty interest in the reform, with the practical details of which he is familiar, naturally designate him as peculiarly fitted for the service which he has consented to undertake.

If the Commission shall now be as fortunate in the selection of a Chief Examiner as in that of its own members, the friends of reform throughout the country will have great reason for congratulation that the State of New York, in which the evils and demoralizations of the spoils system were first fully developed, should be the first State to take practical steps for the correction of the abuses of that system by enabling the official executors of a law of reform to a commission of its most intelligent and sincere friends.

PERSONAL.

THE competitive models for the PAUL REVERE statue are still on exhibition in the gallery of the Boston ART CLUB. Mr. J. E. KELLY'S design, which we engraved last week, attracts more attention than any other, and no doubt the most noteworthy. The committee in charge of the erection of the monument have indefinitely extended the time of the competition, and are ready to receive additional models from any source.

—Several memorial windows in honor of the late Dean STANLEY will be placed in Westminster Abbey. "One of them," says the London Times of May 11, "has been subscribed for exclusively by friends in the United States. The money has been raised there in an exceedingly short space of time, and the sum would have been far larger had it been thought right to tax our transatlantic kinsmen for so eminently national a work. The American window will have a suitable inscription, as well as some significant innovation in the glass itself. It may be mentioned that the Rev. PHILLIPS BROOKS, of Boston, one of Dean STANLEY'S best friends in America, called by chance at the Deanery shortly before the meeting of the executive committee, and was invited by the Prince of Wales to be present."

—The Archbishop of Canterbury speaks of his present office as "unsought for and unwished for" by himself. He has been "walking in a dream" ever since it came to him.

—ROSA BONHEUR'S latest public exhibition of animal paintings contains pictures with the following interesting titles: "An Old Monarch," "A Hemlin Servant," "A Norman Sire," "A Noble Charger," "A Wounded Eagle," "A Wild Cat," "A Ram in a Stable," "A Badger," and "A Young Prince."

—"The average man sees little that has not been pointed out to him," observes a recent writer. "He will keep a dog from poisoning to death and never know that he has under his eye a creature as original as nine-tenths of his human neighbors, and a good deal more interesting."

—Mr FROUDE declares that in his early boyhood he never heard, either in church or out of it, a single word about orthodoxy. Religion was considered "too sacred to be argued about," and was therefore, in his judgment, in "a condition of moral health."

—Mr W. RANKINE, an advocate of cremation, believes that the cemetery of the future will be a national garden in the best sense, safe from isolation as the Via Sacra, and having the added charms of pure air, trees, grass, and flowers. The urns will be reserved within temples or mausoleums, which shall bring the garden proper, leaving open green lawns planted with groves and gardens, which would be the home of all beautiful green things. A desirable adjunct, he thinks, would be a winter garden, in which burial ceremonies could be held in wild and stormy weather.

—"Had it not been for hasty and bustling Human Henry Lewes," writes an admirer of George Eliot, "the world would most likely have been without such precious possessions as Adam Bede, Romola, and The Mill on the Floss. Not that George Eliot was without a very large amount of mere industry and application, but as regards energy, 'thought widens, but leaves,' as GOETHE says, and the wealth of unused potentialities—the waste of force—is as striking in the intellectual as in the physical world." The forthcoming Life of George Eliot, by her second husband, Mr CROSS, is nearly finished.

—Sir JOHN LUBBOCK has been investigating the sense of color among some of the lower animals. He finds that that lowly animal the water-flea is able to distinguish yellow and green light, and is fonder of either than of white light.

—From the London Athenæum: "Mr. ALFRED THOMPSON, the painter of landscape panoramas, to whom was attributed the increased impost on works of art entering the United States, has denied taking any steps to bring this about, and declares that he took an energetic part in the reverse sense."

—Says the Pall Mall Gazette: "Conservatives, in despair of securing either a programme for the present or a faith for the future, have fallen back upon the worship of the memory of Lord BEACONSFIELD. It is easy to sympathize with them anxiety to hide the difficulties of leadership to-day by glorifying the statesman who led them yesterday, but it is only the function of a friendly critic to tell them that they are making a mistake. We do not deny that they might find a source of much needed strength in the worship of the memory of their lost leader, but it must be sought, not in the timid policies of Lord BEACONSFIELD, but in the secret sympathies of the author of Sybil." Precisely what is meant by referring to the dead Premier as a "lost" leader?

—The opening of the British Museum and the National Gallery from seven to ten o'clock three nights every week is on a line with the needs of the public, and with the action already pursued by the authorities of the Bodleian Library, the Brussels Royal Library, and the Paris National Library, and seriously contemplated, if not resolved upon, by the trustees of the Astor Library.

—M. DE LESSEPS is called upon to bestir himself with regard to the present condition of the Suez Canal, which is now little better than a stagnant sewer, having long been used as a receptacle for the drainage of the stations on its banks. The passengers and crews of vessels detained in the canal are sufferers in consequence from diarrhœa and dysentery. But what shall be said of the average suburban village householder, which is a miscellaneous collection of cesspools and open pools?

—The Royal College of Music in England is congratulated upon having accomplished a principal object of its existence in discovering and rewarding talent musical talent ex out-of-the-way places. Among its prize pupils last year were a girl who works in a mill, the daughter of a brickmaker, and the sons of a blacksmith and a farm laborer.

—Mr H. A. SALA speaks of himself as "an hopenitent Radical of thirty years' standing."

—The influence of art, says a late reviewer, still reaches very little beyond the well-to-do class, and is le principally to the extraordinary increase of well-to-do people in the last fifty years that the empire is due. "Popular, in the sense in which literature is fate becoming popular, the arts of painting and sculpture are not and do not as yet promise to be. It is music, if anything, which gives promise of attaining to this universal dominion."

—The Buddhist Mongols are a class of men who do their praying by machinery, but the machinery is not "mighty, majestic, musterably harmonious," like the hog wheel that Oscar WILDE saw at the Chicago Water-Works. Their praying wheel is a small and simple thing, with a handle which a man easily holds as he walks about. It contains a large number of printed prayers, and whenever it revolves the prayers revolve—in other words, are repeated. Sometimes the wheel is placed over the fire of the hearth, and turned around by the upward current of hot air. Sometimes you see it in a temple, or fixed that the pilgrim can take hold of its handle and give it a turn, as a laundry-maid does with the handle of a mangling machine.

—Professor CHANDLER'S connection with the Board of Health has ceased, and so has Professor YEOMANS'S connection with the London Board of Trade and the Light-house Board. In each case the difficulty seems to have been the insufferable intermeddling of smaller men than they. It is more than a pity for a city to lose the professional services of such scientists.

—The entering wedge of American interviewing, so far as the conservative journals of London are concerned, seems to be found in the Pall Mall Gazette of May 9, which prints nearly a column of matter about Sir JULIUS BENEDICT, the eminent musician of that city, in the shape of an extract from the Boston Herald, whose London correspondent wrote it. Sir JULIUS lives only a few minutes' walk from the editorial rooms of the Pall Mall Gazette. It is only fair to add, however, that the latter journal assures its readers that it has carefully stripped the extract about Sir JULIUS of "many highly flavored personalities."

—Our Southern exchanges note the successful lecturing tour of the celebrated "Blind Preacher," the Rev. WILLIAM R. MILBURN. At Wilmington, North Carolina, a few days ago, "the shortest night of the season" did not deter a large number from hearing "Dr MILBURN'S very able and splendid lecture on AARON BURR." The eloquent doctor is remarking as well, and one of his sermons is described as "an almost perfect specimen of narrative and description."

—Every traveller in China is looked upon as a missionary, and treated accordingly.

—At a crowded meeting in Mr SPURGEON'S Tabernacle the loudest and longest cheers were given in favor of the Affirmation Bill in the House of Commons. "This typical assembly of Nonconformists," writes a spectator, "were universally and deeply interested in the project for the abolition of the compulsory oath."

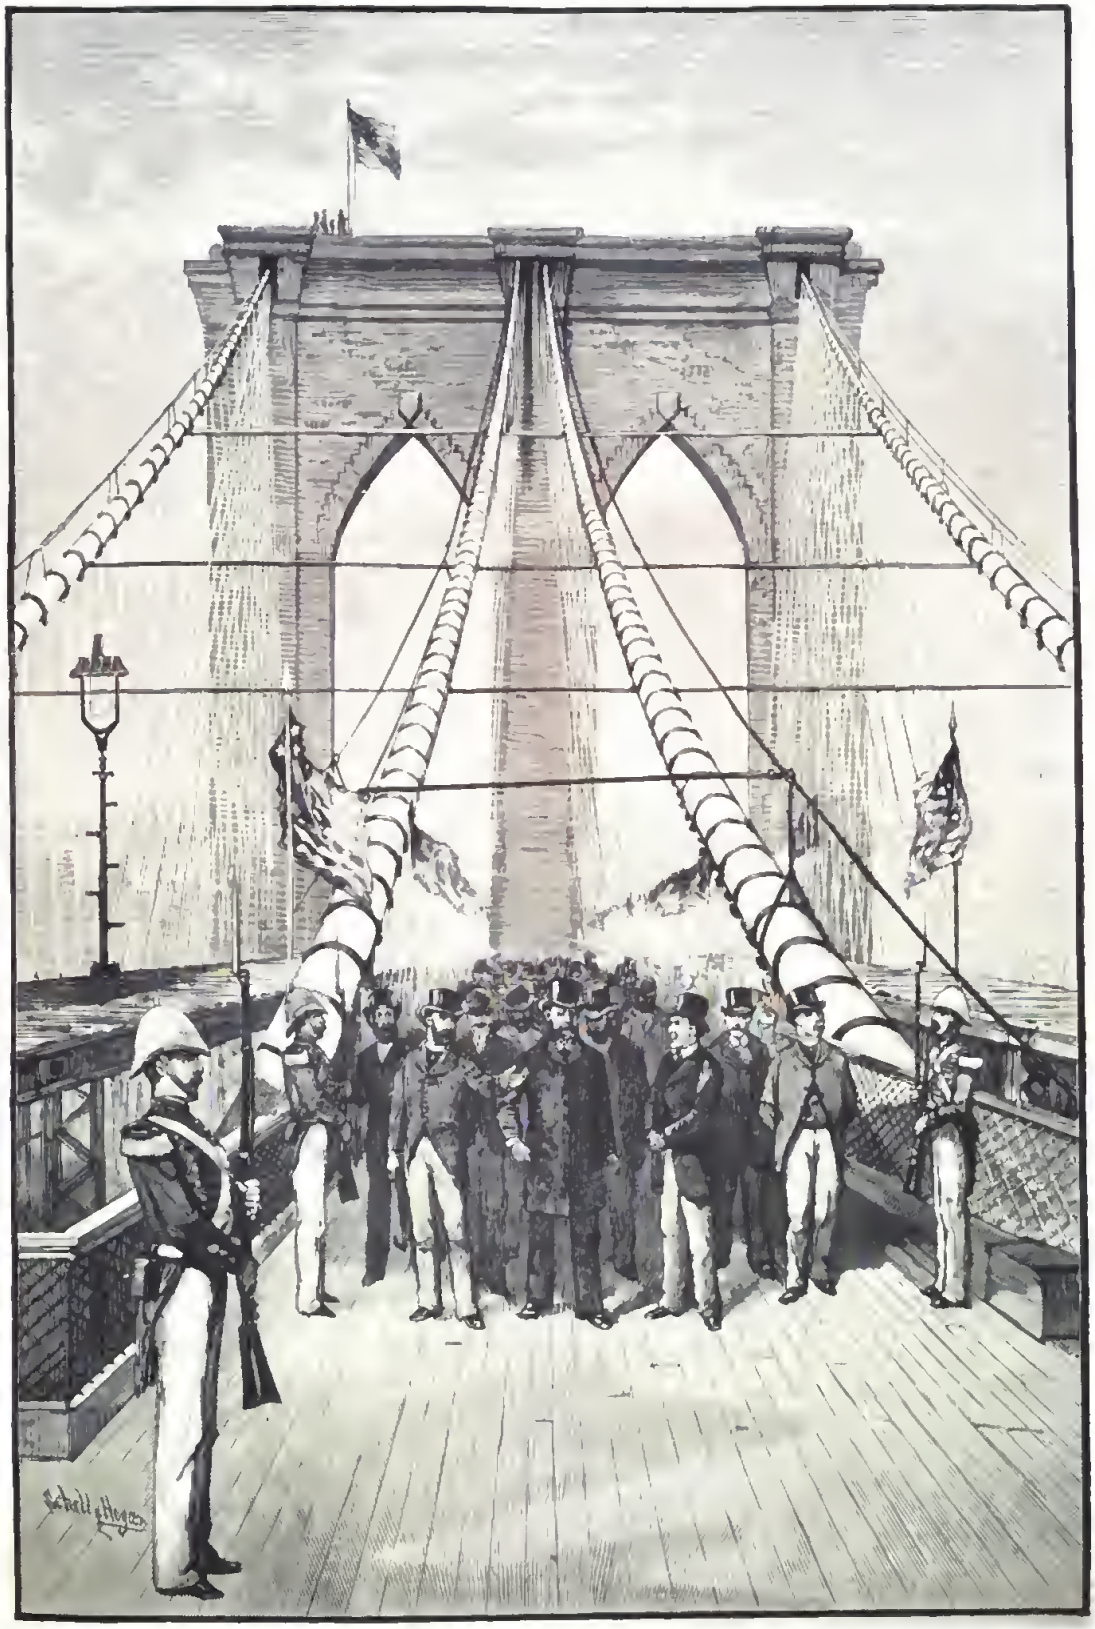
—Minister LOWELL, says the Pall Mall Gazette, is an outwitting sayer of good things.

—There is a proverb in Madagascar which says, "If a person will neither milk the cow nor hold the calf, but only fetch the cream, he is not dealing fairly."

—From a recent speech by JOHN BRIGHT: "The late Bishop of Winchester [Bishop WILBERFORCE] and a man with whom I had often pleasant conversation upon public [illegible] and I had occasional [illegible] at dinner, and he was always [illegible] me, although in [illegible] things we were quite apart. He told me that with regard to the Crimean war his opinion agreed with mine. He thought it [illegible] and unjust, and greatly to be lamented. I suggested to him whether it might not be good for him and for the country if he would take some opportunity to lie plain in the House of Lords of addressing to the House and to the government and to the nation a speech upon that question corresponding with the views that he had then explained to me. Well he hesitated—reasonably enough, and I have no doubt he felt the question to be a very serious one—and he said that he had taken that matter into his deliberation, and he had not been able to come to a conclusion that [illegible] that course would be productive of more good than it would of harm, and therefore that he had remained silent."

MEMORIAL HALL OF [illegible] VERMONT.—[See Page 343.]

WAR-DANCE OF GENERAL CROOK'S APACHE SCOUTS.—[See Page 343.]



THE GREAT BRIDGE—PRESIDENT ARTHUR AND HIS PARTY CROSSING THE SUSPENDED HIGHWAY.—Drawn by Schell and Hogan.—[See Page 343.]

DECORATION-DAY.

I WALKED the streets at midnight,
But my thoughts were far away,
For my leaf of life, now withered,
Was green again with May

The sworn of twenty winters
Had vanished from my brow,
And I (oh me!) looked forward,
As I look backward now.

Why should I not look forward?
I knew my soul was strong,
I knew there was within me
The might there is in Song.

My heart was light and friendly;
I loved my fellow-men,
And I loved—how much!—my comrades,
For I had comrades then.

Where are those dear old fellows?
Ah! whither have they flown?
I asked myself at midnight,
As I walked the streets alone.

There was Fitz, the Irish singer,
And Fred, the tender heart,
And Harry, who lived for Woman,
And Tom, who lived for Art

Poor Fitz's song is over,
And the heart of Fred is still:
One went down at Yorktown,
The other at Malvern Hill.

Wrapt in the blue they fought in,
They buried them where they lay;
And elsewhere Tom and Harry,
Were worn, poor lads! like gray.

As I walked the streets at midnight,
And remembered the awful years
That snatched my comrades from me,
My eyes were filled with tears.

I thought of bloody battles,
Where thousands such as they
Had met and killed each other
For wearing the blue and gray;

Of happy homes that were darkened,
Of hearths that were desolate,
Of tender hearts that were broken,
Of love that was turned to hate.

I pitied the wretched living;
I thank I did the dead;
I know I sighed for Harry,
And dropped a tear for Fred.

"Poor boys!" I said. But pondering
What was, and might have been
(What I am is the sere leaf,
And they were in the green),

I paused my dead an longer;
I did not dare to. No.
They went when they were summoned—
Before, they could not go.

When we know what Life and Death are,
We shall then know which is best;
Meanwhile we live and labor:
Their labor done, they rest.

The earth lies heavy on them,
But they do not complain;
They do not miss the sunshine,
They do not feel the rain

If they see ever conscious,
In that long sleep of theirs,
It is when, past the winter,
We feel the first spring airs.

When the birds from tropic countries
Come back again to ours,
And where of late were snow-drifts,
The grass is thick with flowers—

Such flowers as will to-morrow
Be scattered where they lie,
The blue and gray together,
Beneath the same sweet sky,

No sum upon their manhood,
No memory of the Past,
Except the common valor
That made us One at last!

R. H. STODDARD.

"DISARMED!"*

By MISS BETHAM-EDWARDS,

AUTHOR OF "KITTY," "EXCHANGE NO ROBBERY," "HOPEFUL TO EARNEST PEARL," "DR. JACOB," "THE BOUVERIES: OR, OUR GOVERNESS," ETC.

CHAPTER XIX.

By the time ripe walnuts were falling from the trees in farm-house orchards and over the brown fallow starlings held solemn conclave before flying south, Valerian's winter campaign was made out. One sunny sea-side rendezvous of winter idlers does as well as another for the purpose of mere pastime and epicurean pleasure in life, so he had brought his mistress to the same bright town nestled under the southern English hills. Miss Hermitage pronounced the house perfect, and the site bewitching, which it was indeed. Valerian's choice fell this time on a modest maisonette perched on a right royal hill, grounds and garden mount be of course insignificant in a place where every square inch of building land is worth its weight in gold to the speculators. But the view made up for everything. You might march the kingdom through and not find a more engaging prospect or heart-stirring panorama—fair green hills to the left, to the right, behind you, with all the signs of life and movement, church spires, garden-embowered villas, sloping meadows on which the cattle grazed even in winter, and below the many-sailed sparkling sea. All this and much more was to be seen from the house itself, whilst the very sense of altitude gave exhilaration. Were only a common prosaic world below, the tenant of these breezy heights must all the same have felt a strange change in being thus lifted above it, and enabled to contemplate his fellow-creatures, and especially those of the lower class, as they hurried about the day's many pigmies, as they hurried about the day's business. But the scene was very gracious. The happy configuration of the soil, dimpled hills of beechen grove, joining hands with stern sweeps of geese-clad moor, is heightened by contrast with the sea—perpetual repose wedded to perpetual unrest. Yet the sea has oftentimes a southern calm and suavity, and even on winter days bears on its tranquil bosom many a silvery sailed shallop that rests as anchor "lily as a painted ship upon a painted ocean."

Nor is life wholly ordinary and unpicturesque in this sweet place. You may still see in its ancient harbor sea-faring men brown as Redoubts, and, like them, not translated into vulgarity by means of broadcloth and the chimney pot. Wonderful indeed is their gear both on Sundays and working-days, for Sundays, provided the wind is not fair, new smocks dyed with the Indian catechu till they are bright as virgin copper, for plying their craft "all doth suffer a sea change." There are to be seen slouched hats, trews, and pea-coat—I know not by what other name to call them—of oil skin, shiny and green as fishes' scales, with big Roundhead boots well seasoned by salt-water, the whole making up a formidable appearance, as of men bent on dire encounter with the elements. When there is no wind at all you may see one metamorphosis more. This time the fishermen wear tight fitting garments of dark blue, having, with their fancifully shaped shrouding nets, an airy poetic appearance, although full of cold reality is the shrimper's life in winter. For these surroundings Miss Hermitage cared little, nor did the at all concern herself with Valerian's plans. She felt certain of being amused, and that sufficed. Just at present, however, she was enjoying a temporary lull, a pleasing interlude, devoid of surprise, but full of expectation. The curtain would soon be drawn. Meantime it was agreeable to sit awhile in subdued light, resting in one's powers of enjoyment. Stephana's arrival was the first event, and Miss Hermitage welcomed her warmly. "I do not understand you one more than if you had dropped from the planet Jupiter," she said, the first time they found themselves alone. "But I confess you divert me mightily. You are so unexpected in everything."

Stephana smiled one of those repressing little smiles of which Miss Hermitage was so far from divining the import. "And now I am going to be more unexpected than ever, Cousin Christina. I have something to tell you. I am going to marry Valerian."

"Valerian"—a man without a penny, without any position in the world, without— "You are joking," replied Miss Hermitage. "And I am sure you never led any one to suppose that you would ever marry again," she added, in an aggrieved tone. "What can have put such a thing into your head?" Stephana was silent. Could she ever make her reason understand? The task seemed as arduous she knew not how to begin. "At least if you make the mistake of marrying a second time, do it to your own advantage," Miss Hermitage continued. "You are young, rich, handsome. You might marry any one."

Still Stephana held her peace, but Miss Hermitage could not misread the look of quiet decision on her face.

"And Valerian's marriage would be the greatest possible misfortune to me," she said. "Have you thought of that?"

"Yes, I have thought of all these things. But I can not do otherwise. I must act up to my conscience."

"Really, Stephana, I am driven to think that you are going out of your mind."

"Is conscientious behavior so very rare, then?" laughed Stephana, bitterly. "But hear me out, Christina. I am bound to explain my motives to you. I will first my that two years ago, when we were at Naples together, Valerian led me to believe that only the deplorable position hindered him from coming forward. How could he, indeed? The thing was not possible."

"Well, what has happened to make it so? I have told you all along that I should never make Valerian my heir. A fair provision he will have, and the rest goes to charity," retorted Miss Hermitage. "If you marry Valerian, you will do it with your eyes open."

"But it is just because Valerian is so unfortunate that I have determined to do all that in me lies to make reparation," Stephana went on, quietly and resignedly, her mind made up to force an explanation upon her cousin, an answer at what cost to both. "Do you not see" she added, with almost painful emphasis, "how we are beholden in him be very reason of the wrongs in him endured?"

"I leave him a thousand a year. A man ought be so idled to grumble when thus provided for. I do think, my dear Stephana, Valerian's wrongs, as you call them, are for the most part imaginary. We have adopted him into the family; the facts of his birth concern nobody."

"At least they concern himself," Stephana made reply, again with extreme bitterness underlying her sweet voice, "and because they are shameful they concern all the world." She glowed with passionate indignation as she went on: "Has it never occurred to you that it is just the sins of which Valerian is the victim that make our modern civilization a mockery and society hideous? For my part, I never meet a work-house child but I blush for the depravity of my fellows. And now the law of retribution! We bring those unhappy beings without conscience into the world, and without conscience they turn upon us, vindicating themselves by violence and crime. What but chance hindered Valerian from being one of these abandoned ones?"

Miss Hermitage looked annoyed, even disturbed, yet unconvinced. "All this may be true," she said, evidently wishing to narrow the discussion to a point; "but I fail to see what they have to do with your proposal to marry him."

"Everything," answered Stephana, quietly. Then with a fine blend of enthusiasm she said: "I am rich, and he has nothing. In making over to him my wealth I give him the means of combating those social evils. He, the victim of shame and sin, shall stand up to plead the cause of others similarly ill used, the apostle of a higher code of morality."

Miss Hermitage made sarcastic retort, though she had seemed to wince whilst listening.

"Throw your money into the sea if you like, my dear Stephana. It is your own, and none can say you nay. But, depend on it, as long as the world stands there will be vice and virtue. It is a law of nature."

The glow faded from Stephana's face, and the tremor of fine feeling no longer thrilled her voice, as she replied, in her turn biting and sarcastic: "So I dare say the Pacific islanders thought when they made meals of their captives. And we are not so far ahead of them as we think."

"Well, we are not cannibals, thank Heaven! But reflect for a moment. You would be very unhappy with Valerian; you can are not in the least suited to each other. Let him be. Let everything be. It would be so much better both for your health and spirits."

Stephana sat still, silent yet remonstrant. Miss Hermitage continued, with positively caressing ease in her hard voice: "I should be really sorry to see you make another mistake—I should indeed. These handsome notions of doing good never come to anything, my dear. We must just eat our bread and butter from day to day, and leave the world as we find it."

"Has Valerian's fate never troubled you, then, Christina?" asked Stephana, looking with indescribable pathos into her cousin's eyes.

"You see that I have provided for him; I could not do less," was the quick, irritated answer. "But now do let me hear what you have been doing in London all this time, and the place reeking with fever. I trust you have made your will. The life of a rash, impulsive person like yourself is not worth an hour's purchase."

Thus the conversation ended. And Stephana succeeded in making her motives plain? Was Christina any nearer her honest thoughts and most painful convictions? She could not tell. She only knew that her cousin would never be brought to return to the topic, and almost seemed, by such avoidance, to shun her company.

CHAPTER XX.

VALERIAN needed all his much praised tact, collectedness, and discrimination to extricate himself from his strange position. Arthura, he betrothed, his only love, in the house, Stephana, his would-be benefactress, close by, and alike the love of the one and the magnanimity of the other to be held a dead secret, locked up in his own breast as if indeed they were not. For if Arthura must not know of Stephana's benign intentions, still less must Stephana suspect Arthura's girlish passion. He had kept silence. The time was gone by for any gentle unravelment of the threads. Come what would, they must now be calmly cut asunder, perhaps to-morrow perhaps next year, no matter when, so long as it was not too late.

Thus he reasoned, and certainly such a decision was convenient, if hardly high-minded or wise. Nothing could have been more uncomfortable to all three than an explanation just then. Arthura must straightway forfeit her really handsome position, Stephana's generous schemes would be nipped in the bud, and his own worldly prospects suffer shipwreck. Miss Hermitage would never forgive the deception, never, never, never, repeated Valerian to himself, condoning one crooked line of conduct by another. And having once persuaded himself that it was inevitable, that he was thus acting because to act otherwise was impossible, he finally took refuge, as most of us do under similar circumstances, in a kind of fatality. Failure's chances were playing with him. He was the sport of misadventure. He must live the time being just as the Fates do with him in their would. For the time being, reasoned Valerian. He had not the remotest idea of playing traitor to his better nature. He loved Arthura more dearly than ever, and would not suffer himself to drift into infidelity to her. When the crisis came he should give up everything for her sake; but meantime there was no crisis. He could enjoy the amenity of Stephana's friendship in the sweet consciousness of Arthura's love. And last but not least he was not breaking with his best friend, his cousin Christina. To give her up indeed, just now when she so urgently needed his services, would be the acme of human ingratitude. To have deceived her in the first instance and to go on deceiving her now was not only a duty, but a piece of downright kindness, Valerian finally said to himself, one sophistry, like one tortuous act, being implicitly bound up with another.

And indeed all went once smoothly. Arthura helping him with her proud reserve, Stephana on less so with her quiet, almost sisterly kindness. Kinder no woman could be to any man, but it was the kindness that has an sentiment in it—the kindness a lover would have resented. These steady sympathetic glances, those affectionate signs of interest, that friendly cervicabellatum, might mean anything but love. No wonder that Arthura was disarmed. It needed an woman's insight, nor man's either, to see that so far as Valerian was concerned Stephana was absolutely insensible to deeper feeling. She might like him, and that cordially. But she saw him come and go with perfect composure. She was the more whether he was absent or sitting by her side. Flattering, however, as might be this outward calm and fancied security to Valerian, Stephana aimed to touch firmer ground. Life to her meant an mere living from hand to mouth, to patchwork of good intentions and vague purposes, with less a curse-shoes got up for pastime and clipping of the hands. She must live consistently having definite objects before her ever, and forcing all minor circumstance and endeavor to one central thought. So having come to the conclusion that Valerian's future was matter of first concernment, she could not let day after day slip by. Nor was opportunity wanting. They were often thrown together; it rested with herself whether or no they should be alone. She had only to command an interview. She preferred to seize upon chance, and one day when Valerian called, little prepared for such an encounter, she bade him stay.

"Take a chair," she said, quite collectedly, almost coldly. "I have something to say to you."

Now Valerian had been quite thrown off his guard by Stephana's counsels, how, soberly behavior for weeks past, and almost driven to believe that such blissful uncertainty might last forever. There was an reason why Stephana should speak out to-day any more than yesterday, and that day twelvemonths any more than to-morrow. When, therefore, quite suddenly and unlooked for came such a behest, he felt too much taken by surprise to frame any resolution at all. And again the beguiling sophism came to his aid. He was the sport of circumstance. Chance must do with him as it would. At first Stephana's confidences were very re-assuring. Valerian listened, growing easier to mind and more courageous every moment.

"Valerian," she began, "I wish you would tell me in all frankness whether you have any sympathy with those causes for which my cousin Constantine has battled so stoutly? Do they so much as interest you?"

"To be perfectly sincere," he said, speaking candidly, and without any more an re-assuring, "I have always regarded myself as a nobody, to whom nothing was of any concern, except, indeed, the matter of meat, drink, and the wherewithal to be clothed."

They both smiled after friendliest fashion. Such straightforwardness pleased Stephana, and seemed a guarantee of higher qualities.

"Have you never wished to run such person as you possess on a wider, more ambitious scale? You are variously gifted. You should make a figure in the world."

Valerian laughed sarcastically. "Some men might do so certainly, and under the same conditions. I am afraid that I lack magnanimity. What right has society to expect anything of me? I say to myself, and go an ways unconcerned."

"But hardly content, I am sure," Stephana said, the underlying bitterness of Valerian's speech interesting, touching her. It was the first time that they had ever verged upon a confidence. She wanted to probe this nature hitherto denied by her—who could say how unjustly?—unprepossessable even to shallowness.

"Content is not perhaps the word, but nothing that may shock you more—indifferent. Had I not long ago schooled myself into indifference, life must have been intolerable to me. Men are slumberly placed would have recourse to the same philosophy."

Stephana glanced at her cousin's agreeable physiognomy, as traces of silent anguish on the smooth brow, no signs of inner conflict in the steadily beaming eye. All was careless, easy, youthful, yet how often may outward aspect betray rather than reveal the hidden soul! Who could tell what Valerian might have suffered in secret? Very kindly and unknowingly she took up the thread.

"I should have felt much for you, but I mistook your light-heartedness for insensibility. If, as you say, then, your present life were unbearable but for such indifference, why not change it? I was I have blamed your passiveness."

"Ambitiousness may be acquired," Valerian said, determined not to pose—at no rate and at all hazards to appear so other than he was to Stephana's eyes. "It would be hard indeed if I could not do better than I am doing now."

"Perhaps better for yourself and your worldly prospects," Stephana made answer, with appreciable disapproval in her voice. "I was hardly thinking of personal objects."

"Hear me," cried Valerian, giving way to sudden burst of genuine feeling. "I have never for a moment dreamed of being entoiled with myself. But there was gratitude binding me to Christina, and she still have this kind of service, and no other. It is hardly my fault if I am a perpetual master of drawing-room ceremonies."

"Poor Valerian!" said Stephana, smiling such more all sympathetic concern and benevolence. The herculean tasks that fell to his hands daily struck her as new facts of good augury. "The skill and energy you put into your present career might really accomplish great things," she went on, thoughtfully, "if you would only be guided."

Then turning round and looking him straight in the face, without a lineament of the saved vessel, a tinge of carnation in the pale cheek, she said, quite naturally and calmly:

"Will you give me a conscience in exchange for my wealth? Long ago, when we were in Rome, you hinted of your wishes to me, and spoke of the differences in our position as a barrier between us. I see the matter in another light. The sacrifice is to be all on your side. I have nothing but unearned worldly fortune to tender, but you—"

She gazed at him wonderingly, and added, with a more subtle movement in her voice: "What a more subtle movement in her voice: "What are you not bidden to give up? Ease, supposed habits of life, and perhaps romance? You must

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 1373.

here dreamed, like other men, of winning some woman's love, if not mine, for I can only give you friendship. No deeper feeling. I have said it. If, then, a single conviction assures you to be true, be true to it. Be what you will, only true to yourself."

Thrilled by this noble appeal, Valerian not listened, unable to open his lips, and such outward impassibility might well deceive a less unsuspecting looker-on than Stephana. For she was for as could be from reposing confidence or cowardice in this matter of fact, common place, yet well meaning and much-suffering Valerian. It seemed to her only natural that having at one time, hopelessly as he thought, aspired to her hand, he should to some what overcome by the sudden realization of his wishes. Silence on his part could mean no more nor less than excessive surprise, not without a touch of gratitude. And nothing he could say was so becoming and consonant to silence. His thanks she did not want, his love-making she could not have. They could, must be, only the best possible friends.

And Valerian seemed but to put her thoughts into words when at last he got out, lowlieringly enough, "You are my best friend in the wide world!" He paused, glanced round him nervously, as if he feared that even in Stephana's boudoir might lurk eavesdroppers, then added, "How can I ever thank you?"

Was he on the verge of a confidence? Had Stephana's singleness of purpose infected him? He hardly knew, he only felt conscious of a vague feeling akin to remorse, and of a fluttering impulse to tell her all. Had she been a common woman he would have done so. Stephana's very noble-mindedness awed while it disturbed him. He felt that already he was deserving of her scorn, and her generosity he was unable to measure.

"It will be my turn to thank if you do all, nay, the half of what I would fain impose on you," she replied, smiling graciously. "Thank will be here you accept me as your task mistress."

Then the bell out her beautiful hand with such an air of queenly condescension and yet womanly affectionateness that he could not choose her raise it to his lips.

So their interview ended.

(to be continued.)

MEMORIAL HALL IN RUTLAND.

Few towns have had a more satisfactory experience of the truth of the proverb that "in justice waiting there is no loss" than Rutland, the picturesque and prosperous "Marble City" of the Green Mountain State. Excelled by no town in Vermont in the number and quality of the men she gave to the war, outnumbered by no other town in the graves of her honored dead, which are strewn with flowers on Decoration-day, she has until now taken no practical step to erect anything to their memory. Several years after the close of the war a mixed civil and military committee was named to prepare plans for a suitable soldiers' monument, a handsome prize was widely advertised for the best design, and from over a hundred offered the committee adopted one possessing great merit, estimated to cost, in Vermont marble, ten thousand dollars. They were never quite satisfied that a mere monumental form was the best one for the memorial to take, and pending the discussion the panic occurred, the hard times followed, and it was thought more prudent to defer the report of the committee till more favorable times. So the ten years that have passed the subject has never ceased to occupy the minds of some members of the committee, who have worked out a plan for a more useful as well as a more beautiful form for the memorial to take than the ordinary soldiers' monument—a form in which it should tell its story more eloquently and have a greater daily living use and influence in the community than any monument simply.

From this study the beautiful building which we illustrate on page 340 has taken form—containing at once a temple to patriotic self-sacrifice, a stately and beautiful home for a public library, and an art gallery. The five marble companies of Vermont comprising the Producers' Marble Company generously offered to contribute the entire amount of marble required, and to extend the facilities of their works for the carving and cutting of the same. With an enthusiasm and fervor recalling the impassioned meetings of the war times, the town, rich and poor competing, with hardly a dissenting voice, adopted the designs, and voted the appropriation of $75,000 asked for. The material to be used is the choicest dark blue marble, with carved surface about the basement, finished with a deep red slate roof. The total cost will be about fifty thousand dollars.

Having a twofold character and purpose, the building fronts both ways. One front, the military, is wholly given up to telling the story in marble of the heroism of the dead, and the achievements of their arms in the war of the rebellion. The other, the literary, intending at once to every passer-by the importance of good books in the diffusion of knowledge, and that the great advantages we enjoy impose upon us grave responsibilities as citizens of a republic whose permanence depends upon civic virtue and popular intelligence. On either side of the vestibule on each front are arched panels fourteen feet high, divided horizontally by a heavy moulded course through the centre. In the upper halves are to be placed bas-reliefs—those of the military front of battle scenes—one introducing the artillery and infantry arms in action, and the other the cavalry, understood to be in the lower halves will be carved inscriptions, tributes to the memory of the dead, as well as expressing the popular impulse which has given birth to the building.

In the pediment above the vestibule will be placed a bas-relief representing Columbia sitting a sorrowing mourns beside the bier of her dead sons. Across the friese at a height of thirty feet from the ground will run this inscription: "Brave men, true patriots—loved of God and honored of all ages."

The scholastic front will have the same architectural character, but no ornamentation will be purely literary. The panel on the right will contain a bas-relief representing the re-awakening of the intellectual life after the Dark Ages, the beginning of our era, the subject chosen being an adaptation of the familiar picture of Friar Bacon, in cowl and gown, in his grated cell, surrounded with the rude appliances of scientific research—retorts and crucibles, vellum manuscripts and parchment scrolls—half scientist, half magician. The subject of the other bas-relief will be wholly scientific. As the building will be as absolutely indestructible as marble and iron and the absence of wood can make it, a century hence it may prove a curious and instructive milestone down the pathway of the ages since Friar Bacon's day, and throw us back upon the middle distance, should the twentieth century equal in fertility our own. Across the friese, balancing the other, runs this inscription: "From good Books cometh Education, from popular Education true and abiding Liberty." In the staircase basement story, twelve feet high, well lighted and ventilated, affords room for twenty thousand volumes of the circulating library, together with working and waiting room.

The Memorial Hall will occupy the centre of the building, flanked by two wings, the one containing a thoroughly equipped study, the other a militaire museum of war relic room. Around its walls at the height of six feet will run cases for the more valuable books of a reference library, to be used exclusively within the building. Above these cases the wall spaces will be prepared for the reception of military portraits, battle scenes, or other works of art which may be presented or lent. The floor will be laid in a rich design of marble tiles converging to the centre, as the distinguishing feature of the building, which makes it more complete as a memorial or monument than anything hitherto erected. This will be a pile of a military character, part altar, part trophy, upon which to place a record-book, which takes the place of the usual lettered bullet, only giving the name, company, regiment, date of death, and section in which each soldier fell. This book will be of imperishable as the stoutest vellum with metal binding can make it, and in it as indelible ink, giving to each dead soldier a full page, will be engrossed a short but full record of his service.

The last half of the book will contain a complete roster of all the men Rutland gave to the war, giving a third or a fourth of a page to each, with lists of detail than to those killed in action.

THE OPENING OF THE BRIDGE.

Since the completion of the Croton Aqueduct, now forty years ago, there has been no dedication of a public work to the public uses so impressive and so important as the opening of the Brooklyn Bridge. To find another parallel we must go back twenty years further, to the opening of the Erie Canal. This was perhaps the most important event of the three, since the opening of the canal unquestionably determined the metropolitan rank of the city which is now connected by the bridge with the greatest suburb of any city in the world, itself the third in rank among the cities of the United States.

The canal has been all but superseded as a channel of commerce, and desperate remedies have been brooked to prevent it from lapsing into the obsoleteness and oblivion of a dry and useless moat. The aqueduct, which its builders confidently expected to supply the needs of the city for many generations, has become inadequate during the lifetime of its engineer, and needs to be supplemented by another and ampler conduit. How long will it be before the great bridge that [illegible] designed to supplement by another and another [illegible] and so on ad infinitum?

We can hardly avoid asking ourselves this question as rapid and impressive has been the progress of New York during the forty years that have elapsed since the opening of the Erie Canal, even while we are congratulating ourself in other upon the monumental achievement which seems so much like a triumphant finality. But the bridge, so much of engineering, is so distinct an advance upon anything that has been done before in the same direction, and its influence will be so important upon the relations of the communities which it unites, that it is worthy of the great pageants with which it was opened to the public and of the exultant oratory in which its completion was celebrated by Mr Hewitt and Mr Stevens. The completion of such a work justifies the most gorgeous rites which the complexity of our civic organization can command. The official presence of the President, of the Governor of the State, of the dignitaries of the army and navy, and of a squadron of sobering men-of-war, in addition to whatever of pomp and circumstance could be given on the occasion by the militia, were all required by the intrinsic importance of the event they were to celebrate. The design of the bridge itself shows that no commonplace we have lost the power of conceiving particularly works and events of practical utility. If we had not, the visible union of New York and Brooklyn with links of steel would have demanded the most splendid ceremonial we could have devised. It is not likely that the "inauguration" of the bridge will ever attract a historical painter or a subject. And yet the canvas by a visible tie of the first and the [illegible] of American cities is instrumentally as noble a theme for art as the [illegible] power of Venice, the fantastic symbol of which, in the procession of the Sposalizio, generations of painters have delighted to celebrate.

There is always some measure of tragedy in the memories of a great work that has been continued for many years. The bridge is not, like the Pyramids, a monument of the hopeless toil of thousands of men under the scourge of a cruel tyrant. The humblest laborer can helped to lay its foundations under the side can walk its roadway as much its owner as any other. But the ancient superstition, which Professor TYLER has traced to its source, that a man must be buried under the pier of a bridge that the bridge may stand, has been threatened more than once. The custom of the "caisson disease" have left their lives under those massive towers. The most illustrious of the sacrifices is that of the great engineer who designed the work, the crowning achievement of his laborious life. But scarcely less pathetic be the fortune of his son and successor, who was only permitted to participate in the ceremonies which celebrated the completion of the bridge as a distant spectator, instead of being the hero of the hour, and receiving in person the honors and gratulations he had earned. He has had only the view from Pisgah of the goal that has been reached after twelve weary years. The bridge is likely to outlast all traditions of the men who built it. But one of the most enduring of these traditions is likely to be the touching story of the successive members of the work, the Roeblings, father and son.

"DAD'S GIRL."

Oh, the world is full o' fathers, an' full o' babies too;
An' there's mothers, dear, a plenty, though we've a one for you;
An' there's homes when hev o' money makes livin' fine an' grand,
An' there's folks, too, we can choose from the best on any we land.
It ain't much money, darlin', as stuffs my pockets out,
An all the land I own you could roll a stone about.
But this 'ere cot holds sometain' out every home may see
It's holdin daddy's girl, dear, an' that's enough for me.

Oh, my girl she is as bonny, as winsome, an' as fair,
With the sun forever dancin' an' glintin' through her hair;
An' her lips like two red cherries, an' the mother's eyes so blue,
With the look that was her mother's forever shinin' through:
Save I'm thinkin', baby darlin', all the babies ever known
Can't boast her the mother left me or love and bind alone.
An' of only she war in it—the wife who loved me so—
I wouldn't swap my home for the grandest one I know.

Ay! you're daddy's girl, my baby! he wants no other love
Till the good God bids him home yo an' meet the wife above.
So we'll pat pull on together, my little 'un, an' see
How glad with love and sunshine our humble home may be.
True, toon early done till evenin' there's work enough to do;
But a right heart makes light labor—that's easy puttin' through.
An' dark's dust girl is waitin with her kisses soft an' sweet,
When this long day's work is now, an' she an' dad may meet.

THE COACHING CLUB

"I can't for the life of me see what sport there is in driving a coach."

The speaker was an elderly man who stood at the edge of the throng in front of the Hotel Brunswick, when the New York Coaching Club started on its annual parade.

"When I was a boy—and a young one at that," he continued—"I lived up in Connecticut. That was before the days of railroads. I well remember the line of mail-coaches that then ran between New York and Boston. They used to pass through our village and were like those coaches for all the world. Not quite so smart, perhaps, but very like 'em. Their arrival at the old tavern was a great event. More like work than play coaching is, though. It's time wasted. There isn't be any sport in coaching." The old philosopher nagged his head wisely, and wandered on down Fifth Avenue to the Square.

No sport in coaching? Don't tell a coachman or one who has driven a coach that. He won't believe you, and may think you're crazy. Let the old gentleman opened, or any who believe with him, count the loss of a herdsome and heavy coach or which four spirited horses are attached. Let him crack his long whip over the heads of the leaders, if he can, to the music of the post-horn, as evoked by Few save some other "coachguard. With the first plunge of the horses he will find that he has something besides boy's play on hand. He will find too, that, expert driver as he may have been, smart horses or he may have driven, he has in the finely bred horses in front of him something besides the hack team of a lumbering mail-coach to handle. Give the horses their heads, and these comes at once a rush of young blood that setsonsive the sluggish fluid in his veins, and sets it coursing at unwonted speed. He braces himself more manfully against the stanch foot-rest, he settles more squarely on his seat. As the leaders plunge forward, and the pole horses settle down to their work, and all seem to take a firmer hold on the ribs, there comes along the lines a sort of electric thrill, and unconsciously he takes a firmer hold. Fingers tingle, muscles tighten, carpets tone are deeper and fuller. Age says good by for the time, and youth resumes once more its sway. The eye watches critically to detect every ungrim of the blooded animals, restless to harness, and every [illegible] is at a high tension. A bit of paper [illegible] across the road, and near the leaders. They swerve from their course, and as steady a hand is needed as is necessary at the helm when a sudden gust makes the sails of the trim yacht, and evokes every plank and every yard of rigging groan and almost beg to stop asunder. No sport? Let him try and crack the whip as accurately as does that pet of society, that favorite of the clubs, driving the coach ahead of him, so that the others look just touches the nested covering over the ear of a leader—touches it as lightly as does the fly cast by the expert fisherman just touch the water in the centre of that pool where the king of the trout stream has his way. He'll find as much genuine pleasure in holding the ribbons then or does the fisherman in holding the line when the trout makes his lightning-like snap at the tempting fly. And the former must be as expert as a any as the latter to keep the competitive game—may both be called—in hand. A ten-mile drive over Westchester County or Long Island roads will find the old man or the amateur coachman possessor of a healthfully tired body, a gourmand's appetite, and, if it be evening when the drive is concluded, a disposition for a fragrant after-dinner cigar and a sound night's rest. He will see more say there's no sport in coaching.

Coaching has more to be one of the most popular of sports among those who can afford it. It is not only healthful and invigorating, but a union of unlikability beside which many of its rivals among sports—even yachting, with its [illegible] ever possible dangers—can not be compared. There is a sense of safety while rolling over mother earth—no treachery there from winds or tides. That sense of security goes out to the social spirit. The invigorating air, the beauties of the landscape, the countless "Wanamaker's head-quarters" on every side, and the pictures of country life and country gentlemen, an never-failing themes for all in sentiment, suggestions for poetry or story. To be sure, the coaching enthusiast can not control the weather. Showers will come. But there are seats inside for the ladies. Your true coachman rather enjoys than regrets such an interruption. His great-coat, with prodigious buttons, always provided for such an emergency, is sufficient protection for him, and a rain for a place of shelter, when thunder and lightning accompanies the storm and frightens the horses a bit, is a source of additional exhilaration to him; and a successful race under such circumstances forms a fruitful topic of conversation for many days to come.

To the average man or woman the annual Coaching Club parade is an event of the season. And well it may be. Sleek, high-spirited horses, mated to cross match, carefully groomed, handsomely harnessed, clean body-lined coaches in white, cream, yellow, claret, or red, with running gear usually of some strongly contrasting color, guards well dressed, conscious of their importance, lumy of lung, and every so busy as to post-horn; gallants, each with boutonnière in the coat lapel, dressed and kidded in accord with fashion's latest dictates; ladies resplendent in costumes of the gayest and umbrellas of the brightest colors, vying with those of the flowers in their orange bouquets, yet always in harmony—that is the picture, and some of its characteristics one notes has reproduced elsewhere. Who will say it is not a bright one, especially when color brings out the effects that we but ply be told in black and white or HARPER'S WEEKLY must tell it? A dozen coaches—a dozen pictures of life and beauty—whirling through the Park when spring has given life to the brown and barren lawn and trees of winter. Flashing horses, merry laughter, smiling faces, happy hearts. Such was the parade of the Coaching Club, and each participant to the day's sport felt under personal obligations to Colonel DELANCEY KANE for introducing the sport to Manhattan Islanders. Colonel JAY, Colonel KIP, FREDERIC BRONSON, Consul-General T. A. HAVEMEYER, and Consul BRUNO FRITSCH, of the Austrian government, G. H. FEARING, J. V. PARKER, J. R. ROOSEVELT, F. A. SCHERMERHORN, F. K. SUTTON, ARTHUR BELMONT, Colonel ISAAC H. REED FARNHAM ROGERS, and others well known in social and business circles, own and drive their coaches, and lend health and pleasure in the recreation. No sport in coaching? Why, then, its devotees among those whose means enable them to gratify every desire for pleasure?

C. T. BARNUM.

AN INDIAN DANCE.

On page 340 we give an illustration of the war-dance celebrated by General Crook's Apache scouts at Willcox, Arizona Territory, the night before starting on the present expedition against the hostiles. The sketch was made on the spot by Mr HARMAN, an artist who is devoting himself assiduously to the delineation of Indian life and character.

THE WHEELMEN'S MEET.

On page 346 we present an illustration of the third annual meet of the League of A[illegible] Wheelmen, one of the largest and most enthusiastic gatherings of the kind that has ever taken place in this country. Our picture shows a column of wheelmen on the Riverside Drive. The procession, led by the "pace-makers," followed by Commander BENNETT and his escort, consisted of four divisions, as follows. The first, under command of Mr Page, [illegible] Boston, was composed of clubs whose entire membership was League ones; the second, under command of Captain [illegible], third, [illegible] Mr [illegible] R[illegible], [illegible] the [illegible] under [illegible] of [illegible] way a [illegible]

THE GREAT BRIDGE—FIREWORKS AND ILLUMINATION: FROM THE BROOKLYN SIDE.—DRAWN BY CHARLES GRAHAM.—[SEE PAGE 345.]

OPENING OF THE COACHING SEASON.—DRAWN BY H. A. ULKE.—[SEE PAGE 341.]

A RECOGNITION.

By F. MARION CRAWFORD.
Author of "Mr. Isaacs."

JOHN CURWEN was never jealous. He had perhaps outgrown such weakness, for he was forty years old at the very least, and his gray hair made him look older. At all events, he had not missed a meal during the four or five days since the steamer had left New York. He did not look very healthy, like no Englishman, nor very dyspeptic, like some Americans. His hair was gray, his face rather pale, and his manner quiet. He was of middle height, neither stout nor thin, neither very broad nor very narrow. He dressed very quietly, read a great deal, and said he belonged to the legal profession. Altogether he was an unobtrusive and business-like passenger, who gave no trouble, and took none.

For four or five days he rose regularly, answered the regular summons to table, walked a mile or two on deck, read for several hours, smoked an evening cigar, and went to bed between nine and ten, apparently perfectly contented, or perfectly indifferent.

One morning he paused in his walk and leaned back against the bulwarks facing the deck, just as a steward was helping a lady, who seemed very weak, to reach her deck chair near the door of the companion. The weather was warm, but the lady was thickly veiled and wrapped in some soft voluminous garments that hid her figure completely; but her hands were ungloved as she gripped the arms of the chair in the act of seating herself. They were hands that had been beautiful once, and were still remarkable—long, slender hands, with delicate fingers tapering back at the last joint, like those of some pianists; as she lady sank back wearily into the chair they folded themselves loosely on her lap. The steward arranged her pillows and her shawls not unskilfully. She motioned her thanks, and he withdrew. John Curwen stood looking at her, still leaning against the bulwark. In a few minutes he resumed his walk on the deck, pausing and repassing the sick lady, and each time he came near to her he slackened his pace and looked intently at those hands of hers, that were unlike those of other women, and seemed to tell a tale. He tried to smile what must have been his curiosity, and he sat for some time reading far away from her, but it was no use. The leaves of his book stuck together in the breeze, and the letters danced before his eyes, till he discovered that after half an hour's effort he had not read a word. The passengers came and went, and settled themselves to enjoy the balmy June day, each one in his or her own fashion, and John Curwen watched them idly, as though they were so many lay figures. At last a band of children, making merry over their recovery from seasickness, ran against him in their play, and roused him from his reverie. He rose and walked leisurely forward toward the companion.

The lady was still sitting there, her face still veiled, and her hands still here. He stopped by her side and looked once more at the white fingers. Then he took off his hat, and stood bidding it with he spoke

"Madam," he said, "I must beg to be forgiven for my indiscretion. Are you or aren you Miss Amy Anston, of New York, or am I mistaken? Pray forgive me—I will explain."

"That was my maiden name, sir," she answered, quietly. "May I ask how or when you have known me?"

"I am John Curwen."

"John—Curwen," she repeated, slowly, but rather as though she was completely surprised than as needing any effort of memory to recall the man to the name. Her hand quickly loosened the veil that hid her features, and they were face to face, looking earnestly into each other's eyes.

She was a woman who had probably been pretty in her youth, but who was rather plain in middle age. She was thin, and had a refined air; but the jaw was too long and the nose too small for the face, her eyes were blue and faded, and somewhat insignificant. She might be forty, or she might be more, scarcely less. At present she was very pale from sickness, and the ovalous, half fearful look of astonishment that came over her features made the nervous lines that time and care had traced painfully distinct.

"Is it really you?" she asked at last.

"Yes, it is really I. I am John Curwen." He sat down beside her, still looking into her face; and gradually, as he looked, there came into her eyes a little burning light, a faint color rose in her pale cheeks, and she turned away from him.

"After all these years," she murmured, and sighed.

"After all these years," he repeated, solemnly.

"How did you know me, John—Mr. Curwen, I mean?" There was something pathetic in the blush, as she caught herself pronouncing the man's Christian name. What could it matter, at her age?

"I knew you by your hands, Mrs. Hartley," he replied, smiling rather coldly.

"And you know I am married? Of course—that is natural."

"Natural? Yes, I suppose so," said John, and was silent. For some minutes he watched her, as though trying to realize the extent of the changes he saw in her face.

"Are you sorry we have met now?" she asked at last, in a subdued voice.

"Sorry? Oh no! I am not sorry," she answered, and paused as though to choose her words. "Mr. Curwen," she continued, presently, "I have always—that is, I have very often wished I could ask you a question—"

"Yes?" he said, interrogatively, as she hesitated. She turned her face toward him, and spoke quickly.

"Why did you not come to meet me in Brick Lane, as you promised, twenty years ago? Do you look astonished? Do you not remember—"

There was a tinge of irony in her tone. John Curwen seemed to have lost the faculty of speech. He sat stupidly staring at her, unable to articulate a word.

"Do you mean to say," she said, with trembling voice, "that you do not remember?"

"Is it possible that you went to the place and did not see me, and that I did not see you?" John asked, a vague horror beginning to creep over him. She looked incredulous.

"I waited for you so long," she said. "You might have come, even if you meant to break it off."

"But I did. I was there. I waited all the afternoon."

"Mr. Curwen," she answered, coldly, "it is not worth while for you to—to invent anything now. It is too late."

John's face became very white, and he trembled for a moment.

"Mrs. Hartley, I solemnly protest to you that I kept the engagement, and waited for you many hours. You never came, and I was obliged to leave New York that evening, as I had told you. I wrote to you from the South many times, until I saw in the papers the notice of your marriage with Mr Hartley."

"But I was there too. How could I have missed you? There was not a soul in the road, and I was all alone." Mrs. Hartley was visibly in great excitement of mind, and her fingers twisted themselves tightly, as that the small blue veins stood out.

"Alone?" cried John, in great and genuine astonishment. "Alone, did you say? Why, Brick Lane is always crowded with people—it is quite a business thoroughfare! You must have gone somewhere else."

"Somewhere else?" she repeated, blankly. "I can not tell. The name was written on a board at the corner of a vacant lot. There were only one or two houses—"

"Good God! there must have been two Brick Lanes!" John Curwen buried his face in his hands, and Mrs. Hartley leaned back, whiter than death, and stared vacantly at the blue realms. Suddenly John looked up.

"And you never got my letters?"

"Never," answered she, in a weary, far-off voice. "They told me you had gone away, and had written to my father saying that in consideration of his violent opposition you renounced all pretensions to the marriage."

"What a lie!" said John, fiercely.

"Was it really untrue? Did you really write to me? Did you really mean to marry me?" Her voice was low and almost passionate.

"Indeed, indeed I did," was all he could say. There was no mistaking his look and tone; he was speaking the truth.

"Then it was all a dreadful mistake," she sighed, and once more rested her tired head among the pillows. She was so weak with sickness that the terrible shock had a tenfold force.

John Curwen sat by her side in deepest distress. He would have taken her hand in his had he dared, and he would have tried to comfort her. But he did not yet know what was in her heart, and he feared lest anything he might say or do should displease her.

He had been very much in love with her twenty years ago, and now he knew that he loved her still—this faded pretty woman, with her sweet sad face and beautiful hands. She was the same still to him; all the cruel years could not make her less lovely in his eyes than she had been when he had last seen her, not dreaming he should not see her again, marry her, and have her for his own always. He did not take any credit to himself for being faithful to the memory of his first love. Of course, as he said to himself when he thought of the matter, she had treated him very strangely and unkindly, but perhaps it was for the best. At all events, he was never afterward known to show any inclination to marry any one else, and his family and acquaintances had grown used to seeing him single. He sometimes wondered whether he would have been happier had he married Amy Anston all those years ago, and his heart said "yes," though his colder judgment said "no." But it never struck him that if he were to meet her again he would love her as he used to do, and he did not know that it was this love, deep down in his rather prosaic existence, that kept him from other women. And now, after living a great slice of his life without seeing her, and hardly hearing of her, he had suddenly met with her, and had a chance of telling what he felt. And more than this, the veil was dropped, and he saw clearly that his life's happiness had been wrecked on a vulgar mistake about a piece of meeting, and the beating of his blood told him all he had lost. It is no wonder he was distressed.

"Mrs. Hartley," he said at last, very gently, as fearing to disturb her, "are you alone on board? I saw the steward helping you on deck."

"Yes, my husband could not leave his business. I have no children."

"Then at least I can be of some slight service to you," he said, and perhaps his face betrayed his pleasure.

"You are so kind. I have been so dreadfully sea-sick. This is the very first time I have been on deck. It is not fortunate that we should have met?" she added, with a pitiful attempt at cheerfulness. But John did not answer immediately. He looked away.

"What is the use of trying?" he said after a while, as though speaking to himself.

"Trying what?" asked Mrs. Hartley, catching him.

"Well—I did not mean to say it—but what is the use of me trying to be cheerful and to talk like other people? It is very dreadful. But then, of course, you do not look at it quite as I do. You are married."

"Yes," she answered, still trying hard to speak cheerfully, "I am married, and so it is different."

"Ah me!" said John, "I wish I were married too, and—"

"Do not say that," interrupted poor Mrs Hartley. "Do not say that—you do not know what you say."

John looked at her half fiercely, trying to read her thoughts.

"Are you happy, Mrs Hartley?" he asked.

"Are you?" she returned.

"No, I am not a happy man. I am utterly miserable now. But tell me about yourself." His voice became gentle, and his face softened wonderfully as he moved nearer to her.

"What is there to tell?" said she. "Of course you want to know why I married? Yes. I am sure I do not know. Why do girls marry when they do not love? A great many of them do, and it is very wrong—so wrong that I hate to think of it. You see, I thought you had given up saying for me, and had gone away in disgust, and instead, it was all a cruel mistake." Her voice faltered, and they were both silent.

The stream of life moved by them down the deck and back again. All the papas and mammas, and the snowy daughters and the foolish sons, and the tribe of the little ones who would be pretty and foolish when their grown-up brothers and sisters were gray and wise—all the horde of passengers flitted past, and never even glanced at these two rather insignificant people seated side by side at the companion. Who should guess that the wreck of two lives could be so decent a thing?

But John Curwen was not a weak man, and he made a great effort to efface the sad impression of this meeting. He knew well enough that the case was hopeless. He could never marry her now. But it was something unexpectedly happy to be with her, and to know that, after all, she had not thrown him over, that the pleasure got the better of the sorrow before the hour came when Mrs Hartley went back to her state-room. She too felt the soothing influence, and recovering quickly from her temporary sickness, she breathed in the sweet warm sea air, and listened peacefully to the voice she had once loved so well. Little by little she found in the middle-aged man the traits she had delighted to admire in the boy who was to have been her husband. His quiet face wavered after twenty years to its old expression, and the tones of his voice melted back in youth's melody of cadence; his colorless eyes gathered the light unto them, and all his sober nature was young again.

Whereunto shall true love be likened? Being human and of this world, there is yet nothing in the world to which it is germane, and as the scoffers have scoffed in all ages and times, saying there is no true love at all, and if there be one, show it to us that we may know it, and have all the good things you say it gives. And how shall they be answered? Those are they also who say there is an soul, neither any life in a man save what he takes in the form of food. Man, they say, was not only a monkey in the beginning, but is also a monkey now of the higher shrewd kind; and there is truly nothing in their speech to preclude a belief in his possible and present return to that simpler and more primitive state of monkeydom, which was bounded on the one side by instinct, and on the other by violence; on the one hand by natural selection, and on the other by coco-nuts. If they say that on astute discrimination in choosing the best kind of females is scientific true love, how shall they be answered? Verily they need no answer, for they shall perish in their own devices, and that will be answer enough.

When John Curwen was alone that evening, smoking his last cigar, and peering over the side of the ship at the white foam that broke from the wounded bosom of the sea, he found that he had a great many things to think of. It is not a light thing to see a life-long doubt suddenly explained away into a clear truth. It is a very grievous thing to feel that for twenty years one has wronged a woman while loving her, to retrace and live over the hours of sharp agony and chilling pain, and to know at the last that she has suffered too, and that it has all been a mistake. John Curwen found himself searching for each bitter thing he had ever said in his heart about her unkindness, and trying to take it all back and love it unsaid. And ever as he pondered her sad face came close to him in the dark, up from the deep sea, reproachfully and fondly, as he had seen it that day resting on the cushions of the deck chair. And if his thoughts strayed for a moment to some other channel, he came back each time with a fresh start of surprise to the realization of the new truth he had learned.

Accustomed as he was by his profession to doubt and to question, he asked himself if this were only a passing sentiment, resulting from the sudden revival of old influences, or whether, if Amy Hartley were now free again, he would really wish to marry her after all those intervening years. And when he had asked the question he was almost ashamed of it, for it seemed so absurd and so superfluous. It was perfectly true—he had never once dreamed it possible to marry any other woman. If she were really free— But then his heart sank again like a stone in his breast, and he stared down at the rushing water, and wished it would open and swallow up his grief. And then he laughed a little bitter scoff at his own folly, and went to bed.

Mrs. Hartley was tired with the effort of her first day on deck, but she was cured of her seasickness. She took a book, and made up her mind to read a little before going to sleep. But she thought the author, who was nevertheless a very good novelist, the dullest rambler and thrower of phrases that ever spoiled paper. He seemed to her sharpened comprehension to be in a deplorable state of ignorance regarding human nature in general and love in particular, and before half an hour had passed she was reading her own life between his lines.

What a life! She had been very unhappy without being able exactly to define wherein the unhappiness lay. Hartley was a good man enough, as men go, and she had not anything to complain of in particular. Her friends and she were disconcerted, and that her veritable temper was the result of ill health, and indeed in fact diverted her more than once to be something of an invalid. It gave her a sort of respite, a kind of appreciation that she might possibly die and be free at last. She had an real interest in life to rivet her attention or to rouse her energies, and the small social duties that her husband required of her became wearisome before they were half performed. She had aspirations of an undeveloped kind after something she vaguely described as "higher," but they took the form of a little religion, a little charity, and a good deal of sentimentalness to anything she thought at all vulgar. She had travelled, and she read a good deal, and perhaps she might have talked well of the last found the right persons with whom to converse, but she never seemed to be fortunate in her friends, and she was put down among the same crowd of average women in society, whom intelligent people call upon sure a year because their husbands are "able" men, but whom are avoided in conversationalists, dandies, and amateur sweet greatness, because they can neither listen, flirt, nor flatter as well as the professional women of the world.

Her husband treated her well. He was perhaps rather fond of bestowing upon her small marks of his affection in public, and she thought he was coarse-grained, and deserted the reputation of having his wife. But he always treated her well, gave her money in reasonable abundance, indulged her whims when it was convenient, and went to his club when it was not. Once or twice he had shown a decided tendency to be jealous, and she had felt very much injured, or rebelled she might, poor thing! for she was the last person in the world to bestow a thought on the uninteresting men of business whom her husband brought to the house. On the whole, she knew very well that Hartley was a good husband to her, and that most of her friends would have been very glad to have him instead of their own.

But she was unhappy, for all that, and her unhappiness was as incurable as the malady she had made was past remedy. She knew that for it had never been so clear as it was to-day. She had not been an sure of what she had missed until fate had at last brought John Curwen back to her, and thus defined the contrast between what was and what might have been.

Of course it was only a memory. The John Curwen who had introduced himself was an individual so gifted as to rouse a sudden impulse of passion in the bosom of the first woman he was pleased to address, however charming he might have been in his early youth. The seed thrust into the earth out of the light of the sun in the autumn lies chilled and frozen in the ground, carrying the angularities of its subterranean apartment. Then comes the spring and the sun again—a very different looking sun, in all probability, in his first dubious shining, and one that he may would not as much regret leaving. But he is the sun all the same, and the seed knows him, and can not help growing if it would. That is not like the human heart.

Mrs. Hartley said to herself that it was only a memory, and must be treated as such, and forthwith the memory became a very present reality, and she thought of nothing but of her next meeting with John Curwen. All the gray, nervous, tiresome time was suddenly separated from the life before them and the life after them, and as the devil folded up poor Peter Schlemihl's shadow and packed it in his carpet-bag, so the genie of love rolled together those shadowy years of unrealized solitude and dropped them unstitch over the ship's side into the sea, and the sea swallowed them up. Not but what conscience came and whispered certain exceedingly trite and important truths, with which we are all very familiar—conscience did its duty in that desultory and perfunctory manner which characterizes especially its services. Conscience rarely has enough exercise to grow surely and aggressive. Besides, thought Mrs. Hartley, arguing backward, it is only a memory, and there is no harm in memories. Did one somebody write a book called the Pleasures of Memory? Yes, memory has great pleasures, thought she, and she went to sleep. Go you and do likewise, unless you would listen to a sad story.

Early the next morning John Curwen was on deck surveying the weather with an assumed expression on his face that was new to him. He had been dreaming all night of a pleasant day spent together in the open air talking over old times. It would be so easy, now that the ice was broken. And behold, the weather was inauspicably foggy and damp, the sun was nowhere visible, and the ship seemed to be sliding through greased cotton-wool. Still John hoped that after breakfast the fog would lift, and that it would be fine enough to sit on deck. Poor fellow he had promised himself so much pleasure in seeing the steward's place, in arranging Mrs. Hartley's chair and pillows, just where she would get the most warmth and the least glare of the sun. He was probably doomed to disappointment, and though he was not easily annoyed by anything, he gnawed his teeth and swore a little.

There was little chance that she would come to breakfast, for she had really been very sea-sick, and could hardly be expected to recover at a moment's notice. Nevertheless John asked all every one who seated to the great saloon, and then leisurely made a tour of inspection round the tables, in the faint hope of finding her. She had not come, however, and he reluctantly took his plans, and went through the usual ordeal of a ship's breakfast.

But Mrs Hartley woke in the morning with a supply of good conscience accumulated during the night. She had no intention of depriving herself of the pleasure of seeing John Curwen. Ah, no, how could she? It was so very sweet a thing to meet the old love again, and to know frost him own lips that he had been faithful to her. She was sure he was not married, for he had said something about it; and if he had not married, it had been for her sake. Besides, what could it matter? It was only for the few remaining days of the voyage, and then she would never see him again. But she would certainly not show any haste to be with him that day. He would think she could not exist without him. Well, not exactly that, for John was not that sort of man. Nevertheless she would take a little longer in dressing than she would have done if there had been no John Curwen.

She looked into the mirror as she arranged her hair, and the half light of the state-room helped her to be happy. Truly she was more able to bear the daylight this morning than she had been for many a long year. Seasickness is a passing ill with most people, and she had been fortunate in the manner of her cure. She looked pretty enough when she had twined a ribbon in her hair and adjusted the lace about her throat. But still she lingered awhile, and looked into the mirror and took a book and read a little, and then looked again, for there was not light enough to read, the day being foggy, but she could see herself in the glass.

How glad she was that she had been seasick all the time, and had no acquaintances on board, among the old lady with whom she meant to travel in Europe, and who never left her state-room during sea-voyages! She was such a tiresome old lady too! But her husband did not wish her to be altogether alone. They would meet in Liverpool, and mean while, now that the was well, the could go and inquire how the old lady was doing. Of course she would not be admitted, for the old lady was very hideous when the was not well, and belonged to a very high and glorious tribe of Knickerbockers, so that she had a reputation few state-liness to maintain. So the old lady would perhaps never know anything about John Curwen's meeting with Mrs. Hartley, not that it ought to be concealed, but the old lady had a vilely tenacious memory, and would doubtless remember the story of twenty years ago with inexorable accuracy of detail.

So it came to pass that between her toilet and her reflections it was twelve o'clock before Amy emerged from the sanctity of her state-room, and was immediately confronted with John Curwen. He had ascertained the position of her quarters, and was doggedly keeping watch. Mrs Hartley blushed with pleasure at seeing him, and looked prettier than ever.

"How well you look! I am so very glad!" were the first words he spoke, and if he had planned the speech for hours it could not have been more wisely framed.

"Yes," said she, "I am much better. How do you do? Let us go on deck and breathe." John was in raptures. She looked like her old self once more, and he was human enough to attribute the change in some measure to her pleasure in his company.

"I am afraid it will be bad for you," he said, "it is so foggy."

"Is it? Well, we can go out for a little, just to breathe the air, and then—we can come in again," she added. She was going to say, "and then we can talk," but the thought it would be too much encouragement for the first day. However, she reflected that it was really the second day, after all. The end of it was that after half an hour they were comfortably ensconced in a transom in a corner of one of the saloons. John was talking very earnestly, and Mrs. Hartley was fidgeting with downcast eyes and heightened color. One or two people passed there, and having noticed John's solitary habits during the voyage, looked twice at his companion, and went on. There was nothing about either of them that was in the least striking to the ordinary observer. Mrs Hartley had certainly been pretty, and today she looked bright and well preserved. nobody would have said that.

"Do you know," said John, looking at her as she turned her eyes from him, "that you hurt me very much by saying such things?"

"I do not know what I can have said to hurt you," said she, and it was about enough from the tone that the would not here hurt him for worlds.

"No," said John, thoughtfully, "I do not believe you meant it. You never know me to tell a lie in the old days. Do you think I would tell one now? I suppose it is hard to believe that any man could lead the life I have led. It has been a very sober and quiet life, very professional and staid. But I have sometimes noticed in my efforts how no idea has got hold of them very young, and has held them all their lives, and has brought them to queer results in the end. Excuse me if I am talking about myself, but to talk about myself is to talk about you."

"What is that you were saying about an idea lasting so long?" she asked, without nothing the latter part of his speech.

"Only this. I think that when a man suffers what I suffered in his early manhood, he is likely either to be a very oddly quiet person, or to go to the dogs altogether. Now ever since I got over the first shock I have always had an idea that some day we should meet, as we have met, almost by accident."

"But you might have met me hundreds of times if you had wished it," she objected.

"Yes, — not as we have met now. Just think, here we are, quite alone among those hundreds and hundreds of people. And we can say all we have to say without the least chance of interruption. If I had met you in society, we should never have had a moment's peace, and if I had come to see you, you would have been pouring tea, or ringing the bell for the servant every three minutes. I know just how it is, though I do not go out much."

"And now, instead, I have nothing to do but to listen to you, Mr Curwen?"

"Exactly. No tea and no servants. I have always thought we should meet in some such way, and the idea has kept me straight. It made me feel that I should some day have to account to you for my life. And now after twenty years I am able to do it. In twenty years, Mrs. Hartley, I have never for one moment thought of uniting myself with any woman since I lost the woman I loved. It is a clean record, though I do not want any credit for it. How could a man who had loved you ever think of having any one else?"

"Mr Curwen, you really ought not to talk like that," said Mrs. Hartley.

"Why not? It was ever so long ago, and of course now that you are married I can not possibly make love to you." It was a simple speech, but it had the merit of the outermost novelty. Even good-hearted Amy Hartley knew that, and she looked kindly at him.

"You are so honest," she said. "I am sure I should like you." John looked surprised.

"You liked me once, I hope you do like me still," he answered, "and that there is no small, would, or should about it. But please—please do not talk as you did a little while ago, and say you think I ever loved any one else. I have had chances, you know," he continued, demurely—"plenty of them. It is not as though I were a hunchback, or an idiot, or poor. I use successful, as they call it, and I might have married very well. Do not laugh. I do not want any credit for not having married, I never thought of it. But I want you to do me the justice to believe that I have always loved you faithfully, as I love you now, with all my heart. You see I am not making love to you as all; it is a mere statement on oath."

"I am not sure," said Mrs Hartley, with an attempt at a laugh. "If you say so I suppose I must believe you, and of course it would be no manner of use, you know. But I will do you justice, as you call it, and believe the other things you say, which are so much easier to believe." She leaned back, and her eyes grew dreamy.

"Try and believe it all," said John. There was a pause.

"After all," said Mrs Hartley, dubiously, after a few moments' silence, "there is no reason why we should not always be very good friends."

"Oh no, there is no reason," he answered. "I think we can." In his honest heart he jumped at the idea of a beautiful, innocent friendship.

"That is," continued Mrs Hartley, "if you will not talk any more as you have been talking today."

"Oh!" ejaculated John. "Why?"

"Because friendships of that kind are apt in turn out unexpectedly."

"Do you think so?" he asked. "It seems to me there is nothing else left for us but friendship. After all, when you think of all we have suffered, that is a great deal."

Amy Hartley's pretty face faded gradually, and seemed to lose its prettiness, growing weary and plain again. She was not disappointed at John Curwen's creation of fact views of the future, nor insisting as they did with his ardent words of love. She was too honest herself to look upon any other arrangement as possible, but it seemed hard to accept it. It seemed a terrible thing to look forward to the kind of acquaintance that friendship meant to her as the only possible relation between herself and the man she loved. The past had been painful enough in a dull, negative way; but to plan a future in which she should be constantly meeting John Curwen just as she met a dozen other people who called themselves her friends was inexpressibly horrible. The color faded from her cheeks and the eyes marks all came out. John saw the change, and understood.

"How dreary life is!" said poor Mrs. Hartley, half aloud.

"Dreary is not strong enough to express it," said John. "I think many people, in our place, would say it was tragic. And yet I suppose there is nothing for it," he continued, soliloquizing aloud. "We must live through it somehow, and perhaps there will be something better hereafter. There must be some compensation for suffering so much. If one could only guess at what the next world will be like!"

"It would not matter so long as it was not like this," sighed Mrs Hartley. "A very little difference would [illegible] like heaven."

"The difference of one life," said John, almost in a whisper.

"Hush!" said she, and the color came back to her face.

"Amy!" — he paused, half frightened at the sound of the old name. There was no answer. "Amy, if you were free now, would you marry me?"

There was a certain dignity in her as she answered him:

"Yes, Mr Curwen, if I were free I would marry you." But John lost his head. His eyes flashed, and his pale face borrowed a faint color from hers.

"Oh, Amy, I do love you so!" he said, close to her ear. His voice sounded very differently now. It was no longer the smiling-of-fate declaration of a quarter of an hour before. It was genuine love-making, and his hand, obedient to his voice, stole softly to her hands—only for a moment—then she started away from him.

"Oh, no! no! no!" she cried. "You must not—it is very, very wrong. I do not love you—no, I do not. I only could, if—" But the remainder of her speech was drowned in the noise of many rushing feet and crying voices overhead upon the deck.

The sound was so extraordinary and so loud that John sprang from his seat, certain that something was amiss. Mrs Hartley instinctively stretched out her hand to hold him back.

"Do not leave me!" she cried, but before the words were out of her mouth John was thrown heavily back into his seat, and the whole great vessel lunged and shivered and reeled again be neath a tremendous blow. The ship resounded with the deafening shrieks of women and the hoarse cries of men. From every side people rushed from their cabins, from the saloons and passages, in frantic panic to reach the deck. Falling over each other in their haste, they passed John and Mrs Hartley like a herd of frightened beasts, tearing each other to the struggle to be first, trampling each other under foot, uttering those strange sounds of fear and frenzy, never heard save in times of desperate and sudden death. At the same time a deep and ghastly sound, in horrid tones to the shrill human treble, wailed and gurgled beneath it all; a gulping, heavy gurgle, as though some huge monster were struggling to swallow up the world.

John put his arm round Amy Hartley, and would have lifted her and carried her away with the stream of people. But she clung desperately to the cushions and the carved work of the seat.

"We have struck something," John cried to her through the din, "and perhaps we are sinking." Her face was dead-white, and there was a strange look in her eyes.

"I will not go," she said, in a tone that he rather understood than heard. Still he struggled to take her away, and still more fiercely she resisted. The people had all passed them, and they were alone with that deep roar of rushing water close to them.

"I will not go," she repeated. "Save yourself. Leave me." And she strove with all her strength to shake him from her.

"So be it," said John, under his breath. "But I will not leave you now or ever." He fell back into his seat, his arms still around her, and his face still close to hers. "If it must be, dear, I will stay with you to the end." Then he was silent.

The ship moved strangely in her death-agony. One end seemed to plunge downward, slowly at first, and then more quickly, and the masses of water by her surged with tremendous force between the decks. Overcome with the extremity of the danger, John made one last desperate effort to drag Mrs Hartley from the seat to which she clung. But it was too late. It had all happened in a moment. The ship was at an angle that made walking impossible, and John saw that there was no hope. The few seconds' delay caused by her mad resolution had put all chance of escape beyond reach.

In that awful moment the two lovers clung to each other in the terror of expectation. The woman had suffered most, and was the more ready to die.

"We shall be drowned together," said Amy, quite calmly. Her courage fired the sinking life in the man's breast. He wound his arms close about her, closer and closer, and his white lips were upon hers in the last sweet kiss. She did not push him away as struggle any more.

"Oh, Amy," he cried, forgetting everything in the joy of that close meeting, "Amy, Amy, how I love you! Love me too, just for this one moment. Make this dying together the sweetest thing in all our lives." Her eyes were brought into an agony of passion and love and tenderness. But she did not answer, she could not say it. But the color came for the last time to her poor face, and her arms were about him. She meant to hold him, the gray lose was never—no more would be the sadness of life-long parting. Still he pleaded, grieved in the complete forgetfulness of [illegible]. "Ah, dear, you need not [illegible] to tell me you love me now. Say! we have only an instant more to live. But it only once, beloved—only this last little once."

Then she drew him closer still, and kissed him. "I love you, John! I have loved you always—God knows how I have loved you always. I have no tears left now, only happiness. I love you now and forever."

"Forever, darling," cried John Curwen, and with a huge whirling furore, like a hundred mill races let loose, the heavy water broke into the cabin, and drowned them, still kissing each the other's lips.

Breast to breast, heart to heart, hand to hand, the two went down to their death in the deep, to be at peace forever. It was quick and merciful and happy, for the report from the colliding ship said the vessel had sunk in five minutes from the time of striking.

The green ocean washes evenly over them by day and night, and by weeks and months and years, and we pray that their two souls that had so bravely struggled through the dismal tasks of life may be united in one common essence of love, to be together forever. They need no other heaven than each other's love.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

A Philadelphia daily paper explains that a "newspaper man" is one who has been writing editorials for eighteen or twenty years, and a "journalist" is one who has been a police reporter for about two weeks. A man who had grown gray in editorial work in this city was asked why he had himself put down in the directory as printer. Because there are [illegible] many editors," replied

An arrant coxcomb of the [illegible] which recently visited Kansas City in [illegible], "The air suddenly grew cold. It is impossible to describe the weird and unnatural chill, more than it was icy, and lasted for some moments. Just then a gigantic cone-shaped cloud, the point toward the earth, appeared in the northwest. Those who noted the time as we shot it was exactly 4.20. The cloud rushed into view as quickly that it was impossible to tell whether it was born of a conflict of the elements before the eye or came from some point beyond. Moving with inconceivable rapidity, and bounding like a ball, sometimes hundreds of feet above the earth and sometimes trailing upon it, the monster passed over Windedotte, and passed at the line opposite the mouth of the Kaw, where it sucked up tons of mud, completely changing its color from dark blue to a deep dun, then it zigzagged upward, bounded into mid-air, and disappeared."

Now that the great bridge is opened to the public, much will be heard of the inexplicable sensations of persons who will declare that as they looked down into the river they felt themselves almost irresistibly impelled to hurl themselves from the lofty span. The location of the promenade in the centre of the structure, and the presence of a numerous guard, will afford them no excuse for not acting thus rashly, and they will live to tell of the strange impulse. The owner of three lanes walked across the slatted foot bridge that was slung from the tops of the towers two hundred feet above the water, and, humor bright, he felt himself irresistibly impelled to hang on to the guide-rails and make his way across very cautiously. He can truthfully and that once, while looking down through a hole and a half of "thin air" from the basket of a balloon, a similar impulse to not throw himself not possessed him.

What could be more farcical than the close of a violent speech made by an Irishman at a meeting in this city a few Sundays ago, against opening the East River Bridge on Queen Victoria's birthday? Snapping his fingers and making a gesture which told that he would offer no further resistance, he cried, "Let the farce go on!"

A ROOSTER QUERRE (RUSE DE GUERRE).

This season's May snow-storms will furnish material for the discourses of the future Oldest Inhabitant.

Foundations are in course of preparation for a fifteen-story apartment house in the upper part of this city. The building is not to cover a large area, and those are no tall structures adjoining, it would seem to be beyond the possibilities of architecture to make the building look like anything but a mere inhabitable shaft. The street on which it is to be built is some eighty feet above the sea level, so the dwellers in the fifteenth story will be sure to get all the advantages which a sightly location offers. In the event to be surrounded by the large apartment-houses at Seventh Avenue and Fifty-ninth Street, now partly built, fifteen tiers of windows may be counted. The level of the court in one story lower than the sidewalk, so that it is fair to count only fourteen stories. The construction of the houses is such that there will be fewer stones on the sides fronting the streets than on those upon the court, and the appearance of great height will thus be avoided in a considerable degree. Apartment-houses with ten stories in the rear are becoming quite common in New York. They are made as nearly fire proof as possible, and are provided with passenger elevators, and the upper stories are usually among the first to find tenants.

The opening of the season at Coney Island so differs now from what it was in the days when it consisted chiefly of the advent of a brace of three-card monte men in green goggles on a Sunday morning in June.

Many suggestions have been made in print as to the best popular name for the great bridge. The structure has been called the Brooklyn bridge oftener than by any other name, but since there is to enjoy the greater share of whatever material benefits may arise from its use, Brooklyn will suffer no hardship if the name of the city is not given by popular voice to the structure. The Abo announcement, without dreaming is worth while to set forth the undeniably weighty reason, that the structure should be called the Roebling bridge. A very serious objection to this name is the fact that very few native Americans could pronounce it properly. In view of the fact that the bridge is the only one that spans the East River and is in a fair way to remain the only one for [illegible] years, why not call it the East River [illegible]? Nearly every great bridge in the world [illegible] of a [illegible] bridge, [illegible] the [illegible] bridge, [illegible] The [illegible] for [illegible] bridge. The [illegible] bridge. [illegible] East River bridge. [illegible] bridge [illegible] East River bridge—not a bad [illegible] short enough in [illegible] after the issue of its first number; and under the management of Mr Joseph PULITZER the World, after many vicissitudes of fortune, appears to have entered upon a new career of substantial prosperity.

THIRD ANNUAL MEET OF THE LEAGUE OF AMERICAN WHEELMEN.—THE PARADE ON RIVERSIDE DRIVE.—DRAWN BY C. D. WARNE.—[SEE PAGE 341.]

CHARLES B. MILLER.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY SARONY.

KENTUCKY POLITICS

THE recent three days' Convention of the Democrats at Louisville, Kentucky, resulted in the choice of the following ticket for State officers: for Governor, J. PROCTOR KNOTT, of Marion; for Lieutenant-Governor, J. B. HENDMAN, of Adair; for Attorney-General, P. W. HARDIN, of Mercer; for Treasurer, JAMES W. TATE, of Franklin; for Auditor, FAYETTE HEWETT, of Harlan; for Superintendent of Public Instruction, J. DESHA PICKETT, of Fayette; for Register of the Land Office, J. C. CURTS, of Pike.

The Hon. Mr KNOTT, the nominee for Governor, was born near Lebanon, Kentucky, in 1830. After studying law he removed to Missouri in 1850, and was admitted to the bar in 1851. He was elected to the House of Representatives of Missouri in 1857, and resigned in August, 1859. The same month he was appointed Attorney-General of Missouri; was unanimously nominated for the same position by the Democratic Convention, and elected in August, 1862. In 1865 he returned to Kentucky, and commenced the practice of law in his native town. He was elected a member of the Fortieth, Forty-first, Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, and Forty-seventh Congresses, but declined a nomination for the Forty-eighth. Among those who contested the nomination with Mr KNOTT were General SIMON B. BUCKNER, THOMAS L. JONES, CHARLES D. JACOB, and M. H. OWSLEY. Mr JACOB was withdrawn after the first ballot, followed by Mr OWSLEY and General BUCKNER, and finally by Mr JONES. The nomination was then made unanimous.

DR. HATFIELD.

THE Rev. E. F. HATFIELD, D.D., Moderator of the Presbyterian Assembly which recently convened at Saratoga, was born in Elizabethtown, New Jersey, in 1807. He graduated at Middlebury College, Vermont, in 1829, and studied theology at the Andover Seminary, Massachusetts. His career as pastor of various churches in New Jersey and New York city was a most active and fruitful one. In 1863 he retired from pastoral work, owing to the failure of his health, and since that time has devoted his energies to other departments of clerical labor. He was active in securing the endowment of the Union Theological Seminary in New York, and is the author of several books.

ALEXANDER SULLIVAN.—PHOTOGRAPHED AT COPELIN.

THREE JOURNALISTS.

THE retirement of Mr JOHN FOORD from the position of editor-in-chief of the New York Times brought before the public a young journalist whose name had been but little known outside the craft. By brother journalists Mr. CHARLES R. MILLER was most highly rated as a brilliant writer, a man of sound judgment, keen political insight, and unusual executive capacity; and a ban he was selected to succeed Mr FOORD, all who knew him predicted for him a brilliant career as manager of one of the foremost newspapers of the country. If we may judge by what he has accomplished during the short time he has occupied his present position, the predictions of his friends were not extravagant.

Mr ALBERT PULITZER and Mr JOSEPH PULITZER, the former the founder and editor of the Morning Journal, in this city, the latter the new proprietor and editor of the World, were widely known as successful journalists before their New York enterprises were undertaken. The Journal attained popularity with surprising rapidity, achieving a circulation of more than 30,000 copies daily within six months from Clerkenwell and, I think, Coventry, at the present day; for it is difficult to understand how every country clock-maker should have cast, turned, and made his own brass frames and dials precisely similar to those of all the other clock-makers in London and all the provincial towns. And I am strongly disposed to think that the manufacture of clocks and clock-work was at that time—early in the sixteenth century—established at Clerkenwell, and that the country clock-makers were supplied from there; and thus Clerkenwell has continued to be the great manufactory for clocks to the present time.

This idea is, I think, somewhat borne out by the fact of the exact resemblance of so many of the perforated brass ornamental plates, above the dials and sides of these clocks, to conceal the bells, which form a cupola at the top. One common pattern has two dolphins with intertwined tails, another has a small square-shaped escutcheon in the centre, whilst a third has scale pierced scroll-work. The front plate is often engraved, the side-pieces being plain. Some clocks have the name of the maker, the name of the town, and the date engraved on the front, and some on the dial.

THE HON. PROCTOR KNOTT.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY C. M. BELL.

THE REV. E. F. HATFIELD, D.D.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY W. H. BAKER.

JOSEPH PULITZER.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY SARONY.

ALEXANDER SULLIVAN

THE President of the Irish National League of America is a gentleman about thirty-five years of age, and a native of Maine. He was an active abolitionist, and an earnest advocate of negro suffrage. Until 1872 he was a Republican, when, being a strong friend of GREELEY, he supported the Liberal movement, and has since been a Democrat. He studied law with ALEXANDER S. SULLIVAN, of New York, and has been for a number of years in successful practice in Chicago.

OLD CLOCKS.

THE domestic clocks divide themselves into two classes, those which go by weights, and those of which the motive power is a coiled spring, which was not applied till about 1500; and these spring clocks form the class of chamber and table clocks. The weight clocks, which the dealers are apt to call fifteenth-century clocks, are, in fact, the work of the nineteenth and seventeenth centuries. But there is something remarkable about them. They are peculiarly English; they are all made of brass, and precisely similar in form and design; and they seem to have been cast upon the world suddenly and early in the sixteenth century, and to have lasted unchanged for nearly two centuries.

All clock-makers at that time seem to have adopted the same pattern, and to have preserved it without any variation, and with similarity of form, mechanism, and ornament, as though they had worked to a regulation pattern. I can not help fancying that there may have been a large manufactory or brass foundry, in London or some other place, where the frames and [illegible] were all cast, from which the clock-makers in London and all [illegible] were supplied with [illegible] parts of clocks, which they fitted together, as they are

ALBERT PULITZER.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY [illegible]

Digitized by Google

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE
AS A REFRIGERANT DRINK IN FEVERS.
Dr. C. B. S. Davis, Meriden, Conn., says: "I have used it as a pleasant and cooling drink in fevers, and have been very much pleased with it."—[Adv.]

PREMATURE LOSS OF THE HAIR
May be entirely prevented by the use of Burnett's Cocoaine. Housekeepers should insist upon obtaining Burnett's Flavoring Extracts; they are the best.—[Adv.]

Angostura Bitters, the world-renowned appetizer and invigorator, imparts a delicious flavor to all drinks and cures dyspepsia, diarrhoea, fever and ague. Try it, but beware of counterfeits. Ask your grocer or druggist for the genuine Angostura, manufactured by Dr. J. G. B. Siegert & Sons.—[Adv.]

SWEET BREATH.—Dr. Jas. X. Knight's Stomach Powder makes the breath as sweet as a rose. 50 cts. by mail. P. O. Box 1165, N. Y. Pemberton, Agent, 115 Fulton Street, N. Y.—[Adv.]

Thousands of people testify to the merits of Piso's Cure for Consumption.—[Adv.]

Halford Sauce—the standard relish. Of all the choice condiments Halford sauce is the best.—[Adv.]

TESTED AND NOT FOUND WANTING.

Thirty years of close observation and study have convinced us that the science of medicine needs some great vitalizer adapted to the widest range of diseases, yet thoroughly practicable. For a long time we sought it in electricity, but for the masses that is an untamed colt—serviceable if it can be properly used. In the nature of the case, no drug can ever meet the requirements. Four years of experiment have led us to believe that it is found in the Compound Oxygen of Drs. Starkey & Palen.

As we have been so severely condemned for advertising this article so largely, we submit the following facts to the judgment of our readers, and also to answer the numerous letters of inquiry that reach us concerning it.

We have personally tested Compound Oxygen in forty-one cases, with the following results:

Class I. Cases recognized from the outset as incurable. One uterine, three consumption, one diabetes, advanced stage; all greatly relieved.

Class II. Cases deemed as possibly curable. 1. Deranged several years, excessive nervousness, much improved.—2 and 3. Bronchial consumption, one nearly cured, the other greatly helped, but the disease rendered fatal by an accident.—4. Bronchitis, one lung useless; cured.—5. Constitutional debility, life long; improved.—6. Consumption; cured.—7. Confirmed and increasing hallucinations; cured.—8. Neuralgia of optic nerve, gastric irritation, great nervous prostration; abandoned for want of proper instruction while at a distance.

Class III. Cases deemed probably curable. 1. Bronchitis and hay fever; bronchitis cured.—2. Gastric fever and prostration, inability to recuperate; cured.—3 and 4. General debility; greatly benefited.—5. Kidney disease and nervous debility; "life saved."—6. Persistent and harassing cough; cured.—7. Cough of 12 years' standing; cured.—8. Lung and heart disease, lungs cured and heart much improved.—9. Obstinate cough; cured.—10. Consumptive tendencies and cough; cured.—11. Cough and spermatorrhea; cough cured.—12. Nervous debility; cured.—13. Sciatic neuralgia, nervous prostration (life despaired of); cured.—14. Consumptive decline; "saved."—15. Bronchial and gastric irritation and extreme nervous prostration (life despaired of, could only take oxygen three seconds); cured.—16. Nervous debility and uterine troubles; greatly relieved.—17–20. Overwork, all helped immediately, though continuing the work.—21. Uterine difficulties, extreme nervousness and hallucinations; appetite improved immediately, but treatment unwisely abandoned lest it should increase stoutness.—22–24. Treatment not properly used.—25. Nervous debility from over-study; helped.—26. Debility, difficulty of breathing, strong hereditary consumptive tendencies; debility partly overcome, difficulty of breathing cured (still under treatment).—27. Liver complaint of many years, and nervous derangement; liver decidedly better.—28. Lung disease and dyspepsia; improved, but frequent absence from home interferes with the treatment.

It should be observed—

1st. Most of these were cases in which physicians and other remedies had failed.

2d. Many of them were chronic.

3d. In 38 of the 41 cases only one treatment (2 months) was used, and in no case more than two.

4th. Many of the cases reported relieved or helped would undoubtedly have been cured by further treatment, but financial reasons prevented. A number are still under treatment.

5th. This statement of results is accurate to our personal knowledge.

6th. These embrace all the cases under our own direction, instead of being culled, as ordinary testimonials are, from hundreds or thousands of experiments.

Knowing these facts, and knowing moreover that, according to the reports of a large Life Insurance Company of causes of death of its members during six months of the present year, every fourth person died of lung disease (and these, too, all selected lives), we should deem ourselves false to the interest of our readers, and traitors to humanity, if we failed to make known such a boon for the suffering.

Now, if the Baltimore Methodist, or The Pioneer, can produce from the records of any physician of any school, or from the history of any proprietary remedy, achievements equal to these, we proffer our columns for a like publicity; still the fact will remain, that they have maligned this agency of cure without adequate investigation of its merits. Prejudice and pre-judgments are as poor helps to editorial consistency as elsewhere in life.

We copy the above from The Whispers of Peace, published by Rev. S. H. Platt, A. M., at Southampton, N. Y. Mr. Platt has been using Compound Oxygen for some four years, and during that time has tested it in forty-one cases, the results of which he has voluntarily given to the public in his paper. Mr. Platt is well known among the Methodists, to which denomination he belongs, as a truth-loving and conscientious man. No question can therefore lie against the fairness of his report. The Compound Oxygen Treatment can be obtained only from Drs. Starkey & Palen, 1109 Girard Street, Philadelphia. Their treatise on Compound Oxygen, giving a history of the discovery, nature, and action of this remarkable therapeutic agent, and containing a large record of the surprising cures which have been made during the last thirteen years, will be mailed free to any one who will write for it.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

ROYAL

BAKING POWDER
Absolutely Pure.

This powder never varies. A marvel of purity, strength, and wholesomeness. More economical than the ordinary kinds, and cannot be sold in competition with the multitude of low-test, short-weight, alum or phosphate powders. Sold only in cans.

Royal Baking Powder Co., 106 Wall Street, N. Y.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. FINEST AND CHEAPEST MEAT FLAVORING STOCK FOR SOUPS, MADE DISHES, AND SAUCES.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. An invaluable and palatable tonic in all cases of weak digestion and debility. "Is a success and a boon for which nations should feel grateful." See "Medical Press," "Lancet," "British Medical Journal," &c.
CAUTION.—Genuine only with the fac-simile of Baron Liebig's Signature in Blue Ink across the Label. This caution is necessary, owing to various cheap and inferior substitutes being in the market.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT
OF MEAT. To be had of all Storekeepers, Grocers, and Chemists. Sole Agents for the United States (wholesale only), C. DAVID & CO., 9 Fenchurch Avenue, London, England.

Sold wholesale in New York by PARK & TILFORD, SMITH & VANDERBEEK, ACKER, MERRALL, & CONDIT, McKESSON & ROBBINS, H. K. & F. B. THURBER & CO., W. H. SCHIEFFELIN & CO.

THE AMERICAN JEWELRY COMPANY send free, by mail, an elegant illustrated catalogue of the best make of gold and silver Waltham Watches and latest styles of Diamond Jewelry, with prices attached. Address AMERICAN JEWELRY CO., No. 8 Arcade, Cincinnati, O.

Buffalo Lithia Water,

A powerful solvent of Stone in the Bladder. Invaluable in Bright's Disease of the Kidneys; specific in Gout and Rheumatism; highly efficacious in Acid Dyspepsia, &c. Endorsed by Dr. J. Marion Sims, Dr. Wm. A. Hammond (late Surgeon-General U. S. Army), and other eminent medical men. Water, in cases of one dozen half-gallon bottles, $5.00 per case at the Springs. Springs pamphlet sent to any address.
W. H. SCHIEFFELIN & CO., } Agents,
CASWELL, HAZARD, & CO., } New York City.
THOS. F. GOODE, Proprietor,
Buffalo Lithia Springs, Virginia.

Lady Agents can secure permanent employment and good salary selling Queen City Skirt and Stocking Supporters, etc. Sample outfit Free. Address Queen City Suspender Co., Cincinnati, O.

LUNDBORG'S PERFUMES,
RHENIA AND MARECHAL NIEL ROSE.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1878.

BAKER'S
CHOCOLATES
Baker's Premium Chocolate, the best preparation of plain chocolate for family use.—Baker's Breakfast Cocoa, from which the excess of oil has been removed, easily digested and admirably adapted for invalids.—Baker's Vanilla Chocolate, as a drink or eaten as confectionery is a delicious article; highly recommended by tourists.—Baker's Broma, invaluable as a diet for children.—German Sweet Chocolate, a most excellent article for families.
Sold by Grocers everywhere.
W. BAKER & CO.,
Dorchester, Mass.

WAR VOLUMES
OF
HARPER'S WEEKLY.
(Now entirely out of print and the plates destroyed.)

We would call the attention of those who have not the files of Harper's Weekly during the War to

Harper's Pictorial History of the Rebellion,

Same size pages as the Weekly, containing 1000 of the illustrations that appeared in Harper's Weekly during the War.

2 vols. Price, delivered, free of express charges: Cloth, $14; Half Turkey Morocco, $20.

SOLD BY SUBSCRIPTION ONLY.

McDONNELL BROS.,
112 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

TIMKEN SPRING VEHICLES!

Easiest riding Vehicle made. Rides as easy with one person as with two. The Springs lengthen and shorten according to the weight they carry. Equally well adapted to rough country roads and fine drives of cities. Manufactured and sold by all the leading Carriage Builders and Dealers.
HENRY TIMKEN, Patentee, ST. LOUIS, MO.
Used exclusively by ABBOTT BUGGY CO., CHICAGO, ILL.

FOR THE MAJOR.

A Novelette. By Constance Fenimore Woolson, Author of "Anne." Illustrated. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

A story so sweet and simple that it suggests an old-fashioned plaintive ballad. She has chosen the most picturesque materials that America affords. * * * There are no analytical, unwelcome dissections of the emotions of the various characters. It belongs to no particular school, and to the casual reader will not be so full of interest as Miss Woolson's "Anne." But from a literary point of view it is more finished, and to a critic interested in striking peculiarities of character it will prove a valuable study.—N. Y. World.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of the price.

Established 1818. Beware of Counterfeits.
Copenhagen · Peter F. Heering's · Cherry Cordial
7 Prize Medals. Gold Medal 1878 Paris.
Purveyor by appointment to the Royal Danish Court and H. R. H. the Prince of Wales.
And by special appointment to the Imperial Russian Court.
For sale by Wine Dealers generally.
JOHN DUNCAN'S SONS, Union Square, New York.

Universally prescribed by the Faculty.
TAMAR INDIEN GRILLON
A laxative and refreshing Fruit Lozenge for Constipation, bile, headache, hemorrhoids, cerebral congestion, &c. Prepared by E. GRILLON, Sole Proprietor, Pharmacien de 1re Classe de la Faculté de Paris, 27, rue Rambuteau, Paris. Sold by all Druggists.
TAMAR, unlike pills and the usual purgatives, is agreeable to take, and never produces irritation.

POCKET $1.00 SIZE THE ANTI-STYLOGRAPH (MABBOTT'S PATENT U.S.A.) DESK $1.50 SIZE
Fitted with Pearson Pen, uniform-pointed, $2.50.
THOS. DE LA RUE & CO., LONDON, PARIS, & NEW YORK.

40 New (1883) Chromo Cards, no 2 alike, with name, 10c., postpaid. Geo. I. Reed & Co., Nassau, N.Y.

DISFIGURING Humors, Humiliating Eruptions, Itching Tortures, Scrofula, Salt Rheum, and Infantile Humors cured by the Cuticura Remedies.

Cuticura Resolvent, the new blood purifier, cleanses the blood and perspiration of impurities and poisonous elements, and thus removes the cause.

Cuticura, the great Skin Cure, instantly allays Itching and Inflammation, clears the Skin and Scalp, heals Ulcers and Sores, and restores the Hair.

Cuticura Soap, an exquisite Skin Beautifier and Toilet Requisite, prepared from Cuticura, is indispensable in treating Skin Diseases, Baby Humors, Skin Blemishes, Sunburn, and Greasy Skin.

Cuticura Remedies are absolutely pure, and the only infallible Blood Purifiers and Skin Beautifiers.

Sold everywhere. Price, Cuticura, 50 cents; Soap, 25 cents; Resolvent, $1.

Potter Drug and Chemical Co., Boston, Mass.

SUPERIOR FISHING TACKLE.

We offer a fine 3-joint Fly Rod, 25-yard Brass Reel, 30-ft. Linen Line, 3 Flies, 2 Hooks to gut, and Leader complete, by express, for $3 00; by mail, postpaid, $3 50. Sample flies by mail postpaid, 10c. each, per dozen, $1 00. 1 three-piece Trout Rod (Float), 1 Brass Reel, 30 ft. Linen Line, ½ dozen Hooks, 1 Float, 1 Gut Leader, all for $2 25.

Just published, the largest and most complete Catalogue of all sporting goods ever issued—as Lawn-Tennis, Base-Ball, Archery, Cricket, Foot-Ball, Fishing, Boating, and Gymnasium and Firemen's Goods and all the latest novelties. 228 large pages, 2000 illustrations, on fine tinted paper. Price, by mail 25 cts.
PECK & SNYDER, 126 to 130 Nassau St., N. Y.

MEMOIRS OF GENERAL DIX.

Memoirs of John Adams Dix. Compiled by his Son, Morgan Dix. With Five Steel-plate Portraits. 2 vols., 8vo, Cloth, Uncut Edges and Gilt Tops, $5 00.

"The life of General John A. Dix, from his fifteenth year, when fired by the example of his father, he entered the United States army at the commencement of the war of 1812, to the close of his administration as Governor of the State of New York in 1874, was, with the exception of a few short intervals, one of uninterrupted activity in the public service. During a large portion of that period the country was confronted by some of the gravest problems which a nation could be called upon to solve; and in the discussion of these questions, as well as in the momentous events into which they developed themselves, the subject of this memoir bore a conspicuous and effective part. This work, accordingly, has a profound interest, not only for those who may desire to learn the particulars of the career of an honored and useful citizen, but also for those who are earnest students of the course of affairs in the republic during the most critical years of its existence. It is at once a biography of General Dix and an epitome of the history of his times. * * * The story of this extended and honorable career Dr. Dix tells with loving elaboration and proud appreciation of the splendid qualities of his father's character. * * * The book will be read with intense enjoyment and lasting profit by all classes and parties of American citizens. In the minds of older readers it will awaken stirring memories, and the young will find in it a powerful incentive to honorable ambition."

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Harper & Brothers will send the above work by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

ARTISTIC PATTERNS FOR EMBROIDERY AND PAINTING.

MANUAL OF NEEDLEWORK, a book of 100 pages, giving plain and intelligent directions for doing all kinds of plain and fancy needlework, including the various kinds of Embroidery, Knitting, Netting, Tatting, Crocheting, Lace Making, Darned Net Work, Rug Making, &c. Profusely illustrated. Price, post-paid, 35 cents. Four for $1.00.
Address, PATTEN PUBLISHING CO., 38 Barclay St., New York.

"BOKER'S BITTERS," THE OLDest and Best Stomach Bitters known—unequalled for their medicinal properties, and for their flavor as a cordial. To be had in Quarts and Pints. L. FUNKE, Jr., Sole Manufacturer and Proprietor, 78 John St., N. Y. P. O. Box 1029.

The NEW DEPARTURE
Makes Education free and Self Instruction easy. Learn to write, spell, and punctuate; also, English Grammar at the same time by a new and natural system. More learned in a day than in a month by the old method. Sent by mail on receipt of $1. Agents wanted. Liberal terms. Sells at sight.
E. R. PELTON & CO., 25 BOND ST., NEW YORK.

"OPERA BOXES."
Beautiful set of Imported Cards, by mail, on receipt of two 3c. stamps. WHITING, 50 Nassau St., N. Y.

NEW STORE.

Le Boutillier Bros.,

Of 23d Street.

BLACK SILKS.

The best and most reliable in the market, at $1 00, $1 25, $1 50, and $2 00.

BLACK SATIN RHADAMES—the best value ever offered. Present prices, 90c. to $2 50; former prices, $1 50 to $3 50.

COLORED SILK AND COLORED SATIN RHADAMES at $1 10, $1 25, and $1 50. These are 25 per cent. under regular prices.

SUMMER SILKS in large variety at greatly reduced figures.

FINE ALL-WOOL double-width Dress Goods at specially low prices.

500 Pieces SCOTCH GINGHAMS, at 20c. 500 Pieces, 32 inches wide, at 18c. per yard. The lowest prices these goods have ever been sold for are 30c. and 31c.

Prompt and careful attention to all Mail Orders. SAMPLES SENT.

IT WILL PAY YOU TO SHOP BY MAIL.

Please note the address:

LE BOUTILLIER BROS.,

Of 23d Street.

31 & 33 West 23d Street, New York.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

CHOICE NOVELTIES.

Handsomely mounted Lace, Brocade Silk, and Satin Parasols, for Promenade, Coaching, and Carriage. Also, a fine assortment of Sun and Rain Umbrellas.

Broadway and 19th St.

H.W.JOHNS' ASBESTOS

LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING.

Steam Pipe & Boiler Coverings, Steam Packing, Mill Board, Sheathing, Fire Proof Coatings, &c.

Send for Descriptive Price List.

H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO. 87 MAIDEN LANE, N.Y.

NOTICE TO CLERGYMEN.

"M'CLINTOCK & STRONG'S CYCLOPÆDIA OF BIBLICAL, THEOLOGICAL, AND ECCLESIASTICAL LITERATURE" (now complete in ten volumes), is meeting with the heartiest popular endorsement. The N. Y. Tribune says, "It is by far the best work of its kind existing in any language."

This work is sold by SUBSCRIPTION ONLY, and not to the BOOK TRADE.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, Franklin Square, N. Y.

Made by W. W. GREENER & ... Also manufacturers of American Double-Action Revolvers.

DAKOTA.

Quick, safe, and sure investments for capitalists or residents in Oriska, Barnes County, Dakota. A new town on Northern Pacific Railroad, at crossing of N. W., county miles west of Dalrymple Farm. Splendid opening for Merchants in every line. Merchandise in demand; wages good. Well settled country, in the the famous wheat belt. Correspondence solicited. References: KEAN, REIN, & COMPANY, New York. First & Leather Nat Bank, Chicago. Address PERKINS, ROBBINS, & CO., Bankers, Oriska, Dakota.

TAKE THE VERY BEST

EUROPE EDUCATIONAL EXCURSIONS

1883, Combining Unequalled Advantages. Send for Descriptive Circular, Free. E. TOURJEE, Franklin Square, Boston.

WANTED. A practical Book-Agent to assume the management of the subscription department in a publishing house. Address, stating experience, P.O. Box 1241, Philadelphia, Pa.

WANTED 8 or 10 Successful BOOK AGENTS of pluck and enterprise to operate as GENERAL AGENTS to hire and train others to introduce a NEW WORK of extraordinary merit and grand salability. Positions are worth $1,000 to $7,000 a year. Address, giving full particulars of experience, etc., HUBBARD BROS. 723 Chestnut St., Phila. Pa.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address H. HALLETT & Co., Portland, Maine.

The Great Soap Wonder, "Death on Dirt"

NO BOILING!
NO RUBBING!
NO STEAM!
NO ODORS!
BENEFICIAL TO CLOTHES!
BENEFICIAL TO SKIN!
MAKES CLOTHES WHITER!
MAKES THEM IRON EASIER!
LESS LABOR!
LESS FUEL!
LESS TIME!
LESS TROUBLE!

has been tested by thousands upon thousands of housekeepers and laundresses from Maine to California, from Canada to Mexico, and in not a single instance, where directions have been followed, has it failed to do all that is claimed for it. The Manufacturers,

ALLISON BROS., of Middletown, Conn., have several cart-loads of letters and postal cards from those who have used it, thanking and blessing them for the

WONDERFUL DISCOVERY.

Of course, "Death on Dirt" is imitated; imitated by those who never knew anything about soap until they saw this great housekeeper's magician and realized what a blessing it is and what a demand there would be for it. Allison Bros. have long been known as making nothing but soap of the finest quality, greatest durability, and general excellence of its washing qualities.

They have often talked about the old sloppy way of washing, and wondered what could be used in the manufacture of soap that would banish from the house the steam, suds, and slops always present on washing days. After long and expensive experiments they discovered "Death on Dirt," and all they ask is a trial and comparison of it with any other soap or compound making similar claims. wherever it has once been used there is nothing that will take its place, and every thoughtful, economical housekeeper who tries it, wonders how she ever got along without it.

THE WASH-BOILER NOT TO BE USED AT ALL.

A TRIAL WILL CONVINCE. GET IT OF YOUR GROCER; OR,

If you will send 10 cents for a regular 10-cent cake, the manufacturers will forward it by mail; to do that, it will cost them 17 cents in postage—saying nothing of the cost box to pack it in. If it were not really a SOAP WONDER, this would not do any good, but the Proprietors KNOW that, wherever tried, it is hailed as an emancipator from all the ills of wash-day; and that if you once give it a fair test—using it strictly according to directions—you will never after use any other Soap.

ALLISON BROS., Sole Manufacturers, Middletown, Connecticut.

CASTORIA

for Infants and Children.

Castoria promotes Digestion and overcomes Flatulency, Constipation, Sour Stomach, Diarrhœa, and Feverishness. It insures health and natural sleep, without morphine.

"Castoria is so well adapted to Children that I recommend it as superior to any prescription known to me." H. A. ARCHER, M. D., 82 Portland Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

What gives our Children rosy cheeks,
What cures their fevers, makes them sleep;
'Tis Castoria.
When babies fret and cry by turns,
What cures their colic, kills their worms,
But Castoria.
What quickly cures Constipation,
Sour Stomach, Colds, Indigestion,
But Castoria.
Farewell then to Morphine Syrups,
Castor Oil and Paregoric, and
Hail Castoria!

CENTAUR LINIMENT—an absolute cure for Rheumatism, Sprains, Burns, Galls, &c. The most Powerful and Penetrating Pain-relieving and Healing Remedy known to man.

ESTABLISHED 1844.

J. C. TODD, ENGINEER AND MACHINIST.

Flax, Hemp, Jute, Rope, Oakum, and Bagging Machinery, Steam-Engines, Boilers, &c. Sole Agent for Mayher's New Patent Acme Steam-Engine and Force-Pump combined. Also Owner and Exclusive Manufacturer of

The New Baxter Patent Portable Steam-Engine.

These Engines are admirably adapted to all kinds of light power for driving printing-presses, pumping water, sawing wood, grinding coffee, ginning cotton, and all kinds of agricultural and mechanical purposes, and are furnished at the following low prices:

1 Horse Power, $150.	3 Horse Power, $200.
1½ Horse Power, 190.	4 Horse Power, 310.
2 Horse Power, 245.	5 Horse Power, 420.

Send for descriptive circular. Address

J. C. TODD, Paterson, N. J., Or No. 17 Barclay St., New York.

PAVARA PILLS.

These pills do not purge, but they assist nature to perform her functions in a perfectly natural manner, without pain, nausea, or any inconvenience whatever. Purely vegetable, perfectly harmless, gelatine coated (tasteless), and the only SPECIFIC FOR CONSTIPATION. Recommended by Physicians. Sold by Druggists, or sent by mail for 50 cents.

Wholesale Agent, C. N. CRITTENTON, 115 Fulton St., N. Y. | Address all communications to the T. S. Laboratory, Send for circular. P.O. Box 991, New York City.

WONDERS WILL NEVER CEASE! THE HARP-ETTE.

Any Tune can be Played on this Elegant New Musical Instrument

By any person entirely ignorant of musical notes or musical rules. It possesses the full, round, sonorous tones of the Harp, ... accompanying the voice. ... Marches, Waltzes ... Piano ... The Melodeon and the Music have similar numbers ... Harp-Ette you can Surprise Your Friends and give a Delightful Entertainment of Playing "Right off" without any Practice.

... The Harp-Ette ... $1 00. ... child can play it as well as Blind Tom. ... WORLD MANUFACTURING CO., 122 Nassau Street, New York.

40 Chromo Visiting Cards, no 2 alike, for 1883, name on, and Illustrated Premium List, 10c. Warranted best sold. Agents wanted. L. JONES & Co., Nassau, N.Y.

AGENTS WANTED FOR THE COUNTRY WHO can make from $3 to $10 a day. Send for circular and terms. WM. HEES, Artist, 106 Walker St., N.Y.

AGENTS can now grasp a fortune. Outfit worth $10 free. Address E. G. RIDEOUT & CO., 10 Barclay St., N. Y.

TEACHERS supplied with positions in all grades of Educational work. Send stamp for circular. BRAINARD'S TEACHERS' AGENCY, Times Bldg., Chicago.

THE ... DREAM ... 10 CENTS

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine.

Print Your Own Cards, &c. Press $3. Large sizes for circulars, &c. $8 to $80. For pleasure, money-making, young or old. Everything easy, printed instructions. Send 2 stamps for Catalogue of Presses, Type, Cards, &c. to the factory. KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

HARPER'S BAZAR CUT PAPER PATTERNS.

We have transferred our WHOLESALE PATTERN DEPARTMENT to Mr. J. G. CROTTY, Nos. 180 to 186 Centre Street, New York, who will conduct it upon his own account and responsibility.

SPECIAL CAUTION.

We are not interested in nor responsible for any contracts made by J. G. CROTTY & CO., whether for HARPER'S BAZAR Patterns or for any other business.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

MUSIC FREE.

We will send free 5 complete pieces of Vocal and Instrumental Music—full size, best paper—that would cost $2 00 at any music store, with our catalogue for 1883 on receipt of 10c. for postage, etc. WOODWARD & CO., 819 Broadway, N. Y.

FREE NEW ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE OF Scrap Pictures, Visiting and Advertising Cards, Palettes and Printing Presses, including our new set of Imported Cards, sent to any address for 6 cts. CLARK CARD CO., Box 22 Brooklyn, N. Y.

LADIES!

... PREPARATION CO. 201 Spruce St., Phila, Pa.

SEELEY'S HARD RUBBER PILE PIPE

... Seeley's Truss Establishment, 1347 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa., or 74 Fleet Street, London, England.

NEW TELEPHONE

... Patented. Works 2 miles on steel cable wire. Illustrated Circulars free. HOLCOMB & Co. Cleveland, O.

CARDS. An Elegant New Set of Cards for 3c. stamp. W. H. PRINGLE, Rochester, N.Y.

$72 A WEEK. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly Outfit free. Address TRUE & Co., Augusta, Maine.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Per Year:

HARPER'S MAGAZINE	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR	4 00
The THREE above publications	10 00
Any TWO above named	7 00
HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE	1 50
HARPER'S MAGAZINE / HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE	5 00
HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY, One Year (52 Numbers)	10 00

Postage Free to all subscribers in the United States or Canada.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR begin with the first numbers for January, the Volumes of the YOUNG PEOPLE with the first Number for November, and the Volumes of the MAGAZINE with the Numbers for June and December of each year.

Subscriptions will be entered with the Number of each Periodical current at the time of receipt of order, except in cases where the subscriber otherwise directs.

Specimen copy of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE sent on receipt of a three-cent stamp.

HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY: a weekly publication, containing works of Travel, Biography, History, Fiction, and Poetry, at prices ranging from 10 to 25 cents per number. Full list of Harper's Franklin Square Library will be furnished gratuitously on application to HARPER & BROTHERS.

Remittances should be made by Post-Office Money Order or Draft, to avoid risk of loss. Address

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE, of between three and four thousand volumes, mailed on receipt of Nine Cents in Postage Stamps.

Digitized by Google

JOHN KELLY, M.D, HAS HIS IDEAS OF HOW THE N. Y. BOARD OF HEALTH SHOULD BE MANAGED.

RAPID CURES.

OF Coughs and Colds, Influenza and Bronchial complaints are effected by using Piso's Cure. Piso's Honey of Horehound and Tar, a pleasant and reliable remedy, which allows no opiate or poison of any kind. Sold everywhere. 25 cents.

Pike's Toothache Drops Cure in one minute

Hill's Hair and Whisker Dye, 50c.

THE IMPROVED HORSMAN BICYCLE.

A durable and easy running road-ster for men and boys.

30 in. 34 in. 36 in. 44 in. 48 in. 56 in.
$50 $55 $60 $65 $85 $125

New York Agency for the Columbia Bicycles and headquarters for Bicycle Sundries. Send 4c Stamp for Illustrated Catalogue.

E. I. HORSMAN, Manufacturer,
80 & 82 William St., N. Y.

FISHERMEN!

TWINE and NETTING

MANUFACTURED BY THE

BALTIMORE TWINE AND NET CO.

WM. J. HOOPER & SON,

No. 6 S. Calvert St., Baltimore, Md.

☞ Send for price-list, naming county and state. Please mention this paper.

I will never buy any but HARTSHORNS' ROLLERS

And I will never sell any but HARTSHORNS'

OPERA GLASSES Prismatic, Telescopic, Microscopic, Photo. Field or Analytical Lenses &c. E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO., Manufacturing Opticians, Philada. Pa. Illustrated Price Catalogue.

EARL & WILSON'S
PATENT SHORT BAND COLLARS
AND BEAD EDGE CUFFS

CONGRESS WATER.

Superior to all. Cathartic, alterative. A specific for disorders of the stomach, liver, kidneys, eczema, rheumatism, and all impurities of the blood. Avoid imitations, bottled, corks, labels and foreign. Each where genuine positive remedy and invigorate the digestive organs and kidneys. None genuine on draught.

REV. HENRY WARD BEECHER
SAYS OF
DR. TOWNSEND'S REMEDY FOR
Hay-Fever, Asthma, and Catarrh:

Brooklyn, N. Y. Sept. 24, 1881.

"I believe it will be cure in ninety-nine cases in a hundred."

Brooklyn, N. Y., Oct. 17, 1882.

"I am happy to say that your remedy has served me in a most signal manner as well as the last year."

Pamphlet sent to Mr. H. W. Beecher will be sent free. Other testimonials, furnished on application about.

Prepared by

DR. H. H. TOWNSEND, Frostburg, Md.

Price, $1.00 by mail, Postpaid.

For sale by CHARLES DENNIS, First Place and Court St., Brooklyn, N. Y., and by the drug trade generally.

THE ELECTRIC LIGHTS
FOR
The Brooklyn Bridge
WERE FURNISHED BY THE UNITED STATES
ELECTRIC LIGHTING CO.,
59 and 61 Liberty St., New York.

LOW, SON, & HAYDON'S
Flower de Luce
The Howard Tooth Brushes
HAVE
SECURELY FASTENED BRISTLES
AND CAN BE FOUND WITH ALL DRUGGISTS.

PINS BEARING THIS TRADE MARK.
P&A
ARE SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS
MANUFACTURED BY
THE PLUME & ATWOOD MFG CO.
WATERBURY, CONN.

THE BEST THE QUEBER WATCH CASE

"Dr. Benson's Skin Cure cured my Eczema of the Scalp." Jno. A. Andrews, Atty at Law, Ashton, Ill.

"Dr. Benson's Celery and Chamomile Pills cured my sick headache." W. W. Hubbard, Manchester, N. H.

AMERICAN STAG SOFT CAPSULES THE BEST. A Sure, Safe Remedy Capsules. All Druggists

SPENCERIAN STEEL PENS. No 26 Numbers, suited to every style of writing. One of each for trial, by mail, postpaid, on receipt of 25 cents in stamps. Ivison, Blakeman, Taylor & Co., 753 Broadway, New York.

AMERICAN INDUSTRIAL ART HONORED.

(By Telegraph to the Tribune.)

Boston, May 10.—Edward King telegraphs as follows to The Journal under date of London, May 10: "American industrial art has secured a great triumph in the appointment just made of Messrs. Tiffany & Co., of New York, as special jewellers and gold and silver smiths to the Queen of England, the Prince and Princess of Wales, the Emperor and Empress of Russia, the Grand Duke Vladimir of Russia, and the Kings of Belgium, Italy, Portugal, and Greece."—N. Y. Tribune, May 11, 1883.

SYPHER & CO.
ARE EXCLUSIVELY RECEIVING FROM EUROPE
Antique Silver, Furniture, Clocks, Bronzes, and Articles of Verta.
736 & 738 BROADWAY.

ROEBLING'S
WIRE ROPE
The John A. Roebling Son's Co.,
117 & 119 Liberty Street.
WORKS, TRENTON, N. J.

Round Writing
BOOK FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION & PENS.
Sold for $1.50 by Stationers, or
KEUFFEL & ESSER, New York.

FROM THE OLD ...

From the [illegible] London (Eng.) Times.

Among the many specifics introduced ... for the cure of dyspepsia, indigestion, ... various kinds, and as a general ... have met with such genuine success ... form. Introduced to the country ... a comparatively short time since, to meet ... they have obtained the ... sale, and perfect family medicine, they have ... crowned be favor, until they are, without question, the most popular and valuable medicines known. In this ... while reason is not due to the advertising ... received; it is famous by reason of its intrinsic ... It does all that is claimed for it. ... curative powers without any of the evil effects of ... bitters or medicines, being perfectly safe and ... for the most frail woman, smallest child, and ... invalid to use. Few are the homes indeed where ... great discovery has not already been hailed as a ... ever and welcomed as a friend. It does what ... affect to do. Composed of simple materials, it is a ... marvel of delicate and successful combination. ... ing is wanting. Every ingredient goes straight to ... mark at which it is aimed, and never fails. Pleasant ... to the palate, agreeable to the stomach, and thorough ... effective as a cure, it has won for itself the confidence ... all.—Times, London, Eng.

A Few Unsolicited Letters from Thousands Received.

Feb. 9, 1882.

I have tried experiments on myself and others with Hop Bitters, and can cordially recommend them as a pleasant and efficacious medicine. I have found them especially useful in cases of congestion of the kidneys, as well as in diseases of the stomach.

Rev. J. Bryce, B.A.,
Rector of the Duke of Edinburgh.

U. S. Consulate, Matamoras, Mex., Nov. 6, 1882.

Gentlemen,—Since writing you of the great benefit I had derived from taking "Hop Bitters," I gave a friend a bottle, who had been suffering more or less with dyspepsia and sluggish liver, and the change was so wonderful, he appeared another being altogether. He had tried several other remedies without any benefit. I could name over a dozen other miraculous cures.

Arthur C. Hale, Consular Clerk.

Lawton, Exp., Sept. 7, 1882.

I am pleased to testify to the good effects of my "Hop Bitters." Have been suffering a long time with severe pain in the left side and across the loins, and, having tried a number of so-called remedies without any benefit, I am glad to acknowledge the great relief I have obtained from your medicine.

Charles Wade.

Cincinnati, Ohio, Aug. 14, 1882.

Gentlemen,—I was troubled with a very bad form of indigestion for a long time, and tried many things to relieve me, but I got none of any benefit, and at last was quite cured, and remain so till this time. I know three bottles did me more good than I can tell.

F. Beck.

From Ould Ireland.

Hop Bitters Co.: Dublin, Nov. 18, 1882.

Gentlemen,—You may be interested to hear on one of the most eminent Judges on the Irish bench a customer of mine; highly approves of your Hop Bitters, having received great benefit from their use.

P. T. Dockett, Dublin.

Alexandra Palace,
London, Eng., April 18, 1882.

I find Hop Bitters a most wonderful medicine; ... blood-purifying, and strengthening. ... cure, from personal as well as from ... knowledge, highly recommend them as a valuable family medicine.

Barbara William Gotman, Supt.

Sheffield, Eng., June 7, 1882.

Sir,—Having suffered from extreme nervous debility for four years, and having tried all kinds of medicine and change of scene and air without deriving any benefit whatever, I am persuaded by a friend to try Hop Bitters, and the effect, I am happy to say, was truly marvellous. Under these circumstances, I feel it my duty to give this testimonial for the benefit of others, as I may say I am now entirely well, therefore I am gratefully and with confidence give personal testimony to any one wishing to call upon me.

Yours truly, Hugh Hall.

Norwich, Eng., June 20, 1882.

To the Hop Bitters Co.:

Gentlemen,—Having suffered for many years from biliousness, accompanied with sickness and dreadful headache, always greatly delighted with emetics and long hours of loneliness, I lost all energy, strength, and appetite. I was advised by a friend to whom I had been much benefited effects to try Hop Bitters, and I soon each beneficial effects to try Hop Bitters, and a few bottles have quite cleared and restored me to better health than ever. I have also recommended it to other friends, and am pleased to add with the like result. Every claim you make for it I can fully endorse, and recommend it as an incomparable tonic.

Yours faithfully, S. W. Fox.

From Germany.

Kattenbachoof, Germany, Aug. 18, 1882.

Hop Bitters Co.:

Dear Sirs,—I have taken your most precious essence, Hop Bitters,—and I can sincerely, after so short a time, assure you that I feel much better than I have felt for months.

I have had, during the course of four years, three times an inflammation of the kidneys. The last, in January, 1881, was the worst, and I took a lot of medicine to cure the same, in consequence of which my stomach got terribly exhausted. I suffered from constant pains, had to bear great nervous excitement, insomnia, and sleepless nights, but none of these methods was of the least use to me. Now, in consequence of taking Hop Bitters, these pains and nervousness have entirely left me, I have a good appetite, I always had to lay down during the day, and that is almost every hour. I shall think it my duty to recommend the Bitters to all who suffer, for I am not content to thank the Lord enough that I came across your preparations, and I hope He will maintain you a long time to come for the welfare of suffering mankind.

Yours very truly, Pastor Hassmer, Cath. minister.

From Portugal and Spain.

Gentlemen,—Though not in the habit of praising ... medicines, which for the most part are ... only useless but injurious, I have constantly used Hop Bitters for the past four years in cases of ... debility, fastidiousness of constitution, and in all diseases ... caused by poor or bad ventilation, want of air and exercise, overwork, and want of appetite, with the most perfect success.

I am the first who introduced your Hop Bitters in Portugal and Spain, where they are now used by all ... exclusively.

Yours truly, Baron de Forte Bella.

Professor de Clinic e de Pharmacia, Coimbra University, Coimbra, Portugal.

ALLEGHENY COLLEGE LIBRARY.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

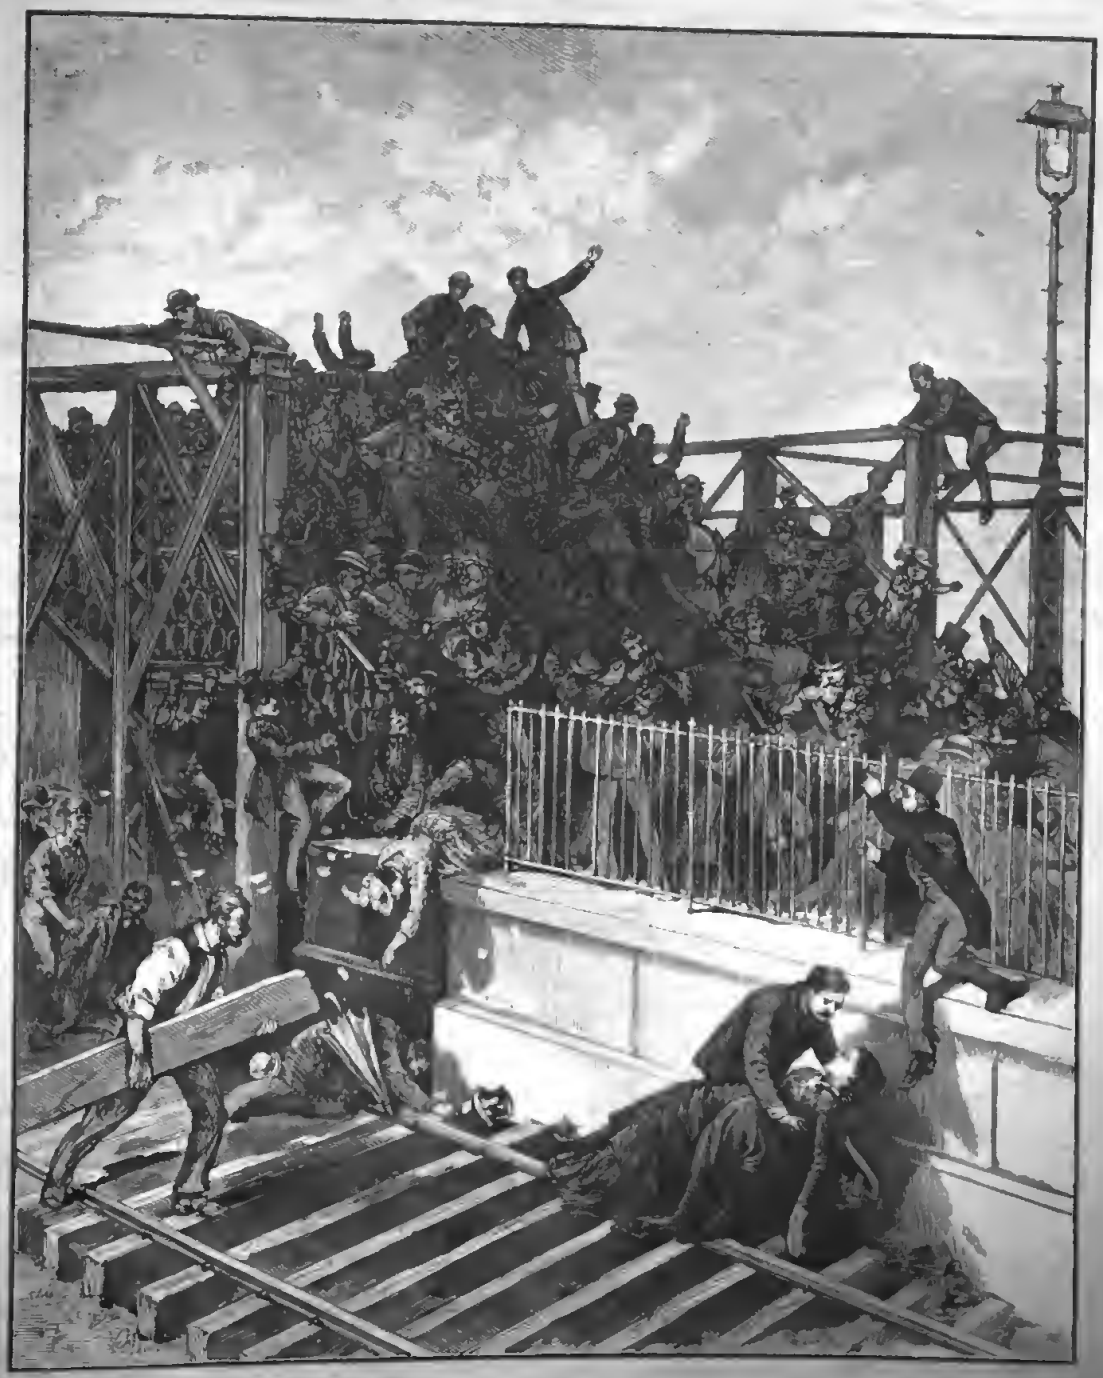
A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XXVII.—No. 1391.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 9, 1883.

TEN CENTS A COPY. WITH A SUPPLEMENT.

Copyright, 1883, by Harper & Brothers.



THE TRAGEDY ON THE BROOKLYN BRIDGE, MAY 30.—Drawn by C. Graham and W. A. Rogers.—[See Page 355.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 9, 1883.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

AN OFFER TO YOUNG AMERICAN ARTISTS.

For the best original drawing to illustrate ALFRED DOBBIT'S "Christmas Hymn"—the drawing to be suitable for publication in HARPER'S MAGAZINE, and to be the exclusive work of an American artist not over twenty-five years of age—MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS offer an award of THREE THOUSAND DOLLARS, upon the honorable understanding that the successful competitor shall use the same for the prosecution of art studies in one or more of the best American schools, including also a separate abroad of at least six months for the study of the old masters. The award will be paid in such installments and at such times as shall best suit the convenience of the recipient for the purposes specified.

The drawings must be received by MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS *not later than August 1, 1883, addressed "*Art Competition, Harper's Magazine, Franklin Square, New York"; and each must be designated by an assumed name or motto which should also be given, together with the real name, age, and residence of the artist, in a sealed envelope accompanying the drawings, and not to be opened until the result of the competition shall have been determined. The name of the successful competitor will not be publicly announced until the publication of the drawing.

MR. R. SWAIN GIFFORD, N.A.; MR. F. D. MILLET, A.N.S.A.; and MR. CHARLES PARSONS, A.N.S.A., Superintendent of the Art Department, HARPER & BROTHERS, will act as judges of the competition.

It is intended to engrave the successful drawing as one page for HARPER'S MAGAZINE of December, 1883; and should other drawings submitted be found suitable, second, third, and fourth awards will be made, as follows: one page HARPER'S WEEKLY, $200; one page HARPER'S BAZAR, $200; one page HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, $100.

If the judges should decide that no one of the drawings is suitable, MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS reserve the right to extend the limit of time and re-open the competition.

Two Christmas Hymns by ALFRED DOBBIT have been published. That published in 1877 is the one for the illustration of which artists are invited to compete, and a printed copy of it will be sent on application to

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

☞ A SUPPLEMENT, with portraits of some distinguished American scholars, is issued gratuitously with this number of HARPER'S WEEKLY.

CANDIDATES AND CHARACTER.

IN an era of mere personal politics like that in which the country now finds itself, the necessity of selecting good candidates for office is naturally greater than ever. When there is some great and absorbing issue such as this generation has seen, the extension of slavery, the prosecution of a war, the reconstruction of the Union, the chief popular qualification of candidates is that they shall be sound upon the great question. But when there is no great question, the character of the candidate becomes of vital importance, because at such times, when the main consideration is that of comparative confidence in parties, the parties will be judged largely by those whom they select to represent them. This is not unfair, because, freedom of choice being assumed, the selection of inferior representatives certifies inability in the party. This shows how extremely important, in a mere party view, is both the selection and the method of selection of candidates. Nobody doubts that the nomination of a man so reputable as Mr. CLEVELAND was of the utmost service to the Democratic party last autumn. Considering the Republican apathy, indeed, even if the Democratic party had selected one of its ordinary politicians he might have been elected, but the astounding majority at the election would have been wanting.

It is wise to bear this situation in mind when making or considering selections for every position. The party which can point to honest and capable and fitting men in office may well point with pride, because they are the evidence of party sagacity. They are the earnest that, if the party be trusted with power, it will choose agents who will command confidence. In no other way can a party commend itself so closely to public respect, or so firmly intrench itself in administration. It was not desire of change, nor mistrust of Republican principles, nor hostility to Republican policy, but suspicion of Republican agents and methods, which brought the party into extreme peril in 1876, just as it was demonstration of the party ability to disembarrass itself of such agents and methods which restored public confidence in 1880. It is unquestionable that the result in 1884 will depend largely upon the character of the men who are nominated for the Presidency. It is safe to say, for instance, that, should the Democrats select General BUTLER for their candidate against a Republican of unassailable ability and character, General BUTLER would be defeated because of the general want of confidence in his character. His cleverness is conceded. Puck's picture of him as Topsy exactly represents the general public feeling in regard to him, and in an era of personal politics that feeling would defeat him.

Naturally men who have been long conspicuous in public life have made both friends and enemies. But that is not an answer to the objection that a proposed candidate has made a certain impression upon the country, or that he is not a man of such acknowledged qualities as in the public estimation to fit him for a designated position. The universal satisfaction with which an obviously proper appointment, like that of Mr Justice GRAY, for instance, is received, and the favor which it instantly wins for the appointing power, show the immense advantage to a party of good judgment in selecting candidates. Next year both parties will be put to the severest test of this kind in nominating a President, and there was never a time when it was more necessary to put the best men forward, for it will be the year in which the ablest, the best known, and the most unsullied candidate will be the most available.

THE CORONATION OF THE CZAR.

THE Czar of Russia has placed the imperial crown upon his own head amid an unequalled splendor of pageantry, and doubtless amid general disappointment that in his manifesto there is no intimation of any kind of concession to the discontent of the Russians. The extent of revolutionary plots and conspiracies is undoubtedly magnified, as they always are, but a discontent which embraces all classes of society, and which persistently seeks assassination by mysterious means, can not be disregarded as whimsical, nor will it be suppressed by severity. The Czar is one of the most conspicuous of contemporary figures but it is chiefly because he is believed to be threatened every moment with a ghastly death. He is probably one of the most solitary and most unhappy of men, for his temperament is said to be of a kind which deepens the gloom of his position. In these circumstances the greater the splendor of the scene of the coronation, the more pitiable seems the man who was crowned.

The silence which characterizes absolute despotism prevents accurate knowledge of the Russian situation, and forbids implicit confidence in the most positive assertions. It is impossible to measure motives and events in a despotic country by the experience of free lands. Extreme tyranny and oppression at last rain a people, and to require of an ignorant, degraded, and semi-barbaric population the prudence, sagacity, and intelligent devotion and fidelity which mark a free people is idle. This is the root of the difficulty in the treatment both of Ireland and of Russia. To present such of those countries with the constitution of the United States would not solve the problem. The late Czar emancipated the serfs, and was hailed as a great human benefactor, but that did not save him from assassination as if he had been a monster of oppression. He may have trembled at his own boldness, and may have recoiled from his own act. But to murder him as if he had been a NERO or a CALIGULA was to confound all standards of conduct.

The tragedy of the Czar's position is that he stands really alone. To yield to the popular demand is to alienate the nobility, and to do nothing is to feed the popular discontent. To grant a constitution, or to summon a free constituent assembly, and to make the press free, is to change the very nature of the empire, and to seem to himself to betray his highest honor—fidelity to his blood and his sovereign responsibility. Yet to do less than this would be not to satisfy the demand to which he would yield. Nihilism is a challenge to the empire. But that the concessions required by the Nihilist party could be made, even with the hearty sympathy of the Czar, without a tremendous convulsion, is very doubtful. Certainly none but a very great man, acting not in compliance with an external demand, but upon his own strong convictions, could popularize the Russian government. And no truly great statesman would ever believe that the government of a vast ignorant, degraded, and barbarous multitude could be suddenly popularized by an imperial rescript, or by the belief of an emperor that a self-governing republic is better than an absolute empire. Nevertheless, a beginning in Russia must be made, and it is the want of an announcement that a beginning would be made which has cast a certain gloom over the late magnificent ceremonial at Moscow.

A LESSON FOR THE DAY.

A FEW days ago a woman of thirty, carrying an infant in her arms, and leading a young child of two or three years by the hand, walked to the end of a pier on the East River, and after a few moments threw the infant into the water, flung the other child after him, and then instantly plunged into the water herself. It was in the day, and all three were rescued half drowned. As soon as possible the woman was questioned, and answered that she had no home, no food, no work, no hope, and that death seemed to be the only relief possible. Such a tragedy in the great, busy, prosperous city is not to be dismissed with an exclamation either of pity or of horror. It is not an unprecedented event. It is only necessary to turn a few rods aside from the most glittering streets and the finest houses to come upon another world of want and suffering and struggle; and the incident of the mother trying to drown herself and her children instinctively recalls to every generous mind the oldest of questions, "Where is ABEL, thy brother?"

The progress of civilization merely emphasizes more strongly the fact that we can not satisfy ourselves by returning CAIN's answer to the question. No reasonable and conscientious New-Yorker, for instance, could read in his morning paper the story that we have repeated without an uncomfortable feeling of responsibility, and a certain unwillingness to enjoy comfort and luxury while others starve, without even a word or an effort to do something. The doctrine of every body for himself, and the devil take the hindmost, and the survival of the fittest, in the sense that sympathy and assistance are superfluous and vain, is the doctrine of the devil. The theory that he who will not work must starve is sound enough, perhaps. But the corollary that his wife and children must be permitted to starve also is again merely a doctrine of the devil. There is undoubtedly, as we have often stated, immense fraud in beggary. Alms given in the street are in almost every instance a pecuniary offered to poverty and drunkenness. An enormous proportion of the stories told at the door are lies, and nothing is more imperatively necessary than careful inquiry before giving. But the duty of that inquiry is no less imperative. It is the way in which we discharge the unavoidable obligation of keeping our brother. It is the most familiar and oldest of convictions that one man is not to suffer because ninety-nine men are rascals. A hundred women may hold their ragged and pallid infants in the street in order to soften your heart to give them money, which they will turn into a dram. But the woman in question, even if insane, was at least an honest sufferer.

Mr. HENRY GEORGE improves such incidents to urge a radical and permanent remedy by recasting certain theories of property, and he does it with a strength of conviction but with a moderation and eloquence of tone which have given him just eminence as contrasted with the unintelligent and passionate ardor of many social and industrial reformers. But pending the settlement of such fundamental problems, which demand time and long deliberation, the care of the mother and her children challenge immediate action. What are we to do with them? The first thing to do is not to neglect a single personal appeal, and to answer it in the only possible and practical manner by referring the applicant to a responsible inquirer. This can be done by obtaining tickets from the Society for the Relief of the Poor, at 79 Fourth Avenue, or by applying to the Charity Organization Society, at the same place. If you make personal inquiry, even with the best of intentions, you will probably be deceived. The one thing to do to prevent the recurrence of so terrible a disgrace to a civilized community as that of the mother's desperate endeavor is, not to say "How horrible!" but to do something, and that something is to improve the very next opportunity for inquiry and for relief if needed. Meanwhile you can also reflect upon what steps may be necessary practically to make Christendom Christian.

THE POPE AND THE LAND LEAGUE.

THERE is no doubt that the circular of the Pope to the Irish bishops disapproving the PARNELL testimonial fund is an important event in the controversy. Whatever may be said of it, no intelligent person will suppose that it was issued under any misapprehension. The Irish prelate who is most favorable to the present movement, Archbishop CROKE, has been in Rome, and he has, of course, made the most friendly representations of the League and its methods and purposes. But he returns to Ireland and urges his countrymen to submit to the Vatican. The words of the Pope are most emphatic and significant. The chief duty of the clergy, he says, is to calm men's minds. Referring to instructions previously sent, he adds:

"It is certainly not forbidden to collect for the relief of distress in Ireland; but at the same time the aforesaid apostolic mandates absolutely condemn such collections as are raised in order to inflame popular passions, and to be used as a means for leading men into rebellion against the laws. Above all things they, the clergy, must hold themselves aloof from such subscriptions when it is plain that hatred and dissensions are aroused by them, that distinguished persons are loaded with insults, that never in any way are censures pronounced against the crimes and murders with which wicked men stain themselves, and especially when it is asserted that the measure of true patriotism is in proportion to the amount of money given or refused—so as to bring the people under the pressure of intimidation."

This is the most unequivocal disapproval of the methods pursued by the present Irish leaders, and that there may be no doubt of the position of the Church, the Pope condemns all revolution in the most unqualified manner. "It is wicked to further any cause, however just, by illegal means."

It may surprise many persons to know that this has been the general papal position during the later Irish agitations. The chief Roman Catholic leader in Ireland for many years, O'CONNELL, took precisely the same ground, and he fell because he strictly adhered to it. His doctrine, like that of GRATTAN, was constitutional agitation, and when the Government raised the direct question with him by forbidding the monster meeting, O'CONNELL yielded, and soon died. Yet before his death, by insisting upon the same doctrine, that under no circumstances should the welfare of Ireland be sought by force of arms, he forced the secession of Young Ireland from the Repeal movement. The Church did not favor the Fenians, who were revolutionists. Even at the time of the great insurrection in 1641-2 the Roman Catholic bishops and clergy, while approving the war against the English Parliament which had decreed the extirpation of their religion in Ireland, declared in the strongest terms their detestation of the crimes of the insurrection, and excommunicated all Catholics who should be guilty of such atrocities.

The circular of the Pope, therefore, is in strict accordance with the policy of the Church. It holds that as the PARNELL movement is addressed to the passions, and tends to illegal and criminal acts, the testimonial fund can not be approved, nor can any ecclesiastic be allowed to take part in recommending or promoting it. As the League depends upon the support of the Roman Catholic population, this practical censure of the movement by the Vatican will necessarily affect it deeply. If the advice of Mr. MCCARTHY and of Mr. EGAN should be followed, and the fund should be made up by popular subscription despite the prohibition of the Pope, it will show how profoundly the religious loyalty of Ireland has been shaken, and how tenacious is the hold of the present movement upon the country. The fact of the publication of the circular is the evidence of the strong hostility of the Church to the methods of the Land League agitation, which is apparently the most universal and deeply rooted of any popular Irish movement since that for Repeal.

REFORM IN NEW YORK.

THE New York Civil Service Commission having appointed Mr JOHN JAY Chairman, an act which will be universally approved, has selected Mr. SILAS W. BURT as its Chief Examiner, and in so doing has secured the best man in the State for the position, and has given a signal proof, not of its good faith, of which no evidence was necessary, but of its practical sagacity. Mr. BURT, the late Naval Officer, was nominated by the President for the same position upon the national Commission, but under the singular circumstances of the nomination—as was shown at the time—it was impossible for him to accept. It is most fortunate, however, that Mr. BURT'S pecuniary fitness for the position and his invaluable experience in the reformed system are not to be lost.

In the hands of such a Commission as the Governor has appointed, which will be heartily sustained by him, the law will not be found feeble nor ineffective. Those who supposed that a Democratic Governor and a Democratic majority of the board would make it a mere blind for party purposes will be undeceived. The board is composed of Messrs. JAY, SCHOONMAKER, and RICHMOND, with Mr. BURT as Chief Examiner. Mr JAY, Mr BURT, and Mr RICHMOND are perfectly well known to those who have been most active in the reform for the past two years as among its chief friends and champions. Mr. SCHOONMAKER honorably co-operates with them, and the Governor is in full sympathy with the work. To every friend of reform in the country it is a matter of just pride that the reformed system within a State should be first applied, and under the most encouraging auspices, in New York, where the mischiefs of the old system have been most flagrant.

THE DISASTER ON THE BRIDGE

THE sad catastrophe upon the Brooklyn Bridge on Decoration day will become a painful tradition. The day of the opening was so fortunate and successful in every way that it is unfortunate that its associations must be darkened by the melancholy loss of life that followed. It is the more painful because it was evidently avoidable. Nothing, indeed, can stay a crowd in the frenzy of panic. But it was evident after the first day that a vast crowd, a blockade, and a panic were not only possible, but extremely probable, and this being apparent, it was an imperative duty to provide for it.

The conditions of the safe passage of a huge crowd across the bridge were as plain before the disaster as they are now. The two currents should be kept separate, and the police force should be adequate to keep them constantly moving, and to clear the approaches from interlopers. Peddlers and every kind of obstruction should be summarily moved on. This will be now probably done. But it is humiliating that it should have needed so terrible a spur.

Of course no such event can occur again without bringing the management under universal public indignation. Those who have to deal with crowds are bound to know that a crowd is easily panic-stricken, and that when panic-stricken it is uncontrollable. The problem of safe passage across the bridge is certainly not a difficult one, and the lamentable disaster is not only irreparable to the victims and their friends, but it is a disgrace on those who should have prevented it.

A POINT FOR THE PRESIDENT TO DECIDE.

AN interesting question arose during the visit of Mr. EATON, the Civil Service Commissioner, at the Custom-house. It was whether the applicants who had already passed the old examination successfully, and were already upon the eligible list, ought to pass another examination under the new regulations. According to the report, Mr. EATON, although recognizing the force of the argument in favor of the present eligible list, doubted whether the Commission could properly adopt the results of any examination except those held under its own authority. He suggested that the President, by a simple order, could continue the present eligible list.

This course we hope will be taken. The list is composed of those who have passed substantially the examination which is now prescribed—an examination which was instituted for the same purpose, and which was conducted in the same manner and by much the same examiners. It was in fact, except in name, the same examination, and the success of the examinations of the last four years was one of the strongest arguments for the passage of the bill, which, in effect, merely confirms and extends them. There is no good reason that those who stand already upon the eligible list should not compete, by their standing marked upon that list, with those who pass under the new regulations. Should the Commission make such a recommendation, we can see no reason to doubt that the President would approve it.

The members of the Commission have been at work diligently since their adjournment, and have completed the organization of the local boards from Portland to New Orleans. The only point not visited in San Francisco, where the details will be arranged at once. It was necessary to lose no time, for the bill provides that after six months from the passage of the act no appointment, within the range of places included, should be made except according to its provisions. The bill was approved on the 16th of January, and the six months consequently expire on the 16th of July.

OFFICIAL SARCASM.

Mr. DERENDORF having made complaints to the Secretary of the Navy respecting certain violations of law at the Navy-yard in Norfolk, the Secretary was at liberty to dismiss them as trivial, or as proceeding from a person known to him to be unworthy to be heeded, or to direct a prompt investigation and action, which last he did. But the Secretary was not at liberty to insult the complainant, which he also did. If the complaints were worthy of attention, as the Secretary admitted by at once entertaining them and ordering an inquiry, the motives of the complainant or his previous conduct were not before him, and sarcastic comments were impertinent and officially improper. It is not the clever Mr. WILLIAM E. CHANDLER who is writing, but the Secretary of the Navy; and the little gibes which Mr. CHANDLER the politician might choose to fling at another politician are unseemly when a high public officer is speaking for the whole country. There is also something of the bully in using an official position to satirize a private citizen who, by the confession of the Secretary's own action, has done only his duty.

If the Secretary had supposed the charges to be unfounded, the proper course was also the most crushing. To have said Mr. DERENDORF that inquiry had been made into the truth of his charges, and that they were shown to be totally unfounded, would have disposed of him effectually. But to receive the complaint and insult the complainant is, under the circumstances, presumptive evidence that the Secretary believed the charges to be true, and was angry that they had been made.

HARVARD UNIVERSITY AND GOVERNOR BUTLER.

HARVARD UNIVERSITY has decided to break a bad precedent, and will not confer the degree of LL.D. upon Governor BUTLER. The sole argument in favor of doing it was that it was the custom, and that the honor is offered to the office and not to the man. The reply to this is that the circumstances which have now arisen show the custom to have been unfortunate, and if it was to be renounced, there could have been no more fitting occasion.

But the conclusive argument in favor of the course adopted is that the governing body of the University ought not to bestow its highest honors in any way which tends to cheapen it and to belittle the institution. That the people of Massachusetts have elected General BUTLER to be the Governor of the State is no more reason that the University should make him an LL.D. than that Andover Seminary should make him a D.D. The State has thought him to be a fitting person for the Chief Magistracy. The University has not thought him to be a proper person for its highest honor. Neither authority is bound by the other, and each is responsible for its own action. The unfortunate custom could never have been broken without offense to the Governor, whoever he might be, at the time. But that is surely not a reason for persevering in the practice.

Governor BUTLER is reported to have said that the course of the University had helped him politically. But even if that were so, the political consideration is not germane, because the University is not a political body. The degree is not withheld because Governor BUTLER now calls himself a Democrat. It was conferred, we believe, upon Governor GASTON, who was a Democrat. General BUTLER'S reported remark, that withholding the degree was an insult to the people of the State offered by Harvard College because it could not dictate a Governor, is within his usual remarks, because it is simply silly. In the Board of Overseers the question was solely one of propriety. All the members equally distrust General BUTLER, and all of them respect his office. But a college degree is in its nature a personal and not an official honor. This is the point which the University has now decided.

PERSONAL.

THE Rev H. R. HAWEIS on the late J. R. GREEN "I took Mr GREEN to breakfast with FREDERICK DENISON MAURICE; we always called MAURICE the Prophet—and so he be call a prophet—ever sweet and gentle, and genial to young men. MAURICE afterward preached a characteristic sermon on the doubt of THOMAS, the point of which was to show that THOMAS was the type of the true believer. 'How like MAURICE!' said GREEN to me; 'always to MAURICE the last and least obvious lesson seems the first, if not the only one, to be learned.' I think GREEN was as completely fascinated by MAURICE'S strength of soul and large tenderness of nature as ever I was. I remember GREEN'S reading out some passages of SWINBURNE'S then new book of Poems and Ballads, and saying, 'This is the greatest master of poetical language since SHELLEY, but he can't think.'"

—The Pall Mall Gazette, of May 15, speaks of "the human-rabbit company of MORAN" as "certainly the most artistic family since the days of the VAN HUTENIS . . . In the family of MORAN, sublime adagio."

—The project of a second canal across the Isthmus of Suez is not a new one. Six years ago Sir GEORGE ELIOT foresaw the necessity of providing additional accommodation, and suggested to the Khedive the expediency of a canal between Alexandria and Suez, by way of Ismailia. The idea that M. DE LESSEPS enjoys the exclusive right of connecting Europe and Asia is now exploded. "He deserves all honor," observes one of his admirers, "but the commerce of the world can not pause for fear his self-love should be hurt."

—Although it is fashionable in England to found clubs for the improvement of mastiffs, bull-dogs, fox terriers, collies, and St. Bernards, there are no clubs for the improvement of setters, retrievers, pointers, spaniels, and other dogs most useful in field-sports.

—Mr. ROBERTS has been lecturing at Oxford on Mr BURNE-JONES and several other modern painters before crowded audiences, which consisted chiefly of members of the university. His judgment was flexible enough to contain him in my that in a man who, like Mr BURNE-JONES, is given to personification and to myth, "a certain strangeness, or quaintness, or even violation of probability, is not only excusable, but desirable, in the representation of what in nature body nor spirit, nor unusual nor vegetable, but only an idea." Mr. BURNE-JONES, too, "has a sense of color perfect in its way, but he is essentially a chiaro-oscurist, rather than a colorist."

—Some discussion has been aroused in Paris because HACHETTE & Co. who have a monopoly of the railway book-stalls in France, have refused to sell GUY DE MAUPASSANT'S novel Une Vie, on the score of its undue "realism." To ZOLA'S works, however, no such objection is made; but their sale is interdicted on various railway lines to this country.

—Is it proper for a vicar and his wife to dine in the vestry? This great question has been exercising the intellects of "a committee of parishioners," who wrote to the Bishop of Winchester about it, and received the reply: "Though I think the vestry is not the right place for dinners, I do not think I could desire Mr KNIGHT [the vicar complained of] to take a lodging for the sake of getting refreshment on a Sunday. If Mr and Mrs. KNIGHT had to remain in the vestry between the services, I should not think there was much desecration of the house of God in the using of a sandwich, etc."

—Baron NORDENSKJÖLD has sent to the great Fisheries Exhibition in London a case containing ten figures representing a couple of Chukchis—a race of the northeast of Asia—engaged in angling. Crouching down over a hole in the ice, the woman tries to attract the fish by uttering a peculiar cry; and as soon as she perceives a fish she casts her line into the hole. The figures are life-size, and dressed in suits of reindeer-skin and seal-skin, bordered with dog-skin, which were brought home in the Vega. The face of the woman is tattooed, and her black hair hangs down over her forehead.

—The Volunteer Fireman was proverbially strong in language. A New-Yorker now living in Providence, Rhode Island, having received from a merchant of this city a copy of the Story of the Old Volunteer Fire Department of New York City (published by the HARPERS), wrote a little letter of acknowledgment in French, which ended as follows: "C'est un bien joli cadeau, et j'en aurai bien soin. Ce sera pour moi un souvenir précieux de notre amitié qui date dès la première jeunesse."

—Mr HENRY C. GIBSON'S private collection of oil-paintings in Philadelphia—one of the most notable in the country—is hung not in a single gallery, but in a series of juxtaposed rooms which he calls cabinets. He regards these works of art not as curiosities to be inspected, but as every-day companions whose society is agreeable, and there is scarcely an apartment on the first floor of his house where they are not to be found. The effect of hanging the pictures in this manner is singularly cozy and pleasant.

—Mr. GLADSTONE attended service at the Hawarden Church on Sunday, May 13, and, as usual, read the lessons for the day. For more than two months three special constables have been guarding Hawarden Castle, each of them provided with six-chambered revolvers and several rounds of ammunition, and instructed not to lose sight of the Premier when he is walking in the grounds.

—MATTHEW ARNOLD is not yet done with Biblical criticism, in spite of his late protestations to the contrary. In the Nineteenth Century he becomes exceedingly conservative while discussing the prophecy of ISAIAH: "All meddling with the letter itself of the text is to my opinion undesirable. The case is one where the feeling that liberty is taken with the text does more damage than any amendment of the text can do good. It is better, I think, to get out of the existing text what meaning can be got out of it than to create the sense of insecurity which comes when the reader perceives the text to be treated with license. We are so constituted by nature that our enjoyment of a text greatly depends upon our having a sense of security."

—Dr SAVAGE, in the Journal of Mental Science, considers the hereditary aspects of insanity: "One would say to a person asking whether she might marry, 'If you have strong insane inheritance, and if you have had already one attack occurring at about twenty, more especially if there has been a tendency to hysterics or other emotional disturbance, you will marry at very great risk of breaking down after childbirth, and your future partner must be fully warned of this fact;' whereas, if the insanity has been more accidental (if I may use the term), more the result of some other physical cause, the chances of recurrence are less. I am afraid, however, none of us are in a position to say a hat cases will or will not recur."

—If it were only possible (writes a late essayist) to convince our teachers of singing of the possibility of teaching pupils to sing artistically without the aid of anatomical knowledge, it would really be a valuable thing for our future vocalists. I have heard very young children use the Legato mode as naturally as breathing. From boys and girls as they play in the streets, or as they call out to one another, there can be heard the most perfect examples of pure sound, brought forth with a correctness and sustained with a steadiness of vibration which many a vocalist might envy. Indeed, there is not a sound uttered by any animal, whether bird or beast, or by the sea, or any other part of this great world, but the vocalist can learn something from it which will be of advantage to him when using his one voice in the expression of thought and feeling.

—A well-known capitalist of this city recalls a toast which forty years ago made an impression upon his youthful mind. A lady of Watertown, Massachusetts, whose surname was FOWL, was a guest of a well-known citizen of Newtown (now Newton) in the same State. After dinner, on one occasion, a guest arose and proposed the following bumper: "To the fair of Newtown, and the fowl of Watertown."

—Amid the prevailing darkness of our civil service one ray occasionally a rift in the cloud. Mr CHARLES FORRESTER, assistant superintendent of the newspaper department in the New York post-office, has the unique distinction of having been connected with that institution for fifty-eight consecutive years, his appointment dating from 1825, under the Postmastership of General THEODORUS BAILEY, when the post-office was situated in Garden Street (now Exchange Place), and was served by only six clerks and six carriers. To-day there are twelve hundred clerks. General BAILEY used to reside over the post-office, and four of his clerks boarded with him. Mr FORRESTER'S father was an officer of the same institution for twenty-eight years, and Mr FORRESTER'S son held a similar position at the time of his death. But the rift becomes less when an occasion that ever since the days of President TYLER Mr. FORRESTER has been forced to pay an annual assessment to the politicians.

THE COMPETITIVE DRILL AT NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE.—From a Sketch by Horace Bradley.

THE NASHVILLE PAGEANT.

"Man is a military animal" who "glories in gunpowder and loves parade." There is no spectacle so sure to attract eager attention, no display possessing so unfailing interest, as a military pageant. From the rural "muster," which very fairly suggests soldierly exercises, to elaborate and picturesque reviews of uniformed [illegible] in large bodies, everything in the nature of a military display [illegible]tracts and holds the eager interest of the people.

The splendid pageant which recently filled the city of Nashville, Tennessee, with people from all quarters of the country, however, was significant of something more and better than this. The competi[illegible] drill held recently in that city was pla[illegible] and carried out in strict accordance with the governing principle of our republican [illegible] of military defense. Its purpose was to test and promote the ef[illegible] of that citizen soldiery upon which chiefly the nation [illegible] for defense against foreign foes or domestic violence. It [illegible] purpose to make the volunteer militia organizations [illegible] efficient military schools [illegible] and thorough [illegible] It was [illegible] instructed, as all [illegible] should be, to the purpose of stimulating thoroughness of educational work. The people of the South are even more strongly military in their tastes than most of our race usually are, and they attend an exhibition of this kind with no gaping curiosity, no purpose to indulge in ignorant admiration. They are keen critics of military drills and evolutions, and they went to Nashville as the people of a musical community attend a new opera, to judge the performance critically, to apportion praise and blame impartially, and to test the work done by exact standards. They knew how each detail should be managed, and were quick to detect errors or excellences in the smallest particulars. The newspapers of the city made much of the affair as a pageant of unusual splendor, but they were not content with such generalities. They analyzed the performance of each company, each platoon, and even each individual soldier. They criticised as [illegible] closely and as intelligently as an inspector at West Point might do when testing the work of the cadets. Their reviews of each day's display were critical analyses of unstinted severity. The praise they accorded was given willingly and heartily, but it had to be earned in every case.

In presenting illustrations of this pageant we can not too heartily commend the purpose with which it was organized, or the right spirit in which it was carried out. It has always been the policy of our country to rely upon militia organizations for defense in all emergencies, and under such a policy it becomes as to care by its efficiency of those organizations as earnestly as other nations establish their standing armies. Practically the people of the South this country, and the earnestness shown by the people of the South in promoting its efficiency and duty recognizing its importance is worthy alike of praise and imitation. The attitude of the people in the South toward the citizen soldiery is that which the people of the whole country should maintain. They regard the militia organizations as real bodies of [illegible] not to defend the country as need. They treat their work seriously, and [illegible] make a mistake of undervaluing their thorough [illegible] in discipline and perfection in drill. They fully understand that the militia are meant to play at soldiering, and that their [illegible] is a more important one than the [illegible] parading of a holiday show.

There is no ground for [illegible] complaint of a want of earnestness on the part of the citizen troops in any part of the [illegible] organization given to them in the North is not always as earnest as it should be, and in this particular the [illegible] ville has set a wholesome example.

"They are quite happy together."

THIRLBY HALL.

By W. E. NORRIS,

AUTHOR OF "MATRIMONY," "MARIE DE MERSAC," "NO NEW THING," "HEAPS OF MONEY," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

TEMPUS ACTUM.

When I think of the early years of my life I think of a wide green landscape, fertile, well timbered, and swept always by fresh breezes from the German Ocean. I see great sheets of calm water reddened by the glow of sunset, and flights of wild fowl in a black line against the sky, and the wherries, with their enormous brown sails, moving slowly along the dykes, and having, from a short distance, the appearance of sailing on dry land. I see an old red brick house, too, with gables and twisted chimneys, standing in the midst of a perfectly level park. Round about it are shrubberies and a few flower beds and an old-fashioned walled fruit garden, while behind it there rises a slight—a very slight—eminence, which is called "the Hill," and from the summit whereof (forty or fifty feet above the level of the sea, perhaps) many miles of land and water can be discovered stretching away to meet the horizon. There is a sense of space and vigor and freedom connected with this country which goes far toward atoning for its flatness, and in some sort a substitute for beauty. So, at least, polite strangers were wont to affirm; but to my eyes it was always a beautiful country, and could stand very well upon its own merits, without need of any excuses or equivalents whatever.

A certain number of years ago—sometimes it seems a great many, sometimes only a few—a little boy used to trot about that part of East Norfolk in a state of constant and serene satisfaction with himself and his surroundings. He was, I think, what most people would consider a rather nice-looking little boy; and as he was allowed to do almost exactly as he pleased, and got very nearly everything that he wanted, it is not surprising that he should have been also a good-humored and jolly little boy. I can see him plainly now as he plods hither and thither on his sturdy little legs among the woods and fields. Sometimes he is alone, but more often he is accompanied by an elderly gentleman, with a slight stoop and a kind, handsome face, who does not say a great deal himself, but who listens with much courtesy to his companion's unceasing flow of conversation, and who only puts forward his own opinions from time to time with a proper degree of deference. These two are the best of friends, one of them being a great talker and the other an admirable listener; and whether they go their daily rounds on foot, or whether the old gentleman is mounted on a big boned bay horse and the boy on a diminutive Shetland pony, they are quite happy together, and want no third person to enliven their solitude.

Third persons come, however, from time to time. There is another boy, George Warren, from Hailsham, and there is the Rector with his fishing rod, and old Sir Digby Welby, who rides over to talk politics and agriculture. These come and go, but for the greater part of the long days the old man and the boy have no society but their own, and are content therewith.

A few years later the little boy has become a big boy, and is more satisfied with himself than ever. His round jacket has been replaced by a shooting coat; his legs are incased in leather gaiters, and his feet in stout boots; he is out on the Broads after duck, happy in the possession of a brand-new gun all of his own. With legitimate pride he eyes this weapon of destruction, while the part in which he balances himself somewhat unsteadily in advancing among the tall reeds and rushes of the shore. All of a sudden the duck rise in a compact mass above the tops of the waving reeds. Bang!—right into the middle of them. Now, then, Dido, old girl, pick up the slain! Off goes Dido; off goes the impetuous youth after her, plunging deep into water and mud. How many killed? What! none? Well, well—better luck next time. The sportsman returns a little less quickly than he went; and there is old Jim Bunce, in his confounded old velveteens, sitting calmly in the punt, reloading with the aid of that forgotten implement called a ramrod; and Jim Bunce widens his already wide mouth, and says, "Lord! Mr. Charlie, who'd ha' thought it, now!" when he hears the confession that has to be made, though perhaps he is not quite so surprised as his words would seem to imply. No matter, Jim Bunce—a day will come.

The day does come—many days. Days in the stubble and among the turnips; days in the coverts that lie about Thirlby Hall. The boy is now a young man, who can shoot as well as another, and if there are not a great many pheasants to be shot, there are not a great many people to shoot them, while of partridges there are enough to satisfy anybody. Ah, dear old days! jolly old life! dear old country! Is it memory or time that has played such strange pranks with you?

I revisited those once familiar scenes the other day, after a long, long interval of absence—"a vast o' years," as old Jim Bunce would have said. It is not a beautiful country. I won't allow that it is ugly, but beautiful it certainly is not; and as I stood under the lee of Thirlby Church, looking out upon it all with sorrowful eyes, a furious east wind came tearing round the angles of the old building, and chilled me to the very marrow of my bones. I am sure the wind never blew like that when I was young. As for the landscape—well, I was prepared for a certain degree of disappointment; for how could I expect that the reality should answer to my dim recollections when it is only by a vigorous effort that I can identify myself, the Charles Maxwell of A.D. 1883, with the slim young gentleman whose portrait in crayons hangs, or used to hang, in the library at Thirlby Hall? I say I was prepared for change, but what I was not prepared for was to find that the entire neighborhood had shrunk to something less than a fourth of its original size. That Thirlby Broad! And Hickling Broad, and Horsey Mere, on those comparatively insignificant sheets of water be the vast inland seas upon which I used to sail by the hour together, and which my callow imagination likened to Lakes Erie, Michigan, and Superior? The villages, too, how they have huddled themselves together, and how sadly the woods have diminished in area! Even the Hall itself—but this is too painful. I turn my back upon the view, and look up at the gray, weather-beaten church tower above me, with its iron cage at the top, which was used to call the laborers, and which served in ancient days as a light house to ships out at sea. It is a tower of very respectable height, but, alas! it is no longer to be compared, without palpable absurdity, to the Tower of Babel. And within the building things are not any better. Thirlby Church is a large church, as all the churches are in those parts, but it is not so large as York Minster—not nearly so large. I have difficulty in recognizing it. The sea-green east window, against which I used to watch the flying shadows of the rooks during church-time, is gone: so is the old three-decker; so are the high square pews. Renovation and restoration have resulted in stained glass and Minton tiles, and a reredos, and a marble pulpit, and rows of carved oak benches. Those are improvements, no doubt; but I am sure I don't know what the old Rector would have thought of it all.

The old Rector and his old fashioned ways have been forgotten for a long time, I should imagine. I saw his grave outside, among the graves of many others whom I saw last as hale, hearty men. Under the chancel, in the family vault, sleeps the best friend I ever had. Perhaps it was rather a mistake to begin with the parish church when I stole away, without saying a word to anybody, to renew acquaintance with my old home.

As I pass out through the grave yard I come upon the last resting place of another old friend:

SACRED TO THE MEMORY
OF
JAMES BUNCE,
Born 3d August, 1790. Died 10th December, 1862.
For upward of fifty years Keeper and Water-Bailiff to
GERRARD LE MARCHANT, OF THIRLBY HALL, ESQ.

A worthy man within this grave doth lie,
A faithful servant and a sportsman true;
Never filled with fish his master to supply,
Preserved his partridges and pheasants too.
Now in the heavenly quires above he sings,
Removed from guns and rods and all such things.

Likewise of SUSANNAH, Wife of the Above.

Likewise of his Sons JAMES and WILLIS, Drowned at Sea.

THIS HERE STONE
Was put up by his third son, Daniel Bunce,
Carpenter and Shipwright of Great Yarmouth.

There is some internal evidence of "this here stone" having been literally put up by the aforesaid Daniel—put up, that is, by his own hands; and indeed, if he inherits his father's qualities, he is not the man to call in professional aid over an unskilled matter as the cutting of a tombstone, or even the composing of a suitable epitaph to adorn the same. Old Jim Bunce used to be fond of saying of himself that he was a Jack-of-all-trades. He would sometimes add modestly that he was master of more; but this, I take it, he said only to secure the harmless satisfaction of being contradicted. If ever any one knew his own large value, as a person of many shifts and large experience, Jim Bunce did, and he was only a gamekeeper because his taste inclined him toward field-sports, not because he doubted his capacity to fill any other station in the world that he might select. I well remember how he would insist upon painting his own garden fence, mending his own roof and windows, and making his own nets. I remember also that he always received the full market value of such odd jobs from my uncle, who would justly remark that it would be most unfair to take advantage of Bunce's economy. It would not surprise me to hear that Daniel Bunce, carpenter and shipwright, of Great Yarmouth, had got the price of that grave stone out of the trustees.

And as Jim Bunce has left his velveteens, his rod, and gun, and "all such things," and is singing in heavenly quires, is he? It may be so; but I must be allowed to reserve my opinion. I fancy that if Bunce has kept his consciousness and his identity at all, he is not content with the employment as confidently merited to him by his son. Daniel, to be sure, may reply that he knows quite as much about the matter as I do. How, indeed, can we say what change may come over the spirit of a man after death, when we are daily witnesses of the vicissitudes to which it is subject while still imprisoned in the flesh? Of all the head laws which govern us poor mortals, and mould us without the smallest respect for the accredness of our free-will, the law of change is the saddest and most puzzling. It is no use that a man develops into a better edition of his former self, that his intelligence widens, and his knowledge and experience increase, but that he becomes another man altogether. One thinks of the multitudes, the passions, the struggles, of twenty, thirty, forty years ago, asking one's self, with a sort of stupid wonder, Was it really I who did and suffered all those things? One can't look back faithfully and concisely into the past without humiliation, without a sense of infidelity and powerlessness. I speak, of course, of myself, and podge humanity at large by myself (which is, I imagine, the common method); but as it is the story of my own life that I am about to write, perhaps a little preliminary egotism may be forgiven me.

I suppose that my childhood was as happy a one as could possibly be. I don't think that the fact of my being an orphan afflicted me for a single moment. My parents died when I was far too young to understand my loss, and my uncle Bernard was father, mother, and friend, all in one to me. I have a portrait of him—a mere pencil sketch of his profile, dashed off one afternoon by George Warren, who had a happy knack of catching likenesses—which I am glad to say that I have preserved ever since, and which recalls him to my mind far more vividly than the full-length oil-painting by Sir Francis Grant. My drawing represents a handsome, refined-looking man, slightly bald, whose age might be anything between forty and sixty. The forehead is broad and rather high, the nose aquiline, the upper lip short, and the chin round and well moulded. There is a suspicion of a smile about the mouth and the eye, which last is half closed, and has a faint crow's-foot at the corner. A very deep line runs from the nostril to the corner of the mouth. Knowing all that I do now, I can see that it is a sad face, though it never struck me as sad in those days, there being, in my opinion, no reason at all why it should be so. I was aware, of course, that Uncle Bernard was a widower; but it did not occur to me as possible that he could be still grieving for my aunt—a person whom I had never seen, and who was as dead as Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Afterward I heard that the subject of his wife's death was one which not even his most intimate friends ventured to mention to him, and that he had had other heavy sorrows besides this, which also—though for different reasons—could not be spoken of in his presence. For the rest, my dear old man was far too unselfish and too philosophical to obtrude his troubles upon those who could not enter into them, or, for that matter, upon those who could. I call him "old" out of habit, and because in the days of my pupplehood he naturally appeared to me to be quite an old man, but he was not in reality much beyond middle age at that time, and his mother was still alive, and even very much alive.

Of that lady we can say nothing, and heard very little. She had contracted a second marriage before my birth, and lived far away in the north of Scotland with her husband, a certain Mr Farquhar. Neither my uncle used to betake himself once in every year upon a filial visit, and as he always looked tired and harassed on his return, I was led to form a poor opinion of my grandmother, who never came to Thirlby.

Thirlby, in truth, was a house where guests were few. Not that my uncle was inhospitable; but it so happened that there were scarcely half a dozen people in the world whom he was expected to ask to stay with him. We were singularly devoid of near relations, he and I. He had only my uncle by marriage, his wife having been my mother's sister, and my own people must have been as much astonished as delighted when he proposed to adopt me. I believe they made rather a favor of acceding to his wish; but I am bound to say that, having brought themselves to do so, they allowed him entire liberty of action with regard to my education and destiny, and if he had thought fit to employ me in a coal mine, or send me to sea as a cabin-boy, I very much doubt whether they would have felt themselves justified in interfering in the matter. But he did nothing of that kind. He treated me in all respects like his own son—only I think that our companionship was somewhat closer than that which subsists between most fathers and sons; and as we lived together in the old house, which as one of us, at all events, never seemed empty or lonely, and it was very seldom that we visited or interrupted our prolonged tête-à-tête.

As for ladies, scarcely one did we see from January to December, and really it is wonderful how well we got on without them. Mr Denoison, the Rector, was a widower; Lady Walky was an invalid; Mrs Warren, of Hailsham, was understood to have every moment of her time occupied in ministering to the wants of a boundless family, and in endeavoring to reconcile these with the capacities of a far from boundless income. Other ladies there were, living, some five, some seven, some ten miles as the crow flies, but our intercourse with them was confined to a few formal calls in the course of the year. My uncle was too unsociable a man to say "Not at home" when he was at home, or even to slip quietly out-of-doors as soon as a carriage was seen approaching across the great level park. Therefore he received these ladies, as often as they came, with gentleness and courtesy; but he did not as courage any advances toward intimacy on their part. I believe that, long before, some of them had roused him great annoyance by asserting that it was a duty that he owed to society to provide his house with a new mistress, and by throwing eligible persons in his way; the result of which was that he took up an attitude of distrust and self-defense before them which the lapse of years had not availed to modify. As for me, no sooner did I detect a green or yellow chariot swinging slowly up the avenue than I bolted away as fast as my legs could carry me. I did not like female society in those days. Whether we were ultimately the better or the worse for being thus deprived of what neither of us missed I will not pretend to say—a little of both, perhaps.

From time to time my uncle's brother, the General, would run down to Thirlby for a few days; and those were merry days for the whole establishment. I am afraid the servants liked the General a little better than they did my uncle. He was not some open-handed, for no one could very well have been that, but he was certainly jolly. Tall, erect, good-looking, and carrying his five-and-forty years with a certain youthful jauntiness, he was a man with whom the world had always gone well, and whom the world accordingly loved. No doubt it was to his own merits that he owed his C.B. and his attainment of the rank of Major-General at so early an age; still it is not every meritorious officer who has a chance of distinguishing himself, and inasmuch as General Le Marchant had had many such chances, he may be said to have been used well by the world. It was therefore as natural that everybody should like him as that he should be good-humored, jovial, and full of jokes, which, if not intrinsically excellent, were made so by the manner of their delivery. Cooper, the butler, ordinarily a somewhat saturnine personage, would stand behind my uncle's chair, grinning from ear to ear, while that capital story was being narrated about the troop-sergeant-major's horse which was cast by mistake and purchased by the Bishop of Cirencester, who afterward exhibited it proudly to the colonel of the regiment. The narrative chuckled as prodigiously over it himself that his audience could not choose but be infected by his hilarity. As for Jim Bouce, he declared that it did his heart good as go out for a day's shooting with a gentleman as took a real delight in his work. The truth is that my uncle, though a very fair shot, was an enthusiastic lover of sport, and would rather, any day, see his brother bring down a moheter, or the Rector land a twenty pound pike, than be at the pains of performing either of these feats himself. It was the General who gave me my first gun; it was the General who carried me off to London while I was yet of tender years, "to open my mind," as he said, and who took me to Madame Tussaud's and the Zoological Gardens, and—most glorious of all—to the play. Somehow, I can never quite bring myself to believe that the General is dead; though it seems natural enough that so many others should be.

The history of a man's life is like the history of a nation: looking back into it, one finds it marked not into certain clearly defined epochs. An event, great or small, takes place here and there, and makes a full stop, after which a fresh period has to be opened. One does not always recognize the full stop at the moment of its occurrence, but when so much that preceded and followed it has been swept out of the ken of memory, it stands forth with sufficient distinctness. The first period of my life ended where the first period of most boys' lives ends—on the day when I was sent to school. Full well do I remember that sad and solemn occasion. My uncle and I drove the whole distance, the establishment for which I was bound being only some thirty miles away from Thirlby, and I recollect that we were both extremely self-possessed and nonchalant in our manner, only toward the end of the journey conversation would flag a little in spite of all our efforts. And then the schoolmaster came out, all geniality and affability, and shook hands with us, and soon afterward my uncle went away. I feel an inward sinking even now when I think of that terrible moment. But the school-master, still genial for, indeed, it was the first day of term, and parents were arriving at every moment), patted me on the shoulder encouragingly, and said "Now, my little fellow, you must not pull a long face. And here is Warren, an old friend of yours, and a big boy, who will take care that nobody eats you up."

Dear old George Warren! I dare say he saved me a licking or two during those first few days, though I do not remember that I was in much danger of being eaten up then or afterward by any one, unless it were by the school-master himself, from whose fierce indignation no boy, however big, could have shielded me. George was four years older than I; but in spite of this great disparity of age we had been friends at home, and in spite of it we remained friends, not only throughout our school-days, but long after our school-days were at an end. I attribute this partly to George's native modesty, and partly to the circumstance that during the greater part of our boyhood we met only in the holidays. Had we been at Eton together we could hardly, I think, have continued to associate upon terms of equality; but Mr. Warren, who was a poor man, with many children, entered his son at a less expensive and famous public school than Eton, and my removal thither in due course of time gave me a certain prestige in my intercourse with George, of which I fear that I was only too ready to take advantage.

But great as was the change from that dreary little private school to Eton, and important as it seemed at the time, it does not now strike me as marking the commencement of a fresh period to my career. To reach a genuine full stop I have to advance several years, to the time when I was nearly eighteen, and the afternoon on which Maud Dennison returned to her father's house.

Maud Dennison and I had been companions as children, and had climbed trees together, and together had caught many a perch and bream in the Broads. She was at that time, as I often remarked to George Warren, "almost as good as a boy"; and the Rector was more than once heard to say, with a sigh, that he wished it had pleased Providence to create her of the other sex. Much as he loved his little girl, it came to him, no doubt, as a relief when his sister, Mrs Saville, a lady of some wealth and position in society, who had girls of her own, proposed to take Maud, and keep her with her cousins until her education should be completed. The offer was, at any rate, accepted. Maud and I parted—not without tears upon both sides—and forgot one another with the celerity natural to our age. I suppose it was found more convenient that the Rector should run up occasionally to London or to his sister's place in Surrey than that his daughter should spend her holidays at Thirlby, for to Thirlby she came no more; and the chances are that Norfolk would never have been gladdened by the sight of her again but for the sudden demise of the Rector's housekeeper. This melancholy event deprived poor Mr Dennison of his right hand, and almost of his head into the bargain. He had a right hand of his own equal to any man's for the tying of flies, and he had a head upon his shoulders which was tolerably well stocked with brains; but as regarded the details of every-day life he was as helpless as an infant. To order his dinner was a task altogether beyond him; nor could he find his sermons, his memoranda, his surplice, his boots, or his hat, without assistance. Hence he spent some weeks of hopeless misery and bewilderment, and committed blunders in the discharge of his duties which were talked about all over the parish, before it occurred to him that he had a daughter who had attained, or nearly attained, years of discretion. Long afterward Mrs. Saville described to me how she was sitting in her drawing room in Portman Square one morning, when the Rector rushed in, excited and dishevelled, to say that he was very sorry to upset counting arrangements, but that unless he was allowed to take Maud home, he believed, upon his honor and conscience, that he should be driven into marrying the house-maid. "What was I to do?" Mrs Saville asked. "I had fully intended to keep the dear child until she married well—as she would have been quite certain to do within a few years—but, knowing what a suspicion my poor brother was, and how easy it would be for any unscrupulous woman to lead him into making a fool of himself, I simply dared not raise objections. I was sorry for Maud; but I felt that there was no help for it, and that she must go."

So the Rector—who, by the way, was anything but a simpleton—carried off his daughter from the pomps and vanities of the metropolis; and thus it came to pass that, as I was walking homeward one evening, I was struck dumb with amazement by encountering at the corner of a lane a young lady of the most surpassing beauty and elegance. I have already mentioned that feminine charms were wholly unknown to me during the early years of my life; and although at this time I had a pretty high opinion of myself—being in the Eton Eight, and being possessed of advantages of face and figure of which I was fully conscious—I was apt to be bashful when ladies looked at me, and I felt myself growing red under the calm scrutiny of this one.

I don't know that I can describe her. In fact, I am quite sure that I can not, though some attempt at description is doubtless necessary. She was slim, and of something less than middle height; she had a low, broad forehead, and no abundance of brown hair shone in it; but what struck you first of all in looking at her was her eyes. These were shaded by remarkably long lashes, and were of that soft gray color which has no suspicion of blue or green in it, and which is, as my mind, the most beautiful of all the hues which human eyes can possess. With such eyes as that, it really could not signify at all what her nose and mouth might be like, and I don't think I noticed them at the time. Subsequent familiarity with all the features of this lady's face enables me to state that the former was short and straight, and that the latter was rather too large for the then received ideas of beauty. It would not, I believe, be considered so nowadays. She deliberately took stock of my person, and then extended her hand to me with a smile, saying: "I think you must be Charley Maxwell. I am Maud Dennison, if you remember such a person."

I made a clutch at my hat with my left hand, and held out my right, not to take hers, but to show that circumstances made it impossible for me to do so. I said, "Oh, how do you do, Miss Dennison?" (I did not venture to call her Maud, though she had addressed me as Charley.) "I'm afraid I can't shake hands. The fact is, I've been mending the bottom of the old punt, and I've got myself into an awful muddy mess, as you see."

If I am to confess the truth, I was not a little vexed that she should have discovered me in such an unbecoming plight, and was uncomfortably aware that my coat and trousers were the oldest in my possession. However, she laid her little hand in mine without any hesitation, remarking quietly that the mud would wash off, and as she did so I became aware that, for the first time in my life, I had fallen in love.

Sudden, no doubt; but not so very much more sudden, perhaps, than that kind of thing generally is. My admiration was no great that I should certainly have given some sort of verbal expression to it had not my shyness been even greater. But presently she caused all my shyness, and I was a large part of my admiration also, to evaporate by observing, "You are very much grown."

"As far as that goes, so are you, you know," I returned, rather tartly. In truth, if she had an inched for a month she could hardly have discovered a form of criticism more calculated to annoy me.

"Oh yes," she said; "I have grown a great deal, of course—in fact, I am grown up now. You are not quite that yet."

"I'm seven months older than you are, at all events," I retorted.

"Still," said she, "that does not make you grown up. You are a boy, whereas I am a young woman. I am sure you must see that yourself."

I replied that I didn't see it at all.

"Ah, I think you do, or you would not have called me 'Miss Dennison' just now. But we won't quarrel over it," she added, after a short pause.

I explained to her that she was under a total misapprehension. One was obliged to be a little careful, because some people happened to certainly suck up after living in London that there was no knowing whether the slightest familiarity might not offend them. I had only addressed her as Miss Dennison out of politeness.

"Or because you had forgotten my Christian name," she suggested. "Have you forgotten teaching me to climb trees, I wonder? And don't you remember our fishing expeditions, and the day when I was frightened out of my wits by catching a huge eel? You wouldn't take it off the hook for me, and I had an dog it along the ground for over an far at the end of we line, till I met George Warren, who relieved me of the monster. Don't be cross and disagreeable, Charley, or I shall think that it is you who have grown stuck up at Eton."

This was quite irresistible. My offended dignity was soothed, and I once more realized that I was desperately in love with this new and exquisite Maud Dennison—a fact as to which I had begun to entertain some doubts during the past few minutes.

"And here you come home for good?" I inquired.

"Oh, I suppose so," she answered. "Papa has discovered at last that he wants me, and I hope he will always find no necessary now. We must try to become friends again, you and I, as we are to be such near neighbors."

No great effort was needed in order to arrive at this result. We walked on together, talking over old times and comparing notes, and I was not a little disgusted when the Rector came turning along the lane—the Rector was always a hurry—and caught us up.

"So there you are, Maud?" he called out, "I've been looking for you all over the place. Come along, my dear child; we must get home as quickly as possible, or I shall have to go without my dinner.—Well, Charley, here's your old playmate back again, you see.—Did you tell Bose about those rascally ponchers? They don't belong to this parish, thank God!—Your old playmate back again. No time for play this evening, though. Maud has got her work cut out for her. My junior curate, I call her—my junior curate. Not but what she ought to take rank of poor Tomkinson, upon my word. Dear, good fellow Tomkinson, but no hand for business—no head whatever."

The Rector bustled on, talking as he went, and Maud paused to wish me good-night.

"Good-night, Maud. May I really call you Maud, then?" I asked, in my most reassuring manner.

She laughed, and looked full at me with her frank gray eyes. "What else should you call me?"

And then she was gone, and I took me way homeward, a changed and exultant creature. I still can make the absurd assertion that I did not sleep at all that night, but I do believe that I lay awake for quite an hour, thinking of Maud.

[To be continued.]

THE TENDER BACHELOR

It is not many people who can talk, as Percy Bramwell did at the time of which we are speaking, of four maiden aunts, in the best sense, and established at the same family mansion in the suburbs. Percy was never tired of talking of his aunts, their softening angles, their mellowing complexions, and their yearly improvement in spinsters. He even aired their perfections at the club, and made other members count up their aunts. And he ought to have been deeply considerate of them, as he freely admitted, for his aunts had given the real direction to his life. A subtle, of course, from that aim of all others is the like of a man of fashion—personal comfort.

While sipping a dainty cup of coffee in the freshest and pleasantest nook of the club parlor Bramwell would go back into the far past of his memory for anecdotes of his aunts. One had once been a trifle comely, and of her her nephew never wearied of telling pathetic stories. He would act out a little scene, for instance, where she had come to him and informed him, with a lingonishing air, that she had dropped her left handkerchief in the next room, and had made a fruitless search for it. Percy would look very much mortification because she had not attended gallant to room to her. Then he would hasten to the room indicated, pick up the article, hand it as her with a flourish, and become imbued with the conviction that a law of nature had been violated in her remaining single.

Another choice bit of amusement was when Bramwell would tell about the aunt in Quaker gray and a tulle kerchief, who sometimes showed him a pale daguerreotype of a young person who was to have been hers, and whose terrestrial sojourn was unaccountably fulfilled in company with an entirely different individual. The aunt which, on such occasions, were shed at Bramwell's elbow, he always asserted, were inexplicably touching, and were never wiped from his susceptible memory.

His two remaining aunts were very plain in the face, and only knitted and cooked soul-cake, but they excited his pity no less than their sisters, and he often as a boy, in a reversed spirit his own authority, contemplated the scarecrow over the corn patch with serious thoughts of getting them to the house for the purpose of exposing his single relatives.

As for Bramwell's acquaintances, they were constantly coming up to him and telling him of engagements, real or invented, which greatly distressed him, and were sad to keep him quite of night. Mac Meyers had actually brought one evening as the club a delicate handkerchief, em-by recognized as one of Percy's editorial articles. Messrs swore to having begged it of the monomaniac, because it had been wet with tears before his very eyes, solely on account of an unattractive damsel whose fate Percy had determined to mourn—for he could not love her.

"Is there anyone in the club," asked Fred Durand at this, "who has the temerity of ill manners to tell Bramwell on sees would keep him if he offered himself?"

"But they would, you know," said Max. "He is a good fellow, and rich, and so refined as a piece of old ivory."

"He is a source of amusement, at any rate," yawned the "fat member," as James Fosby was called. "So don't let him get married yet a while."

One day, however, Bramwell came in and announced his own engagement at last. It was to a Miss Fanny Chiltenham. He did not seem much disconcerted that the club men present showed remarkable sobriety upon the occasion. Everybody looked down at the floor or up in the air, and remained unusually solemn.

"Isn't this a little sudden?" ventured Fred Durand, drawing down the corners of his mouth as he lounged back in an arm-chair.

"The circumstances are very peculiar," remarked Bramwell. "Swansee knew to a cousin of Miss Chiltenham's, and may possibly know the unusual articles of the agreement. If so, I have no doubt he will bear me out in saying that I have not very much compromised my usual views upon the subject of engagements."

"Bramwell is right, of course," cried the gay member appealed to, and at the same time jumping up and coloring, and suddenly slipping out of the room, and then trying to smother a laugh in the vestibule, at the bell door.

"My good fellows," says Bramwell, gently, noticing their constrained silence, "you must not be depressed. I desire to invite you all to dinner at six, and you will find me the same man I have ever been. Come, don't look up other appointments, but join me in the best the club can offer, by means of an humble follower, Percy Bramwell, bachelor." With a wave of his hat, glove, and cane in one slender hand, he departed, as he said, in order to give directions about some particular wines.

There was a great slapping of knees and tossing of small objects when Bramwell was not at the room, augmented by Swansee, who returned as soon as he found the coast was clear, and waltzed up and down the apartment, talking all the time.

"I would not have told you, you know," he said, reversing, rattling off, and coming back again, "if it had not been a scheme for curing the poor fellow of his craze. He really has been too much afraid of interesting young ladies to become interested in anybody himself. Of course there is no need of doing a kind action with a glum face, so we might as well laugh over it."

"Do stop twirling, my dear fellow," said fat Fosby, panting. "What with all this laughter and your untiring steps, I am all of a twitter. Well, here comes Dan Rostervelt, and I'll wager he don't know a word about it yet."

"About what?" chimed in Rostervelt, with a sigh. He was a dark, heavy man, who required much instruction before he could grasp situations.

"You must enter into a serious contract not to grumble at our frivolity," said Max Meyer, coming up.

"You're a parcel of children, and I can't for swear myself about time," growled Rostervelt. "I can't think why I succeed such a juvenile club as this is, anyway."

Suffice it to say here that their commiseration was based upon Bramwell's desire to divorce his brother-cum to every girl he became acquainted with, and not his sense of being bound to one special young lady. We will transfer ourselves to the parlor of the Misses Swansee, whose two cousins, Miss Chiltenham and her brother, were visiting them from a neighboring town.

Fanny was a very pretty girl, with a great aptitude for many things, and the result of this circumstance in her case was an endless fund of spirits. She was an retiring and gentle as possible when she was in earnest, or when her feelings were touched, but at the same time seemed to have a little warmth of heart. Her brother Will was a year or an younger than herself, and not at all like her, being dark haired and olive-skinned, while she was fairer, with light brown eyes.

The young people were in the parlor with the exception of Swansee, who really did have business to attend to every day, although he had not long been out of college. The three young ladies, it was evident, were trying to train Will in some role with which they had invented him.

"Yes see, you rogue of a cousin, you must be quite perfect, dejected and all that sort of thing, or Mr Bramwell will find out the whole farce too soon. You are a model actor, of course, but if you laugh with your eyes or your nose you might as well do it with your whole face. Kristi says that Mr Bramwell is so fond," The speaker was Bessie Swansee, Will's particular crony.

"I don't know about Mr. Bramwell's not being a fool," said Fanny, with a burst of merriment. "I never saw such a ridiculous proposal as he made me in my life, and I believe it is going to last me for a joke as long as I can remember." Upon this Fanny gave herself up to every imaginable aggravation of fun and frolic.

Will was made to pose intrinsically, and roll his eyes, and sob, and glance from under his lashes, and smile fascinatingly over his shoulder, and mope in corners.

"Well, see thing is certain, and it is that I must learn not to laugh in my skirts and sig," announced Will. "They will make me go off at once if I don't get used to wearing them in a dead fade parlor."

"You can't have them till they come back from the dressmaker's, goose," said Milly Swansee, reprovingly. "I hope all our trouble in acting your role will turn out successful. Of course I will tone down the light of the drawing room on the eventful day of Mr. Bramwell's introduction to you."

"There he is, I think," whispered Bessie, going to the balustrade of the stairs and looking down into the hall. "I am sure I hear his measured tones asking for Miss Chiltenham. Fanny, why are you not flying down-stairs to meet Mr. Bramwell?"

"Dear me," said she in answer, "how frequently it comes round! Just reflect, this is the first visit since our engagement, and I am as calm as my tickle. And yet I don't like this part assigned me quite so much as I thought I should. I wonder how soon he will find out that we are all making fun of his hobby?"

When Fanny flasted down-stairs to receive Bramwell she began long before it was necessary to hold out her hand for the distant shake which was all she thought of permitting in the way of greeting.

They exchanged a few words, during which he gave her a bouquet of roses, and remarked that he was glad to see her put them on entirely in the shade by her own loveliness.

"Are you quite, quite sure," said she all at once, and sitting down upon the edge of her chair as if ready to burst away, "that you have not yet found I need the devotion of your life for than some other poor girl?"

"Oh, you are really too, too generous," murmured Percy, bowing. "You remind me most unflinchingly of the stipulations of my worship; but do you not know that it is dreadfully soon for me to think of another claim than your own? Nevertheless, I thank you. Your consideration for the demands of my conscience is unparalleled."

"It is so fortunate," rejoined Fanny, slipping a little farther upon her chair, since danger was not imminent from Mr Bramwell's earnestness of feeling, "that we could understand each other so quickly alone all this. It is hardly an engagement at all, you know, placed in this light."

"Yes, yes, an engagement, Miss Fanny," replied Bramwell, with great decision, as that Fanny almost dropped her heavy bouquet. "Do not let yourself become vague upon that point. But of course if any one were brought forward by Fate as more hopelessly intended for me than you are, I should have to consider the case. Women are a great responsibility. I have naturally but one heart to give to the end. The end is the thing, and I sometimes wonder how I am to get there. Meantime, here is a token of my regard and sincere preference, which I trust you will let me place upon your finger."

"I have not the slightest objection," cried Fanny, smiling disingenuously deep, and holding out her graceful arm.

Bramwell held out his hand too, as if with as much contempt for sentiment as she, and dragged a rather large old-fashioned ring from her finger up.

"That is an Egyptian turquoise which I believe to seven thousand years old," he remarked, coughing.

"Are you interested in antiques, then?" asked Fanny, and thought as she spoke of the four ancient ones she so disliked on, and of whom she had said

"I am extremely anything that is very old or many [illegible] plain Percy." You see, I am the descendant of many [illegible] ancestors and I am difficult to suit in particulars. The items and the report I can easily accept as authentic and genuine; and as for the cloth, it is quite the most [illegible] dressing. I don't know but that I find it much [illegible] to be foolish as to a virgin, but I is tantalizing not to be able to make it after an date and qualities are ascertained."

"You dance very well for a person of so little [illegible]," said Fanny, kindly. "As drawing changes frequently, I suppose you have not so limited a subject of the steps your ancestors took down the centre in old times. I should not accuse besides, it was did not do yourself justice what you say, but were really a very pleasant companion indeed."

"I really do hope you will find me so," exclaimed Bramwell, abruptly, looking up from the top of his [illegible]

"If you give me time—but you making a change of sentiments," responded Fanny, hesitating, but hinging to go on with more impertinence. "The next time you call it may be all over with our engagement, because it all depends upon a third person."

"Ah, Miss Fanny, there it is again! Your clearness of mind fills me with enthusiasm, your love of truth set exalts my esteem for your peerless self. If by our next meeting," he added, rising, "I have been forced to contemplate the possibility of transferring my allegiance to another—one, no doubt, less fair—still I shall never be able to think of you without a warmer glow of the heart than I now feel for any one else. If the terror of our days can on in unanimosion, without the shadow of change, happy shall I be, as happy I am; happy now and forever."

"Mercy!" murmured Fanny, astonished.

Bowing low over his shining hat and cane, Percy withdrew. He left his [illegible] with gleaming eyes, her cane buried in the bouquet of roses, and her face trembling to convey her as soon as possible to the corner of a lounge, into which she flung herself for a long laugh.

Thereafter she went upstairs, and showed the most the quaint old ring, but somehow she had got over laughing, and was as quiet as a mouse.

The young people all made up their minds that the next time Bramwell called they would bear as much amusement as possible out of Fanny's engagement, especially as they intended so to arrange matters that the young man would break it then and there of his own free will.

Will Chiltenham, whom Percy had never seen, by special forethought, was dressed in a hand some gown of her brother in and design than those he had been accustomed to wear at college, as pretty girl, in the dramatic performances of his society. His wig was so perfect that he was frightened when he looked into the pier glass, and came very near throwing up the whole thing lest he should by any chance turn into a creature with long hair, he said.

"I used to be delighted with thorough costumes," he protest, "but this is too complete altogether. Look here! I believe you girls nowadays can have your beauty all your own way, if you can do this for me."

"Don't be so proud," cried Bessie Swansee, "until you have won the turquoise off Fanny's finger."

The young lady in question went down to the drawing room once more in execution her betrothed, and the dropped him a rather humorous courtesy.

He stepped forward to meet her, and kissed her hand. Fanny did not like this piece of familiarity; but she was instantly engrossed by fancying that Bramwell looked quite funereal; and on she said the word in her own mind he pulled out a card with a deep black edge, and the content that he was in black from top to toe.

"What can have happened?" she said, starting. "I did not dare to send up my present card, but I should give you such a touch," he explained. "But this wide band of black denotes a heavy bereavement. My aunts are dead."

Fanny became dizzy. At last she stammered: "You do startle me terribly. Dear me! did any one ever before have so many aunts all at once, and lose them so suddenly? But really I am very, very sorry. Oh, how can you bear it? Oh, I must run and tell the others."

"Not for suicide," cried Bramwell, energetically, lifting his hand, which held the inseparable little cane, to stay her in her flight. "A great anxiety is off my mind. I no longer mourn their lonely existences. I assure you, my dear Fanny, that I will compose myself as cheerfully as I can. Do not spare any means of encouraging and enlivening me."

Now by this time Fanny was to have told Bramwell of the advent in the house of a very melancholy friend of hers, of whose circumstances she thought it her duty to inform him, since this young woman might prove to be the long-expected and long-dreaded object of his disinterested devotion.

But Will, who was to slip in at about this time, suddenly appeared, bemused and excited, without Fanny's having the least desire to carry out her former intention. Will did not understand his sister's hesitating manner, and had to make the best of it. So he said,

"Oh, Fanny, you are actually too ashamed of your poor relations to introduce her to Mr Bramwell!"

As Fanny knew that the only help now was to keep Percy in entire ignorance of the joke in order to avoid set her down as heartless fiend, retire, in view of those aunts, she came for ward and

After introducing Percy, she told him that the young lady was a dear friend of Miss Maud Wilbur, who had come to the city for a short visit.

"But she had [illegible]" Fanny went on, and then spoiled it, and Miss Wilbur [illegible] with little relevancy.

"Oh I never can't suffered like every one else with a nasty affection [illegible] I can't [illegible]," and fell faint upon visits. I shall soon die. How sorry that will be! Oh!"—the young lady had slid down upon an ottoman placed beside Bramwell—"do not think me and I may will ever know the sorrows of heart-ache? I am very sure that can never be so I hear you have a truly [illegible] again, Mr Bramwell. Oh, do tell me where you got it! Was it by reading Don Quixote? Boo, after all, I believe he was rather a failure. I do fancy such. If [illegible] people don't need to do it, but I need to, and, moreover, when I have an health rest a few dresses for myself, I really think I [illegible] not about wearing my living. We can't all make, you know. That is what I am told the papers are saying."

"I [illegible] am to be [illegible] can speak in this strain," said Percy. "How is it, Fanny, my dear, that at the very threshold of our engagement we meet on such a pathetic example of my worst imaginings? Miss Wilbur, look on me, now how perfectly content we are, and take courage for your own future." Percy strained his mustache vigorously, and then took out his handkerchief, looked on it as if wondering whether or no he would weep into it, and put it back in his pocket.

"You mock me!" exclaimed Miss Wilbur, with startling emphasis. "But do not let my miserable life-history interrupt the quiet flow of your spring-time days. Ah, Fanny, I congratulate you from my heart, broken as it is. I was betrothed with an opal, you with a turquoise. Does that make any difference?"

"Of course it does, Maud," cried Swansee, stepping into the room. "Next time take another stone, and the same man will answer just as well."

"Swansee!" remonstrated Bramwell, "you must remember that we are in the presence of suffering."

"I'll leave it to your care, if there is any one to be taken," cried Ernest. "You've always talked about some nonsense for fourth damsels. I've no doubt Fan will let you off if you hold her to her agreement."

"Mr Bramwell is himself in poor spirits," put in Fanny, gently. "He has lost, Ernest"—but she was afraid they would all laugh if she called up the images of the four spinsters, so she soon dared about. "He seems to much alarm—we must speak more considerately—don't you see Mr Bramwell's mourning?"

"Dear me," said Ernest. "Bramwell hasn't got no mourning, child. But are any of your relations gone, old fellow? I know you been none very near."

"My aunts were very near, I have told you, my dear Swansee. And they are no more. All gone." Bramwell looked into his hat, and Will and Ernest had time to choke down their laughter a little.

"It sounds like a May morning," muttered the latter in the Sophomore's ear; and then Maud Wilbur had to retire to a stained glass window, or faint. "Bear up, Bramwell," added Swansee, aloud. "And here come the rest of the girls to help us put a better face on it."

"What a party we make when we are all together!" laughed Milly as she joined them, with Bessie at her side. "Don't think us impudent, Mr Bramwell; we wish to see a little of you, of course. Since we have Miss Wilbur with us, too, we must try to be more sociable—Maud, why are you away off there?"

"Maud is quite right to stay there," objected Fanny to Milly's motion; and she went over to where the stately figure stood, with its puffings of material and Pompadour ruff.

Milly and Bessie devoted themselves to the guest of honor. After a few minutes that Bessie said, in if involuntarily, "Poor Maud Wilbur! how dreadful she stands there!"

"I could give anything to see one of her old radiant smiles, wouldn't you, Milly," Ernest put in.

Maud put her hand round Fanny's waist as they conversed apart.

As for Bramwell, he began to fidget with his gloves, and soon got up.

"Oh, we must see dear you away," exclaimed Milly. "But we were going to beg you to stay to lunch. We young people are all alone to-day, and it is so hard for us to find ourselves free from concerts and everything, and how many of us are there? One, two, three—"

Maud was putting her hand on Fanny's shoulder now, and Bramwell strode up to her, and rapped her fiercely as the knuckles with his cane.

"I beg your pardon, sir," he blurted

"What the mischief do you mean by banging at my knuckles?" demanded Will, in his wig and gown, shouldering up to Bramwell, while Swansee gave merriment the reins.

"Because you're a rascally jackanapes, and I'll be obliged to you to come where I can flog you," replied Percy, in an even voice. "Don't dare to go near Miss Chiltenham." He slid his cane across Will's side as if it were a foil.

"Come, Will, you'd better pull up your going and your wig at the same time," roared Swansee, overpowered by Chiltenham's contradictory appearance. "Somehow or other, Bramwell has come out of the big end to-day."

"Why, Mr. Bramwell, what does this mean?" interpolated Fanny, as frightened as natural. "How could you ever find out my brother as soon in the role of that forlorn young creature?"

"Ride! ride! ride!" cried Bramwell, to a pet with everybody. "Do you suppose you young folks here are the only persons who take roles? Don't I pretend to having and losing a set of aunts I never saw in my life for the sake of hearing those ridiculous rich fellows? And do you suppose, Swansee that I can see in an earnest under a little rubbish of oddity, and that I can not tell a Sophomore when I see him, like this, in yards of silk and lace? Pshaw!"

"Oh, dear me!" sobbed Fanny, coming up and holding out the turquoise ring, "how we have all off-lulled you! But here is this, and it was only a joke, anyway, which I trust you will pardon."

Percy Bramwell looked from her to the ring, and back again. "Oh no," he said, "that's all settled."

Fanny was spell-bound.

"This is terrible," gasped Milly.

"Indeed it is" exclaimed Bessie.

Miss Wilbur had stopped off some moments ago.

"Now, I'll tell you, Percy, that's not fair," said Swansee, getting up from his chair. "Take back the ring, you know."

"You really must," said Fanny, brokenly. "I'm dreadfully tired of this folly, and—"

"It is no folly to me, Miss Chiltenham," said Bramwell, trying not to laugh. "I did not ask your brother's permission to pay you my addresses in any expectation of giving you up—if I won you. I am sorry if you so understood it."

"I did indeed," cried Fanny, beginning to get angry. "And, besides, I am interested in some one—"

"But you know very well you were expected to turn off fiancée after fiancée," remonstrated Bessie, stepping up with sparkling eyes.

Bramwell raised both hands in mock despair at all their beseeching.

"But it is the facie of the moment that we are to deal with," he pleaded in his turn, glancing in a very different way from formerly at Fanny's perplexed face. "Just let me have a word with Miss Fanny, and I'll talk to you all afterward."

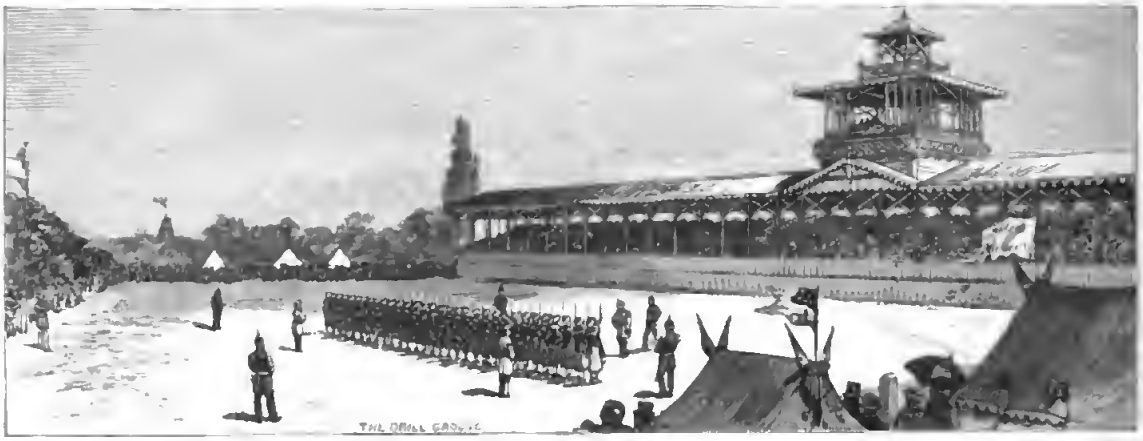
"I might as well die at once," muttered his betrothed. And then she clasped her [illegible] with a revulsion of feeling. "Oh no, I will [illegible]" she cried, in the utmost glee. "Mr Bramwell, consider yourself [illegible]"

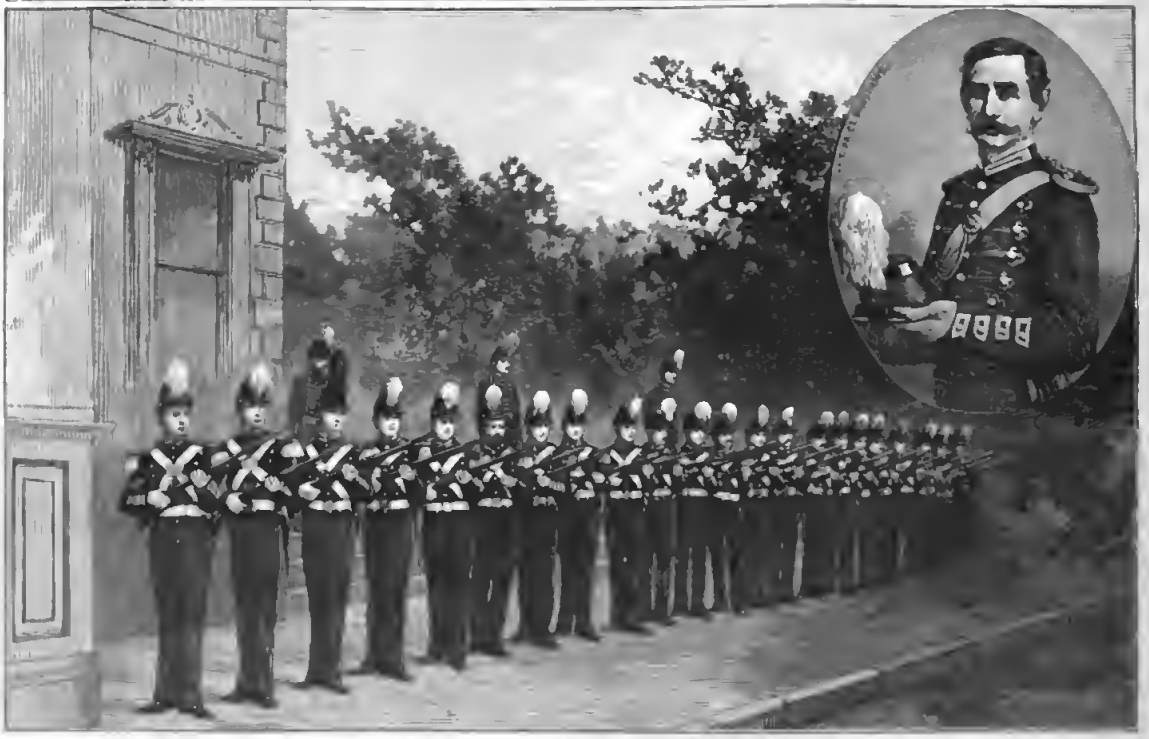
"I don't know about that," [illegible] Swansee, who had been in a brown study. "Don't let us go into anything else without due deliberation. But we will decide it all after lunch, and when Will has got out of his frills and feathers, and can give advice to his sister. Come, Milly, order a royal repast and a loving cup, and we will sit down amicably to table, while Bramwell tells us stories of his ancestors—twenty-four grandparents to a generation, and all that. By Jove, though, I don't [illegible] see that he a truthful man!"

"You've been at open with me," replied Bramwell, curling [illegible]

Rose Hawthorne Lathrop.

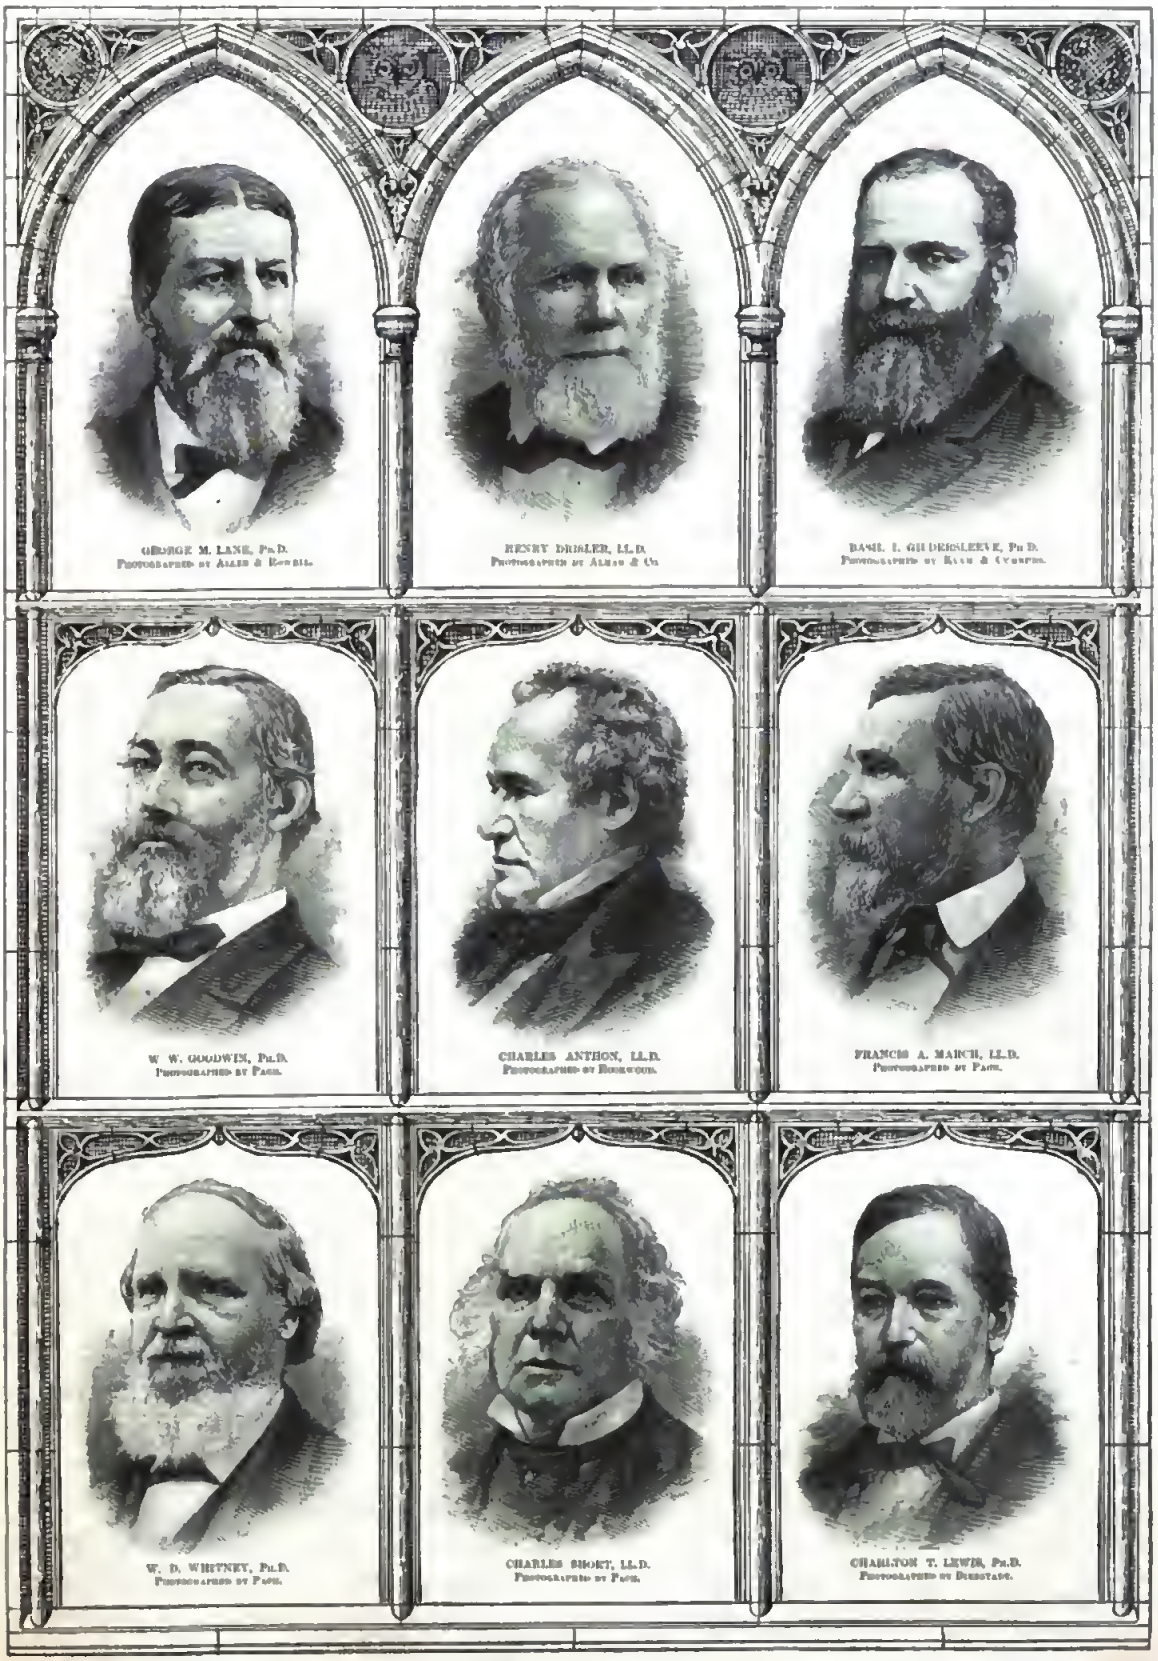
Digitized by Google





THE MOBILE RIFLES, COMMANDED BY CAPTAIN PRICE WILLIAMS.

THE COMPETITIVE DRILL AT NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE.—From Sketches by Horace Bradley.—[See Page 356.]



GEORGE M. LANE, PH.D.
PHOTOGRAPHED BY ALLEN & RUSSELL.

HENRY DRISLER, LL.D.
PHOTOGRAPHED BY ALLEN & CO.

BASIL L. GILDERSLEEVE, PH.D.
PHOTOGRAPHED BY KLEIN & CHAPMAN.

W. W. GOODWIN, PH.D.
PHOTOGRAPHED BY PAGE.

CHARLES ANTHON, LL.D.
PHOTOGRAPHED BY BOURGOIN.

FRANCIS A. MARCH, LL.D.
PHOTOGRAPHED BY PAGE.

W. D. WHITNEY, PH.D.
PHOTOGRAPHED BY PAGE.

CHARLES SHORT, LL.D.
PHOTOGRAPHED BY PAGE.

CHARLTON T. LEWIS, PH.D.
PHOTOGRAPHED BY DUBOSTAGE.

SOME AMERICAN PHILOLOGISTS.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

PROGRESS OF GREEK PHILOLOGY IN THE UNITED STATES.

The Greeks were wont to extend the practice of the healing art beyond the diseased individual to the diseased body-politic. Among them it was no uncommon thing, when a state was fallen into any disorder, or weakness, or organic trouble, to call upon some philosopher to make the diagnosis of the disease and to prescribe the remedy. Thus of Plato especially we are told that his practice upon such states was large and remunerative. And surely if there be any certainty on the processes and results of philosophy, it might well be on the power of a wise and well trained intelligence, acting upon philosophic principles, to discover in a disordered state the seat and cause of its malady, and by the application of proper remedies to remove, or at least to palliate, its troubles.

Had some such man, a modern Plato, standing to the knowledge and thought of our time as Plato stood to the knowledge and thought of his, been called upon to make a diagnosis of the mental state of the American people in the first quarter of this century, and to prescribe for its ailments, he would have found his patient suffering from grave and repulsive disorders. And the wise physician's sense of the gravity of the case would have been deepened by seeing the sick man's utter unconsciousness of all disease, his fantastic self-complacency, his most probable in the very symptoms of his disease as the proofs of his robust and vigorous vitality. Such a physician, in studying the condition of his big and unruly patient, would have seen too many evils, indeed, and disorders too complicated, to admit of any brief or simple classification. But to the main the troubles of his patient, the American people about 1825, might have been reduced by analysis to three three: In the first place, the physician would have seen that the action of the American mind, as compared with the contemporary mind of England, Germany, and France, was marked by exceeding feebleness and narrowness of movement. Thought was exercised on very few subjects, and outside of some practical problems there was in all the higher ranges of speculative thought either no action of the popular mind at all, or else action of the feeblest kind and within the narrowest limits. In the second place, our physician, in studying the American literature as the expression of the American mind, would have seen that this literature, apart from its deficiencies in matter and thought, was marked by the absence of artistic form, by a crudity and shapelessness that robbed it of artistic worth. Both in the poetry and in the prose of the time, whatever the intellectual vigor or the strength of feeling and conviction that were present, there was, with few exceptions, no feeling and no forming touch of genuine art. In the third place, our physician, in watching the phases of inner American life, would have seen this life deformed and disordered by the most violent intolerance of opinion on all the great questions that agitate, and must always agitate, human societies. To be orthodox in religion according to the narrow canons of an unintelligent provincial orthodoxy, to be orthodox in politics up to the point of accepting even the abuses of our own system as the best possible form of social organization, to be orthodox in conduct and behavior up to the point of eating, dressing, feeling, thinking, and living according to the standard of one's neighbors—this was the condition of living happy, or even safe, in an American community. Society seemed in grave peril of stifling all variety of excellence, and of settling down into one dead level of ugly and uncultured monotony. Foreign observers of us and our ways, however friendly they might be, began to fear lest under the pressure of this intolerant and illiberal majority rule the play of mind might be forever crushed, and the rise and growth of a mature and art made impossible.

Before such a state of things, in the presence of this narrowness and ugliness and fierce intolerance of American life, what could have been the course to be taken by our imaginary physician, the treatment to be recommended, the prescription to be given? By what remedial means might he have sought to deal with the mental and moral disorders of his patient, to give breadth and range to his thinking, artistic form to his intellectual creation, generosity and tolerance and sweetness to his social life? Had such a physician been called in, his prescription for the American people, we think, his remedy for its worst ailments, would have been a course of study in Greek literature and a severe training in Greek philology. In the crisis of our national life, as in all the great crises of man's intellectual history, Hellenism, the genius of the Greek spirit, was the power to be invoked in order to bring light into dark places, health into diseased and disordered civilization.

The prompting of nature, the craving of a few thoughtful men, did for us the very thing that such a wise critic of our disorders might have prescribed for our condition. An acute student of literature, Mr Sharp, in his life of Dante Rossetti, has traced, indeed, the nineteenth century renaissance of England to the medieval revival in religion and in art that began about 1833. But on the United States our renaissance was due not to any revival of mediævalism, but to the revival of Greek studies and of Greek philology. The mental impulse that was needed came to the educated youth of our land from the fervid inspiration of a few widely scattered professors of Greek, from students of Greek philology, who had caught the breath of the great philological revival in Germany, and who transmitted the flush of those great ideas from their German teachers to their American pupils.

In this, as in all great movements of thought, the common feeling of the need to be supplied and of the danger to be averted led more isolated workers, without communion and even without knowledge of one another's work, to press forward in the same spirit and toward the same goal. In the city of New York, Dr Anthon, Professor of Greek at Columbia since 1820, himself a German by parentage, took the lead in bringing the views and results of the best German philology to bear upon American education; both by his own teaching and by his many books, and especially by training his illustrious pupil Dr Drisler, he did a work of far reaching results in the spread of classical learning. In the University of Virginia, Dr Harrison, Professor of Greek since 1826, armed with enthusiasm to the study of the German philology, and one perhaps the first of American teachers to penetrate into the full meaning of Bopp's great achievement, and to use the results of the comparative grammar for the exploration of the structure and syntax of the Greek and Latin. At Harvard, Dr Felton prepared the way for the solid and sagacious Greek scholarship of Dr Goodwin. At Yale, Dr Woolsey and Dr Hadley made their Greek school the centre of a Greek revival that swept over many States. In the West, at a somewhat later time, Dr. Boise built up a school of vigorous Hellenism in the University of Michigan, and in 1856 Dr Gildersleeve, coming fresh from his Greek studies in Germany, began at the University of Virginia that lofty and acute method of Greek study which has given shape and direction to the philological movement in all Southern institutions.

Since the days when Dr Anthon and Dr Harrison began their fateful work of inoculating the crude American schools with the Greek learning and the philological method of Germany, more than half a century has passed. In these fifty years Greek culture in America has been slowly and steadily advancing. In Greek scholarship itself, as proved by the last editions of Liddell and Scott's great Lexicon, to which the labors of Donaldson, Gildersleeve, and Goodwin have given its peculiar value, the best of our American scholars have shown a precision and perfection of method unsurpassed in the world. But outside of Greek scholarship itself, by the direct and the indirect action of Greek culture upon our educated classes, the influence of the Greek spirit upon the national thought, and upon the spirit and form of the national literature, has been distinct and vitalizing. Under that masterful influence the faults and weaknesses that marred the intellectual life and the social life of our people are fading out of sight. Instead of being narrow and feeble in mental action, the educated mind of America may now claim, in comparison with the French, the German, or English mind, to be singularly wide and generous in its sweep of thought and in its range of discussion. Nay, against many phases of American literature the charge may be reasonably made that in their width of range they are becoming too cosmopolitan, and too thoroughly denationalized. And, again, in the structure of our best American literature, both in prose and in poetry, however much may still be lacking in the forces of creative genius, the striving after artistic perfection of literary form is carried to the pitch of an almost fastidious daintiness. Most important of all, as the noblest result of the Greek spirit upon our culture and civilization, in our social life the old intolerance of opinion has given way to a spirit of toleration in religion, politics, and customs that is unsurpassed on earth. In the same communities where fifty years ago life was made intolerable to all that had the bad luck to differ from their neighbors in any of their opinions or practices, the foreign observer may now find a broad and generous toleration that is often mistaken for laxity or indifference. Thus, in all directions, after fifty years of penetrative and widely spreading action, the Greek spirit emanating from the study of Greek literature is beginning not only to mould the intellectual life of the American people, but to give artistic form to its literature, and sweetness and liberality to its social feelings and its manners.

In this revival of Greek learning the Hellenists of America have been forced by the circumstances of their lives to follow a path of their own, and to give to our American scholarship a peculiar kind of excellence. Those scholars, living apart from the great libraries and museums of the world, and knowing but at second hand the manuscripts and art remains of Greece, have, of course, been able to do very little in archæology, in epigraphy, or in the higher criticism. Those branches of Greek philology they have left to the more fortunately situated scholars of Europe. But this narrowing in their range on the one side of philology has led, by the concentration of their studies, to an unsurpassed excellence on the other. If the text of the ancient writers has been in the main fixed by the scholars of Europe, and especially of Germany, the scholars of America may claim to have gone as far as the furthest in fixing the meaning of these texts by the scientific system of interpretation, and in the classification of the facts of language by the logical analysis.

To know the Greek language means, at last, to know an almost infinite number of facts, and to import a scientific knowledge of those facts means to invent a system of classification by which the knowledge of them may be most easily acquired and most easily retained. In this process of classifying the facts of the Greek language, the facts of inflection and word use and syntax, the supremely practical mind of the American has achieved one of its chief triumphs. Here the American philology may fairly claim a certain degree of superiority over the philology of Germany itself. In the scientific classification of the facts the best American workmanship is as perfect in its Greek lexicography and its Greek grammar to in a sewing machine or a patent reaper. The problem here is not so much to add new knowledge as knowledge already won as to present the sum of ascertained facts in the clearest possible light by the best possible system of arrangement and classification. From this point of view Dr Goodwin's Moods and Tenses may be taken as representative of the best American workmanship. As such it has been accepted and welcomed even in Europe. In no other book, perhaps, are the complicated facts with which this book deals so clearly presented and so ably classified for the student's use as in this masterpiece of practical American philology.

And in another domain of Greek philology the sharp analytic power of the American mind has been as nobly demonstrated as in the domain of the logical classification. The study of Greek syntax as remodelled by the philosophy of evolution becomes a historical science of the noblest type, and the historical discussion of the problems of syntax rises into view as the crowning glory of the philological method. The syntax presents itself no longer as an infinite mass of facts to be analyzed and grouped by the logical method, but as an organic growth in which the later forms of the sentence are to be explained from the earlier by the historical method. To follow the laws of this growth onward from the structure of the Homeric sentence to the fullness of the Demosthenic must period, to show how the usage of the later has been developed from the usage of the earlier time, and how the exquisite perfection of the Attic prose has arisen by natural selection from the forms of the epic of the lyric and dramatic poetry, this is the problem that now lies before the Greek philologian—a problem of transcendent interest and importance. And in the study of this problem it may be boldly claimed that the Greek philology of America has won its highest distinction, and that the method and results of Dr Gildersleeve's historical analysis have done more than has been done anywhere else to make the solution of this problem possible.

THE NEW GREEK LEXICON.*

Readers of Barchester Towers will perhaps remember Mr. Tom Staple, who, though universally known by a species of nomenclature so very undignified, was tutor of "St Lazarus," Oxford, and maintained a very high dignity in that ancient university. To the mind of Mr Staple a natural sanctity attached itself to Oxford and everything Oxonian, and the thought that any outsider should seek to share in matters belonging peculiarly, and as he believed exclusively, to his alma mater, was an gall and wormwood to his lordly soul. The easy profanity which had begun even in his day to discuss certain academical Elevinian mysteries was to him, indeed, as bad as death. Mr Staple, in short, had fallen on troublous times, yet managed in some sort to keep up his courage by the help of a certain pipe of old port which had been brought into the cellars of "St Lazarus" in his own undergraduate days, and which was understood to constitute one of the chief attractions of that venerable college. At any rate, these pering outsiders, who had the hardihood to criticise the doings of deans and wire-eyed heads of colleges, were native-born Englishmen. That "those Americans" should one day push their way within the sacred circle which separated Oxford from the outlying barbaric world, and as thought too monstrous to have suggested itself to the tutor of St. Lazarus even in his most penitentiary mood.

Alas for the Tom Staples and other unyielding Catos of a by gone time! While these loyal tutors have been dozing over their port in the common room, the deans and masters have held themselves aloof. They have kept their eye upon Cambridge, whose classical examiners ten years ago recommended to candidates for honors the "Greek Moods and Tenses" of our of "those Americans," nor have they been unobservant of the strange sight, witnessed more recently on the Cam, of eager gownsmen thronging the lecture-room of a young American discoursing with brilliant learning on Greek art. Doubtless the Tom Staples chuckled over all this and enjoyed Mr Lowell's joke, at the Cantabs' expense, in regard to the importation of dead meat and a live professor, reminding each other that it has always been as from the days of Erasmus, who formed Greek at Oxford and taught it at Cambridge.

But not on the deans and other dignitaries. Charles Astor Bristed tells us that, as far back as his time, in the mutual "chaff" between the rival universities, the Cantabs had to yield Oxford's boast as to her Latin and her "Liddell and Scott."

The Tom Staples may now, indeed, turn their faces to the wall and die, for, curiously enough, these are precisely the penetralia into which the Oxford dons, in the spirit of true scholars, have welcomed their transatlantic brethren with graceful acknowledgment and generous cordiality.

Two years ago the syndicate of the Clarendon Press placed the supervision of Oxford on a Latin lexicon compiled exclusively by two American scholars (Dr. Charlton T Lewis and Professor Charles Short), which the foremost Oxford Latinist, Professor Nettleship, cordially welcomed as "a real advance on any previous Latin-English dictionary"—a judgment which found even more emphatic utterance on the part of his illustrious colleague, Professor J. E. B. Mayor, Regius Professor of Latin in the University of Cambridge.

And now hard on this, comes a new edition of their famous "Liddell and Scott," which to a notable degree owns the reason of its being, as the French say, to the work of American scholars, whose labors have been gracefully and heartily acknowledged by the veteran English lexicographers.

As to this last, let us briefly consider what has been done.

Forty years have passed since the first edition of this great lexicon, "based on the German work of Francis Passow," was issued. Among English-speaking scholars its success was marked and instant. It at once took the rank, which the unabridged labors of the editors have steadily maintained, of being the best Greek-English Lexicon in existence. The fourth edition, published in 1855, omitted the name of Passow from its title-page, because, in the language of the editors, "additional materials had been incorporated from so many and various sources that as our name could fairly claim that position." In doing this they but followed the example of Passow himself, who, after a third edition, omitted the name of Schneider from his title-page. With still greater force did the argument apply to the fifth edition (1861), which owed heavy obligations to the great Curtius Thesaurus (then nearing completion), as well as to the Greek German Lexicon of Rost and Palm, and to other lexicographical sources.

In 1880 the sixth edition appeared, revised throughout, and, though brevity was studied, augmented by one-eighth in the number of its pages. This increase was largely due to the fact that for the first time the forms of the verb were treated with adequate thoroughness, the admirable work of Dr Veitch (Greek Verbs, Irregular and Defective) being laid under contribution to this end. Furthermore, the editors, recognizing the fact that the "new science" of Comparative Philology had made prodigious strides since the appearance of their first edition, determined to recast the whole of the etymological part of their work. For the first edition they had used the Etymologische Forschungen of Pott. This was now discarded, and the first edition of Curtius's Grundzüge der griechischen Etymologie was substituted as the basis of their etymological labors.

To the curious Molloyist nothing accentuates more sharply the immense advance made among English scholars in the accurate study of Greek during the quarter of a century between 1843 and 1869 than a comparison between the first and sixth editions of this lexicon. That such advance was owing to closer study of German methods and results is clearly reflected in the labors of the Oxford lexicographers. Accepting from the first the truth of Strauss's proud dictum that "the road to Greece lies through Germany," they have continued with scholarly vigilance to adopt and incorporate into their work the results achieved by the great scholars of the Fatherland. Thus the sixth edition not only marked a distinct advance over his predecessors in verbal matter and correction, but made good its claim as the standard Greek lexicon for English-speaking people by presenting (unevenly, it is true, and not always satisfactorily) the results achieved in the ancillary sciences of lexicography—orthography, etymology, syntax, archæology, and mythology. In short, the whole cycle of philological study found a place in its pages, and despite unevenness of execution and a lack of consistency in minute matters, the work approached a degree of lexicographic completeness which did infinite credit to the painstaking care and industry of the editors.

Fourteen years have passed since the appearance of the sixth edition, and once more the veteran editors, animated by the same love of Greek learning, the same spirit of determined scholarship, offer to us a new edition of their great work —"the last," they say, simply, "we can hope to see published."

Of all that has been achieved during these years bearing directly and indirectly on lexicography, this is not the place to speak. Brief as has been the interval, there has arisen within the time a new school—"Junggrammatische Schule," distinctively called—in comparative philology, which, led by Verner, Karl Brugman, Collitz, and Johannes Schmitz, threatens the overthrow of results reached by the "old school," as the Jung-Grammatiker are pleased to term Georg Curtius and his disciples. Curtius himself has carried his Grundzuge to a fifth edition (1879), which now presents the final views of that great scholar. But apart from this, and not considering recent notable contributions made to Greek syntax, there has been in the time keen activity in every department of classical philology. MSS. have been discovered, codices, known imperfectly or to second-hand, have been carefully collated; texts, in consequence, have been put upon a surer basis, and disputed readings definitively settled; hundreds of words of doubtful origin have yielded up their etymological secret, while material of the highest import from every point of view has been rendered available by the publication of countless inscriptions previously unknown. It is scarcely too much to say that in this period of philological activity many famous Continental scholars have done the best work of their lifetime. In Germany, Bekker, Th Kock, Wieseler, Peppmuller, Steinhart, F Blass, Gustav Meyer, and Diederich; in Holland, Van Herwerden and the already illustrious Cobet; in France (where of recent years there has been a veritable renaissance of Hellenism), Graux, Egger, De Saulcy, and Max Weil—all these have achieved, in widely varying directions, results of the highest moment to classical philology, and of solid value to Greek lexicography.

That the editors of this seventh edition and their American coadjutors have kept fully abreast of these results is capable of easy verification by comparing it with the sixth edition, being, as we have done, a score of test words. We say "their American coadjutors," for those scholars who by reason of the scope and importance of their articles have alone been singled out for public acknowledgment are all Americans.

After stating that their own additions consist mainly of fuller references to the classical authors, and a free use of the Indices to the Berlin Aristotle and to the Corpus Inscriptionum Graecarum, the editors continue (in their preface): "We have gratefully to acknowledge the assistance rendered us by many scholars. More particularly must we mention the names of Pro-

* A Greek-English Lexicon. Compiled by Henry George Liddell, D.D., Dean of Christ Church, Oxford, and Robert Scott, D.D., Dean of Rochester, late Master of Balliol College, Oxford. Seventh Edition Revised and Augmented throughout, with the Co-operation of Professors Drisler, of Columbia College, New York. 4to, sheep. New York: Harper and Brothers, Franklin Square. 1883.

feasors Drisler, of New York; Goodwin, of Cambridge, Massachusetts; and Gildersleeve, of Baltimore. Professors Goodwin and Gildersleeve have rewritten several important articles, which their well-known grammatical learning makes peculiarly valuable; we may specify the articles on ἄν, εἰ, ἐάν, ἤν, ἵνα, ὅπως, ὅτι, ὅτου, οὐ, μή, and πρίν: the former has also supplied some excellent additions to Attic law terms, such as γραφὴ παρανόμων, ἀπογραφή, ἀνάκρισις, ἔνδειξις, ἀπαγωγή. Professor Drisler has gone carefully over the whole book, and there is hardly a page which does not bear some trace of his accurate observation."

None but those whose lives are spent in the study of the classics can be familiar companionship with lexicons, can adequately measure how much is implied in an acknowledgment such as this.

So varied and important have been the contributions of Dr. Donaldson that his name now fitly finds a place on the title-page. A comparison between the last and present editions evidences, indeed, that these contributions cover the whole alphabet, and are of every kind that comes under the head of lexicography. Errors of quantity, of accentuation, of reference, of definition, have been corrected, important matter has been added to imperfect articles, in other articles essential alterations have been made to bring them in accord with the latest results of philological criticism; a wealth of new references attests the breadth of his reading; many words have received a notable extension of meaning, while to his vigilant learning we owe the insertion of many new words omitted in all previous editions of the lexicon. Let any scholar compare in the sixth and seventh editions, under the single letter A, in the first twelve pages, for instances of various kinds, the articles on ἀ, ἀάριφος, ἀβροπος, ἀγαθός (in which we are glad to see that the identity of the word with German gut, English good, with a euphonic, based on Donaldson's New Cratylus, has been discarded, "for Greek g ought to be represented by Teutonic k"), ἀγαπᾶν, ἀγγεῖον, ἄγγος, ἀγορά—all enlarged and improved by Dr. Donaldson's contributions—and he will readily form some idea of the obligations of the new edition to the patient learning of the Nestor of American scholars.

But the acknowledgment means, in addition, that the English editors, keenly alive to the syntactical deficiencies of previous editions, have in great measure recast that portion of their work, seeking to meet more nearly in that direction also the requirements of modern scholarship. A neglect of this would, indeed, have proved a fatal error. The sixth edition was most vulnerable in the articles which undertook to deal with the more delicate points of Greek syntax. The treatment was in many cases inadequate, and in many more erroneous, being based upon antiquated English authorities. Happily this deficiency has been remedied to a very great extent by confiding the most important syntactical articles to the two illustrious American scholars mentioned along with Dr. Donaldson in the preface.

Dr. Gildersleeve has written the articles on εἰμί, ἐστί, ἔστιν, οὐ, μή, πρίν, ἄν, and, to a certain extent, the articles on οὐ μή and μὴ οὐ.

Dr. Goodwin, in addition to the articles on Attic law terms and kindred topics, has written the articles on εἰ, εἰ, ἐάν, ἤν, and ὅπως.

To attempt a comparison between the syntactical treatment in the old and new editions would require a separate article appropriate only to the pages of a philological review. Suffice it to say that of those new articles many are marked by the keenest philological instinct, and, by some happy turn of expression, convey with epigrammatic terseness the results reached by the most patient investigation. Some of these discussions, indeed, compressed within the compass of one or two pages (e. g., Dr. Gildersleeve's ἄν and μή, and Dr. Goodwin's ἄν), embody a treatment of delicate points of syntax more lucid and essentially more complete than can be found in any single book. It is to be regretted that in the discussions of ἄν and μή Dr. Gildersleeve's modesty forbade him to refer to his masterly monographs on "ἄν in the Attic Orators" and the "Encroachments of μή on οὐ in Later Greek," which have appeared in the American Journal of Philology. The sixth edition found room for copious references to such antiquated authorities as Jelf's Greek Grammar and hundred works, and surely with advantage such space might have been devoted in the new edition to directing the critical student to the pages of the Journal, which now ranks, the world over, among the chief authorities in comparative philology.

To our mind the editors might also with advantage have imitated Dr. Gildersleeve's syntactical investigations touching ἵνα and πρίν, both of which suggest in their present shape the Scriptural warning as to new wine and old bottles.

One other point, and we have done.

The editors tell us that they have been urged to incorporate all Proper Names in the lexicon, but that this would have "added so much to the bulk of a book already bulky enough that they were compelled to put aside the suggestion." In this, it seems to us, they have erred. By compression and a slight enlargement of the page (as compared with the sixth edition) the bulk of the volume has been reduced by ninety pages. Had the space thus saved been devoted to proper names, the ground in this respect might have been fairly well covered by observing a wise economy. Proper names are, after all, but common names, and to an etymologist the study of them is essential. No scholar expects or desires that under proper names should be found long historical or archæological disquisitions, which belong properly to dictionaries of biography and of antiquities. What every student really needs is simply a concise statement as to their etymology and variant forms, and a lexicon is the place in which he has a right to expect to find them. It must not be understood, however, that no proper names occur in the lexicon. On the contrary, many of them find a place, and some (e. g., Ζεύς and Ἡσίοδος) have long articles devoted to them. Still there has been no such consistent treatment of proper names on that which distinguishes Harper's Latin Lexicon, and the inconvenience still remains to the student of being driven to have in hand, when at work, two books of reference instead of one.

To say that mistakes still remain is to say that it is a lexicon. In a work of such magnitude it is inevitable that there should be errors in accentuation and etymon, slips in grammar, and a few explanations of linguistic phenomena which would be "unto the Greeks foolishness." Such has been the history of all great lexicons, and it would be idle to hope that this should prove the sole example of lexicographic perfection. Especially must it be remembered that the field of etymology is still a happy hunting ground where the Junge Grammatiker and the champions of the "old school" will for years to come take "pot-shots" at one another, to the perplexity of lexicographers and the despair of publishers who own stereotype plates.

Still, after all is said, the seventh edition of "Liddell and Scott" will be cordially welcomed by scholars as a noble and notable contribution to Greek learning, bearing throughout an impress of Grundlichkeit such as on Greek English lexicon has ever before attained, and the editors may be congratulated on having so improved upon their former labors (to borrow the boast of one the Master Thomas Cooper, prefixed to his *The*saurus printed nearly three centuries ago at Oxford), "ut nihil posse desyderare possint."

W. Gunion McCabe.

VALUABLE BOOKS FOR STUDENTS.

Student's Old Testament History.

The Old Testament History, from the Creation to the Return of the Jews from Captivity. By Philip Smith, B.A. Edited by William Smith, D.C.L., LL.D. With Maps and Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

Student's New Testament History.

The New Testament History. With an Introduction connecting the History of the Old and New Testaments. By Philip Smith, B.A. Edited by Wm. Smith, D.C.L., LL.D. With Maps and Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

Student's History of Greece.

A History of Greece, from the Earliest Times to the Roman Conquest. With Supplementary Chapters on the History of Literature and Art. By Wm. Smith, D.C.L., LL.D. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

Student's Cox's Greece.

A General History of Greece from the Earliest Period to the Death of Alexander the Great. With a Sketch of the Subsequent History to the Present Time. By George W. Cox, M.A. Maps and Plans. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

Student's Ancient History.

The Ancient History of the East, from the Earliest Times to the Conquest by Alexander the Great. Including Egypt, Assyria, Babylonia, Media, Persia, Asia Minor, and Phœnicia. By Philip Smith, B.A. Edited by Wm. Smith, D.C.L., LL.D. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

Student's History of Rome.

A History of Rome, from the Earliest Times to the Establishment of the Empire. With Chapters on the History of Literature and Art. By H. G. Liddell, D.D., Dean of Christ Church, Oxford. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

Student's Merivale's Rome.

A General History of Rome, from the Foundation of the City to the Fall of Augustulus, B.C. 753–A.D. 476. By Charles Merivale, D.D., Dean of Ely. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

Student's Gibbon.

A History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. By Edward Gibbon. Abridged, Incorporating the Researches of Recent Commentators. By Wm. Smith, D.C.L., LL.D. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

Student's Strickland's Queens.

Lives of the Queens of England, from the Norman Conquest. By Agnes Strickland. Abridged by the Author. Revised and Edited by Caroline G. Parker. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

Student's Hume.

A History of England, from the Earliest Times to the Revolution in 1688. Based on the History of David Hume. Incorporating the Corrections and Researches of Recent Historians. Continued to the Treaty of Berlin in 1878. New Edition, Revised and Corrected by J. S. Brewer, M.A. With an Appendix by an American Editor. Illustrated by Maps and Engravings on Wood. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

Student's History of France.

A History of France, from the Earliest Times to the Establishment of the Second Empire in 1852. By Rev. W. H. Jervis, M.A. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

Student's Hallam's Middle Ages.

A View of the State of Europe during the Middle Ages. By Henry Hallam, LL.D., F.R.A.S. Incorporating in the Text the Author's Latest Researches, with Additions from Recent Writers, and adapted to the Use of Students. By Wm. Smith, D.C.L., LL.D. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

Student's Hallam's Const. History.

The Constitutional History of England, from the Accession of Henry VII. to the Death of George II. By Henry Hallam, LL.D., F.R.A.S. Incorporating the Author's Latest Additions and Corrections, and adapted to the Use of Students. By Wm. Smith, D.C.L., LL.D. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

Student's History of Germany.

A History of Germany, from the Earliest Times. Founded on Dr. Dietrich Mueller's "History of the German People." By Charlton T. Lewis. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

Student's Lyell's Geology.

The Elements of Geology. By Sir Charles Lyell, Bart., F.R.S. 830 Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

Student's Classical Dictionary.

A Smaller Classical Dictionary of Biography, Mythology, and Geography. Abridged from the Larger Dictionary. By Wm. Smith, D.C.L., LL.D. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

Student's Ecclesiastical History.

The Student's Manual of Ecclesiastical History. A History of the Christian Church, from the Times of the Apostles to the Full Establishment of the Holy Roman Empire and the Papal Power. By Philip Smith, B.A. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

Harper's Cyclopædia of Poetry,

British and American. By Epes Sargent. Large 8vo, nearly 1000 pp., Half Leather, $5 00.

Mahaffy's Greek Education.

Old Greek Education. By J. P. Mahaffy, M.A. 16mo, Cloth, 75 cents.

Mahaffy's Greek Literature.

A History of Classical Greek Literature. By J. P. Mahaffy. 2 vols., 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

Simcox's Latin Literature.

A History of Latin Literature. From Ennius to Boethius. By George Augustus Simcox, M.A., Fellow of Queen's College, Oxford. In Two Volumes. 12mo, Cloth, $4 00.

Studies of the Greek Poets.

Studies of the Greek Poets. By John Addington Symonds. Revised and Enlarged by the Author. In Two Volumes. Square 16mo, Cloth, $3 50.

English Men of Letters.

English Men of Letters. Edited by John Morley. 12mo, Cloth, 75 cents per vol.

Volumes now ready:

Johnson.—Gibbon.—Scott.—Shelley.—Hume.—Goldsmith.—Defoe.—Burns.—Spenser.—Thackeray.—Burke.—Milton.—Hawthorne.—Southey.—Bunyan.—Chaucer.—Cowper.—Pope.—Byron.—Locke.—Wordsworth.—Dryden.—Landor.—De Quincey.—Lamb.—Bentley.—Dickens.—Gray.—Swift.—Sterne.—Macaulay.—Fielding.

Other volumes will be announced.

English Church History.

A History of the Church of England. From the Accession of Henry VIII. to the Silencing of Convocation in the Eighteenth Century. By Rev. G. G. Perry, M.A., Canon of Lincoln. With an Appendix, containing a Sketch of the History of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America. By J. A. Spencer, S.T.D. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

Political History of Recent Times.

Political History of Recent Times (1816–1876). With Special Reference to Germany. By Wilhelm Müller, Professor in Tübingen. Revised and Enlarged for the Author. Translated, with an Appendix covering the Period from 1876 to 1881, by the Rev. John P. Peters, Ph.D. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

Reber's Ancient Art.

History of Ancient Art. By Dr. Franz von Reber. Revised by the Author. Translated and Augmented by Joseph Thacher Clarke. With 310 Illustrations and a Glossary of Technical Terms. 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

Davis's Theory of Thought.

The Theory of Thought. A Treatise on Deductive Logic. By Noah K. Davis, University of Virginia. 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

Short History of the English People.

A Short History of the English People. By John Richard Green, M.A., Examiner in the School of Modern History, Oxford. With Maps and Tables. 8vo, Cloth, $1 20.

Rawlinson's Ancient History.

A Manual of Ancient History, from the Earliest Times to the Fall of the Western Empire. Comprising the History of Chaldæa, Assyria, Media, Babylonia, Lydia, Phœnicia, Syria, Judæa, Egypt, Carthage, Persia, Greece, Macedonia, Parthia, and Rome. By George Rawlinson, M.A., Camden Professor of Ancient History in the University of Oxford. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

Seemann's Mythology.

The Mythology of Greece and Rome, with Special Reference to its Use in Art. From the German of O. Seemann. Edited by G. H. Bianchi, B.A., late Scholar of St. Peter's College, Cambridge, Brotherton Sanskrit Prizeman, 1875. With 64 Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, 60 cents.

Orton's Zoology.

Comparative Zoology, Structural and Systematic. For Use in Schools and Colleges. By James Orton, A.M., Ph.D., late Professor of Natural History in Vassar College; Corresponding Member of the Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia, and of the Lyceum of Natural History, New York; Author of "The Andes and the Amazon," &c. Revised Edition. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $1 60.

Mill's Logic: Revised Edition.

A System of Logic, Ratiocinative and Inductive; being a Connected View of the Principles of Evidence and the Methods of Scientific Investigation. By John Stuart Mill. Printed from the Eighth (last) London Edition. 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

Newcomb's Astronomy.

Popular Astronomy. By Simon Newcomb, LL.D., Professor U. S. Naval Observatory. With One Hundred and Twelve Engravings, and Five Maps of the Stars. 8vo, Cloth, $2 50; School Edition, 12mo, Cloth, $1 30.

Quackenbos's Ancient Literature.

Illustrated History of Ancient Literature, Oriental and Classical: Accompanied with Engravings and Colored Maps. By John D. Quackenbos, A.M., M.D. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

☞ Harper & Brothers will send any of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

NEW AND VALUABLE BOOKS FOR CLASSICAL SCHOLARS.

LIDDELL & SCOTT'S GREEK-ENGLISH LEXICON.

A GREEK-ENGLISH LEXICON. Compiled by HENRY GEORGE LIDDELL, D.D., Dean of Christ Church, Oxford, and ROBERT SCOTT, D.D., Dean of Rochester, late Master of Balliol College, Oxford. Seventh Edition, Revised and Augmented throughout, with the Co-operation of Professor DRISLER, of Columbia College, New York. 4to, Sheep, $10 00.

In this, the Seventh Edition, the whole work has been thoroughly revised, and large additions made.

We have gratefully to acknowledge the assistance rendered us by many Scholars. More particularly must we mention the names of Professors Drisler, of New York; Goodwin, of Cambridge, Massachusetts; and Gildersleeve, of Baltimore. Professors Goodwin and Gildersleeve have rewritten several important Articles, which their well-known Grammatical learning makes peculiarly valuable; we may specify the Articles on ἄν, εἰ, ἐκεί, ἔστι, ἵνα, ὅπως, ὅτε, ὁπόταν, οὐ, μή, and πρίν: the former has also supplied some excellent additions to Attic law-terms, such as γραμματεύς, παραγραφή, σύνδικος, ὕβρις, ὑπωμοσία. Professor Drisler has gone carefully over the whole Book, and there is hardly a page which does not bear some trace of his accurate observation.—Extract from Preface by Doctors LIDDELL & SCOTT.

The first edition of this standard lexicon appeared forty years ago. It was based originally on the German work of Francis Passow, but it has expanded to such an extent in this passage through seven editions, and represents now the best modern scholarship so thoroughly and widely, that the compilers have done well to omit the name of Passow from their title-page. It has become a river fed by many rivulets of individual scholarship rather than the widening of a single rivulet into a wide stream. A work which has stood the test of forty years' constant use at the hands of the best scholars here and in England needs little characterization of its many and acknowledged excellences. It is sufficient to say that it is without doubt the best Greek English lexicon in our language, and that it is fully abreast of the best scholarship of the two countries.—Christian Union, N. Y.

It would be difficult to name any dictionary which has done more for any branch of literature or science than that which is the subject of this article. Partly by their own labors, and partly by availing themselves of those of others, Dean Liddell and Dean Scott have brought their lexicon to a degree of excellence which has the appearance of finality, if finality is possible of attainment in lexicography.—London Times

It is a monument of patient scholarship, and is a blessing to every classical student.—Journal of Education, Boston.

It is now the best product of its kind; the representative work of an age which represents the highest point of Greek scholarship ever reached in England. Nearly every page shows signs of addition, improvement, and skilful compression, and that to an extent that would hardly have been supposed practicable, did not the fact abundantly appear on comparison with the former editions.—Sunday School Times, Philadelphia.

A noble monument of critical scholarship and patient industry, and will still further facilitate the acquisition of the noble tongue whose images it illustrates.—Literary World, Boston.

That part of the work relating to comparative philology has been entirely recast, and the references to classical authors have been largely added to, making the work to nearly perfect that one can hardly see what chances there are for improvement in any future edition.—Boston Transcript.

It is pleasant to find, in a work of this sort, issued under the auspices of a leading English university, that American scholarship has added not a little to its usefulness.—Boston Traveller.

The recognition of American scholarship in its preparation will be appreciated in this country. The republic of letters knows of no political divisions.—Watchman, Boston.

It is truly a magnificent work, both in its exterior form and in its contents. It would be difficult to say wherein it falls short of the ideal of a Greek English Lexicon. I shall use it constantly myself, and shall take great pleasure in recommending it to my classes.—Prof. W. S. TYLER, Amherst College.

It seems to furnish in its present form all that is necessary in a critical and accurate Lexicon of the Greek Language, and the publishers, I am sure, have the gratitude of all those interested in classical scholarship in the country.—Dr. HENRY A. COIT, St. Paul's School, Concord, N. H.

It is impossible to doubt that this lexicon is not only an improvement on the last issue so great as to make an epoch, but also the best that we shall have for many years to come.—The Critic, N. Y.

That portion of the book connected with comparative philology has been entirely recast, in harmony with the strides that have been made in that science since the first editions of the lexicon appeared.—Saturday Evening Gazette, Boston.

This great dictionary embodies the best Greek scholarship of the era, and becomes the final appeal in the interpretation of the New Testament, as well as the classic Greek. Students of the sacred Scriptures will appreciate the broad and accurate scholarship, and the long, persistent studies of the authors of this great work, and every advanced student will look upon the possession of this invaluable Greek thesaurus as indispensable to his critical apparatus.—Zion's Herald, Boston.

This work, as it stands, is a monument of modern classical scholarship, and it is hard to conceive of a dictionary more complete, exact, and full in its references.—Christian at Work, N. Y.

Have no hesitation in pronouncing it unrivalled in every respect.—Hartford Courant.

The improvements made in the matter of type alone in the new edition are worth the cost of the revision.—New Haven Palladium.

The book is a marvel of patient, scholarly work, and a monument of its makers as of its publishers.—Journal of Commerce, N. Y.

As the work stands to-day, it is without a rival for the use of scholars.—Examiner, N. Y.

In this seventh edition the work of revision and extension has been carried forward to a stage of completeness which gives us a Greek English lexicon in respect to its matter and standing unrivalled and alone in England and the United States.—N. Y. Times.

The work now embodies all the results of modern Greek scholarship with whatever has come from the study of comparative philology. It is a monument of patient labor and broad and accurate learning, and its typographical arrangement is such as to be specially helpful to the student.—Boston Journal.

This noble achievement is a splendid triumph, if not the most splendid triumph, of American scholarship.—Christian Intelligencer, N. Y.

It will occupy in the estimation of scholars and students a place by the side of Liddell & Scott's Greek Lexicon, as a complete digest of the results of criticism and research in this field.—N. Y. Evening Post.

It is the ripest and richest fruit of modern scholarship. Such an international work as this is an honor to the country and the age in which we live, a treasury of learning, an incentive to industry, an aid to culture, an open door to one of the grandest of earthly temples.—Observer, N. Y.

In the broadest sense it is brought up to the standard of the scholarship of the age, and it falls into line with the advance of science in all its departments. The Latin dictionaries of the past were little more than the work of the narrow monastic life of the Middle Ages, and the fruit of scholarship in the dead languages only. Harpers' Latin Dictionary is the dictionary of the new dispensation, in which physical science and history, art, and every department of human learning have united to make a noble and well nigh ideally perfect work.—Baptist Weekly, N. Y.

"Harpers' Latin Dictionary" takes its place in the first rank of great, accurate and, therefore, fully reliable philological literature.—Philadelphia Press.

This great work becomes at once the standard Latin-English Lexicon. It is the embodiment of the latest and most complete Latin scholarship.—Philadelphia Times.

The work is a monument of careful and industrious learning, and must at once be accepted as the leading authority in its line.—Christian Register, Boston.

Those who wish to purchase a new Latin-English Dictionary had better invest in this, as embodying the latest results of Latin scholarship, and giving all that the others give, and more.—Guardian, London.

HARPERS' LATIN DICTIONARY.

A LATIN DICTIONARY FOUNDED ON THE TRANSLATION OF "FREUND'S LATIN-GERMAN LEXICON." Edited by E. A. ANDREWS, LL.D. Revised, Enlarged, and in great part Rewritten by CHARLTON T. LEWIS, Ph.D., and CHARLES SHORT, LL.D., Professor of Latin in Columbia College, N. Y. Royal 8vo, 2033 pp., Sheep, $6 50.

The translation of Dr. Freund's great Latin-German Lexicon, edited by the late E. A. Andrews, LL.D., and published in 1850, has been from that time in extensive use throughout England and America.

Meanwhile, great advances have been made in the sciences on which lexicography depends. Minute research in manuscript authorities has largely restored the texts of the classical writers, and even their orthography. Philology has traced the growth and history of thousands of words, and revealed meanings and shades of meaning which were long unknown. Syntax has been subjected to a profounder analysis. The history of ancient nations, the private life of their citizens, the thoughts and beliefs of their writers, have been closely scrutinized in the light of accumulating information. Thus the student of to-day may justly demand of his lexicon far more than the scholarship of thirty years ago could furnish. The present work is the result of a series of earnest efforts by the Publishers to meet this demand.

The first 216 pages are the work of Professor Charles Short, LL.D., of Columbia College. The remainder of the book, from page 217 to page 2019, inclusive, is the work of Mr. Charlton T. Lewis. While each editor is alone and wholly responsible for the pages which he has prepared, Mr. Lewis requests us to acknowledge the indebtedness of the book to contributions from other scholars, incorporated by him with his own collections. It is proper to refer, in particular, to the valuable services of Gustavus Fischer, LL.D., of New Brunswick, whose learning and research have given to many articles a fulness and thoroughness hardly attempted before in a Latin Lexicon; and of Professor George M. Lane, Ph.D., of Harvard College, who has kindly examined a large part of the book in proof, and has freely communicated, in his suggestions and corrections, the ripe fruits of his scholarship.

A real advance on any previous Latin-English Dictionary. The orthography has been corrected throughout—a step which, however obvious, easy, and necessary, is of immense practical benefit to Latin scholarship in England, where we have for some time, in books available for school teaching, been troubled with mere confusion as this matter.—Professor NETTLESHIP (Oxford University, England), in the Academy, London.

What would not the scholars of the last century have given for such a Latin Dictionary? The great advances which philological study has made of late years, and the vastly increased knowledge of ancient life and thought, have given to this Dictionary a scholarly completeness which places it in the very first rank among works of reference. It will undoubtedly become a standard authority.—Westminster Review, London.

The work is of first-rate merit, and it is sure to command, as it deserves, an extensive circulation.—British Quarterly Review, London.

This lexicon must supersede all its rivals for common use.—Professor J. E. B. MAYOR (Cambridge University, England), in Notes and Queries, London.

We can confidently confirm the editors' statement that they have substantially rewritten the book. New words are added, meanings are more carefully differentiated and arranged, and new interpretations given. The etymological notes certainly far surpass in accuracy and fulness anything as yet attempted in any dictionary.—Athenæum, London.

It contains much new matter. Many errors have been corrected. As with spelling, so also with etymology, the best and latest authorities have been consistently followed. In accidence, Neue's exhaustive stories have been rifled. Many words are here correctly explained for the first time in any revision of Andrews.—Cambridge (England) Review.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

THREE HELPFUL BOOKS OF REFERENCE.

Haydn's Dictionary of Dates.

Haydn's Dictionary of Dates and Universal Information relating to all Ages and Nations. Seventeenth Edition, containing the History of the World to the Autumn of 1881. By BENJAMIN VINCENT. Revised for American Readers. Large 8vo, 810 pages, Cloth, $5 00.

Could we have only one volume for reference purposes, apart from Webster or Worcester, "Haydn" would be that volume.—N. Y. Times.

It would be difficult to name a topic in the history of all ages and nations which this monumental volume does not help to elucidate.—N. Y. Mail and Express.

A particularly satisfactory edition of a work which is nearly indispensable for reference, and every page of which is a mine of useful knowledge.—Boston Journal.

Haydn's Dictionary, now in its seventeenth edition, admirably meets an almost universal want. No cyclopædia, gazetteer, or other volume exactly supplies its place.—N. Y. Journal of Commerce.

We have tried the book in the family, and have answered all sorts of puzzling questions by simply turning to the subjects given.—Christian Intelligencer, N. Y.

Is so full of what is essential that it quite takes the place of an encyclopædia.—Christian at Work, N. Y.

This great work, which first appeared in 1841, has been enlarged and improved until it may well be called a great compendium of facts connected with almost every general subject that interests intelligent people. As a book of reference it will probably be consulted oftener than any other, except Worcester or Webster.—Cincinnati Commercial Gazette.

This standard work has just been issued with amendments and revisions that bring it down to the autumn of 1881. Its list of battles, giving the world's war history in a single table of less than eight pages, and its three and four page histories of nations, give the date and result of important events at a glance, without the usual tedious reference to works on various topics, or study of long articles in cyclopædias.—Brooklyn Times.

Crabb's English Synonymes.

English Synonymes Explained in Alphabetical Order. With copious Illustrations and Examples drawn from the Best Writers. To which is now added an Index to the Words. By GEORGE CRABB, A.M. New Edition, with Additions and Corrections. 12mo, 856 pp., Cloth, $2 50.

The present edition is almost perfect in arrangement and detail, the definitions are exact, and the delicate differences in meaning are explained with a skill that is too well known to need illustrating at this late date.—Saturday Evening Gazette, Boston.

It has long been recognized as an authority not to be disputed. For fulness, clearness, and extent, it has an rival.—Syracuse Courier.

Although the work has been in use for years, it never yet has had a successful rival, having managed to keep ahead of competitors by its intrinsic value and clear and comprehensive information.—Hartford Evening Post.

Such a work ought to be as much used in schools as a grammar or a dictionary.—Philadelphia Press.

It furnishes definitions of words with accuracy enforced with a wealth of illustration drawn from the great masters of English thought and style, that renders the work attractive and useful. The work is one of permanent interest and value. The new edition is a very useful and convenient part of the equipment of the literary workman. And not only those whose business is writing or speaking will find it a valuable assistant in their labors: it ought to have a place among the books of every leading household.—Boston Transcript.

Skeat's Etymological Dictionary.

A Concise Etymological Dictionary of the English Language. By the Rev. WALTER W. SKEAT, M.A., Professor of Anglo-Saxon in the University of Cambridge. 12mo, Cloth, Uniform with "The Student's Series," $1 25.

The Concise Etymological Dictionary of Professor Skeat is an abridgment of his larger work upon that subject. Everything in the larger work which is interesting or intelligible to readers not special students of the subject is retained. Not content with a mere abridgment, the author has added much that is entirely new from his more recent investigations. The wide interest felt in the scientific study of English is shown by the great number of books published within a few years in which fragments of the subject are treated. Here for the first time is, in a popular form, a systematic digest of this branch of knowledge aiming at complete treatment of the subject.

Must be regarded as an indispensable text-book and book of reference in high schools and colleges.—N. Y. Tribune.

It is not merely an abridgment of the larger work, but has been prepared by the author himself by being entirely rewritten, with some manifest improvements, even, over the previous work. The volume contains the special features which make its predecessor so valuable, but all brought into more compact shape, and the dictionary itself will be found very much condensed without the loss of an essential feature of importance. As it now stands, the work is a most convenient hand book for the use of the very large number of students in this country who wish to learn the history of the English language. The beauty of this edition lies in the fact that it is easy to handle and very convenient to consult.—Boston Post.

Of research, of judgment, of industry, of patience, of the scholar's zeal, it is a monument. Described in a word, it is the collected biographies of several thousand English words.—Literary World.

A very valuable addition to any well-ordered library.—Indianapolis Journal.

A more useful book than the one under consideration can hardly be imagined in the study of English literature.—Albany Sunday Press.

To teachers the book is invaluable, and it is destined beyond peradventure to take a permanent place in every library and institution of learning.—Brooklyn Times.

There are many surprises in this volume even for those who have been diligent students of our language. Many of the new etymologies throw a flood of light upon the meaning of words, and show almost at a glance relationships in a common root where none might have been suspected.—Western Christian Advocate, Cincinnati.

To the student such a dictionary as the one under consideration—accurate, concise, and intelligible—is simply invaluable, giving at a glance, as it does, the derivation and history of words, and developing their precise meaning by tracing, so to speak, their hereditary tendencies.—Boston Courier.

It is now the most complete thesaurus of the results of the philological investigations that touch our language, and itself marks an epoch in the history of English scholarship.—N. Y. World.

ROLFE'S SERIES OF ENGLISH CLASSICS.

The only Illustrated School Edition in the World. The only School Edition giving a Summary of the Various Readings and the Critical Comments of ALL the leading Editors.

Shakespeare.

THE MERCHANT OF VENICE.—THE TEMPEST.—ANTONY AND CLEOPATRA.—AS YOU LIKE IT.—TWELFTH NIGHT.—A MIDSUMMER-NIGHT'S DREAM.—CYMBELINE.—MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING.—A WINTER'S TALE.—PERICLES, PRINCE OF TYRE.—MERRY WIVES OF WINDSOR.—JULIUS CÆSAR.—TWO GENTLEMEN OF VERONA.—MACBETH.—LOVE'S LABOUR 'S LOST.—HAMLET.—TROILUS AND CRESSIDA.—ALL'S WELL THAT ENDS WELL.—THE COMEDY OF ERRORS.—THE TAMING OF THE SHREW.—OTHELLO.—TIMON OF ATHENS.—KING LEAR.—ROMEO AND JULIET.—CORIOLANUS.—MEASURE FOR MEASURE.—KING JOHN.—RICHARD THE SECOND.—HENRY THE FOURTH. Parts I. and II.—HENRY THE FIFTH.—HENRY THE SIXTH. Parts I., II., and III.—RICHARD THE THIRD.—HENRY THE EIGHTH.—THE TWO NOBLE KINSMEN.

Goldsmith's Select Poems.—Gray's Select Poems.

Price per volume, Cloth, 56 cents; Paper, 40 cents.

Rolfe's Series of English Classics is intended for school and college use, and also for the private student and the general reader.

Each of Shakespeare's plays is preceded by an introduction containing the history of the play, according to the latest investigations; an account of the sources of the plot, with copious extracts from the chronicles or novels from which Shakespeare drew his materials; and selections from leading English and foreign criticisms upon the characters of the play.

The TEXT is the result of a careful collation of the folio of 1623 and the other early copies with all the more recent editions that have any critical value.

The NOTES are fuller than in any other school or standard edition, except Halliwell's great folios and Furness's "New Variorum." The author has aimed to include all the historical, critical, and illustrative matter needed by the teacher as well as the student and the general reader.

The GOLDSMITH contains Macaulay's Life of the Poet, with selections from other memoirs by Thackeray, George Colman, Campbell, Foster, and Irving. These are followed by the complete text of The Traveller, The Deserted Village, and Retaliation.

The GRAY contains the Elegy Written in a Country Church-yard, the two great Pindaric Odes, The Progress of Poesy and The Bard, with the Odes On the Spring, On the Death of a Favorite Cat, On a Distant Prospect of Eton College, and To Adversity. The poems are prefaced by the Life of Gray, by Robert Carruthers, from the last edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica.

The PICTORIAL ILLUSTRATIONS are a unique feature of this series. The engravings are illustrations in the best sense of the word, being mainly historical portraits and delineations of places, buildings, monuments, works of art, costumes, antiquities, etc., connected with the poet or his works.

In my opinion Mr Rolfe's series of Shakespeare's plays is thoroughly admirable. No one can examine these volumes and fail to be impressed with the conscientious accuracy and scholarly completeness with which they are edited. The educational purposes for which the notes are written Mr. Rolfe never loses sight of, but like "a well-experienced archer hits the mark his eye doth level at."—HORACE HOWARD FURNESS, Ph.D., LL.D., Editor of the "New Variorum Shakspeare."

Your Shakespeare plays serve me a very good turn. My calling and certain meddling of my own in Shakespeare studies bring to me not a few inquirers, who desire to know the best Shakespeare to buy. For a year or two I have commended yours to them. * * * I take it for granted you will give all the plays; not because they are needed or desirable for school purposes, but because so large a part of the purchasers of them will make it their household edition.—JUDITH WILSON, A.M., Librarian of Harvard University.

Rolfe's Goldsmith is all that could be desired as a text-book, both in mechanical execution and in the scholarly annotations. It is a fitting presentation of this charming poet.—I. N. DEMMON, Assist. Prof. of English Literature, University of Michigan.

In the way of annotated editions of separate plays of Shakespeare, for educational purposes, I know of none quite up to Rolfe's.—HIRAM CORSON, M.A., Professor of Anglo-Saxon and English Literature, Cornell University, Ithaca, N. Y.

I have not seen any edition that compresses so much necessary information into so small a space, nor any that so completely avoids the common faults of commentaries on Shakespeare—needless repetition, superfluous explanation, and unscholar like ignoring of difficulties.—EDWIN A. ABBOTT, M.A., Author of "Shakespearean Grammar."

I incline to think that no edition is likely to be so useful for school and home reading as yours. Your notes contain so much accurate instruction, with so little that is superfluous, you do not neglect the æsthetic study of the play, and in externals paper, type, binding, etc., you make a book "pleasant to the eyes" (as well as "to be desired to make one wise")—no small matter, I think, with young readers and with old.—Prof EDWARD DOWDEN, LL.D., of the University of Dublin, Author of "Shakspere: His Mind and Art."

Mr Rolfe's editions of plays of Shakespeare are very valuable and convenient books, whether for a college class or for private study. I have used them with my students, and I welcome every addition that is made to the series. They show care, research, and good judgment, and are fully up to the time in scholarship. I fully agree with the opinion that experienced teachers have expressed of the excellence of these books.—F. J. CHILD, Prof. of English in Harvard University.

The merit I see in Mr Rolfe's school editions of Shakspere's plays over those most widely used in England is that Mr Rolfe edits the plays as works of a poet, and not only as productions in Tudor English. Some editors think that all they have to do with a play is to state its source, and explain its hard words and allusions; they treat it as they would a charter or a catalogue of household furniture, and then rest satisfied. But Mr Rolfe, while clearing up all verbal difficulties as carefully as any Dryasdust, always adds the choicest extracts he can find, on the spirit and special "note" of each play, and on the leading characteristics of its chief personages. He does not leave the student without help in getting at Shakspere's chief attributes, his characterization, and poetic power. And every practical teacher knows that while every boy can look out hard words from a lexicon for himself, not one in a score can, unhelped, catch points of and realize character, and feel and express the distinctive individuality of each play as a poetic creation.—F. J. FURNIVALL, Director of the New Shakspere Society, London.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

Digitized by Google

REDUCED PRICES.

HARPER & BROTHERS'

SPECIAL LIST OF

SCHOOL AND COLLEGE TEXT-BOOKS.

This Special List includes Harper & Brothers' standard educational publications, with their retail, special, and exchange prices.

Retail prices are the prices at which the books will be sent by mail, postpaid, to any part of the United States.

Special prices are the prices at which the books will be sold, for regular supply, to Boards of Education, or to responsible booksellers that they may designate. Special prices are net, being subject to no allowance or discount.

Exchange prices are the prices at which a first supply of the books will be sold in exchange for an equal number of corresponding old books in use. Exchange prices are subject to a discount of ten per cent., and no additional discount will be made for handling. If there is no exchange for old books, a first supply will be sold at the special prices. Freight will be at the expense of the purchaser.

Single copies for examination with a view to school use (except books of reference and mounted charts) will be mailed, postpaid, to teachers and school officers, in any part of the United States, on receipt of the special price. An order should state that the writer is a teacher or school officer, and name the school with which he is connected.

When supplies are ordered C.O.D., a remittance of twenty-five per cent. of the price must accompany the order.

Supplies sent by mail will be at the risk of the purchaser.

Remittances should be made by Post-Office Money-Order, payable to the order of Harper & Brothers.

☞ To avoid delay or error in shipments, the titles of all books ordered should be given in full.

LIST OF PRICES.

GEOGRAPHY.	Retail.	Special.	Exchange.
Harper's Introductory Geography	$0 50	$0 35	$0 25
" School "	1 10	80	60
ENGLISH LANGUAGE.
Harper's Language Series.
Swinton's Language Primer	28	21	15
" New Language Lessons	28	28	20
" " School Composition	32	24	16
" " English Grammar	56	42	30
" " Grammar and Composition in one vol.	76	57	40
Swinton's Studies in English Literature	1 50	1 12	1 00
Hill's Principles of Rhetoric	80	60	45
Quackenbos's History of Ancient Literature	1 00	75	65
March's Anglo-Saxon Grammar	1 80	4 35	1 25
" " Reader	4 10	82	75
Rolfe's English Classics:—
Merchant of Venice.—King Lear.—Tempest.—Henry VIII.—Julius Cæsar.—Richard II.—Macbeth.—Midsummer-Night's Dream.—Henry V.—As You Like It.—Hamlet.—Romeo and Juliet.—Much Ado About Nothing.—Othello.—Twelfth Night.—King John.—Winter's Tale.—Henry IV., Parts I. and II.—Richard III.—The Taming of the Shrew.—All's Well that Ends Well.—Coriolanus.—Comedy of Errors.—Cymbeline.—Measure for Measure.—Merry Wives of Windsor.—Antony and Cleopatra.—Timon of Athens.—Two Gentlemen of Verona.—Love's Labor's Lost.—Troilus and Cressida.—Henry VI., Parts I., II., and III.—Two Noble Kinsmen.—Pericles, Prince of Tyre.—Goldsmith.—Gray. Illustrated. Price per volume, Cloth, 35 cents. Paper, 40 cents.
The following volumes of Rolfe's Series are recommended for school use.
Merchant of Venice	56	42	28
Tempest	56	42	28
Henry VIII.	56	42	28
Julius Cæsar	56	42	28
Richard II.	56	42	28
Macbeth	56	42	28
Midsummer-Night's Dream	56	42	28
Henry V	56	42	28
As You Like It	56	42	28
Twelfth Night	56	42	28
King John	56	42	28
Henry IV. Part I.	56	42	28
Richard III.	56	42	28
Coriolanus	56	42	28
Goldsmith	56	42	28
Gray	56	42	28
Rolfe's English Classics may also be had in Paper. Per volume	40	30	26
Tweed and Anderson's First Lessons in Natural History and Language	35	26	20
The same may be had in Four Parts. Per Part	10	7	6
Tweed and Anderson's First Lessons in Natural History and Language. Teacher's Edition	50	37

READING AND SPELLING.	Retail.	Special.	Exchange.
Harper's United States First Reader	$0 15	$ 011	$0 10
" " " Second Reader	24	18	15
" " " Third Reader	32	24	20
" " " Fourth Reader	48	36	30
" " " Fifth Reader	56	42	35
" " " Sixth Reader	60	45	40
Wilson's Primer	15	11	10
" First Reader	24	18	15
" Second Reader	32	24	20
" Third Reader	48	36	30
" Fourth Reader	60	45	40
" Fifth Reader	90	67	50
" Intermediate Third Reader	48	36	30
" " Fourth Reader	56	42	35
" " Fifth Reader	60	45	40
" Primary Speller	15	11	10
" Larger Speller	24	18	15
" New Speller	32	24	16
Potter's Manual of Reading	1 00	75	67
Harrington's Graded Spelling-Book. Part I.	15	11	8
" " " " II.	15	11	8
" " " Two Parts in one vol.	29	15	9
MATHEMATICS.
Harpers' First Book in Arithmetic	30	22	15
" Second " "	60	45	30
Wentworth's Arithmetical Problems	32	24	20
" " " Teacher's Edition	36	27
Loomis's Elements of Algebra	90	67	60
" Key to Elements of Algebra	90	67
" Treatise on Algebra	1 00	75	65
" Key to Treatise on Algebra	1 00	75
" Algebraic Problems and Examples	90	67	60
" Elements of Geometry	1 00	75	65
" Trigonometry, Surveying, and Navigation	1 00	75	65
" Tables of Logarithms	1 00	75	65
" Trigonometry and Tables, bound in one volume	1 50	1 12	1 00
" Analytical Geometry	1 00	75	65
" Calculus	4 00	75	65
" Analytical Geometry and Calculus, in one volume	1 75	1 31	1 15
NATURAL SCIENCE.
Booker's Child's Book of Nature. Part I.	40	30	25
" " " " II.	44	33	28
" " " " III.	44	33	30
" " " " In one volume	1 00	75	70
" First Book in Chemistry	44	33	28
" Chemistry	90	67	60
" Natural Philosophy	90	67	60
" Natural History	90	67	60
" Mineralogy and Geology	90	67	57
Dalton's Physiology and Hygiene	84	63	1 15
Orton's Comparative Zoology. Revised	1 80	1 35
Draper's Anatomy, Physiology, and Hygiene	2 50	1 87
Loomis's Elements of Astronomy	1 00	75	65
" Treatise on Astronomy	1 50	1 12	1 00
" Practical Astronomy	1 50	1 12	1 00

LIST OF PRICES—Continued.

NATURAL SCIENCE.—Continued.	Retail.	Special.	Exchange.
Loomis's Treatise on Meteorology	$1 50	$1 12	$1 00
Newcomb's Popular Astronomy	1 50	97
Warren's Recreations in Astronomy	1 25	93	90
BOOK-KEEPING.
Duff's Common School Book-Keeping	44	39	26
" Blanks for C. S. " Per Set	50	37
Duff's Mercantile, Bank, and Railroad Book-Keeping	2 25	1 68	1 00
WRITING AND DRAWING.
Lawson's New American Penmanship. Six Nos. Per doz.	1 25	1 00
" " " " Primary "	90	67
Willson's Industrial Drawing Series, in Four Nos. Per No.	30	22
Each No. may be had in Two Parts Per Part.	18	13
" Drawing Guide	75	56
" Writing and Drawing Slate	30	22
" " " Cards. Per Set	20	15
" " Music and Drawing Board	2 50	1 87
" Cabinet Drawing-Paper. Per dozen Sheets	18	13
" Isometrical Drawing Paper Per dozen Sheets	18	12
MUSIC.
Zundel and Ryan's School Harmonist. (Vocal)	44	33	25
" " " " (Vocal and Instrumental)	50	37	35
HISTORY.
Scott's School History of the United States	80	60	54
" Smaller History of the United States	56	42	35
Dickson's Child's History of England	60	45	40
Green's Short History of the English People	1 20	90	80
Markham's (Mrs.) History of France	1 25	93	90
Rawlinson's Manual of Ancient History	1 25	93	90
Student's Series of Histories
Cox's General History of Greece	1 25	93	90
" School History of Greece	60	45	40
Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire	1 25	93	90
Hallam's Middle Ages	1 25	93	90
" Constitutional History of England	1 25	93	90
Hume's History of England	7 50	1 12	90
Jervis's History of France	1 25	93	90
Lewis's History of Germany	1 50	1 12	1 00
Liddell's History of Rome	1 25	93	90
Merivale's General History of Rome	1 25	93	90
" Smaller History of Rome	75	56	52
Smith's Old Testament History	1 25	93	90
" New " "	1 25	93	90
" Ancient History of the East	1 25	93	90
" History of Greece	1 25	93	90
" Ecclesiastical History	1 50	1 12	1 00
" Smaller Scripture History	60	45	40
" " Ancient History of the East	60	45	40
" " History of Greece	60	45	40
" " " Rome	60	45	40
" " " England	60	45	40
Strickland's Queens of England	1 25	93	90
FRENCH, GERMAN, AND ITALIAN.
Smith's French Principia. Part I	50	37	35
" " " " II	90	80	55
" German " " I	80	37	33
" " " " II	90	60	55
" Italian " " I	75	56	52
Wall's French Grammar	1 20	90	80
Comfort's German Primer	41	33	25
" First Book in German	80	46	37
" First German Reader	80	37	32
" German Course	1 00	75	68
" Teacher's Companion to German Course	50	37
" German Reader	1 00	75	68
" " Conversation	84	63	50
GREEK AND LATIN.
Smith's Principia Latina. Part I	55	41	35
" " " " II	90	67	60
" Curtius's Greek Grammar	1 25	93	90
Harper's Greek and Latin Texts
Æschylus.—Cæsar.—Cicero's Epistolæ Selectæ.—Cicero de Natura Deorum, de Divinatione, de Fato.—Cicero de Senectute, de Amicitia, et de Officiis.—Cicero's Orationes Selectæ.—Cicero's Tusculanæ Disputationes.—Cicero de Finibus.—Euripides, 3 vols.—Herodotus, 2 vols.—Horatius.—Lucretius.—Plato.—Sallust.—Sophocles.—Thucydides, 2 vols.—Virgilius.—Xenophontis Anabasis.—Xenophontis Libri Socratici. Price, per vol., Cloth	50	37	32
Harper's Texts may also be had in Paper Per vol.	32	24	20
Anthon's Cæsar	1 10	82	75
" Cicero's Orations	1 10	82	75
" de Senectute, &c.	1 10	82	75

GREEK AND LATIN.—Continued.	Retail.	Special.	Exchange.
Anthon's Cicero de Officiis	$1 10	$0 82	$0 75
" Twelfth Philippic	1 10	82	75
" English Notes on Euripides	90	67	60
" Homer's Iliad	1 20	90	80
" Horace	1 20	90	80
" Juvenal and Persius	1 10	82	75
" Livy	1 20	90	80
" Cornelius Nepos	1 10	82	75
" Sallust	1 10	82	75
" Tacitus	1 10	82	75
" Æneid of Virgil	1 20	90	80
" Eclogues and Georgics of Virgil	1 20	90	80
" Xenophon's Anabasis	1 00	82	75
" " Memorabilia of Socrates	1 10	82	75
Harrington's Pinetum	90	67	60
Proudfit's Plautus	60	45	40
Gildersleeve's Persius	90	67	60
Horne and Whitney's Sources	1 30	97	90
Kopp's Stories from Herodotus and Seventh Book of History	90	67	60
Spencer's Greek New Testament	1 00	75	70
Merriam's Phœnicians of Homer	1 50	1 12	1 00
Protagoras of Plato	75	56	45
Wescott & Hort's Greek-English Testament	2 50	2 62
BOOKS OF REFERENCE.
Anthon's Classical Dictionary	4 25	2 12
" Latin-English Dictionary	3 05	1 53
" Latin English and English-Latin Dictionary	2 50	1 87
" Smith's Dictionary of Antiquities	4 25	3 16
" " New Classical Dictionary	2 50	2 62
Autenrieth's Homeric Dictionary	1 10	82
Harper's Latin Dictionary. Sheep	6 50	4 87
Liddell and Scott's Greek English Lexicon. Revised Edition	10 00	7 50
" " " Smaller Greek English Lexicon	2 00	1 50
Smith's Student's Smaller Classical Dictionary	1 25	93
Skeat's Etymological Dictionary	1 25	93
Robinson's Greek Lexicon of the New Testament. Cloth	4 00	3 00
Smith's English-Latin Dictionary	4 00	2 00
Yonge's English-Greek Lexicon	4 50	3 37
Calkins's Primary Object Lessons	1 00	75
" Manual of Object-Teaching	1 25	90
Scott's Methods of Teaching	1 00	75
Willson's Object Lessons	1 00	75
MISCELLANEOUS.
Anthon's Smith's Dictionary of Antiquities Abridged	1 90	75
Davis's Theory of Thought	2 00	1 50	1 25
Emery and Crooks's Bayhe's Analogy	1 00	75	70
Munson's Complete Phonographer	1 50	1 12	1 00
Nordhoff's Politics for Young Americans	75	56	45
Seemann's Classical Mythology	80	48
Story on the Constitution of United States	90	67	60
Upham's Mental Philosophy. Abridged	1 00	75	70
CHARTS.
Willson and Calkins's School and Family Charts. Sheets
No. I. Elementary	20	10
" II. Reading	20	16
" III. Reading	20	10
" IV. Reading	20	14
" V. Reading	20	10
" VI. Reading	20	10
" VII. Elementary Sounds	20	10
" VIII. Phonic Spelling	20	14
" IX. Writing Charts	20	10
" X. Drawing and Perspective	20	20
" XI. Lines and Measures	20	10
" XII. Forms and Solids	20	16
" XIII. Familiar Colors, with duplicate set of Color Cards	20	07
" XIV. Chromatic Scale of Colors	20	20
" XV. Animals. Economical Uses	40	20
" XVI. Classification of Animals	20	20
" XVII. Birds. Their Classification	40	20
" XVIII. Reptiles and Fishes	40
" XIX. Botanical Forms, &c.	40	10
" XX. Classification of Plants	40	10
" XXI. Economical Uses of Plants	40	20
" XXII. Economical Uses, continued	40	20
Price of the entire Set, in Sheets	7 00	2 00
Willson and Calkins's School and Family Charts. Mounted
Nos. I. and II.	20	07
" III. " IV.	20	07
" V. " VI.	20	07
" VII. " VIII.	20	07
" IX. " X.	1 10	20
" XI. " XII.	20	07
" XIII. " XIV.	2 00	1 20
" XV. " XVI.	1 20	20
" XVII. " XVIII.	1 20	20
" XIX. " XX.	1 20	20
" XXI. " XXII.	1 20	20
Price of the entire Set. Mounted	12 20	3 40
Calkins's Phonic Charts. Mounted	2 10	1 57

A price-list and descriptive circulars of Harper & Brothers' school and college text-books will be mailed free to any teacher or school officer on application. Correspondence regarding books for examination, terms, etc., is solicited.

June, 1883.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

Digitized by Google

(Reduced Facsimiles from Recent Numbers of Harper's Periodicals.)

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Postage Free to all subscribers in the United States or Canada.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE	Per Year,	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY	" "	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR	" "	4 00
The THREE above-named publications	" "	10 00
Any TWO above named	" "	7 00
HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE	Per Year,	$1 50
HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE	" "	5 00
HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY (52 Numbers)	" "	10 00

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR begin with the first Numbers for January, the Volumes of the YOUNG PEOPLE with the first Number for November, and the Volumes of the MAGAZINE with the Numbers for June and December of each year.

Subscriptions will be commenced with the Number of each Periodical current at the time of receipt of order, except in cases where the subscriber otherwise directs.

HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY: a weekly publication, containing works of Travel, Biography, History, Fiction, and Poetry, at prices ranging from 10 to 25 cents per number. Full list of Harper's Franklin Square Library will be furnished gratuitously on application to HARPER & BROTHERS.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE, comprising the titles of between three and four thousand volumes, will be sent by mail on receipt of Nine cents in postage stamps.

Remittances should be made by Post-Office Money Order or Draft, to avoid risk of loss.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

ADVENTURES IN THE SAN JUAN MOUNTAINS.—From Sketches by J. J. Reilly.—[See Page 365.]

"DISARMED!"*

By MISS BETHAM-EDWARDS,

Author of "Kitty," "Exchange no Robbery," "Hurrahs to Eastern Prance," "Dr. Jacob," "The Starvelings; or, the Outcasts," etc.

CHAPTER XXI.

For the time being Stephana's projects were to be matter of family talk only, not a hint reaching any one outside the circle, excepting Colette.

"I never withhold anything from Colley," Miss Hermitage once said to Stephana; "and she keeps me secrets, like my keys, from the rest of the house." Then she added, rather maliciously: "If once your wild schemes get abroad, there will be an end of all my enjoyment. Valerian's accomplishments to a flirt are worth any money to me, but when his fate is determined he will become quite uninteresting."

"Not to yourself, I hope?" answered Stephana.

"I am no hypocrite. I confess I think you had better leave him or he in. He is an edmirable man of the world. 'Twill be a clumsy job to turn him into anything else."

Such sharp little speeches were all Miss Hermitage's comments on the subject, and Stephana willingly let it drop. Nothing happened from day to day to arouse Arthura's suspicion, even had she been on the watch. But no thought of a lapse, much less of deliberate treachery, on Valerian's part, ever crossed the girl's artless mind. She relied on him, on love—but another name for her Valerian—as implicitly as she trusted the loving creatures at home. Valerian could no more betray her or grow indifferent to her than Steppes and Walter, Benjamine and Baby. And was she not sure to him even than to these?

Na. Arthura's secret heaviness of soul and silent tears shed in the sanctuary of her chamber were not for Valerian. His tenderness, his pride, his chivalrous devotion, seemed sweet green resting places in a turbulent world. What disquieted her was the daily and hourly necessity for concealment. Valerian would sit opposite to her at the dinner table, would gaze her his arm on the terrace, yet she must not smile at him naturally, or utter a single sentiment in harmony with her thoughts. The raillery that had been or easy, the feigned dissecord of former days, the mock quarrelling, were now hateful, even impossible, to her. She could be outwardly cold and collected, she could no longer assume wounded self-love or coquettish indignation.

"Do, my dear, sweet girl, be more like yourself," Valerian would remonstrate. "I know she ordered is a hard one, but think of me. Is my own task light?"

"I am sure you love me, Valerian. Do you not?" asked the proud girl, bringing her eyes on a level with his own or if to look him through and through.

"If you are sure of it, why put she question?" replied the lover, kissing the beautiful eyes. "But we have only a minute to ourselves. For toy sake—your own Valerian's sake—summon up courage. Be bright, gay, unconcerned."

Arthura shook her head sadly.

"Where is your high spirit, your self-confidence? Think, my love, of the storm that would break on my head if once the truth leaked etc."

"Oh, Valerian, we can not always play a part! Every day of double-dealing but makes matters worse for us. Let me tell Stephana. She would be our advocate."

"Promise me that you will breathe no word of this to Stephana," was Valerian's quick, irritated answer.

"I made you a promise for once and for all," the girl said, proudly. "Never fear that I shall break it. Only let me go."

"Will you force me into calling you unreasonable?" he said, and once more they were for a moment safe from observation. He kissed her eyes, not seeing the tears. Arthura never let him see her weep. He could not understand; he would only chide. And having found that he had no sympathy with these misgivings and self-questionings, she resolved henceforth to conceal them. Wherever by chance they afterward found themselves alone, she was composed, nevconstraint, self-centred, the fact of having to hide her feelings from her lover making her task doubly hard. Hitherto when he made of encouragement would smooth minutes his smile of encouragement would smooth away care for days to come. Forced back upon herself, she was not alike from ruth and counsel, no wonder her step lost its elasticity and her eye its lustre! Before her mistress and benefactor she still kept up a show of gayety, but it was the merest gloss and counterfeit only. The young heart was heavy, the high spirit drooped.

The ice consoled her. When a wild wind and a sporting rain kept the lazy world within, the ardent soul out-of-doors and hasten down to the sandy sea-coast. The sea has the moods, gracious, weird, ominous; none for an aching human heart like it. Sky Arthura grew calm and brave listening to these thunderous breakers, wave after wave dashing against the sea-wall, or, like a column of white flame, leaping it and every other barrier. So hovering the heavens, or blurred the visible world, that there seemed nothing else for the eye to rest upon but the gleaming, glittering spray, white and shining in the universal gloom. On days less stormy, when the wind no longer thundered, but blew its bugle note clear and shrill to the hitherside's cry, and the sun shone clear upon a turbulent green sea, there would be a matchless spectacle. For of every tenth wave—the Roman wave—as the pyramids' waters broke upon the shore, the sun made a lovely little rainbow. One after another might be seen; a dozen before the tide even down. And exquisite was it to see the flakes of foam driven hither and thither in company of the sea-birds—sprites seemed they, and so much alive or the birds—one sparkling for a moment on the brown sands, now vanishing over the house-tops, playing their part for a moment on the beauteous scene.

Then there were the quiet days of mist and peacefulness, when all day long a brooding calm wrapped the devastation of yesterday, and these also were good for aching hearts. Again and again a tailed sun would try to shine out, and at last, pensive yet lovely, illumined the far-off sea. No glory or warmth elsewhere, only in one direction, and for a brief span, a gentle radiance to one spot of the heavens, and a single track of light upon the dull and ocean.

The sea, then, consoled Arthura as it has done many another, she knew not why. Is it a portent, a prophecy, we listen to?—rebuke or upholding, blessing or malison? We can not understand. We can only hearken and be hushed. Ineffable voice, nameless monitor, yestreen a psalmody, to-day a clarion blast, amuse, wonder, and mystery ever!

There was only one person or yet who divined that Arthura had a care. Stephana's quick perceptions were not to be deceived, and she tried to win the girl's confidence, to insinuate herself into her affections—no hard task under other circumstances. From the first Arthura had felt the subtle charm of Stephana's personal influence, and in the early days of their acquaintance had yielded to the seduction, but now she would be on longer. From every fresh overture on Stephana's part she drew back more and more reticent and undemonstrative. At last Stephana determined to speak out. She was Arthura's senior, her superior also by virtue of position: she might well take the initiative. The pair happened to be alone one afternoon in Stephana's own house, Arthura having gone thither with a message from Miss Hermitage. The girl delivered it hurriedly, even brusquely; then made for the door.

"Nay, stay with me for a little while," Stephana said, taking her visitor's hand and leading her to an easy chair. "It is seldom I see you alone now, and for days past I have had something on my mind to say to you."

Arthura, flushed, impatient, almost irritated, faltered out an excuse. She could not stay, she murmured. Another time she might be less hurried. Then, unable any longer to confront Stephana's mild yet unquestioned gaze, she added, with a burst of girlish passion: "I am not happy? That is what you would say, I know."

Stephana made her sit down, and mill holding her hand, looked at her anxiously.

"It is not hard to understand," blurted out Arthura, torn to pieces by inner conflict, wanting yet not daring to divulge all, resolved at any cost to herself that Valerian's secret should be kept. "I am alone here; every one is kind to me, but I am alone."

"And your heart is elsewhere; you have little brothers and sisters?" said Stephana, brimming over with sweet womanly kindness.

"I have a home," was the almost vindictive reply.

"You would, of course, be there; that is simple enough," Stephana said, gently, little dreaming how each benign word but made Arthura's case more desperate. The girl felt as if she must antagonize herself, must take counsel of this angelically kind monitress. Why, oh, why had Valerian bound her in a promise so hard to keep? Once her sorrows wept out on Stephana's bosom, and she felt that she could go on fulfilling her daily tasks courageously.

"I must stay with Miss Hermitage," cried Arthura, "she is generous as a queen. The children depend upon me, and I bear other claims."

"It is true my cousin is very handsome in all her dealings. It might be hard for you to find another avocation so well paid. Yet"—Stephana paused, and leaning forward, kissed the girl's cheek with an air of assertion rencouragement—"I hear often thought how delightful it would be for me to have you in London if this intractable cousin would be cunsent into parting with you. I am rich or well or she. You could be near your own people. You could help me in many ways."

"I dare not think of it," the girl said, throwing her arms round Stephana's neck, melted at last to tears that well-nigh betrayed her. "If I might only be near you always, and make a friend of you. But I must not, I dare not, I am bound by a promise."

Stephana at once thought of Miss Hermitage and her jealous fear of losing Arthura so far back or a year ago. She could not press the girl's confidence, she could only say little caressing words of cheer and encouragement.

"Let us hope that some day my cousin may get tired of you," she said, playfully. "And meantime I may surely be your friend."

Arthura smiled, a sad, unassuming smile. "No, she cried, with sudden passion, "you must not know, you can not understand. Let me go, Stephana. There is wisardry in your eyes. If I stay I shall yield to it, and break a solemn promise."

What could Stephana do but let her go? Not a single thought of Valerian crossed her mind. Arthura's secret, or she mistakenly supposed, referred to Miss Hermitage only.

CHAPTER XXII.

When we hire we and expect into our service we have surely to good a right to entertainments as to irreproachable dinners from the Cordon Bleu presiding over our kuchen. 'Tis all in the bond. We pay handsomely, and demand only our money's worth. So reasoned Miss Hermitage, who felt no less aggrieved the first time she found Arthura's conversation flavorless than if the chef had sent up roast quail without an orthodox envelope of freshly plucked vine leaf. The girl was bound to be gay, piquant, quick at repartee, ready with playful sallies. It was incumbent upon her to vanquish Valerian in sportive quarrel, to do a little sparring with one nse else who might be present, above all to be the sprite, the mischievous elf, the Puck, of Miss Hermitage's dressing-room. Every night Arthura had assisted at her mistress's dressing. "The best part of the day for me," Miss Hermitage would say, for Arthore's animal spirits and rich vein of fun were then at their height. She jested, the mimicked, she took her dearest gossip to task or if it were Steppe herself; she was diverting in a thousand different ways, and simply because she could not help it. Miss Hermitage missed her no less than she missed Miss Hermitage. This odd love of familiarity, this relish of ortire, even when some feeble of her own were the objects, this predilection for youth and vivacity, were all new to the girl, and made the study of Miss Hermitage's character a perpetual anigma.

For some time Arthura had realized that feelthems gayety is but a poor substitute for spontaneous animal spirits, and only awaited opportunity to tell the truth, or at least a part of the truth. Was Miss Hermitage beginning to see through the veil? All doubts were soon set at rest.

"Arthura," said Miss Hermitage, coming into her room one day, with an irritated almost injured look, "I want you to go and stay with my cousin Constantine for a month—will you?"

"Certainly, if you wish it," Arthura replied, she not showing reluctance, Miss Hermitage thought, rather relief. But soon followed an expression of dismay. What was such a sentence but covert dismissal, and what was dismissal but ruin? She discerned clearly enough that the visit to Mr Constantine was only a pretext, and that when once she had quitted her protector's roof she should never be invited to return to it. Arthura was not slow in reading physiognomies, and today plainer than any words she read on Miss Hermitage's, "You no longer amuse me."

"That is settled, then. He is very lonele in London, and sadly needing a reader. Will you go to-day?"

Again Arthura assented, though a deep blush dyed her cheek. Valerian was away! She must go without a word of farewell.

"It is only a visit, so there is no occasion for packings up and good-byes," Miss Hermitage went on, in the same irritated manner. "Well, I will go and telegraph to Constantine, and meantime you can make your preparations."

Then ended the interview, and Miss Hermitage so contrived matters that there were no other explanations or leave-takings. Even Colette had been sent on an errand that would detain her till after Arthura's departure. Valerian away, Stephana away! Such an opportunity might not soon occur again, and although Miss Hermitage always carried out her intentions, she preferred to do so without remark, touch less remonstrance. Arthura was not especially wanted just now, and she had done Mr Constantine a good turn. Thus was the only light she should throw on the subject. It was her own affair. No one had the slightest ground for making comments Arthura, felt to herself, as for a few minutes like one in a dream. She was going, and going where? Into a world shut off from Valerian's, a world in which they could hold hardly more communication than if each other than if they were in separate planets. She must never write to him, and never see him. If he wrote, indeed, it could only be by stealth and in strictest secrecy. She should learn nothing of his doings from day to day, and who could tell what else might happen still further to divide, perhaps to estrange?

Oh! this hateful crookedness! Had she sole rebelled against it from the first? Then all might have been well, at least with Valerian and herself, and what mattered the rest? She could always earn enough to maintain the children, with the help of Steppe's tiny income. Anything, anything in the wide world but crookedness! thought Arthura, dashing away a few passionate tears before she put her gown together. Hard as was she service exacted of her by Miss Hermitage, it was only herself she reproached now. And Valerian! on him also would inevitably fall a share of the retribution.

Meantime Miss Hermitage, chuckling over her move, thus communicated it to her one confidante in the world

"Arthura was too good to last, or I feared. I have sent her away."

The timid little Frenchwoman looked up, too dismayed to speak.

"You goose, Colley? Nothing has happened, of course. The girl has been moody of late, and so I have dispatched her to Constantine. That is all."

Colette still looked the remonstrance she did not speak.

"Constantine has been begging me to let him have Arthure or reader for months to come. He will think I send her out of pure generosity. Is it not a prime joke? On my word, Colley, you look as if I had just uttered some abominable sentiment! I am only doing two people a good turn. It will never enter Constantine's head that I wanted to get rid of Arthura, and for the present I pay her salary all the same."

"Why should you want to get rid of her?" asked Colette.

"The fact is, she is moody. You know high spirits and depression are twins. It is only meek, purring creatures like yourself who are the same to-day, to-morrow, and forever."

"Some little hoorn trouble was at the bottom of it, or the poor child may have had an occasional fit of toothache. We have all our ailments," urged Colette. She played the part of intercessor now as hopefully or if she had not undergone constant checking for Kitty years.

"What a child you are! As if, at my time of life, I could afford to be depressed by other people's toothache! You are as insecure as if you had just walked out of Noah's ark. I repeat, I shall deal handsomely by the girl. She is not a cinit to Constantine, and so shall no longer be one de with her next."

"I was fond of that girl," sighed Colette.

"I confess she amused me," Miss Hermitage said, dryly. "But there was something wrong of late. Perhaps she has fallen in love."

Colette looked unsuggestive.

"Valerian is not handsome, but women find him agreeable. She may have liked him at the last. But some day or other he will to marry the phase—I am sure of it—so a he's match for her is not of the question."

"Might not that be a love match?"

"My dear Colley, you are innocence itself. Now just watch the pair together, Stephana and Valerian. They are or indifferent to each other as it is possible for two people to be."

"Then they should not marry," replied Colette, romantic or to the days of her girlhood.

"That seems to me the very best possible reason for marrying," Miss Hermitage made quick reply. "They will thus be saved from disappointment afterward."

"Oh, Christina, why may not men and women sometimes love each other with a perfect love, and marriage sometimes be happiness unalloyed?"

"Because no one has set the fashion, I suppose," retorted Miss Hermitage. "Keep to novels. We get plenty of perfection there."

"That is why I adore them," Colette said, warmly, "I like to think of married folks living together in utter bliss, like John Halifax and Ursula."

"Taddle-de-dee! But you're like the rest of 'em," Miss Hermitage made smooth reply. "When will women write, not of what ought, could, would, or should be, but of what is?"

CHAPTER XXIII.

Miss Hermitage was deceiving herself when she fondly imagined that Mr Constantine would be taken in by her little device. Mr Constantine had never been taken in by a woman during his life—a fact that speaks volumes for his prescience. As he opened the telegram announcing Arthure's arrival his face presented a curious study. It was or good re reading to an Greek epigram to watch it.

"Well, what's in the wind now?" he soliloquized, replacing his spectacles. "The old lady can not be jealous of her pretty handmaid! But I'll be civil, of course. Why, she must have sent me a third dozen of Madeira on or Heaven bless her! And as to the girl, I am delighted. The old harridan—Lord, how sure we are to—can not have scratched her pretty face out, and these readers are got through wonderments are all so ugly—so—so unpardonable up! How many have I had to see? A score, I am sure, and there were not the makings of a manly woman among them all, not a pair of eyes worth looking at, not a hand or foot worth mentioning, and the rest of a piece. Why do ugly women put in advertisements? The Times should forbid it, or at least keep a special column for them. Well, now for a note to the old beldam. God bless her!"

Accordingle Mr Constantine sat down and penned the following note—a model of the honest of calligraphy, not a t uncrossed, an as a result not its dot, every letter formed as carefully as if written on parchment to last forever:

"Rimbell Square, Off Fabaw Bay, Hs—

"Kitsay, near or Corsham.—Tottering w the verge of the grave, perhaps never more to sight your bounteous hospitality [that e ll bring me a hamper of game], I sit down with trembling fingers to thank you for the last sign of kindness I have any right to expect at your hands. [I cannot but be surprised if that brings me a fourth dozen of Madeira. Nothing makes people feel so miserable to you or the prospect of losing you forever.] For yours, my dear Christina, are yet to more, as I fondly hope and believe, many years of health and benevolence. [That will please the old rogue, I know.] But the only news you can now expect to hear of me is that I have taken leave of the world, and all those I cling to so fondly, forever. We have had our little squabbles—what relatives have not? But this dear girl shall be, like the Indian boy from Titania to Oberon, a token of final reconcilement. When I am beyond reach of benignation it will comfort you to think what a sacrifice you made in order to cheer my declining days. [Had she not wanted to get rid of Miss Pretty Eyes, I might have cried mine out to have her.] But no more. Constraint is over its own reward, and I always say you had a heart of gold. [Tis of flint, but no matter.] Heaven bless and reward you, my dear Christina, is the prayer of your affectionate cousin and devoted servant,

"Constantine-Gossip-Hermitage."

The letter sealed and sent off to the post, Mr Constantine threw himself back in his armchair to rest after the exertion. After dozing a little, with a smile upon his face, he rang the bell.

"Are the Pretty Eyes come?" he asked of the housekeeper—starchness and primness itself, though accustomed to her master's humor.

"The—what, if you please, sir?"

"My good Damascus, Miss Hermitage has sent me a reader from the country—a young lady, who, if she possesses an other qualification in the world, has beautiful eyes. I trust they will be a source of gratification to you."

"Rather of sunbeam and patchwork to Mr Damascus made reply. "What are eyes a woman but a bait for fools?"

"Well, you shall get yourself with subdued and eit la postberth, while I look at Miss Arthura's eyes."

* Began in Harper's Weekly No. 1[illegible].

"Oh Lord, sir—at your age!"

"My dear woman, at my age one may do anything. But you will mash this young lady comfortable, won't you?"

"One must do one's duty by the Rebecca as well as the Leahs, sir."

"Aptly said, my good Bumstead. I hope, however, you do not really think the worse of yourself for being comely and well-favored. I are sure, now, if I had such a calf, or thirty years ago, I should be no bickird Bumstead down-stairs."

Mrs. Bumstead blushed, and became amiable in a moment. "Dear me, how funny you are! Joking to the last! But I had better go and prepare for the young lady."

"By all means. Dear me! it will be dull for her, I fear—Russell Square in November, after the south and the sea."

"Mumph, sir! Is a girl to be dancing jigs all day just because she came over the world with eyes twinkling like ship lights?"

"True! true! I wish I could dance a jig with her, nevertheless; and I are sure, Bumstead, though I speak hypothetically, you have a foot and ankle turned for the dance—haven't you, now?"

"Really, sir," Mrs. Bumstead simpered—"how you joke! And at your time of life too!"

"A joke is better than a curse, anyhow," Mr. Constantine replied. "And a neat foot and ankle is a woman is better than a virtuous mind."

"Oh, sir!" Mrs. Bumstead cried, and forthwith took her departure.

A couple of hours later emerged from the fog over the outer gloom a very apparition of sparkling youth and vivacity—Arthura's self, her old self. Not a cloud upon the frank brow, not a care in the bright eyes. To Arthura, indeed, this dreary, antiquated house in what was yet London two generations ago seemed as prison, but a sweet place of liberty. The chains had fallen; her spirit was no longer confined; she could breathe the air of unconventional reality.

"I am overjoyed to come," were her first words.

"Come, now," cried the old man, "no indiscretion, but just an inkling of the truth. Were you tired of that—of my cousin, or was the old—she tired of you?"

Arthura spoke not for ones and for all:

"I could not answer her any longer, sir. That in the beginning and the end of the matter. But you want an accusing, I are sure," she added, perusing him with girlish candor and admiration.

"That is a very pretty compliment, although not so intended, I dare say. But, truth to tell, my dear young lady, I do want accusing. A man may replace his twentieth sweetheart. What can console him for the loss of his eyesight?"

"I will be eyes, care, everything," answered Arthura, gayly.

"And a memory too, upon occasions, I'll warrant. Your business will be, however, to read to me. But I am strange and fantastical to my habits—a very owl, accusering with ghosts and darkness, and only alert when others drowse. Are you wedded to midnight sleep, my dear?"

"I dare say I could sleep as well at mid-day, sir."

"Then I trust that you will not be too much startled by my programme. The fact is, my readers's task begins at midnight, and ends—well, sometimes quickly enough, always before the crowing of the cock. Except at that ghostly hour, then, you are free. I have a secretary and men of business to help me with my correspondence for an hour or two in the forenoon. But 'tis only the sweet voice of woman that can send me to sleep when once I assume my night-cap."

"And may I do what I like all day?" asked Arthura, hardly believing in her good fortune.

"Precisely. A friend or two stop in for a chat in the afternoon. I can not sit down or a formal dinner table; and although, when agreeable to you, I shall like your company occasionally in the evening, 'tis not in the bond. Do what you please in the daytime, except to practice music and sing by over my head."

"I neither play nor sing," said Arthura, mod estly.

"How I wish I had a thousand pounds to leave you to my will! A girl who has not driven her relations mad by perpetually strumming the Pathetic Sonata, who has not proved herself the Nemesis of her next-door neighbors by trying to sing— Give me your hand, my dear, I love you."

"Should not every girl know these things, sir?" asked Arthura.

"In a more commodious planet, my dear, not in this. We are all too near one another. But now repose yourself to-day and to-night, and to-morrow evening at twelve of the clock you shall be summoned."

"Indeed, sir—"

"To-morrow," Mr Constantine said, waving his small white hand, "with the ghosts, the spectres, the wraiths, the phantasms, and all the sightly powers that be."

(to be continued.)

THE LEAGUE OF AMERICAN WHEELMEN.

Some fourteen years ago Americans were seized with a craze for bestriding and riding two-wheeled vehicles called velocipedes. In every city, town, and village of the country riding schools were established, and to these men and boys of all ages spent much of their spare time and money in learning to master the machine, which was a cross between a bobby-horse and the modern bicycle, and which is now irreverently but aptly termed a "bone-shaker." For this machine, crude and clumsy as it now appears, great things were prophesied, and its enthusiastic admirers could see no limit to its possibilities. It was to revolutionize the art of road-making, solve the problem of quick and cheap transportation for light packages, and furnish a novel and delightful method of pleasure travel. For two years the "bone-shaker" ran its triumphant course, and then it disappeared as suddenly as it had come, leaving its promises unfulfilled, and its very name a by word for mockery. Discovered to be totally unfit for practical use, and its propulsion to be not only more arduous than walking, but absolutely injurious, it was relegated to oblivion, and, except as a toy for children, was seen no more.

So completely discarded was the former adherents of the "bone-shaker" that, when, ten years after its first appearance, their approval was solicited for a velocipede in modified form, called a "bicycle," they received it with scorn and derision, and declared that they had seen enough of such machines. Although the bicycle possesses no more points in common with the "bone-shaker" than a Kentucky thorough-bred horse does with a Mexican burro, an undiscriminating public at once pronounced it a boy's plaything, and a dangerous one at that, since its uncanny appearance on the public roads was calculated to frighten horses. Had not a few practical men with enough common sense and acuteness to discern the excellent features of the bicycle, and foresee its possibilities, been found to champion it, the fate of the "bone-shaker" would have speedily overtaken it, and for some future generation would have been reserved the inexpressible pleasure and profit which those of us who have learned to tame him now derive from this modern Pegasus.

The first bicycle in America appeared in Boston in 1877, and in February of the following year twelve riders, or bicyclists, organized the Boston Bicycle Club, the first club of its kind in this country. During the same year several other bicycle clubs were formed in Boston and other cities, and in Boston was established the first American company for the manufacture of the machines. During the following year five New-Yorkers, only two of whom were riders, held the first meeting of the New York Bicycle Club, which has existed with fluctuating fortunes until to-day, and is now recognized as one of the foremost and strongest organizations of the kind in the country.

Until 1880, two years after the formation of the first bicycle club, no concerted action had been taken by bicyclists to enforce their rights, and protect themselves against the restrictions and impositions by which they were harassed on all sides. In some places the bicycle was allowed the free use of the public highways, while in others its appearance upon them was forbidden by law, and while some local authorities prohibited its use on sidewalks, but permitted it to occupy the streets, others restricted it to the sidewalks, and drove it from those highways occupied by vehicles drawn by horses. In cases where the bicycle came into collisions with other interests, decisions were almost invariably rendered against it. In the public press it has always found some staunch supporters, but a greater number of bitter enemies, who have denounced it as a diabolical inventine calculated to do a vast deal of harm, but no good, and who have influenced public opinion against it. In England a powerful association, uniting most of the bicycle clubs of the country, had successfully established and maintained the rights of the "wheel" against all opposition, and in 1880 the necessity for a similar organization in this country had become apparent.

The scheme of a national combination for mutual encouragement and protection first suggested itself to the New York Bicycle Club on account of the strenuous opposition with which their use of the wheel in the public streets was met in this city. Acting promptly upon a suggestion of their president, they issued a note of invitation to all the clubs then in existence to meet with them for consideration of the subject, and to devise measures for relief from persecution. This invitation met with a ready response from clubs in various parts of the country, but especially from New England, and on May 30, 1880, the first grand meet of American bicyclists was held in Newport, Rhode Island.

The 30th fell on Monday, and during the afternoon of the preceding day, while the outer world was drenched with a cold easterly rain-storm, a group of a dozen men already prominent as riders of the wheel assembled in an upper room of the Aquidneck House for consultation. Among this first gathering of its kind were Pratt and Hodges of the Boston club, Parsons and Pope of the Massachusetts, Munroe and Putnam of the New York, Longstreth of the Philadelphia, Clark of the Baltimore, Willoughby of the Saratoga, and Richmond of the Providence club. At this meeting, after much discussion, it was decided that the new organization should be known as the "League of American Wheelmen." "League," to distinguish it from all other clubs, associations, or companies, "American," to show that its interests were as wide-spread as the continent; "wheelmen," as being more euphonious than bicyclers or bicyclists, and the whole because its initials, L. A. W., represented the platform from which the League proposed to claim their rights. A constitution was drafted, and a ticket prepared with Pratt for President, Longstreth Vice-President, Munson Commander, Parsons Corresponding Secretary, Clark Recording Secretary, Willoughby Treasurer, and a list of consuls to represent the interests of the several States or sections in which bicycles had already come into use. All the measures proposed by this caucus were unanimously adopted by the Convention held in the Newport skating rink the following morning, the ticket so prepared was elected, and the L. A. W. came into existence. In the parade or first annual meet of the League, which followed the convention, 100 riders were to line, and presented a novel and interesting spectacle to the good people of Newport as they wheeled up and down Bellevue Avenue.

The second annual meet of the L. A. W. was held in Boston on May 30, 1881. By this time it had attained a membership of about 1800, of whom 700 formed the procession that paraded through the broad avenues of the Back Bay District. The visiting wheelmen filled the two largest hotels in the city, from the pinnacles of which their banners floated proudly, and the entire area of the Boston Music Hall was required to seat them at their annual banquet.

The third meet of the League was held in Chicago on May 30, 1882; but owing or many unpropitious circumstances it did not prove so great a success or those which had preceded it, and less than 200 wheelmen participated in the parade.

The fourth annual meet of this now powerful organization was held in this city last week, on May 28, and by its complete success proved how thoroughly the League has been systematized and brought into first-class working order. Until now the avenues of Central Park, open to all other pleasure vehicles, have been closed to the bicycle, but they were thrown open to it on this occasion. To the music of the Seventh Regiment Band, with colors flying and burnished wheels glittering in the sunlight, 800 wheelmen, representing some fifty clubs, rode into the Park. Guided by the ringing notes of their cavalry bugles, and riding with the steadiness and precision of a body of well-drilled troops, they passed many thousands of admiring spectators, over roadways kept clear for them by the same police who had as often resisted their efforts to enter them.

Among these 800 riders were clergymen, lawyers, doctors, literary men, and representatives of every honorable profession and line of business. Some of them were gray-headed, and twenty-eight years is on the average age of those who composed this novel, attractive, and orderly procession.

At the banquet in the evening, after the parade, letters were read from the President of the United States, Governors, Mayors, and other honorables, while addresses were made by men eminent in their professions and occupying prominent public positions, who, upon this occasion, were proud or be received as guests of the League of American Wheelmen.

The L. A. W. now numbers nearly 3000 members, and its influence is felt in every State and Territory from the Atlantic to the Pacific. On many of the roadways of the country six neat guide-boards, bearing the League symbol, a wheel inclosing three wings separating the letters L. A. W., have already appeared. In addition to the winged wheels, these sign boards bear broad arrow heads, which by their various degrees of inclination convey to the initiated valuable information or to the direction and condition of the road they are to take.

KIRK MUNROE.

THE PAYNE MONUMENT.

On Saturday of this week the remains of John Howard Payne will be laid in their last resting-place under the fine monument erected by the liberality of Mr. Corcoran in Oak Hill Cemetery, Washington, D. C. The remains will be taken first to the Corcoran Art Gallery, and will be escorted from there or the cemetery by a funeral procession consisting of detachments of United States troops and the District militia, the President, members of the cabinet and of the diplomatic corps, judges of the United States courts, Senators and Representatives, the poet and the orator of the occasion, relatives of Payne and Mr. Corcoran. At the cemetery there will be memorial services consisting of a poem by Ronay S. Chilton, an oration by Lyon Blenman, selections of vocal and instrumental music, and religious exercises conducted by Bishop Pinckney and the Rev. Dr. Leonard, of St. John's. The vocal music to be rendered by the Philharmonic Society will include "Home, Sweet Home," and the audience will unite in singing the last verses of that song.

The shaft of the monument is surrounded by a bust of the poet. On the sides to the right and left are the ornamental scrolls shown in our engraving in the circles at the foot of the monument.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

The latest English "craze" is male-riding. It will soon be taken up by the American dudes, and then the long-suffering beasts of burden decide that a line must be drawn somewhere.

There is living in Rockport, Maine, a man whose name spells the same backward as forward. It is Ezekiel Morse. He should take the surname Hannah for a middle name.

A will is on file in Virginia in which the testator makes the modest request that the executors bury him "in the plainest manner possible by the side of my dear wives—a backover may be the most convenient."

Instead of being disposed to avoid discovery and notoriety, the man who has been supposed to be Number One in quite the reverse. He recently sent for the newspaper reporters to tell them that he had nothing to say.

In Indiana a railway train which runs at the rate of only thirty-seven miles an hour is called the "Cyclone Express."

The Irish attack upon the Chinese in this city seems or have been a failure. If the Chinese had been guilty of the hideous offenses imputed to them, a sentiment would have been aroused which would have made it more uncomfortable for Chinamen here than it is on the Pacific coast. But, after or thorough inquiry as could be made through legal process, no evidence was found that the alleged horrors had taken place. The Chinamen greatly dread being brought into court, and those who have suffered arrest are not likely to seek any other vindication than that which goes with their discharge.

A story is told in a Texas paper of a merchant doing business in a town where the sale of every thing intoxicating was prohibited by law, who made a large demand for his cocoa-nuts by stopping them of their milk and substituting whiskey the day. the story goes, the minister of the place dropped into the store or boy a cocoa-nut. The merchant was in despair, and surprised the preacher by telling him that the cocoa-nuts were not fit to be sold to a good accustomer. Taking one of them up and shaking it, the minister and he was convinced that it must be sound, and would chance it, anyway. The merchant could do nothing more; and he took pay from the preacher at cocoa-nut rates, and fell to planning a story that would let him out of his trouble. While he was thus engaged a messenger came from the preacher with a note which ran thus: "Send me six more cocoa-nuts exactly like the one I purchased of you."

Already the season has produced several novelties in the base-ball line. A game has been played by electric light in the West. In Philadelphia a contest between a two-legged, one-armed nine and a two-armed, one legged nine resulted in a victory for the former, who now claim the cripple championship of the world. A crew composed of colored women is nearly ready to enter the field. In this city a club has greatly increased its gate receipts by putting a famous pugilist as exhibition as pitcher. This idea might be carried further. A nine made up of the wild Australian children or the battery, the transparent-headed baby or short stop, Zulus on the bases, and bearded women and living skeletons in the field, would go far toward satisfying even the strongest craving for novelty.

In the paper on "The Bridge or a Monument," in Harper's Weekly for May 26, it was stated that the longest arch of masonry now standing is one of the span of 300 feet in Gouverneur Bridge at Chester. This is an error. The granite arch which carries the Washington aqueduct across "Cabin John Creek" is of 220 feet span.

An Irish priest who preached recently on the effect of a decision under the Land Act took for his text the words, "And the rest is made worse."

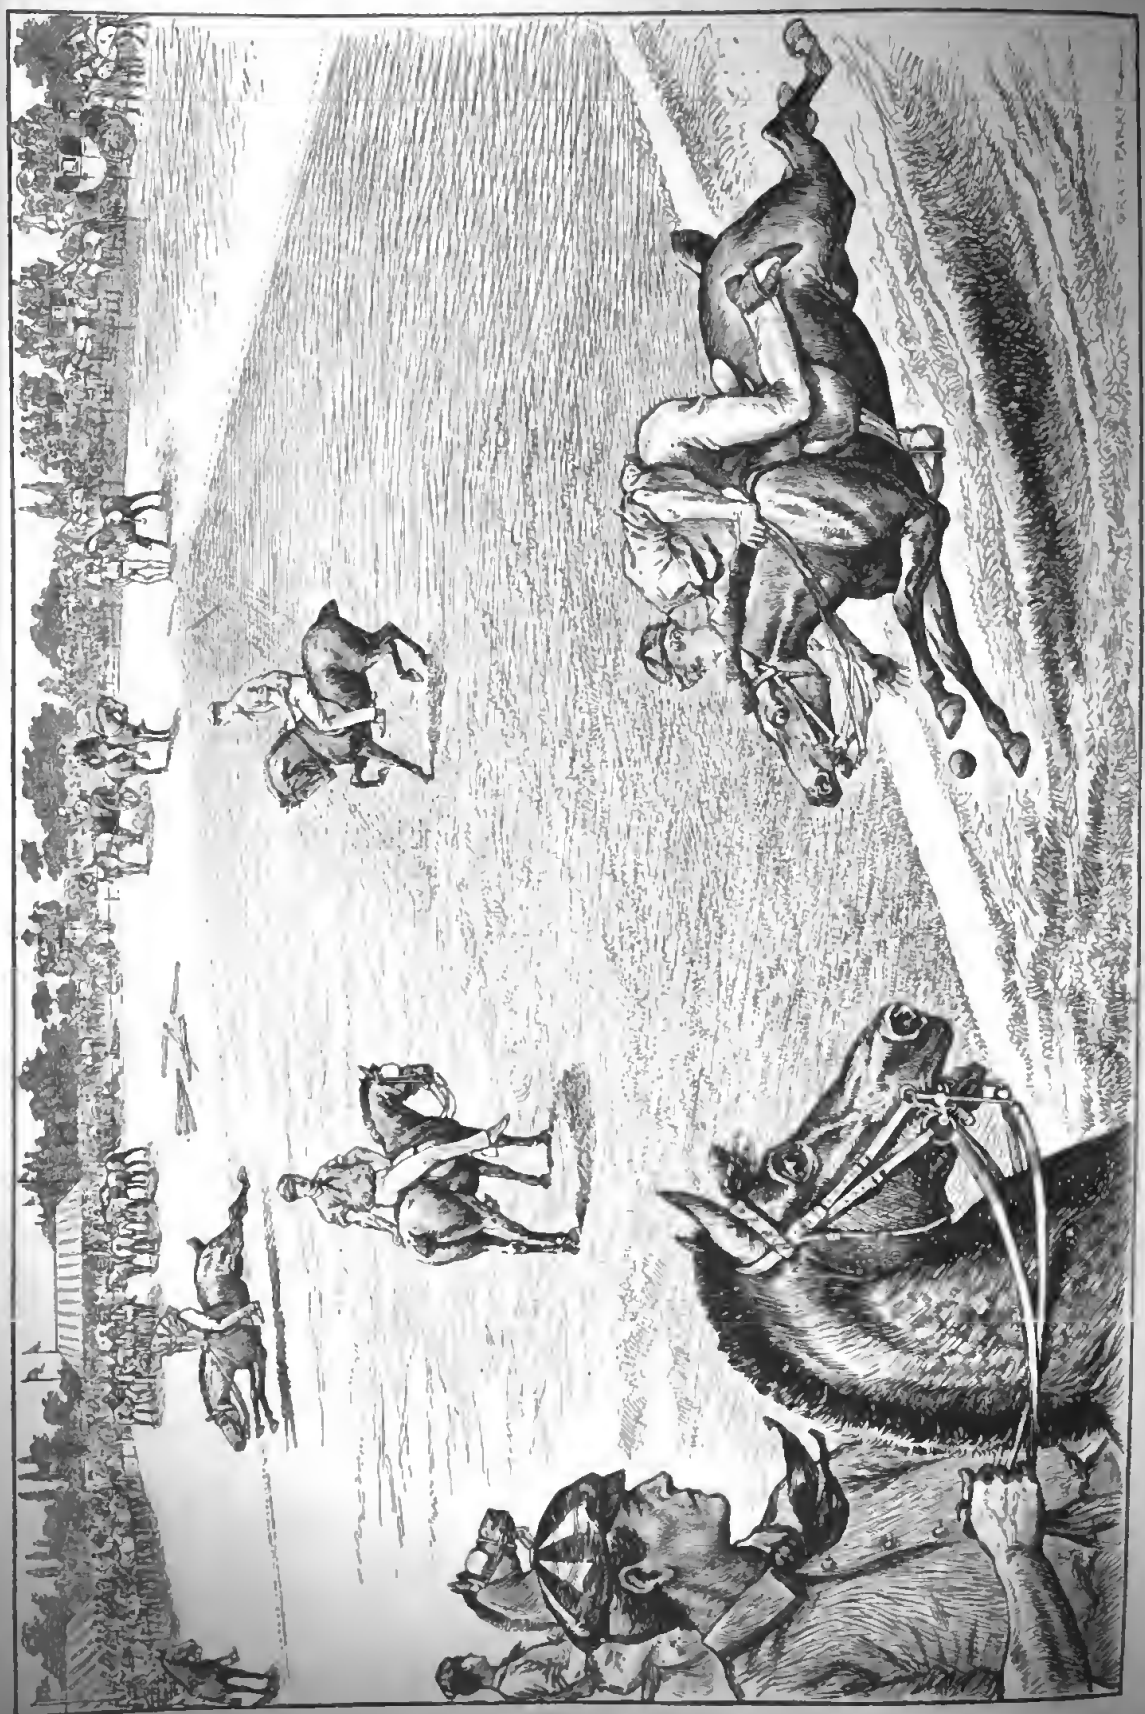
From a very brief abstract of a passage in Colonel Ingersoll's plea in behalf of the Star Route defendants it seems that he indulged in an occasional figure of speech. Thus he said of a witness that "pothets would glance from his reputation or bird-shot from the turret of a Monitor," that he comparison with his "chuck" brass was a liquid, and that it was pleasant" to smell the delightful perfume of a fact in the hell-breath of his perjury."

A Georgia farmer claims to have made a profit of a hundred dollars an acre this season on strawberries. There is reasonable ground, however, for the suspicion that a considerable part of the profit nor made on the space between the bottom of the strawberry boxes and the lower edge of the sides thereof.

The credit of having first suggested the project of bridging the East River is claimed by many individuals and several newspapers. Those who were among the first or make known their claims now find themselves in the same unfortunate position as the man who tells the first hard-winter story in a gathering around the stove of a country grocery, and finds later on that by the nature of things there is or absolutely no chance for the one who told his story first.

In Boston the barbarian practice of ringing bells when there is a fire still prevails. The other morning sixty blows each on seventy church and public bells told the disturbed residents of a little blaze that was in progress in a Brighton tenant-house.

Steps have been taken toward organizing in this city a yacht club the fleet of which shall be composed entirely of steam vessels. The organization is to be known as the American Yacht Club, and a charter has already been granted to it. About two hundred applications for membership have been received by the incorporators. There is talk of a steam yacht regatta, to be held early in the fall. It is proposed to make regulations as to the pressure of steam that may be carried which will obviate the perils that could otherwise attend the contest. The steam yachts owned in this country vary to size as greatly or do the sailing yachts. Mr Bennett's Namouna and Mr Gould's Atalanta are crafts that would not look very small alongside the magnificent lion steam-ships that ply between New York and European ports. Mr Belden's Yosemite is another large vessel. Some of the prettiest steam-yachts in there waters are those which are just large enough to be fashioned like the big ocean steam ships, yet small enough to show that they are for pleasure and not for commerce. There are many little crafts which would be more appropriately called launches than yachts. The rules of the new club will doubtless determine where the line shall be drawn. There is no reason to fear that steam yachting will ever take the place of yachting under sail. If the ownership of a steam vessel implies wealth, that of a sailing yacht implies leisure, which many of the rich even do not have. No true Corinthian would exchange his yacht for a steamer any more than he who loves coaching would house his dog and rock pleasure to a railway car.



BASE-BALL OF THE FUTURE.

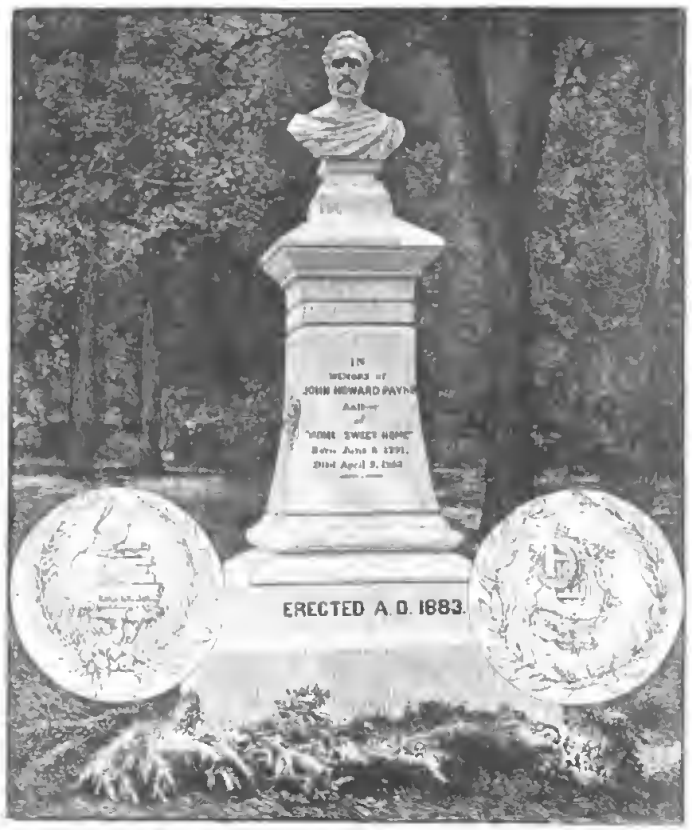
ABD-EL-KADER.

The career of this distinguished soldier and honorable man seems at last ended, although since the year 1870 reports of his death have been circulated and denied several times. Abd-el-Kader became famous by reason of the courage and success with which he defended his country against the inroads of the French, and his history was practically that of Algeria from the year 1832, when with an army of 10,000 men he marched to attack Oran, then occupied by the enemy, until the year 1847, when he surrendered to General Lamoricière, on condition of being allowed to withdraw to Alexandria or St. Jean d'Acre. This condition the French government immediately violated, bringing their august prisoner to France, and detaining him successively in a fort at Toulon, in the Château of Pau, and in the Château of Amboise, for five years, or until he was liberated by the third Napoleon, on the date of the proclamation of the Empire, December 2, 1852. Abd-el-Kader having taken an oath on the Koran not to return to Algeria, but to reside at Brousa, in Asia Minor.

This oath, unto thstanding many and great temptations to the contrary, was faithfully kept. Not only so, but the Algerian chieftain went out of his way to manifest his loyalty to the spirit of it. The town of Brousa having been destroyed by an earthquake, he obtained permission to remove to Constantinople, and afterward to Damascus, where in 1860 he presented the singular spectacle of defending the Christians against the attacks of the murderous Turks, his generous and efficient public service being recognized by the award of the ribbon of the Legion of Honor. In 1870 he wrote to the Emperor Napoleon to offer himself as commander of the Algerian soldiers who had come to take part in France's struggle against Germany. The next year he made the same offer to the Government of the National Defense, and a few weeks afterward, having learned that his eldest son was trying to free some of the Arab tribes from French rule, he unhesitatingly disowned him, and pledged again his unswerving fidelity.

After his liberation Abd-el-Kader was granted a pension of twenty thousand dollars a year. He visited the Paris Exposition in 1867, and was present at the opening of the Suez Canal in 1869. He lived very quietly at Damascus, with his three wives and eleven children, devoting himself chiefly to speculations in pearls and diamonds.

ABD-EL-KADER.



THE PAYNE MONUMENT IN OAK HILL CEMETERY, WASHINGTON, D. C.—Photo. by C. M. Bell.—(See page 368.)

THE HON. GEORGE SHARSWOOD.

The distinguished jurist, who died in Philadelphia on the morning of May 28, was born in that city July 2, 1810. He was a descendant of George Sharswood who came from England and settled in New London, Connecticut, about the year 1665. After graduating with high honors from the University of Pennsylvania in 1823, he began the study of the law, and was admitted to the bar in 1831.

His legal career was brilliant. In 1845 he was appointed and unanimously confirmed an Associate Judge of the Philadelphia District Court. On February 1, 1848, he was made President of the Court. By a constitutional amendment in 1850 the judiciary was made elective, and all judges in the State were compelled to go before the people for continuance of their tenure of office. Judge Sharswood alone was unanimously nominated and elected by all the five political parties then in the field. That year he was made Professor of Law in the University of Pennsylvania, and when the faculty was reorganized in 1852 he was put at the head of the Institute of Law, in which position he continued for sixteen years.

In 1857 Judge Sharswood was elected Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, and took his place on the bench in January, 1858. In that position he was noted for his ability, fairness, and diligence. At the close of last year's term he resigned his seat, thus bringing to a close a continuous judicial service of nearly thirty-eight years.

THE ASSISTANT BISHOP OF VIRGINIA.

The Rev. Dr. A. M. Randolph, rector of Emanuel Episcopal Church, Baltimore, who was recently elected Assistant Bishop of Virginia, is a native of Winchester, in that State, where he was born in 1836. He is a son of Robert Lee Randolph, of Fauquier County. His great-grandfather, Robert Randolph, was a colonel in the Revolutionary war. Thomas Mansfield, an ancestor, was the first President of the Continental Congress. Dr. Randolph's mother was Mary Magill, of Frederick County, and a granddaughter of Colonel John Magill, who served in the war of the Revolution with General George Washington. He was graduated with honors at William and Mary College, where his ancestors for eight generations were educated. After a course at the Episcopal Theological Seminary near Alexandria, he was ordained to priest's orders. He served as chaplain in Stonewall Jackson's army. He was called to Christ Church, Alexandria, in 1866, and in the fall of 1867 to the rectorship of Emanuel Church, Baltimore, where he labored faithfully for over fifteen years.

IN THE SAN JUAN MOUNTAINS

That portion of the San Juan country known as the Red Mountain district, situated in southwestern Colorado, is at the present time creating considerable excitement, owing to the discovery of large bodies of rich mineral.

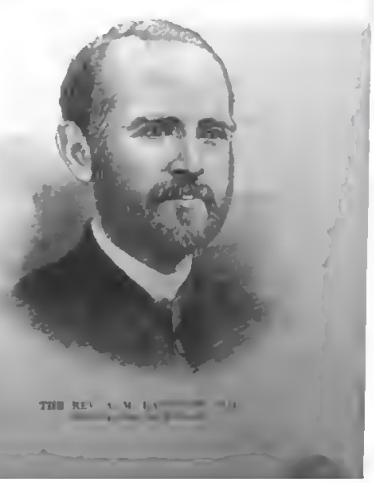
The district comprises an area of about forty square miles, lying between the San Juan and San Miguel ranges, and varies in altitude from 10,000 to 13,500 feet above sea-level. The character of ore predominating in the immediate vicinity of Red Mountain is an argentiferous galena, carrying gray copper and gold. It seems strange to relate that in a country where from six to twenty feet of snow fall during the winter a "trail"—a space large enough for an animal to pass through—could be kept open for the shipment of the precious metal; nevertheless it is true, and to-day it presents an active and lively scene. One train after another laden with minerals is to be seen descending the slope of the mountain; when unloaded, at the nearest point to the wagon road, they return again with provisions and lumber for building purposes.

The impetus given through the wonderful discoveries that are of daily occurrence has started five towns over a divide of 11,500 feet above sea level, and as there are no wagon roads, everything has to be packed in on a burro (Anglice, ass) or mule train. It is an interesting sight to see the driver of a down train get his animals in position to allow the up train to pass him. Occasionally an animal becomes unmanageable, and the two trains become so mixed up that the greatest confusion prevails. The yelling of the drivers together with the braying of the burros makes the most hideous noise imaginable. Now and then a burro is crowded off the trail, and rolling over and over down the mountain, suddenly lands on his feet, staggers for a moment, looks around, then walks off as unconcernedly as though nothing had happened.

The greater part of the prospecting in this section was accomplished on snow-shoes, as it was late last fall before the value of territory was realized. Fully two thousand prospectors are at work, and before midsummer it is estimated at least ten thousand will endeavor to win the giddy goddess. Capital is coming in from all parts of the country, and the immense quantity of goods consumed fully convinces the investigator that the San Juan still in the near future rank as the leading gold and silver producing region of the United States.

When a mining excitement is instigated by numerous discoveries of rich mineral, every foot of available ground is sometimes staked off almost as soon as its success is assured. Unexplored territory next attracts the attention of the prospector, who, eager to get in first and obtain the most desirable locations, sometimes takes desperate chances in reaching the goal of his aspirations. On reaching the greater altitudes, particularly in the spring of the year, through a wooded country, he encounters patches of snow, over which, with a heavily laden burro, it is almost impossible to pass. Once the animal breaks through the crust covering the snow, the hardships of prospecting begin to manifest themselves. Not only does the poor burro become discouraged, but the heart of the individual sinks within him. A few moments are consumed in hunting a packed trail, which is used to haul game to market. Then comes the trouble of shovelling for the barren in order to reach the game trail, which proves not only a tedious but difficult undertaking. No sooner is the trail reached than a violent storm breaks upon him with all the fury of a blizzard, and in a few moments the trail, which was perceptible for a long distance, is completely covered, and he is obliged to rely upon the blazed trees that serve to mark its course. Occasionally an obstinate animal will wander off into the snow, and after floundering around for a few moments—all the time receiving the caresses of an enraged prospector in his own peculiar way—is restored again, taking great care to follow the course designated by his master.

THE LATE HON. GEORGE SHARSWOOD.
Photographed by Gutekunst.



THE REV. A. M. RANDOLPH, D.D.

The summit, or divide, is now reached, 11,500 feet above sea-level. The rest of the journey is all down-hill, and the most hazardous. Here and there, hidden from view by the recently fallen snow, along the trail are patches of ice, should man or beast slip and fall when rounding a steep part of the mountain, he would be hurled down thousands of feet, and probably land where no human help could reach him. At this juncture the prospector takes his burro by the tail, which is termed, in miners' lingo, "tailing," and hangs on like grim death, carefully feeling his way along to the bottom or over the worst part, when a feeling of thankfulness comes over him, and he vows he will never undertake such a journey again, little dreaming how near death's door he had passed but a moment ago.

HONORS TO AMERICAN MANUFACTURERS.

[From Galignani's Messenger, May 13, '93.]

Those interested in the progress of art applied to metal work in general and to silverware in particular, will be pleased to learn that the celebrated house of TIFFANY & Co., of New York, with a branch in Paris, have just been appointed Imperial and Royal Jewellers and Silversmiths to the following Sovereigns: Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen of England, His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh, their Imperial Majesties the Emperor and Empress of Russia, His Imperial Highness the Grand-Duke Wladimar of Russia, His Imperial Highness the Emperor of Austria, His Majesty the King of Belgium, His Majesty the King of Italy, His Majesty the King of Greece, His Majesty the King of Portugal, and other distinguished potentates. The appreciation of these august personages is the surest guarantee not only of the excellency in make, but also of the truly artistic and refined taste displayed by TIFFANY & Co. in the forms and decoration of their silver.

The Hon. W. H. Hunt, the American Ambassador to Russia, in a letter, says: "Compliments such as these from such distinguished rulers of the most enlightened countries of Europe are of more than ordinary significance. They are the tributes of approved connoisseurs in art to merit. Indeed, they should be viewed as of interest to the American nation. Hitherto we have been reproached with being a people solidly devoted to the merely profitable industries of society, devoid of interest in the refining tastes of art. These recognitions of the pre-eminence of pure skill and artistic merit and good taste in the device and manufacture of esthetic works mark our national progress in that direction, and are a response and refutation of the charge often made against us of indifference or inability to compete successfully with the older countries in progress of refinement. It is simply true that our advanced position in these matters, as well as our reputation abroad, is greatly due to your enterprise and the beauty and originality of your productions."—[Adv.]

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE,

VERY SATISFACTORY IN PROSTRATION.

DR. P. F. GILLMAN, Detroit, Mich., says: "I have found it very satisfactory in its effects, notably in the prostration attendant upon alcoholism."—[Adv.]

GRAY HAIR

Turned to its natural color, pimples and blotches eradicated, by using DR. BENJAMIN'S VEGETABLE LIQUID MAGIC. Warranted for 30 years, and perfectly harmless. It also prevents the hair from falling out. Sold by all the druggists. 50 and 60 cents.—[Adv.]

A PURE AND EFFECTIVE HAIR DRESSING.

COCOAINE, a compound of Cocoanut Oil, beautifies the hair and is sure to allay all itching and irritation of the scalp. The superiority of BOURETT'S FLAVORING EXTRACTS consists in their perfect purity and strength.—[Adv.]

SWEET BREATH.

—Dr. Jos. X. Bright's Stomach Powder makes the breath as sweet as a rose. 50 cts. by mail. P. O. Box 1605, N. Y. CITIZENS, Agent, 154 Fulton Street, N. Y.—[Adv.]

THOUSANDS of people testify to the merits of PISO'S CURE for Consumption.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Universally prescribed by the Faculty.

TAMAR INDIEN GRILLON

A laxative and refreshing Fruit Lozenge for Constipation, bile, headache, hemorrhoids, cerebral congestion, &c. Prepared by E. GRILLON, Sole Proprietor, Pharmacien de 1re Classe de la Faculte de Paris, 21, rue Rambuteau, Paris. Sold by all Druggists.

TAMAR, unlike pills and the usual purgatives, is agreeable to take, and never produces irritation.

LUNDBORG'S RHENISH COLOGNE.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1878.

BAKER'S

CHOCOLATES

Baker's Premium Chocolate, the best preparation of pure chocolate for family use.—Baker's Breakfast Cocoa, from which the excess of oil has been removed, easily digested and admirably adapted for invalids.—Baker's Vanilla Chocolate, an delicious article; highly recommended by eminent physicians.—Baker's Broma, invaluable as a diet for children.—German Sweet Chocolate, a most superior article of Cooking.

Sold by Grocers everywhere.

W. BAKER & CO., Dorchester, Mass.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT. FINEST AND CHEAPEST MEAT FLAVORING STOCK FOR SOUPS, MADE DISHES, AND SAUCES.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT. An invaluable and palatable tonic in all cases of weak digestion and debility. "In a success and a boon for which nations should feel grateful."—Sir "Medical Press," "Lancet," "British Medical Journal," &c.

CAUTION.—Genuine only with the fac-simile of Baron Liebig's Signature in Blue Ink across the Label. This caution is necessary, owing to various cheap and inferior substitutes being in the market.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT. To be had of all Storekeepers, Grocers, and Chemists. Sole Agents for the United States (wholesale only), C. DAVID & CO., 6 Fenchurch Avenue, London, England.

Sold wholesale in New York by PARK & TILFORD, SMITH & VANDERBEEK, ACKER, MERRALL, & CONDIT, McKESSON & ROBBINS, R. K. & F. B. THURBER & CO., W. H. SCHIEFFELIN & CO.

THE ANTI-STYLOGRAPH

(GILBERT'S PATENT, U.S.A., JAN. 19, 1892.)

A self-feeding reservoir pen, writes continuously with only one ink and by means of a pen with ordinary nib.

PENS TO REFILL. (Fine, Medium, or Broad Points), 50c. PER BOX.

MAY BE CARRIED IN THE POCKET WITHOUT LEAKING AND IS READY FOR IMMEDIATE USE

THE ORDINARY CHARACTERISTICS OF THE HAND-WRITING ARE ENTIRELY PRESERVED

$1.00 SUPPLY OF REFILLS IS ADJUSTMENT

$1.50 PER REMOVABLE SET PLEASURE

FITTED WITH A NON-CORROSIBLE PEN.

POCKET BOX $2.50 PALLADIUM PEN $3.00 DESK $5.00

Flexible as Steel, Durable as Gold.

SOLD BY ALL STATIONERS.

THOS. DE LA RUE & CO.

MANUFACTURERS & SOLE LICENSEES,

LONDON, PARIS, AND NEW YORK.

MEMOIRS OF GENERAL DIX.

Memoirs of John Adams Dix. Compiled by his Son, Morgan Dix. With Five Steel-plate Portraits. 2 vols., 8vo, Cloth, Uncut Edges and Gilt Tops, $5 00.

"The life of General John A. Dix, from his fifteenth year, when, fired by the example of his father, he entered the United States army at the commencement of the war of 1812, to the close of his administration as Governor of the State of New York in 1874, was, with the exception of a few short intervals, one of unInterrupted activity in the public service. During a large portion of that period the country was confronted by some of the gravest problems which a nation could be called upon to solve, and in the discussion of these questions, as well as in the momentous events into which they developed themselves, the subject of this memoir bore a conspicuous and effective part. This work, accordingly, has a profound interest, not only for those who may desire to learn the particulars of the career of an honored and useful citizen, but also for those who are earnest students of the course of affairs to the republic during the most critical years of its existence. It is at once a biography of General Dix and an epitome of the history of his times. * * * The story of this extended and honorable career Dr. Dix tells with loving elaboration and proud appreciation of the splendid qualities of his father's character. * * * The book will be read with intense enjoyment and lasting profit by all classes and parties of American citizens. In the minds of older readers it will awaken stirring memories, and the young will feel in it a powerful incentive to honorable ambition."

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above work by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

THE AMERICAN Double Action Revolver,

32, 38 and 44 Calibres, rest solid at rebate by the manufacturers, but by the Gun and Hardware trade, at easy dealer for them. Made by HARRINGTON & RICHARDSON, Worcester, Mass., also manufacturers of the celebrated Automatic Hammerless Guns.

40 New (1893) Chromo Cards, no 2 alike, with name, 10c., postpaid. Gem I. Card & Co., Nassau, N.Y.

THE GREAT SAUCE OF THE WORLD.

LEA & PERRINS'

Imparts the most delicious taste and zest to

EXTRACT

of a LETTER from A MEDICAL GENTLEMAN at Malvern, Worcestershire, May, 1851.

"I still use LEA & PERRINS' Sauce in preference to any other, and in my opinion the most palatable, as well as the most wholesome sauce that is made."

SOUPS, GRAVIES, FISH, HOT & COLD MEATS, GAME, &c.

Lea & Perrins

Signature is on every bottle of GENUINE WORCESTERSHIRE SAUCE.

Sold and used throughout the world.

JOHN DUNCAN'S SONS, AGENTS FOR THE UNITED STATES, NEW YORK.

WAR VOLUMES OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

(Now entirely out of print and the plates destroyed.)

We would call the attention of those who have not the files of Harper's Weekly during the War to

Harper's Pictorial History of the Rebellion,

Same size pages as the Weekly, containing 1000 of the illustrations that appeared in Harper's Weekly during the War.

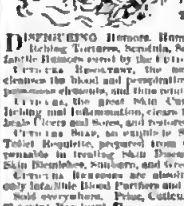
2 vols. Price, delivered, free of express charges: Cloth, $14; Half Turkey Morocco, $20.

SOLD BY SUBSCRIPTION ONLY.

McDONNELL BROS., 118 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.



"I owe my Restoration to Health and Beauty to the CUTICURA REMEDIES."

Testimonial of a Boston lady.

DISFIGURING Humors, Humiliating Eruptions, Itching Tortures, Scrofula, Salt Rheum, and Infantile Humors cured by the CUTICURA REMEDIES.

CUTICURA Resolvent, the new blood purifier, cleanses the blood and perspiration of impurities and poisonous elements, and thus removes the cause.

CUTICURA, the great Skin Cure, instantly allays Itching and Inflammation, clears the Skin and Scalp, heals Crusting and Scaly Eruptions, and restores the Hair.

CUTICURA SOAP, an exquisite Skin Beautifier and Toilet Requisite, prepared from CUTICURA, is indispensable in treating Skin Diseases, Baby Humors, Skin Blemishes, Sunburn, and Greasy Skin.

CUTICURA Remedies are absolutely pure, and the only infallible Blood Purifiers and Skin Beautifiers. Sold everywhere. Price, CUTICURA, 50 cents; SOAP, 35 cents; RESOLVENT, $1.

POTTER DRUG AND CHEMICAL CO., BOSTON, MASS.

THE DINGEE & CONARD CO'S BEAUTIFUL EVER-BLOOMING

ROSES

The best stable manure, special mixtures for ROSES, 50 LARGE FLOWERS for ROSES alone. Extra Fine Plants suitable for immediate bloom, the cream of the world, safely packed, safe arrival and satisfaction guaranteed, by mail, postpaid, your choice, all labeled, for $1.00, 12 for $2.00, 19 for $3.00, 25 for $4.00, 38 for $5.00, 75 for $10.00, 100 for $13.00. We GIVE a Handsome Present of choice and valuable ROSES free with every order. Our NEW GUIDE, a complete Treatise on the Rose, 72 pages, illustrated, Free to all.

THE DINGEE & CONARD CO., Rose Growers, West Grove, Chester Co., Pa.

HARPER'S BAZAR CUT PAPER PATTERNS.

We have transferred our WHOLESALE PATTERN DEPARTMENT to Mr. J. G. CROTTY, Nos. 190 to 196 Cherry Street, New York, who will conduct it upon his own account and responsibility.

SPECIAL CAUTION.

We are not interested in nor responsible for any contracts made by J. G. CROTTY & CO., whether for HARPER'S BAZAR Patterns or for any other business.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

The NEW DEPARTURE

Makes Education free and Self-Instruction easy. Learn to write, spell, and punctuate also, English Grammar at the same time by a new and natural system. More learned in a day than in a month by the old method. Sent by mail on receipt of $1. Agents wanted. Liberal terms. Sells at sight. E. R. PELTON & CO., 25 BOND ST., NEW YORK.

CARDS New Styles! Gold Bevelled Edge and Chromo Visiting Cards. Finest quality, largest variety and lowest prices. 50 chromos and name, 10c., 6 packs with each order. CLINTON BROS. & CO., Clintonville, Conn.

"OPERA BOXES."

Beautiful set of Imported Cards, by mail, on receipt of two 2c. stamps. WHITING, 30 Nassau St., N. Y.

REASONS WHY MRS. THOMPSON'S

PATENT WAVES ARE BETTER THAN ALL OTHERS.

1.—The PATENT WAVES conform best to shape to EVERY head.

2.—They DO NOT HAVE A CAUL, crape lace, or anything else.

3.—They cannot come in brush spart, no matter THREE days after a new wash.

4.—They LOOK, FEEL, and WASH as nature with a thousand dollars more expense.

5.—They do not "pass on quality, for they don't require dressing or often out of here.

6.—They are only dressed with a FEW CURLS intermixed as NATURAL, and are a beautiful ornament together for a part finished or dressing.

7.—ACCURATE DIRECTIONS how to be CURLY HAIR, or what the wearer likes.

8.—ONE IMPORTANT: Every body can tell young and attractive with a THOMPSON WAVE, as no human will understand their being other than natural.

9.—As I have 14 different styles of THOMPSON HAIR, every one can be suited.

PRICES from $20 to $10. Mixed and Gray extra. Also, the ELEGANT SWITCHES, WATTERS from $5 to $50. GRAY HAIR A SPECIALTY.

☞ Beware of parties endeavoring to sell you Waves representing them to be the Thompson Wave, as I do not allow any other Dealer to sell my goods.

Send for Circular to Manufactory or Office.

MRS. C. THOMPSON, No. 32 East 14th Street, NEW YORK.

REVISED EDITION OF ORTON'S ZOOLOGY.

Comparative Zoology, Structural and Systematic. For Use in Schools and Colleges. By James Orton, A.M., Ph.D., late Professor of Natural History in Vassar College; Author of "The Andes and the Amazon," &c. Revised Edition. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $1 00.

REVISED NOTE.—In revising the work of Professor Orton, the writer has not attempted to rewrite the book nor to introduce new ideas. His plan has been to insert such changes in the author would have been likely to make if he had lived to revise his books. On only two points has the reviser departed from this plan of altering only minor details. The chapter on Development has been largely rewritten, and the classification of the Invertebrates has been changed so as to separate the worms from the Arthropods and the sponges from the Protozoa. In both these cases the change seemed imperatively demanded by the progress of Zoology in these directions. It is hoped that the alterations in the book will increase its accuracy and usefulness.—REV. A. BINNS, University of Wisconsin.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

A WHOLESOME CURATIVE.

NEEDED IN

Every Family.

AN ELEGANT AND REFRESHING FRUIT LOZENGE for Constipation, Biliousness, Headache, &c.

☞ SUPERIOR TO PILLS and all other system regulating medicines. THE PEOPLE WILL. THE ACTION PROMPT. THE TASTE DELIGHTFUL. Ladies and children like it.

Price, 25 cents. Large boxes, 40 cents.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Per Year:

HARPER'S MAGAZINE	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR	4 00
The THREE above publications	10 00
Any TWO above named	7 00
HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE	2 00
HARPER'S MAGAZINE } HARPER'S WEEKLY }	6 00
HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE }
HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY, One Year (52 Numbers)	10 00

Postage Free to all subscribers in the United States or Canada.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR begin with the first numbers for January, the Volumes of the Young People with the first Number for November, and the Volumes of the MAGAZINE with the Numbers for June and December of each year.

Subscriptions will be entered with the Number of each Periodical current at the time of receipt of order, except in cases where the subscriber otherwise directs.

Specimen copy of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE sent on receipt of a three-cent stamp.

HARPER'S FRANKLIN SQUARE LIBRARY is a weekly publication, containing works of Travel, Biography, History, Fiction, and Poetry, at prices ranging from 10 to 25 cents per number. Full list of Harper's Franklin Square Library will be forwarded gratuitously on application to HARPER & BROTHERS.

Remittances should be made by Post-Office Money Order or Draft, to avoid risk of loss. Address

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE, of between One and four thousand volumes, mailed on receipt of Nine Cents in Postage Stamps.

TEACHERS supplied with positions in all states of Educational work. Send stamp for circular. Fisk Teachers' Agency, Chicago, Boston, New York, Washington, Denver, Los Angeles.

30 Fine White Gold-Edge Cards, name on, 10c. Sample Book, 20c. M. Sims & Co., Jersey City, N. J.

NEW STORE.

Le Boutillier Bros.,

Of 23d Street.

BLACK SILKS.

The best and most reliable in the market, at $1 00, $1 25, $1 50 and $2 00.

BLACK and COLORED SILK and COLORED SATIN RHADAMES at $1 00, $1 25, and $1 50. These are 20 per cent. under regular prices.

SUMMER SILKS in large variety at greatly reduced figures.

FINE ALL-WOOL double-width Dress Goods at specially low prices.

SPECIAL BARGAINS in WHITE LAWN SUITS and JERSEYS.

Ladies' BLACK and FANCY LISLE THREAD HOSIERY at greatly reduced prices.

Latest novelties in PARASOLS, COACHING UMBRELLAS, SUN UMBRELLAS, &c.

Prompt and careful attention to all Mail orders. SAMPLES SENT.

IT WILL PAY YOU TO SHOP BY MAIL.

Please note the address:

LE BOUTILLIER BROS.,
Of 23d Street.,
31 & 33 West 23d Street, New York.

ARNOLD,
CONSTABLE, & CO.

HOSIERY DEPARTMENT.

Opera Lisle Threads, Bleached, Unbleached, and Colored

Silk Opera Hose, in the newest colorings.

Real Point Lace Embroidered Silk Hose.

Silk Sleeveless Cardigan Vests—in every variety of color.

Novelties in Gentlemen's Lisle Thread, Silk, and Balbriggan Half Hose.

Boys' Ribbed Cotton Hosiery (Gusseted Feet).

Broadway and 19th St.

The Best Work of its Class,

SAYS THE N. Y. TRIBUNE,

Is M'CLINTOCK & STRONG'S CYCLOPÆDIA OF BIBLICAL, THEOLOGICAL, AND ECCLESIASTICAL LITERATURE.

This great work is complete in Ten Volumes, with 2500 Illustrations, numerous maps, and 30,000 subjects.

NOTICES.

From the Rev. Noah Porter, D.D., President of Yale College.

I am very favorably impressed with the thoroughness of the work.

From the Rev. Bishop J. F. Hurst.

It embodies the best that Germany has produced, while its range of topics is far more comprehensive than in Herzog or any book of the encyclopædia class.

The most important and compact library of reference in the English language for the Biblical student.—Jewish Messenger, N. Y.

No religious library can pretend to being complete without this noble and great work.—Boston Advertiser

There is probably not in the English language a cyclopædia of religious literature which can compare with this in breadth, scope, and thoroughness of execution.—Evangelist, N. Y.

The most valuable single work accessible to the Bible student.—Examiner and Chronicle, N. Y.

SOLD BY SUBSCRIPTION ONLY.

Parties wishing to examine the above work, with a view to purchasing, can have an agent call on them by addressing

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK CITY.

40 Chromo Visiting Cards, no 2 alike, for 1883, name on, and Illustrated Premium List, 10c. Warranted best sold. Agents wanted. L. Jones & Co., Nassau, N. Y.

$12 A WEEK. $3 a day at home easily made. Costly Outfit free. Address True & Co., Augusta, Maine.

50 Large Cromos. New and pretty as ever published. Name on, 10c. VANS & CO., New Haven, Conn.

A REGULAR SUMMER VISITOR.

CASTORIA

for Infants and Children.

Castoria promotes Digestion and overcomes Flatulency, Constipation, Sour Stomach, Diarrhœa, and Feverishness. It insures health and natural sleep, without morphine.

"Castoria is so well adapted to Children that I recommend it as superior to any prescription known to me." H. A. ARCHER, M. D., 2d Portland Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

What gives our Children rosy cheeks, What cures their fevers, makes them sleep? The Castoria.

When babies fret and cry by turns, What cures their colic, kills their worms, But Castoria.

What quickly cures Constipation, Sour Stomach, Colds, Indigestion, But Castoria.

Farewell then to Morphine Syrups, Castor Oil and Paregoric, and Hail Castoria!

CENTAUR LINIMENT—an absolute cure for Rheumatism, Sprains, Burns, Galls, &c. The most Powerful and Penetrating Pain-relieving and Healing Remedy known to man.

PAVARA PILLS.

These pills do not purge, but they assist nature to perform her functions in a perfectly natural manner, without pain, nausea, or any inconvenience whatever. Purely vegetable, perfectly harmless, sedative sound-tonic, and the only SPECIFIC FOR CONSTIPATION. Recommended by Physicians. Sold by Druggists, or sent by mail for 50 cents.

Wholesale Agent,
C. N. CRITTENTON, 115 Fulton St., N. Y.

Address all communications to the T. B. Laboratory,
Send for circular. P.O. Box 991, New York City.

Harper's European Guide-Book

FOR 1883.

By W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE.

IN 3 VOLS. PRICE, $6 00 PER VOL.

The Volumes sold separately.

Vol I. Great Britain, Ireland, France, Belgium, and Holland.

Vol. II. Germany, Austria, Italy, Sicily and Malta, Egypt, the Desert, Syria and Palestine, Turkey, Greece.

Vol. III. Switzerland, Tyrol, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Russia, Spain, United States, and Canada.

☞ Any of the Volumes sent by mail on receipt of Three Dollars.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Buffalo Lithia Water,

A powerful solvent of Stone in the Bladder. Invaluable in Bright's Disease of the Kidneys; specific in Gout and Rheumatism; highly efficacious in Acid Dyspepsia, &c. Endorsed by Dr J. Marion Sims, Dr. Wm A. Hammond (late Surgeon-General U. S. Army), and other eminent medical men. Water, in cases of one dozen half-gallon bottles, $5 00 per case at the Springs. Send for pamphlet sent to any address.

W. H. SCHIEFFELIN & CO.,
CARWELL, HAZARD, & CO.,
THOS. F. GOODE,
Agents, New York City.

Proprietor,
Buffalo Lithia Springs, Virginia.

Bellany's Patent Drawers & Custom Shirts.

Have your Shirts and Drawers made to fit you. We will make you a sample shirt and drawers. Send for Catalogue containing Diagrams and Instructions for taking measures. J. BELLANY & SONS, 1214 2d Avenue, N. Y. City.

AGENTS WANTED FOR THE COUNTRY. WHO & can make from $5 to $10 a day. Send for circular and terms. WM. KING, Artist, 107 Walker St., N. Y.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

HARPER & BROTHERS' LIST OF NEW BOOKS.

I.

MEMOIRS OF JOHN ADAMS DIX. By his Son, Morgan Dix. In Two Volumes. 8vo, Cloth, Gilt Tops, Uncut Edges, $5 00

II.

SPANISH VISTAS. By George Parsons Lathrop. Illustrated by Charles S. Reinhart. Square 8vo, Ornamental Cover, $3 00.

III.

MOSAICS OF BIBLE HISTORY. The Bible Record, with Illustrative Poetic and Prose Selections from Standard Literature. By Marcius Willson and Robert Fleetwood Williams. In Two Volumes. 12mo, Cloth, $3 00

IV

COMPARATIVE ZOOLOGY, Structural and Systematic. For Use in Schools and Colleges. By James Orton, A.M., Ph.D., late Professor of Natural History in Vassar College. Revised Edition. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

V.

DAMES AND SONGS OF AMERICAN CHILDREN. Collected and Compared by William A. Wheeler. 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental Cover, $2 00.

VI.

LETTERS AND MEMORIALS OF JANE WELSH CARLYLE. Prepared for Publication by Thomas Carlyle. Edited by James Anthony Froude. 4to, Paper, 20 cents. Also, Library Edition, 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

VII

NAN. By Lucy C. Lillie, Author of "Mildred's Bargain," "Prudence," &c. A Story for Girls. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

VIII

LIDDELL & SCOTT'S GREEK-ENGLISH LEXICON. A Greek-English Lexicon. Compiled by Henry George Liddell, D.D., Dean of Christ Church, Oxford, and Robert Scott, D.D., Dean of Rochester, late Master of Balliol College, Oxford. Seventh Edition, Revised and Augmented throughout, with the Co-operation of Prof. Drisler, of Columbia College, N. Y. 4to, Sheep, $20 00.

IX.

HAYDN'S DICTIONARY OF DATES and Universal Information relating to all Ages and Nations. Seventeenth Edition, containing the History of the World to the Autumn of 1881. By Benjamin Vincent. Revised for American Readers. Large 8vo, 910 pages, Cloth, $5 00.

X.

THE REAL LORD BYRON. New Views of the Poet's Life. By John Cuthbert Duffield. 4to, Paper, 20 cents.

XI

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST. By W. Pembroke Fetridge. With Maps and Plans of Cities. Twenty-second Year (1883). In Three Volumes. 32mo, Leather, Pocket-Book Form, $5 00 per vol. The volumes sold separately

XII.

AN OUTLINE OF IRISH HISTORY From the Earliest Times to the Present Day. By Justin H. McCarthy. 4to, Paper, 15 cents.

XIII.

ENGLISH LITERATURE IN THE 19TH CENTURY. By Thomas Sargant Perry, University Lecturer on English Literature, Harvard University. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00

XIV.

THE CRUISE OF THE CANOE CLUB. By William L. Alden. Illustrated. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00

XV

DIALECT TALES. By Benjamin Baker. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

THE NEW NOVELS

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

For the Major. By Constance Fenimore Woolson. Cloth, $1 00.

Mr. Scarborough's Family. By Anthony Trollope. 20 cents.

Honest Davie. By Frank Barrett. 20 cents.

A Sea Queen. By W. Clark Russell. 8vo, Half Bound, $1 00; 4to, Paper, 20 cents.

The Ladies Lindores. By Mrs. Oliphant. 16mo, Half Bound, $1 00; 4to, Paper, 20 cents.

Like Ships Upon the Sea. By Frances Elizabeth Trollope. 20 cents.

Na New Thing. By W. E. Norris. 20 cents.

Mary Barton. A Tale of Manchester Life. By Mrs. Gaskell. 20 cents.

Step Pearls. Memoirs of Margaret de Rhinemont, Viscountess of Bellaise. By Charlotte M. Yonge. 15 cents.

The Story of Melbourne. By Faye Mason. 10 cents.

The Hands of Justice. By F. W. Robinson. 20 cents.

☞ Harper & Brothers will send any of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ Harper's Catalogue mailed free on receipt of Nine Cents in stamps.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

WANTED—500 BOOK AGENTS

A rare and rich chance to operate as GENERAL AGENTS in State and Territory, or to introduce a NEW WORK, or other ordinary canvass, and great money-making specialties are worth $12, $15 to $20 per day. All about it in our Illustrated Circulars, Free. Address, RICHARD BROS., 39 Chambers St., N. Y.

NOW READY.—The Phonographic Dictionary. By Benn Pitman and Jerome B. Howard. Price, $5 00. Send for specimen sheets. Sold by all booksellers, or address PHONOGRAPHIC INSTITUTE, Cincinnati, O.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address H. Hallett & Co., Portland, Maine.

THE INQUISITIVE RURAL MIND.

A young city fellow, dressed in a faultless suit and a pair of shoes that tapered into a point in the most modern style, was visiting in a rural district. A bright little boy looked him all over until his eyes rested on those shoes. He looked at his own clubby feet and then at his visitor's, and then looking up said: "Mister, is all your toes cuttted off but one?"

PUBLIC SPEAKERS

ARE often greatly annoyed, and their efforts impaired by Hoarseness, Catarrh, Bronchial or Throat Troubles. Use Wells's Health Renewer or Hoarhound and Tar [illegible] Pike's Toothache Drops Cure in one minute.

Hiscox's Hair and Whisker Dye, 50c.

FISHERMEN!

TWINE and NETTING

MANUFACTURED BY THE

BALTIMORE TWINE AND NET CO.

WM. J. HOOPER & SON,

No. 6 S. Calvert St., Baltimore, Md.

☞ Send for price-list, naming county and state. Please mention this paper.

THE BEST TYPE-WRITING MACHINE MADE

THE CALIGRAPH.

Superior quality of writing, interchangeable Ribbons and Manifolding Paper a specialty. Send for Catalogue.

HAMMOND & FRACKER,

87 Union Square, New York City.

HORSMAN'S CELEBRATED

Send Stamp for Catalogue.

E. I. Horsman,

80 & 81 William Street, New York.

LAWN TENNIS.

HOW TO MAKE PHOTOGRAPHS.

A copy of the above work, with Descriptive Catalogue, given to any one who contemplates the purchase of an Amateur Photographic Outfit. Catalogue of Every Description.

SCOVILL MFG. CO., 424 Broome Street, New York.

CATARRH

Any sufferer with Catarrh or Hay Fever who earnestly desires relief, and to whom a means of Permanent and Positive Cure. A Home Treatment. No charge for consultation by mail. Valuable Treatise Free. Certificates from Doctors, Lawyers, Ministers, Business men. Address Rev. T. P. CHILDS, Troy, Ohio.

CONGRESS WATER.

Superior to all. Cathartic, alterative. A specific for disorders of the stomach, liver, kidneys, eczema, malaria, and all impurities of the blood. Avoid crude, harsh waters, nitrate and foreign. Such waters are positive irritants and impair the digestive organs and kidneys. None genuine on draught.

SYPHER & CO.

ARE CONSTANTLY RECEIVING FROM ROUPEN

Antique Silver, Furniture, Clocks, Bronzes, and Articles of Vertu.

720 & 741 BROADWAY.

IT STANDS AT THE HEAD.

THE STAR THAT LEADS THEM ALL

UNEQUALLED FOR SIMPLICITY DURABILITY LIGHT OF OPERATION

THE LIGHT RUNNING DOMESTIC SEWING MACHINE

H. W. JOHNS' ASBESTOS

LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING,

Steam Pipe & Boiler Coverings, Steam Packing, Mill Board, Sheathing Paper, Fire Proof Coatings, &c.

H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO. 87 MAIDEN LANE, N. Y.

RoundWriting

BOOK FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION & PENS

Mailed for $1.50 by Stationers, or

R. G. DUN & COMPANY, New York.

THE BEST THE QUEBER WATCH CASE

Dr. J. W. J. Englar, of Baltimore, says: "Dr. Benson's Pills—an important addition to materia medica."

LOW, SON, & HAYDON'S

Flower de Luce

The Howard Tooth Brushes

HAVE

SECURELY FASTENED BRISTLES

AND CAN BE FOUND WITH ALL DRUGGISTS.

PINS BEARING THIS TRADE MARK P&A ARE SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS

MANUFACTURED BY

THE PLUME & ATWOOD MF'G CO.

WATERBURY, CONN.

GOLD PENS.

PENCILS, HOLDERS, CASES, &c.

THE CALLI-GRAPHIC PEN.

A GOLD PEN and RUBBER HOLDER, containing ink for several days' writing. Can be carried in the pocket. Always ready for use. A luxury for persons who care to preserve their individuality in writing.

MARIE, TODD, & HAMM,

Cor. Nassau and Liberty Sts., New York.

Send for Price List.

OUR GOODS ARE SOLD BY FIRST-CLASS DEALERS.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S

STEEL PENS

Solely ALL DEALERS throughout the WORLD

GOLD MEDAL PARIS EXPOSITION—1878

MARLIN MAGAZINE RIFLE

45 Govt. and 40-60 Grain Cartridges.

VERY STRONG, PERFECTLY SAFE.

THE BEST RifLE in the world for Large Game. Shooting more accurate, Model more beautiful, Manufacture easier, Finish finer, than that of any other rifle. MARLIN FIRE-ARMS CO. NEW HAVEN, CONN.

Print Your Own Cards, &c. Press $3

Large sizes for circulars, &c. $8 to $30. For pleasure, money-making, young or old. Everything easy, printed instructions. Send 2 stamps for Catalogue of Presses, Type, Cards, &c., to the factory.

KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

FOR THE MAJOR.

A Notebook. By Covernance. FREDERIC WOODMAN, Author of "Anne." 16°d. 10mo, Cloth, $1 00.

A story so sweet and simple that it suggests an old fashioned primitive ballad. She has chosen the most picturesque materials that America affords: . . . There are no analytical, soul-searching dissections of the commonplace of the various characters, it belongs to no particular school, and to the casual reader will not be so full of interest as Miss Woodman's "Anne." But from a literary point of view it is more finished, and to a critic interested in striking peculiarities of character it will prove a valuable study.—N. Y. World.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of the price.

EARL & WILSON'S PATENT SHORT BAND COLLARS AND "BEAD EDGE" CUFFS ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION

IT PAYS to sell our Rubber Printing Stamps. Sample free. J. M. Miller & Co., Cleveland, O.

AMERICAN STAR SOFT CAPSULES THE BEST. Also, Star Empty Capsules. All Druggists.

"I had Salt-Rheum for 40 years. Dr. Benson's Skin Cure cured me." F. P. Lavelle, Merced, Cal.

THE BLACKMAN WHEEL. PATENTED.

BY THE USE OF

BLACKMAN'S POWER VENTILATOR WHEEL

We can remove Foul Air, Steam, Smoke, Dust, &c., from any building; can make any hot room cool; can thoroughly Ventilate Hotels, Restaurants, Factories, Mills, Theatres, Mines, Vessels, Laundries, &c. Send for descriptive circulars. Also, send diagram of room or building to be ventilated, giving contents in cubic feet, and showing all openings. Address all communications from Western States to EXHAUST VENTILATOR CO., 116 Monroe St., Chicago, Ill.

From New York, New Jersey, and the New England States, to HOWARD & MORSE, 45 Fulton St., New York, N. Y.

From Pennsylvania and the Southern States, to EXHAUST VENTILATOR CO., 27 North 9th St., Philadelphia, Pa.

SPENCERIAN WRITING FLUID. Made of the finest Chemicals known. Combines three important qualities: Fluidity, Color, and Durability. IVISON, BLAKEMAN, TAYLOR & CO., 753 Broadway, New York.

RELIABLE TESTIMONY.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Sept. 6, 1882.

Hop Bitters Co.:

I am 74 years old, have lived 34 years in Philadelphia, and well known among Germans. I have been troubled 12 years with a white swelling on my right foot, and getting worse every year and very painful, and breaking out in hot weather. I consulted several doctors and they told me it was incurable, and I would have to take it with me to the grave. Some time ago I lost my appetite, was costive, had headache and fever, in fact, was very sick. I saw in the German Demorat that Hop Bitters was what I needed. I got a bottle, took it one week and was as well again as ever and to my greatest surprise, right from the first, my swelling went down gradually, and I taking another bottle got entirely well of it. The wife of our neighbor had two such swellings on her legs, and three bottles cured her. I think this is a great triumph for your bitters. JOHN SPELL,

No. 4 Young's Alley, above Wilcox St.

BRIDGEWELL, IND., Nov 12, 1881

Dear Sirs,—I have read so much about Hop Bitters, and always being afflicted with troubles, a sickness, diseased stomach, never having much health, I tried a couple bottles; it has strengthened and helped me more than any medicine or doctor. I am now on my third bottle, and am thankful that it has helped me. I will advise all that are afflicted to give it a trial. LEVI VAN.

Beat the World.

ROCKVILLE, CONN., March 6, 1882.

Hop Bitters Co.:

I have been taking your Hop Bitters for several weeks, and they beat the world.

L. S. LEGG, Lewis's Axle Works.

LEETONIA, PA., April 23, 1882.

Hop Bitters Co.:

